43028

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation129julnewy

Desk dup

The Nation

A WEEKLY JOURNAL DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE
DRAMA, MUSIC, ART INDUSTRY

FOUNDED 1865

43028

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

VOLUME CXXIX

JULY 3, 1929, TO DECEMBER 25, 1929

THE NATION, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXIX

JULY 3, 1929, TO DECEMBER 25, 1929

(Nos. 3339-3364)

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
C Correspondence
D Drama
Dt Driftway
E Editorial Article
EP Editorial Paragraph
I International Relations, Documents
IP International Relations, Foreign Press
IS International Relations, Signed Article
M Music
P Poetry
S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

A

Academic freedom
Diploma denied to M. Rosenstein as a communist, in Los Angeles; EP..... 79
Accorsi, Salvatore
Tried on charge of murder of Pennsylvania state trooper in break-up of Sacco-Vanzetti meeting; EP.....735; acquitted; EP..... 764
Actors' equity association. See Moving pictures Aderholt trial. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern Adler, Laurence
Fledermaus (Wonderful night, a); M.. 728
Girl of the golden west; M..... 727
Horowitz, Vladimir; M..... 727
New York musical season; M..... 472
Philharmonic concert; M..... 728
Toscanini's Wagner and Siloti's Liszt; M 529
Wonderful night, a (Fledermaus); M.. 728 Aeronautics
Accidents and development of flying. G. Britt; S..... 162
Aviation. H. Broun; S..... 241
Catullus on aviation. N. H. Dole; C.... 170
Falling airplanes, insurance against; Dt. 14
Flying from ocean to ocean. M. de M. Porter; S..... 36
Graf Zeppelin's flight across Pacific ocean; EP..... 235
Russian fliers not welcomed by United States government; EP..... 570
Six miles a minute; EP..... 315
Age should be forgotten; Dt..... 65
Agricultural relief
Farm board organized; EP..... 77
Farm board policy; formation of Farmers' national grain corporation; EP.. 130
First steps in farm aid; E..... 239
Relief probable for large-scale farming only; EP..... 341
Agriculture
Farmers' discontent. F. Fletcher; C... 42
"All quiet on the western front." See Remarque, E. M.
Allen, Robert S.
Mr. Shearer likes a big navy; S..... 378
See also EP..... 371
Alsberg, Henry G.
Organize the prisoners; C..... 493
Alvord, Clarence Walworth Memorial. S. J. Buck; C..... 492
America. See United States
American federation of labor
Convention; labor asleep; E..... 455
Loses strike at Marion, North Carolina; EP..... 340
American legion. See Naval reduction
American or foreigner? J. M. Jacobson; S.. 193
Amorous antic, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 786
Anderson, Paul Y.
Communications to be investigated by senate committee; S..... 661
Congress, recess; summary of session; S. 13
Disarmament; work on new American cruisers not suspended or delayed; S. 744
Hoover and patronage; S..... 518
Hoover and the tariff; S..... 514
Hoover appointments; S..... 660
Hoover's failure to lead; S..... 660
Johnson, H., not invited to White House dinner; S..... 579
Lobbying; J. A. Arnold; S..... 580
Radio trust; S..... 743
Senate blocs; S..... 661
Tariff; J. R. Grundy wants it written by Pennsylvania and Connecticut; S.... 579
Tariff; new measure not the Hawley-Smoot bill; S..... 580
Apartments
$45,000—by the day or hour? (in Hotel Delmonico); EP..... 237; letter, 354
Applause. A. Bakshy; D..... 503
Applejack myth. S. T. Byington; C....117; J. Ellmer; C..... 223
Arabs and the Arab-Jewish riots. See Palestine
Areson, C. W.
Correction on crosses; C..... 628
Armament reduction
Naval reduction only practicable now; EP..... 340
See also Naval reduction
Armant, Alex
Minority, intelligent (in Palestine); C. 466
Armistice day
England celebrates peace. W. Zukerman; S..... 742
Armistice Sunday and its significance. W. H. Sharp; S..... 519
Article indorsed. P. Schiller; C....627; J. C. Mortimer; C..... 751
Arnold, J. A. See Lobbying
Arsenal. A. Bakshy; D..... 640
Art
Modern, museum of. L. Goodrich; S.. 664
Arthur, Katharine
Women cabinet members; C..... 41
Astle-Bateman, John A.
"All quiet on the western front" banned in Ontario; C..... 751
Athletics. See College athletics
Auburn prison
Conditions cause revolt; E..... 768
Austral, Florence
Barred from singing in Worcester Cathedral, England; Dt..... 325 Australia
Election; EP..... 373
Labor landslide. J. H. Scullin, premier; EP..... 452
Austria
Crisis. G. E. R. Gedye; S..... 547
Fascist uprising possible; EP..... 261
Parliamentary troubles; EP..... 571
Revolution fails to come off; EP..... 372
Automobiles
Baby motor cars; E..... 185
Bad-roads movement; Dt..... 750
Dinosaurs of 1929. C. W. Broomall; C. 520
Gasoline-electric, tested; EP..... 262
Aviation. See Aeronautics

B

Backhill culture. C. M. Wilson; S..... 63
Bahr, Max
Destruction of Münsterwalde bridge; C. 170
Bailey, Forrest
Bazaar for P. Hibben memorial; C.... 587
Money for Gastonia; C..... 144
Bailie, Helen Tufts
Dishonoring the D. A. R.; S..... 323
Bakshy, Alexander
Applause; D..... 503
Arsenal; D..... 640
Blackmail; D..... 503
Box of Pandora, the; D..... 784
Condemned; D..... 729
Disraeli; D..... 562
Last performance, the; D..... 640
Moving pictures, art of; D..... 728
New Babylon, the; D..... 729
Sunny side up; D..... 503
Taming of the shrew, the; D..... 784
There are silent pictures; S..... 203
Trespasser, the; D..... 729
Vagabond lover, the; D..... 784
Vaudeville must be saved; D..... 98
Vaudeville, prestige of; D..... 258
Ball, W. W.
Catholicism and tolerance; C..... 118
Bank for international settlements. See War debts and reparations Bareuther, David G.
Reaching for the sky; S..... 585
Barkley, Frederick R.
Parity up or down; S....581; letter.... 666
Barkoski, John
Killing; W. J. Lyster acquitted; EP.... 371
Killing; W. J. Lyster, H. P. Watts and F. Slapikis acquitted of killing him. F. Butler and R. Taylor; S..... 404
Barnes, Harry Elmer
Robinson, William J., commendation of; C..... 305
Barnett, Amos H. Farm relief platform; Dt. 90
Baseball; world series. H. Broun; S..... 457
Beal, Fred Erwin
From the Gastonia jail; C..... 90
Beals, Carleton
Spain, censorship; IS..... 50
Spain, dictatorship; S..... 11
Spain, official corruption; IS..... 74
Belgium
Claim on Germany for redemption of worthless marks; EP..... 78
Benjamin F. Packard
Sale at auction; Dt..... 776
Bennett, Arthur
Criticism of Zionism; C..... 465
Benton, Paul
Defends American press against charge of jingoism; C..... 143
Berger, Victor L. Death; EP..... 183
Bergman, Bernard A.
Hotel Delmonico rental; C..... 354
Berkeley Square. J. W. Krutch; D..... 604
Bernheim, Alfred L.
Prosperity by proclamation; S..... 772
Wall street upside down; S..... 618
Bernstein, Herman
A. E. F. in Siberia; C (with editorial comment)..... 777
Bethlehem steel corporation. See China
Bible
In the schools. H. Broun; S..... 293
Biedenkapp, Fred G.
Attacked by C. G. Wood; EP..... 314
Bingham, Hiram. See Tariff
Birth control
Discussions, public; E..... 649
Bitter sweet. C. V. D.; D..... 642
Black, Ruby A.
Lobbies for loot; S..... 486
Portland (Maine) Evening News also printed accounts of administration of federal power act; C..... 354
Blackmail. A. Baskhy; D..... 503
Blackshear, William S. See Negroes
Blankenship, Russell
Parrington, Vernon Louis. Death; S.. 141
Blanshard, Paul
Uncle Sam's electric empire; S..... 34
Blue shirt, the. J. O. Thomas; S..... 407
Bodily exposure; E..... 317
Bonner, Marion
Behind the southern textile strikes; S.. 351
Book clubs
Compromise with publishers and booksellers; E..... 211
Books
Censorship. See Censorship—Books
Dedications; Dt.....304; 408
Flood of publications; EP..... 649
Index of prohibited books issued by Vatican; E..... 767
Spare the book and spoil the child. S. L. Goldsmith; S..... 428
Books—Children's
Illustration. S. G. Rich; S..... 589
Bootlegging. See Prohibition
Borough, Rube
Boulder dam; C..... 721
Boston
Book censorship; EP..... 341
Miscegenation its trouble. H. Broun; S.....345; letter by S. T. Byington 587
Boston Herald and Traveler
Sold by International paper company; EP..... 397
Boulder dam
Act does not advance public ownership; EP..... 77
Allocation of power. R. Borough; C... 721
Power distribution, plans for; EP..... 509
Wilbur, Secretary, at dam. R. Finney; S..... 714
Box of Pandora, the. A. Baskhy; D..... 784
Bremen, steamship; breaks record; E..... 108
Brenner, Anita
Gomez still rules; IS..... 232
Brenner, Anita, translator
Quecha poems from Peru; P..... 629
Briand, Aristide
Advocates United States of Europe; E. 317
Return as premier; EP..... 129
Briand-Kellogg pact. See Kellogg pact
Britannica, encyclopaedia. See Encyclopaedia Britannica
British empire
Dominions assuming control of foreign relations for themselves; EP..... 208
Britt, George
Where are we flying?; S..... 162
Brokers' loans
Reach new peak; EP..... 106
Brookhart, Smith W.
Tells of liquor at Washington dinner; Dt 626
Broomall, C. W.
Dinosaurs of 1929; C..... 520
Broun, Heywood
Aviation; S..... 241
Baseball world series; S..... 457
Bible in the schools; S..... 293
Boston censorship; S..... 483
Boston trouble is miscegenation. H. Broun; S..345; letter by S. T. Byington 587
Cannon, James, jr.; stock market activities; S..... 161
College athletics; Carnegie foundation report on professionalism; S..... 617

Drinking not merely exhibitionism; S.. 187
Egg balancing; S..... 653
Father and son; S..... 83
Football; case of D. Myers, Negro player of New York university; S..... 514
Gastonia situation; S..... 319
Harvard-Princeton football relations; S 575
Hate; S..... 109
Hoover and religious prejudice; S.... 267; letter by W. E. Sweet..... 588
Hoover attempts to create confidence in business; S..... 707
Hoover bows to Lord's day alliance; S. 213
John D., a portrait in oils; S..... 7 (See also Book Section of Index)
Journalists, outspoken; S..... 541
Materialism defended; S..... 769
Negroes, discrimination against; Blackshear case; S..... 377
Negroes, higher education as a handcuff; S..... 59
Prohibition and temperance; S..... 403
Race problem; S..... 135
Theater tickets, prices of; S..... 741
Unhappiness in books and on the stage; S..... 33
Browdy, Louis
Cleveland city manager; S..... 246
Brown, Beatrice
What is a Bingham?; C..... 587
Buchanan, Scott
Dewey, John; S..... 458
Buck, Solon J.
Alvord, C. W., Memorial; C..... 492
Budenz, Louis Francis
Vare's last triumph?; S..... 349
Buell, Raymond Leslie
East Africa, crisis in; IS..... 532
Bülow, Prince Bernhard von. Death; E.... 539
Burton, Theodore E. Death; EP..... 537
Business
Conferences called by President Hoover; EP..... 611
Hoover attempts to create confidence. H. Broun; S..... 707
Hoover conferences with leaders. L. Wolman; S..... 710
To the rescue; E..... 651
Butler, Frank, and Robert Taylor
Coal and iron justice; S..... 404
Butler, Nicholas Murray
Criticizes Republican party; EP..... 2
Butler, Smedley D.
Tells of marines' control in Nicaragua; EP..... 764
Byers, Edgar S.
Cleveland, Ohio, campaign; C..... 355
Byington, Steven T.
Applejack myth; C..117; J. Ellmer; C. 223
Clothes and the man; C..... 668
Loyalty and liquor; C..... 144
Pressing and hanging of witches in Massachusetts; C..... 587
See also Broun, H.; Boston
Bynner, Witter
Testament; P..... 225
Byrd Antarctic expedition
Byrd and three companions fly over south pole; EP..... 701
Newspaper ballyhoo; Dt..... 776

C

Calendar reform; E..... 343
California
Communism still a crime; EP..... 510
Communist "criminals." U. Sinclair; S 582
California, university of
New president, R. G. Sproul, a self-made man; EP..... 54
Calvert, E. Roy
Murder and the death penalty; S..... 405
Canada
Prohibition; Dominion opposed; EP... 536
Protest against United States tariff; official lying by United States state department; E..... 159
Candle light. D. V. D.; D..... 474
Candy
"White list" of manufacturers; EP.... 703
Candy rat, the. R. M. Knott; C..... 305
Cane, Melville
Fine rain; P..... 722
Cannon, James, jr.
Stock market activities. H. Broun; S. 161
Capital punishment
Murder and the death penalty. E. R. Calvert; S..... 405
Captain, sea. See Shipping
Captain Coll—legionnaire (Centralia case). C. E. Payne; S..... 38
Caribbean
Color in. A. Roller; IS..... 178
Life and property; I. Protection of life. J. Wickwire.. IS..... 259
II. Protection of property. J. Wickwire; IS.....335; letter by R. H. Murray 588
Carnegie foundation. See College athletics
Carpenter, Edward
Death. H. W. Jarrett; C..... 275
Death and burial. S. K. Ratcliffe; S.... 114
Carr, Clyde Syntax; C..... 275
Cason, Clarence E.
Football hero rebels; S..... 490
Catholics. See Roman catholics
Catullus on aviation. N. H. Dole; C..... 170
Censorship, book
Boston; EP..... 341
Boston. H. Broun; S..... 483
Candide released by customs; EP..... 79
Divided action by United States senate; EP..... 452
Florida censors textbooks; New York Times declines advertising of Kept woman; EP..... 571
Rabelais; censorship by customs. A. J. Nock; C..... 549
Centralia, Washington
Captain Coll—legionnaire. C. E. Payne; S..... 38
History of case; EP..... 105
Mackintosh, K., who upheld mob action, on law enforcement commission; EP. 105
Chafee, Zechariah, jr.
Prosperity; commencement address at Brown university; S..... 84
Channel road, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 530
Chase, Stuart
Prosperity—Believe it or not. I. What is prosperity?; S..... 460
II. New standards of living; S..... 488
III. The worker's share; S..... 545
IV. Workers and owners; S.....622; letter..... 777
V. The farmer's share; S..... 745
VI. Stresses and strains; S..... 774
Chekhov, Anton Pavlovich
Twenty-five years after; E..... 5
World. J. W. Krutch; D..... 366
Chewing gum in Chile; EP..... 183
Chicago Tribune
Nationalism, offensive; EP..... 451
Child labor
Decrease since 1904; EP..... 79
Children's books. See Books—Children's Chile
Chewing gum in; EP..... 183
Chilton, Carroll Brent
Protest against review of Keyserling's Creative understanding and recovery of truth; C..... 587
China
Bethlehem (steel corporation), Britain and the Chinese navy. K. K. Kawakami; IS..... 152
Breathing spell; EP..... 28
Chiang Kai-shek's star wanes; rebellion takes heart; EP..... 737
Civil war; why China fights. L. Fischer; S..... 708
Extraterritoriality demanded again by United States government; EP..... 207
Muzzling of the press; E..... 185
New war threatens; EP..... 648
Rebellion, new; EP.....399, 453
Chinese Eastern railway. See Sino-Russian controversy
Chinese-Russian controversy. See Sino-Russian controversy
Christian science
Biography of Mrs. Eddy criticized; E.. 265
Church and drama association
W. H. Hays and former governor Milliken removed from directorate; EP.. 765
Churches
And moving pictures; EP..... 765
Sectarian quarrels; EP..... 612
Cibulski, Samuel
MacDonald visit to United States only a bargaining over cruisers; C..... 666
Cigarettes; Dt.....40; 195
Circus, the; E..... 292
Citizenship
Duties of a citizen; citizenship denied to M. J. Graber because she would not promise to kill; E..... 615
Freedom of belief—for citizens only; E. 30
Refusal to bear arms made ground for denial of naturalization; EP..... 702
Women's. E. Wold; C..... 550
Claire Adams. J. W. Krutch; D..... 730
Classical foreshadowing. H. W. Reed; C.. 249
Clemenceau, Georges. Death; E..... 650
Cleveland, Ohio
Campaign. E. S. Byers; C..... 355
City manager survives. L. Browdy; S.. 246
Cleveland Press
Editor, L. B. Seltzer, and writer, C. K. Matson, convicted of contempt of court; E..... 108
Clothes and the man. S. T. Byington; C.. 668
Coal miners, American
Progress in improving relations in Colorado; EP..... 208
Codeine and morphine. G. H. Hitchings; C.. 16
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram
Boy in the house, the; P..... 589
There yet survived a god; P..... 198
Coleman, McAlister
Writing biography of E. V. Debs. Greenberg, Publisher; C..... 197
College athletics
Attacked in Carnegie foundation report; E..... 513
Carnegie foundation report on professionalism. H. Broun; S..... 617
Defended. H. Williams; C..... 627
Denounced by Euripides; EP..... 537
Colleges and universities
And Main street. E. C. Wilm; S..... 380
Color in the Caribbean. A. Roller; IS..... 178
Colorado
Progress in improving relations in mining industry; EP..... 208
Colorado state prison
Revolt of inmates; EP..... 398
Columbia university. See Propaganda
Commodore marries; D..... 332
Communications
Investigation to be made by senate committee. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 661
Monopoly in the air; E..... 766
Communism
And peace. H. W. Laidler; IS..... 394
Attacked by C. G. Wood; EP..... 314
Baiting of communists by courts and police continues; EP..... 764
Called crime in California; EP..... 510
"Criminals" in California. U. Sinclair; S..... 582
Diploma denied in Los Angeles to M. Rosenstein as a communist; EP..... 79
India; IP..... 732
Red-baiters; M. Woll and International labor service incite to violence; E.. 343
Tactics in south arouse fanatical opposition; EP..... 340
Condemned. A. Bakshy; D..... 729
Congress
See Anderson, P. Y.; Republican party
Connecticut
Supreme Court of errors voids 1,493 laws; EP..... 131
Conscientious objectors, British. H. W. Peet; IS..... 564
Conservatism and the classics. E. E. Edloff; C..... 385
Contempt of court. See Freedom of the press
Cook, Harold Lewis
Karnak; P..... 225
Cook, Waldo L.
Forgetting Sacco and Vanzetti; S..... 188
Cooksley, Bert
Stable boy; P..... 386
Copyright
Efforts to bring United States into International copyright union, and rescind protective policy; EP..... 209
Cost of living
Marriage; EP..... 373
Cotton manufacturing industry
Not dismayed by stockingless fad; EP.. 3
Cotton mills. See South; Strikes
Crawford, Merritt
Ungrateful films; C..... 249
Crime and criminals
Codes, new, of Prussia and Mexico analyzed. W. D. Lane; S..... 770
Gangster, the; E..... 31
Gangster the ideal soldier from a sergeant's viewpoint. E. Scott; C..... 144
War on crime; E..... 158
Criminal code. D. V. D.; D..... 474
Cross, Ephraim
Patriotism and religion; C..... 275
Cross, S. E.
Köbenhavn, missing; C..... 249
Cross roads. J. W. Krutch; D..... 640
Crosses, correction on. C. W. Areson; C.. 628 Cuba
Machado, President, reactionary regime; EP..... 339
Culture
Backhill. C. M. Wilson; S..... 63
One view of. M. P. Monroe; C..... 520
Customs service
"I. A." ("Immediate Attention"); Dt.. 408
Czecho-Slovakia
And Hungary. J. S. Roucek; C..... 67
Refuses to restore Hungarian territory; EP..... 702
See also Little Entente

D

D., C. V.
Bitter sweet; D..... 642
Strong man's house, a; D..... 367
Daily Herald (London)
Sold; passes into capitalistic hands; EP 613
Dana, John Cotton. Death; EP..... 105
Daughters of the American revolution
Blacklist controversy. H. T. Bailie; S. 323
Davis, Dwight Filley, and T. Roosevelt. R. N. M.; C..... 16
Dawes, Charles Gates
Culture. J. A. Scott; C..... 118
Dispatches as they may read; E..... 58
Dawes commission. See Santo Domingo
Dawes plan. See War debts and reparations
Death penalty. See Capital punishment
Debentures. See Tariff

Debs, Eugene V.
Biography by M. Coleman; material sought. Greenberg, Publisher; C..... 197
Debts, war. See War debts and reparations
Dedications of books; Dt.....304; 408
Defender, public. M. C. Goldman; C..... 550
Defense, national
United States needs larger navy. B. Shadwell; C..... 627
Dell, Robert
Replies to criticisms of article on Papal-fascist alliance; IS..... 24
See also C..... 15
Delmonico, Hotel
Rentals; EP.....237; letter..... 354
Denmark
Anthem, national. P. Guldbrandsen; C. 197
De Priest, Oscar
Sensible view on social question; EP.. 29
De Priest, Oscar, Mrs.
Visit to White house. T. Y. Steptoe; C. 144
Detzer, Dorothy
Permitted to take oath to "support" constitution without use of "defend"; gets passport; EP.....77, 130
Deutsch, Charles
Liberal party, need demonstrated by Thomas vote; C..... 666
Dewey, John. S. Buchanan; S..458; E. E. Edloff; C..... 668
Not blamable for American thinking. E. E. Edloff; C..... 668
Seventieth birthday celebration; EP.. 399; H. R. Linville; C..... 408
Dialects, American
To be recorded; EP..... 157
Dime novels; E..... 574
Dinosaurs of 1929 (automobiles). C. W. Broomall; C..... 520 Disarmament
Aerial disarmament of special importance; EP..... 703
And Kellogg pact; E..... 132
See also Armament reduction; Naval reduction
Disraeli. A. Bakshy; D..... 562
Divorce
Mexican; E..... 318
Yucatan; E..... 318
Doheny, Edward L.
And Mexican oil. R. H. Murray; C.. 588
Record. J. Wickwire; IS..335; R. H. Murray; C..... 588
Dole, Nathan Haskell
Catullus on aviation; C..... 170
Dominant sex. T. S. Harding; S..... 166
Dominican republic. See Santo Domingo Drama. See Theater, the Dress. See Fashions
Drevet, Camille
Political prisoners; C..... 550
Drewry, Carleton
Autumn; P..... 520
Father and son; P..... 327
Drinking not merely exhibitionism. H. Broun; S..... 187
Drugs
Codeine and morphine. G. H. Hitchings; C..... 16
Dudderidge, Mary
Protests against B. Russell's view on feminine intellect; C..... 720
Duffield, Marcus
Mussolini's red herring (American citizens of Italian extraction exempt from Italian military service); IS..... 644
Durant, Will. See Wolf Solent

E

East Africa
Crisis in. R. L. Buell; IS..... 532
Economics
Waste and prosperity; Dt..... 384
Eddy, Mrs. Mary Baker
Biography criticized; E..... 265
Edgerton, Charles E.
Use of "but what" and "that"; C..... 355
Edinburgh Review, the; demise; E..... 482
Edison, Thomas Alva
Electric light not invented by him. C. Rowland; C..... 355
Jubilee of incandescent light; EP..... 479
Edison electric illuminating company of Boston
Denied permission to split stock; EP. 451
Edison light stamp. T. H. Shastid; C..... 249
Editor and Publisher. See Propaganda
Edloff, Ethan E.
Conservatism and the classics; C..... 385
John Dewey; C..... 668
Edman, Irwin
Lines from an ungallant lover; P..... 68
Education
Conservatism and the classics. E. E. Edloff; C..... 385
Questionnaire by M. H. Harper; E.... 81
Edwards, Willard H.
Taking advantage of sunlight; C..... 66
Egg balancing. H. Broun; S..... 653
Egypt
Anglo-Egyptian proposals; EP..... 181
Anglo-Egyptian relations brought to fore by ousting of Lord Lloyd; EP..... 129
Compromise agreement with Great Britain; EP..... 398
New status for. E. P. MacCallum; IS. 369
Einstein, Albert
Einstein and science. M. M. Samuels; C, with editorial comment..... 196
Einstein field theory
And speed of nebulae; E..... 81
See also correspondence and editorial comment, 223
Elections, New York city and others; EP.. 569
Electric bond and share company. See Power
Electric empire, Uncle Sam's. P. Blanshard; S..... 34
Elliott, Paul D.
Reading matter for friends of Gandhi; C 67
Ellmer, Joseph
Applejack directory; C..... 223
See also Byington, S. T.
Encyclopaedia Britannica
Before us again; Dt..... 492
England. See Great Britain
English language
Use of "but what" and "that." C. E. Edgerton; C..... 355 Europe
Barriers to understanding with America. R. H. A. Schofer; C..... 628
United States of Europe. J. A. Hobson; S.....484; letter..... 628
United States of Europe advocated by A. Briand; E..... 317
European war
Great Britain refuses to return proceeds of confiscated German private property; EP..... 648
Memorial service for soldiers who died in northern Russia. H. Weimeister; C 777
Export debentures. See Tariff

F

Fall, Albert B.
Conviction; EP..... 509
Farm board and relief. See Agricultural relief
Farmers and farming. See Agriculture
Fascism
Mussolini's American empire; article in Harper's Magazine; EP..... 478
Fashions
Female form divine; E..... 540
Skirts, long? L. R. Sayler; C..... 384
Skirts, short; attempt to abolish; EP.. 373
Sweltering sex; E..... 159
Father and son. H. Broun; S..... 83
Federal power commission
And the public utilities; EP..... 701
Work, importance of, not realized; EP.. 736
Feller, A. H.
Reparations referendum, the; IS..... 672
Fiction
What is happening to it? R. Herrick; S 673
Fiesta. J. W. Krutch; D..... 393
Fifty million Frenchmen. J. W. Krutch; D 756
Finney, Ruth
Secretary Wilbur at Boulder dam; S.... 714
Fischer, Louis
Stimson bungle in Sino-Russian dispute; IS..... 788
Why China fights; S..... 708
Fledermaus (Wonderful night, a). L. Adler; M..... 728
Fletcher, Fred.
Farmers' discontent; C..... 42
Flexner, Bernard
Rights to a Jewish home land; S..... 347
Flood control
Mississippi valley question still lives; EP 736
Florida
And now the fruit fly. H. S. Villard; S..... 244
Flying. See Aeronautics
Food, fashions in; E..... 133
Food ships. See Freedom of the seas
Food trust organized; EP..... 3
Football
Case of D. Myers, Negro player of New York university; S..... 514
Football hero rebels, the. C. E. Cason; S..... 490
Harvard-Princeton football relations. H. Broun; S..... 575
New York university not to play Negro, D. Myers, against Georgia university; EP..... 510
See also College Athletics
Ford, Henry
Not worried by power trust; EP..... 78
Signs check for two cents; EP..... 79
Forests
Devastation must stop. R. Marshall; S. 218
France
Agrees to pay war debt to United States; EP..... 103
Briand, A., return as premier; EP..... 129
Cabinet making, difficulties in; EP..... 570
Daladier cabinet means support of government by socialists; EP..... 510
Intellectual interchange with Germany; EP..... 262
Freedom and loyalty; E..... 6
Freedom of belief—for citizens only; E.... 30
Freedom of speech
Dead letter in Philadelphia; EP..... 155
Freedom of the press
Cleveland Press, L. B. Seltzer, editor, and C. K. Matson, writer, convicted of contempt of court; E..... 108
Muzzling of the press in China; E..... 185
Freedom of the seas
Food ships in war time; Hoover proposal for exemption from capture; E..... 615 Freight
Delivery by railroad and truck, decision by Interstate commerce commission; EP..... 209
Fruit
Workers. C. M. Wilson; S..... 270
Fruit fly. See Mediterranean fruit fly

G

G., M.
June moon; D..... 504
Sons O'Guns; D..... 758
Galloway, Walter H.
Teachers, incompetent; C..... 385
Game of love and death. J. W. Krutch; D. 729
Gandhi, Mohandas Karamchand
Reading matter for friends. P. D. Elliott; C..... 67
Gangster, the; E..... 31
Ideal soldier from sergeant's viewpoint. E. Scott; C..... 144
Gastonia, North Carolina. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern Gedye, G. E. R.
Austria; crisis in; S..... 547
Geneva
I. Litvinov; S..... 219
Germany
Injustice to Germany. S. Knebel; C... 143
Intellectual interchange with France; EP 262
"Liberty law" sure of rejection; EP.... 702
Reparations referendum. A. H. Feller; IS..... 672
Rhineland evacuation by British announced; EP..... 208
Saar conference; E..... 705
Young plan. See War debts and reparations
See also European war; War debts and reparations
Gertz, Elmer
Harris, F.; material for biography sought; C..... 521
Gest, Morris. See Passion play
Girl of the golden west. L. Adler; M..... 727
Gloucester, Massachusetts
Fishing schooners race; EP..... 263
Goddard, Professor
Rocket fails to reach moon; EP..... 105
Goldman, Mayer C.
Defender, public; C..... 550
Goldman, Milt
Pleasures of haying; Dt..... 274
Goldsmith, Sophie L.
Spare the book and spoil the child; S.. 428
Gomez, Juan Vicente. See Venezuela
Goodrich, Carter
Queensland, labor in; IS..... 506
Goodrich, Lloyd
Museum of modern art; S..... 664
Gordon, Pierre
Russian executions denounced; C..... 720
See also EP..... 536
Gorman, John J. See History—United States
Graber, Martha Jane. See Citizenship
Graf Zeppelin
Flight across Pacific ocean; EP..... 235
Grammar. See English language
Grant, Robert
Defends Boston blue laws. H. Broun; S 483
Great Britain
And United States; prize essay by C. E. Payne.....EP. 3; S 8
Armistice day; England celebrates peace. W. Zukerman; S..... 742
Conscientious objectors. H. W. Pect; IS Egypt, relations with. See Egypt
Labor government declares there can be no neutrals in next war; EP..... 763
Labor government gains; EP..... 702
Labor government holding its own in political matters; EP..... 570
Labor party's domestic policy causes concern; EP..... 478
Labor to cooperate with Conservatives; E 56
Lindsay, Sir R., appointed ambassador to United States; EP..... 613
Not a cushion for Europe's ills; not industrially decadent. S. K. N.; C.... 668
See also 374
Relations with Russia to be resumed; EP 372
Russia; agreement with; EP..... 399
Unemployment; EP..... 571
Unemployment, Thomas policy; EP..... 613
See also European war
Great day. J. W. Krutch; D..... 530
Greenberg: Publisher
Material for Debs biography sought; C.. 197

Grundy, Joseph R.
Admitted to United States senate; EP 735, 763
See also Tariff
Guldbrandsen, Peter
Denmark's national anthem; C..... 197

H

H., C
Successor to editor of The Nation?; C 197
H., J. C.
Democrats and Pennsylvania; C..... 521
Haggin, B. H.
Music in Vienna; M..... 364
Viennese audience, the; M, 390; letter, 668
Hague conference. See War debts and reparations
Haiti
Devil-dog rule. S. Lewis; C..... 751
Failure, United States, in Haiti; E..... 739
Marines not needed; sent to Guantanamo instead; EP..... 764
Uprising feared; marines on watch; E.. 573
Hall, Bolton
Paying for petroleum; shale oil to supplement petroleum; C..... 249
Sagacity (German war debts); C..... 41
Halprin, Julius H.
Nation club for Newark proposed; C... 409
Ham
Virginia ham not sugar-cured; EP..... 263
Hamlin, Talbot Faulkner; R..... 46
Hanging
Neglected art, a; E..... 402
Harding, T. Swann
Dominant sex; S..... 166
Harper, Manly H.
Questionnaire sent to educators; E.... 81
Harris, Abraham I.
Story of H. Wirkkula killing; S..... 86
Harris, Frank
Material for biography sought. E. Gertz; C..... 521
Harris, John H.
Natives and the land (South Africa); IP..... 232
Haskel, Harry, Benjamin, and Charles
Object to characterization of Socialists as "doctrinaire"; C..... 720
See also 612
Haste, Gwendolen
Ophidia; P..... 92
Hastings, Thomas. Death; EP..... 537
Hastings, Thomas F.
Sino-Russian controversy; if Russia sent note to United States on Haiti; C.... 751
Hate. H. Broun; S..... 109
Hats
Hatless heads have finest hair. E. White; C..... 91
Hawaiian Islands
Religious intolerance; EP..... 156
Haying; Dt.....143, 274
Heatter, Gabriel
Marching on Broadway; C..... 274
Hedges, Ada Hastings
Summer; P..... 306
Herling, Jack
Marion strike; C..... 197
Herrick, Robert
What is happening to our fiction?; S.. 673
Hibben, Paxton
Hospital memorial fund bazaar. G. Stragnell and F. Bailey; C..... 587
Highways. See Roads
History as she is taught. R. Schlatter; C.. 720
History—United States
Muzzey, D. S., drops libel suit against J. J. Gorman for charges against Muzzey's "American History"; EP..... 478
Hitchings, G. H.
Codeine and morphine; C..... 16
Hobson, John A.
United States of Europe, the; S..484; letter..... 628
Hodges, Charles
Wall street and the world; S..... 658
Hoffmann, Alfred. See Strikes—Textile mills, southern Hollywood. See Moving pictures
Holmes, Jesse H.
Prohibition; EP.....2; C..... 15
Hooper, O. L.
Mathematics and inference; C, with editorial comment..... 223
Hoover, Herbert
And patronage. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 518
And the London disarmament conference; E..... 538
Appointments. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 660
Attempts to create confidence in business. H. Broun; S..... 707
Business conference; E..... 651
Conferences with business leaders. L. Wolman; S..... 710
Failure to lead. P. Y. Anderson; S... 660
Freedom of the seas; proposal to exempt food ships from capture; EP..... 615
Handshaking; EP..... 29
Johnson, H., not invited to White House dinner. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 579
Leadership, wobbling; EP..... 535
Message to congress; E..... 739
Naval reduction—Hoover style; E..... 342
Plan for conferences on business; EP.. 611
Prosperity by proclamation. A. L. Bernheim; S..... 772 Hope, Edward
Sex, if any; S..... 115
Horowitz, Vladimir. L. Adler; M..... 727
Houseparty. J. W. Krutch; D..... 333
Housing and street sprinkling; Dt..... 274
Howland, Emily. Death; EP..... 55
Hundred years old, a. D. V. D.; D..... 474
Hungary
And Czecho-Slovakia. J. S. Roucek; C. 67
Czecho-Slovakia refuses to restore territory; EP..... 702
See also Little Entente
Jails man for praising United States; EP..... 479
Minority rights and reparations dispute with little entente; EP..... 765
Hurley, Patrick J., new secretary of war; EP..... 735
Huston, Claudius Hart
New chairman of Republican national committee, out to hold southerners in line; EP..... 313
Hyde, M. P.
Wanted—a definite program; C..... 628
Hyder, Clyde K.
Swinburne, A. C.; material for books sought; C..... 493
Hydrogen not an element; EP..... 315

I

Iceland
Millennial celebration; EP..... 78
Social conditions. H. K. Laxness; IS.. 284
"Ilk," use of. C. Ward; C..... 492
Illustration of children's books, the. S. G. Rich; S..... 589
Immigration
Toller, E., detained at Ellis Island; EP 372
Income, national. C. Weed; C..... 777
See also 619 and 622
Income tax
Mellon plan for reduction; EP..... 611
Tax-free securities; EP..... 288
Index of prohibited books
Issued by Vatican; E..... 767
India
And dominion status; I..... 760
Books on; EP..... 55
Child marriage, legislation against; EP.. 453
Communism in; IP..... 732
Indians, American Conditions bad; EP..... 375
Injunctions
Restriction bill; EP..... 262
Institute of Pacific relations
American delegates travel via Russia; EP..... 156
Insurance, life
Insurance by the bucket; E..... 375
International labor service. See Communism
International ladies' garment workers freed from communist control; EP..... 737
International paper company
Sells Boston Herald and Traveler, last newspaper properties; EP..... 397
Intolerance, religious
In Hawaiian islands; EP..... 156
Iraq (Mesopotamia)
British mandate to be relinquished in 1932; EP..... 340
Uneasiness in; suicide of Premier Sir Abdul Muhsin; EP..... 612
Ireland
Joyce, J., and Ireland. M. Murphy; S. 426
Italy
Italian-Americans may return without conscription; EP..... 536
Mussolini's red herring (American citizens of Italian extraction exempt from Italian military service). M. Duffield; IS..... 644
White mice. F. McAllister; S..... 38

J

Jackson, Gardner
Malden, Massachusetts, "miracles"; S.. 662
Power of two ghosts; S..... 190
Jacobson, J. Mark
American or foreigner?; S..... 193
Japan
Enter Cupid; E..... 186
Politics; death of G. Tanaka; EP..... 372
See also Kellogg pact
Jarrett, H. W.
Carpenter, Edward; C..... 275
Jenny. J. W. Krutch; D..... 504
Jews
In Russia. M. Kadushin; C..... 16
See also Palestine
Johnson, Geoffrey
Climb, the; P..... 379
Johnson, Hiram
Not invited to White House dinner. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 579
Jones-White act. See Merchant marine
Joseph, Edward G.
British pledges to Arabs; C, with editorial comment..... 465
Josephson, Leon
Facts about Gastonia, the; C, with editorial comment..... 304
Journalists. See Newspapers
Joyce, J., and Ireland. M. Murphy; S.. 426
Jugoslavia
Reign of terror; IP..... 476
June moon. M. G.; D..... 504

K

Kadushin, Max
Jews in Russia; C..... 16
Karl and Anna. J. W. Krutch; D..... 504
Karolyi, Count
Admitted to United States; EP..... 509
Kawakami, K. K.
Bethlehem, Britain, and the Chinese navy; IS..... 152
Keith, Minor Cooper. Death; E..... 5
Kellock, Harold
U.S.S.R. and the Chinese Eastern railway; S..... 140
Kellogg pact
And disarmament; E..... 132
Phraseology creates tornado in Japan; EP..... 28
Kendrick, Benjamin B., sr. Republicans and the rest of us; S..... 112
Keyserling, Count Hermann
Creative understanding and the recovery of truth; review criticized. C. B. Chilton; C..... 587
Kienitz, E. V.
"All quiet on the western front," views on; C..... 550
Kissing
Rules issued by Kansas board of health; EP..... 453
Klein, Nicholas
Palestine riots; C..... 326
Knebel, Spear
Injustice to Germany; C..... 143
Knott, Rachel Mayer
Candy rat, the; C..... 305
Köbenhavn, Danish training ship, disappearance; EP.....183; S. E. Cross; C.. 249
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Amorous antic, the; D..... 786
Berkeley square; D..... 604
Channel road, the; D..... 530
Chekhov's world; D..... 366
Claire Adams; D..... 730
Commodore marries; D..... 332
Cross roads; D..... 640
Fiesta; D..... 393
Fifty million Frenchmen; D..... 756
Game of love and death; D..... 729
Great day; D..... 530
Houseparty; D..... 333
Karl and Anna; D..... 504
Ladies of the jury; D..... 530
Living corpse, the; D..... 785
Mlle Burrat; D..... 504
Maggie the Magnificent; D..... 563
Many waters; D..... 410
Mendel inc.; D..... 758
Merry widow, the; D..... 756
Mountain fury; D..... 410
Primer for lovers, a; D..... 669
Remote control; D..... 367
Review of Wolf Solent criticized by W. Durant; C..... 66
Scotland Yard; D..... 410
See Naples and die; D..... 409
Sherlock Holmes; D..... 730
Silver tassie, the; D..... 605
Strictly dishonorable; D..... 392
Sweet Adeline; D..... 310
Veneer; D..... 669
Week end; D..... 564
Winterbound; D..... 669
Your uncle Dudley; D..... 730

L

Labor
British. See Great Britain
Fruit workers. C. M. Wilson; S..... 270
Standards, challenge to. M. S. Rukeyser; S..... 164
Unemployment, British; EP..... 571
See also American federation of labor
Labor party (British). See Great Britain
Ladies of the jury. J. W. Krutch; D..... 530
Laidler, Henry W.
Communism and peace; IS..... 394
Lakatos, L.
Stet! (women and men before the law); C..... 41
Land taxation. See Taxation
Lands, public. See Public lands
Lane, Winthrop D.
Science in pursuit of crime; S..... 770
Larkin, Margaret
Ella May (Wiggins) songs; S..... 382
Last performance, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 640
Latin America
Change in policy of United States asked by La Prensa; EP..... 612

Law
And law enforcement. V. S. Yarros; S 60
Lawlessness, American; E. 134
Lawlessness by officials the root of American crime waves; E. 480
Lawn tennis
France defends Davis cup successfully; EP. 131
Laxness, Halldor Kiljan
May be deported for comment on Sacco-Vanzetti case. U. Sinclair; C. 91
Social conditions in Iceland; IS. 284
League for independent political action
Created; EP. 314
League of nations
Geneva. I. Litvinov; S. 219
Permanent court of international justice; British agree to submission of legal questions; EP. 1
Root formula for entry of United States into World court to come before congress; EP. 288
United States signs world court protocols; EP. 736
Left-handedness. J. C. Reeve; C. 118
Lewis, Alfred Baker. See Sacco-Vanzetti
Lewis, Nell Battle
Anarchy versus communism in Gastonia; S. 321
Tar heel justice; S. 272
Lewis, Sinclair
Devil-dog rule; C. 751
Libel suits. See History—United States
Liberal party
Need demonstrated by Thomas vote. C. Deutsch; C. 666
Life insurance
Passes $100,000,000,000 mark; EP. 263
Light, electric. See Edison, T. A.
Lindsay, Sir Ronald Appointed British ambassador to United States; EP. 613
Linville, Henry R.
Dewey, John, anniversary; C. 408
Lissauer, Ernest
Regrets publication of hymn of hate against England; EP. 451
Little entente
Minority rights and reparations dispute with Hungary; EP. 765
Little Review. Ends publication; E. 82
Litvinov, Ivy
Geneva; S. 219
Living corpse, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 785
Lloyd, Lord. See Egypt
Lobbying
Arnold, J. A., representative of American taxpayers' association and Southern tariff association. P. Y. Anderson; S. 580
Good and bad; E. 481
Lobbies for loot. R. A. Black; S. 486
Sugar lobby in Washington; EP. 763
Tariff bill, investigation; EP. 397
See also Naval reduction; Merchant marine; Tariff Locomotives
First in United States; EP. 183
Oil-electric, tested; EP. 262
Logan, Somerset
Actors' Equity loses; C. 409
London conference. See Disarmament
Looker, Charles
Irony (on publication of "All quiet on the western front" by W. R. Hearst); C. 223
Lord's day alliance. See Sunday observance
Losano, Marjorie
Underpaid woman workers; C. 91
Louvain university
Library inscription of W. Warren ordered placed; EP. 451
Lychenheim, Morris
Land taxation, taking unearned increment, a substitute for tariffs; C. 668
Lyster, Walter J. See Barkoski, J.

M

M., P.
Robin Hood; D. 758
M., R. N.
Roosevelt, T., and D. F. Davis; C. 16
McAllister, Francis
White mice; S. 39
MacCallum, Elizabeth P.
Egypt, new status for; IS. 369
McChesney, John
On review of Son of Apollo; C. 777
MacDonald, James Ramsay
And socialism. P. Pollack; C. 492
Man and prime minister; E. 454
Palestine riots, views on; EP. 288
Visit to United States; E. 290, 374; letter. 668
Visit to United States only a bargain over cruisers. S. Cibulski; C. 666
Welcome to United States; EP. 397
MacDonald, William
Reparations: Young and Dawes plans; S 205
McGarr, John
Defends Roman catholic church from criticisms by R. Dell; C. 15
Dell, R., replies; IS. 24
Machado, Gerardo. See Cuba
MacIntosh, Douglas C.
Citizenship denied for pacifist views; EP 3
Freedom of belief—for citizens only; E. 30
Who are bad citizens? E. D. Mead; C. 117
Mackintosh, Kenneth
Member of law enforcement commission; upheld mob action in Centralia; EP. 105
Macmahon, Benjamin
Color line, the; C. 521
McNutt, Paul V. See Naval reduction
Mademoiselle Burrat. J. W. Krutch; D. 504
Mademoiselle Modiste. D. V. D.; D. 474
Maggie the magnificent. J. W. Krutch; D. 563
Magnes, Judah
Sees a new vision of Arab and Jew in Palestine; EP. 647, 648
Main street and the colleges. E. C. Wilm; S. 380
Maine
Power export voted down. C. C. Nicolet; S. 320
Malden, Massachusetts, "miracles." G. Jackson; S. 662
Maloney, William J. See Naval reduction
Manchester Guardian
C. P. Scott retires as editor; EP. 55
Retirement. J. H. Hobson; S. 192
Manchuria. See Sino-Russian controversy
Manganese
Ores put on free list by senate committee; EP. 207
Mann, Thomas
Wins Nobel prize for literature; E. 616
Many waters. J. W. Krutch; D. 410
Marín, Luis Muñoz
Porto Rico; what next?; IS. 608
Marine corps
Devil-dog rule. S. Lewis; C. 751
Marion, North Carolina, strike. See Strikes —Textile mills, southern Marriage
Cost of living; EP. 373
Marsh, Corinna Reiman
Illusion; P. 675
To a modern painter; P. 494
Marshall, Robert
Forest devastation; S. 218
Massachusetts
Decline since Sacco-Vanzetti executions; E. 184
Materialism defended. H. Broun; S. 769
Matson, Carlton K. See Cleveland Press
Max, Prince, of Baden. Death; EP. 571
Mayer, Jacques
Viennese opera audiences; C. 668
See Haggin, B. H.
Mayo, Morrow
Rum running on Detroit river; S. 242; correction; C. 354
Mead, Edwin D.
Who are bad citizens?; C. 117
Mediterranean fruit fly. H. S. Villard; S. 244
Fought by science; rights of insect defended; EP. 209
Men and women before the law. L. Lakatos; C. 41
Mendel inc. J. W. Krutch; D. 758
Merchant marine
Lobbying for Jones-White act; EP. 339
Merry widow, the. J. W. Krutch; D. 756
Mesopotamia. See Iraq
Metellus, defense of. M. Radin; C. 274
Mexico
Churches reopen; EP. 1
W. Parsons corrects statements; C. 66
Divorce; E. 318
Oil and Mr. Doheny. R. H. Murray; C 588
See also Wickwire, J.
Penal code, new, analyzed. W. D. Lane; S. 770
See also National university of Mexico
Meyers, J. O.
All quiet on the northwestern front (Veterans of foreign wars encampment); S. 353
Michejda, Helen R.
Destruction of Münsterwalde bridge; C. 169
Militarism
At encampment of Veterans of foreign wars. J. O. Meyers; S. 353
Gangster an ideal soldier from sergeant's viewpoint. E. Scott; C. 144
Military titles; EP. 373
Mississippi river records; Dt. 168; correction 222
Mississippi valley flood question still a live one; EP. 736
Monroe, Mack P.
Culture, one view of; C. 520
Mooney and Billings
Crime against innocent men while California remains calm; EP. 736
Governor Young to consider pardon; EP 53
Smith, L., made death-bed confession of bomb throwing; EP. 570
Morals and movies; E. 291
Morawski, Ignace
Destruction of Münsterwalde bridge; C. 170
Morphine and codeine. G. H. Hitchings; C. 16
Morrison, Hyman
Jewish freedom; C. 465
Morrow, Dwight Whitney
To be United States senator from New Jersey; EP. 701
Mortimer, John C.
Armistice Sunday; approves W. H. Sharp's article; C. 751
Morton, David
Alien ethers; P. 675
Wood moment; P. 467
Moscow. See Russia
Moses, George H.
Use of phrase, "sons of the wild jackass," applied to senate; EP. 569
Motor cars. See Automobiles
Mountain fury. J. W. Krutch; D. 410
Moving pictures
Actors' equity association loses in Hollywood. S. Logan; C. 409
And the church; EP. 765
And the theater; E. 513
Art of. A. Bakshy; D. 728
Morals and movies; E. 291
Revolt in Hollywood by Actors' equity association. S. Logan; S. 61
Talkies for schools; EP. 353
There are silent pictures. A. Bakshy; S. 203
Ungrateful films. M. Crawford; C. 249
Unionism in filmland; E. 211
Moy, Ernest K.
Chinese and the Chinese Eastern railway; map; S. 138
Münsterwalde bridge. See Poland
Muhsin, Abdul. See Iraq
Murder
And the death penalty. E. R. Calvert; S 405
In a maze (Peacox case); E. 376
Murphy, Maurice
Joyce, J., and Ireland; S. 426
Murphy, William C., jr.
License to steal (tariff bill); S. 136
Murray, Robert Hammond
Mr. Doheny and Mexican oil; C. 588
Museum of modern art. L. Goodrich; S. 664
Music
In Vienna. B. H. Haggin; M. 364
Viennese audience, the. B. H. Haggin; M. 390; letter. 668
Mussolini, Benito. See Fascism; Italy
Muzzey, David Saville. See History—United States
Myers, Dave. See Football

N

N., S. K.
Great Britain not a cushion for Europe's ills; not industrially decadent. S. K. N.; C. 668
See also 374
Nagle, H. N.
Senators Norris and Bingham; C. 627
Nakedness; E. 317
Nation, The
Detroit readers to meet. J. Gomon; C. 587
Essay prize to Charles E. Payne; EP. 3
S. 8
Hazlitt, H., to become literary editor; EP. 703
Newark, N. J., club proposed. J. H. Halprin; C. 409
Praise for article on Passion play. M. M. Weisman; C. 16
Successor to the editor? C. H.; C. 197
Syntax. C. Carr; C. 275
Nation Club of Chicago
Dinner; C. 326
National Republic
Monthly Republican propaganda magazine; EP. 3
National university of Mexico
Student's strike brings about separation from government; EP. 157
Nationalism
Chicago Tribune's anti-British articles; EP. 451
Nationality: American or foreigner? J. M. Jacobson; S. 193
Natives and the land (South Africa). J. H. Harris; IP. 232
Naturalization. See Citizenship
Naval reduction
American delegation to conference a disappointment; EP. 647
British representatives at conference; EP 736
Hoover and the conference; E. 538
Japan, France, and Italy accept invitation; EP. 478
McNutt, P. V., commander of American legion, sounds discordant note; EP. 131
Much ado about disarmament; E. 290
Naval reduction—Hoover style; E. 342
Naval reduction only kind practicable now; EP. 340
Parity up or down? F. R. Barkley; S. 581
Propaganda by W. B. Shearer against reduction; senate inquiry, etc. EP. 287, 339; E, 316; EP, 371; S, 378; E, 401; EP. 452

Shearer document shown to be work of W. J. Maloney; EP.... 478
Statesmen and admirals; E.... 4
Work on new American cruisers not suspended or delayed. P. Y. Anderson; S 744
See also Disarmament
Negroes
Barring from Brooklyn church by the Reverend William S. Blackshear; EP. 341
Blue shirt, the; anti-Negro organization and publication. J. O. Thomas; S.. 407
Color in the Caribbean. A. Roller; IS. 178
Color line, the. B. Macmahon; C.... 521
Discrimination against; Blackshear case. H. Broun; S.... 377
Higher education not a handcuff to the Negro. H. Broun; S.... 59
North Carolina may let Negroes ride in buses; E.... 57
Race problem. H. Broun; S.... 135
South Africa; white man's justice; IP.. 102
Southern race prejudice. T. Y. Steptoe; C.... 144
See also De Priest, O.
Nelson, Frederic
Professor's progress. H. Bingham and use of experts in tariff legislation; S. 625
New Babylon, the. A. Bakshy; D.... 729
New Orleans. See Strikes
New York city
Election a disappointment; EP.... 569
Election; New York's Jimmie. C. F. Thompson; S.... 214
For N. Thomas. B. Postal; C.... 385
Mayoralty circus; E.... 455
Politics; EP.... 155
Seven wonders; Dt.... 116
Skyscrapers. D. G. Bareuther; S.... 585
New York musical season. L. Adler; M.. 472
Newark, N. J.
Nation Club planned. J. H. Halprin; C. 409
Newman, Israel
Cloud cities; P.... 752
Newspapers, American
Better in presentation of foreign news than European journals, according to O. H. Kahn; EP.... 209
Defended against charge of jingoism. P. Benton; C.... 143
Journalists, outspoken. H. Broun; S.... 541
Journalists, prayer for; Dt.... 464
Misrepresentations and suppressions. B. Watson; C.... 224
Reporters refuse to tell source of information concerning liquor; Dt.... 626
See also International paper company; Propaganda Newsprint
Scare over; E.... 767
Nicaragua
Butler, S. D., tells of control by marines; EP.... 764
Devil-dog rule. S. Lewis; S.... 751
Nicolet, C. C.
Maine wins its power fight; S.... 320
Nobel prize for literature
Mann, T., wins award; E.... 616
Nock, Albert Jay
Rabelais; censorship by customs; C.... 549
Norris, George William
And H. Bingham. H. N. Nagle; C.... 627
Candidate for reelection; EP.... 535
Power trust in the public schools; S.. 296
North Carolina
May let Negroes ride in buses; E.... 57
Troubles in proceedings against A. Hoffmann and others; EP.... 648
See also Strikes—Textile mills, southern Nudity; E.... 317

O

O'Connor, Thomas Power. Death; EP.... 613
Oil. See Petroleum
Old age pensions
Progress in United States; EP.... 536
Opera
Audiences in Vienna. J. Mayer; C.... 668
See also Haggin, B. H.
Orton, Vrest
Poetry magazines; correction; C.... 67

P

Pacific ocean. See Institute of Pacific relations
Pacifism
Detzer, D., takes oath of allegiance without use of "defend"; EP.... 77
Detzer, D., permitted to take oath to "support" constitution; gets passport; EP.... 130
MacIntosh and Schwimmer cases; EP.. 3
Pajamas for street wear; EP.... 131
Palestine
Arab-Jewish riots; EP.... 235
Arab-Jewish riots; Arabs the aggressors; EP.... 261
Marching on Broadway. G. Heatter; C. 274
Trouble persists; EP.... 613
Two views. U. F. Rabinovitz and N. Klein; C.... 326
Views of J. R. MacDonald; EP.... 288
Arabs, lands of; E.... 264
British pledges to Arabs. E. G. Joseph; C, with editorial comment.... 465
Jewish freedom. H. Morrison; C.... 465
Jewish home land, rights to. B. Flexner; S.... 347
Magnes, J., sees a new vision of Arab and Jew; EP....647, 648
Minority, intelligent. A. Armant; C... 466
Myths in Palestine. W. Zukerman; IS. 412
Pledges made to Arabs by British; EP. 765
Protest against attitude of The Nation. H. Schlossman; C.... 466
Zionism, a criticism of. A. Bennett; C 465
Zionism and peace of the world. A. Rihani; E.... 346
Pan-Americanism. See Caribbean Panama
Awaits the ax; E.... 133
Parity. See Naval reduction
Parrington, Vernon Louis. Death. R. Blankenship; S.....141; EP.... 29
Parsons, Wilfrid. See Mexico
Passfield, Baron, of Passfield Corner (S. Webb). Takes seat in House of Lords; EP.... 28
Passion play
Praise for The Nation's criticism. M. M. Weisman; C.... 16
Passports. See Detzer, D.
Patriotism and religion. E. Cross; C.... 275
Patronage and President Hoover. P. Y. Anderson; S.... 518
Payne, C. E.
Captain Coll—legionnaire (Centralia case); S.... 38
Payne, Charles E.
England and America; wins The Nation's essay prize; EP.....3; S.... 8
Peace
And communism. H. W. Laidler; IS.. 394
Peace pact. See Kellogg pact
Peacox murder case. See Murder
Pearson, Drew
Federal control of the power trust; S.. 300
Peet, Hubert W.
Britain's conscientious objectors; IS.. 564
Pennsylvania
Coal and iron justice. F. Butler and R. Taylor; S.... 404
Democrats, successes of. J. C. H.; C.. 521
Grundy, J. R., new senator; EP.... 735
Permanent court of international justice. See League of nations
Petroleum
Paying for petroleum; shale oil to supplement supply. B. Hall; C.... 249
Salt creek scandal; EP.... 27
Philadelphia
Election, primary: Vare's last triumph? L. F. Budenz; S.... 349
Freedom of speech a dead letter; EP.. 155
Philharmonic concert. L. Adler; M.... 728
Philippine islands
Coastwise shipping laws could harm Filipinos; EP.... 535
Independence debated in Congress; EP 765
Pick, Eugene
Inventor of Bolshevik "plots" convicted of forgery; EP.... 314
Pigeons
Obsolete as navy message bearers; EP.. 289
Pilsudski, Marshal. See Poland
Pittsburgh coal company. See Barkoski, J.
Plagiarism suits; E.... 456
Poems
Abandoned mill: New Bedford. J. Rorty 250
Alien ethers. D. Morton.... 675
Autumn. C. Drewry.... 522
Boy in the house, the. R. P. T. Coffin 589
Cat. E. Scott.... 17
Climb, the. G. Johnson.... 379
Cloud cities. I. Newman.... 752
Crusade. E. L. Walton.... 778
Father and son. C. Drewry.... 327
Fiddler's green. A. Wurdemann.... 145
Fine rain. M. Cane.... 722
For the nursery. H. S. White.... 276
Free woman, a. J. Rorty.... 327
Illusion. C. R. Marsh.... 675
Karnak. H. L. Cook.... 225
Laboratory still life. M. Van Doren.. 356
Lines from an ungallant lover. I. Edman.... 68
Loneliness. E. L. Walton.... 145
Magazines; correction. V. Orton; C... 67
Maine: November. H. S. White.... 171
Marriage songs. M. Van Doren.... 43
Meditations in a country churchyard. J. Rorty.... 484
Not spring. J. Rorty.... 722
Ophidia. G. Haste.... 92
Phenomena. M. Van Doren.... 119
Quecha poems from Peru. Collected by D. A. Robels. Translated by A. Brenner.... 629
Repulse. M. de L. Welch.... 250
Stable boy. B. Cooksley.... 386
Stonehenge. A. Wurdemann.... 552
Summer. A. H. Hedges.... 306
Testament. W. Bynner.... 225
There yet survived a god. R. P. T. Coffin.... 198
Three men: The experience; the player; the quartet. M. Van Doren.... 425
To a modern painter. C. R. Marsh.. 494
Trade rats. L. Speyer.... 752
White knight. E. D. Todd.... 386
Wood moment. D. Morton.... 467
Poland
Coup d'etat, first step toward, by Pilsudski; EP.... 536
Münsterwalde bridge destruction; three letters on; C.... 169
Parliamentary troubles; EP.... 571
Police inquisition; Dt.... 719
Pollack, Philip
MacDonald and socialism; C.... 492
Porter, M. de M.
Flying from ocean to ocean; S.... 36
Porter, Paul
Justice and chivalry in Carolina; S.... 214
Portland (Maine) Evening News
Also printed accounts of administration of federal power act. R. A. Black; C.... 354
Porto Rico
Politics; EP.... 288
What next? L. Muñoz Marín; IS.... 608
Postal, Bernard
For N. Thomas; C.... 385
Postal savings
Increase in New York, but interest remains low; EP.... 263
Post office department, United States
Deficit; E.... 210
Power
Right denied to Federal trade commission to see books of Electric bond and share company; EP.... 106
Power combination, New York state; EP.. 3
Power industry
Centralization of power control.... 297
Challenge to power interests; EP.... 287
Federal control of the power trust. D. Pearson; S.... 300
Government wins point in fight with companies; E....212; correction.... 354
Governor Roosevelt's power program. S. I. Rosenman; S.... 302
Maine votes down power export. C. C. Nicolet; S.... 320
Overcapitalized; EP.... 736
Publicity work; EP.... 156
Triumph of the power companies. H. Raushenbush; S.... 294
Wisconsin's power fight. A. C. Reis; S. 298
See also Federal power commission
Power trust
Does not worry Henry Ford; EP.... 78
In the public schools. G. W. Norris; S. 296
"Say it with deposits"; E.... 31
Powys, John Cowper. See Wolf Solent
Press. See Newspapers
Primer for lovers, a. J. W. Krutch; D.. 669
Prison riots
Auburn conditions cause revolt; E.... 768
Prisons
Revolt in Colorado state prison; EP.... 398
Riots; E.... 158
Prisoners, political Plea for. C. Drevet; C.... 550
Prisons and Prisoners
Organize the prisoners. H. G. Alsberg; C.... 493
Prohibition
And temperance. H. Broun; S.... 403
Applejack myth. S. T. Byington; S.. 117
Bootlegging not turpitude, court holds; EP.... 106
Brookhart, S. W., tells of liquor at Washington dinner; Dt.... 626
Canada not for prohibition; EP.... 536
Drinking not merely exhibitionism. H. Broun; S.... 187
Legal complications; EP.... 649
Loyalty and liquor. S. T. Byington; C. 144
Referendum, national, advocated; EP... 2
J. H. Holmes; C.... 15
Reporters refuse to tell source of information concerning liquor; Dt.... 626
Rum running on Detroit river. M. Mayo; S....242; correction; C.... 354
Sheppard proposal to make liquor buying a crime; EP.... 479
Shriners' convention yields bottles; EP. 29
Treasury department seeks state and local aid in enforcement; E.... 291
Two more killed in dry raid; EP.... 53
Violence in enforcing; EP.... 2
Wickersham enforcement plan; E.... 107
Wirkkula killing by liquor patrolmen. A. I. Harris; S.... 86
See also Applejack myth
Propaganda
Publicity course at Columbia university condemned by Editor and Publisher; EP.... 452
Publicity work of power companies; EP. 156
See also Naval reduction (for Shearer activity)

Prosperity
Articles by S. Chase on Prosperity—
Believe it or not. I. What is prosperity?; S..... 460
II. New standards of living. S. Chase; S 488
III. The worker's share. S. Chase; S. 545
IV. Workers and owners. S. Chase; S.....622; letter..... 777
V. The farmer's share. S. Chase; S.. 745
VI. Stresses and strains. S. Chase; S. 774
By proclamation. A. L. Bernheim; S. 772
Commencement address at Brown university. Z. Chafee, jr; S..... 84
Protection. See Tariff
Prussia
Penal code, new, analyzed. W. D. Lane; S 770
Public lands
Hoover policy; EP..... 235
People's soil, the; E..... 265
Public ownership
Not advanced by Boulder dam act; EP 77
Public utilities
And the Federal power commission; EP 701
Santo Domingo; only profitable systems sold to Southern cities utilities company; EP..... 237
Publicity. See Propaganda

Q

Queensland
Labor. C. Goodrich; IS..... 506

R

Rabelais, François
Censorship by customs. A. J. Nock; C 549
Rabinowitz, U. F.
Palestine riots; C..... 326
Race problem. See Negroes
Radin, Max
Defense of Metellus; C..... 274
Radio
Loud-speaker haled to court; Dt..... 353
Monopoly in the air; E..... 766
Radio corporation of America
Radio trust. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 743
Railroads
Consolidations; EP..... 54
Ratcliffe, S. K.
Carpenter, E. Death and burial; S.... 114
Snowden, P., at the Hague; S..... 268
Raushenbush, H. S.
Triumph of the power companies; S.. 294
Reed, Harold Whitman
Classical foreshadowing; C..... 249
Reeve, J. C.
Left-handedness; C..... 118
Reis, Alvin C.
Wisconsin's power fight; S..... 298
Religion
And patriotism. E. Cross; C..... 275
Church dignitaries renounce orthodox views on hell and literal truth of Bible; EP..... 703
Religious intolerance
In Hawaiian islands; EP..... 156
Religious liberty; E..... 481
Religious prejudice
Hoover and religious prejudice. H. Broun; S..267; letter by W. E. Sweet 588
Remarque, Erich Maria
"All quiet on the western front"; opinions of former German officer. E. V. Kienitz; C..... 550
"All quiet on the western front" banned in Ontario. J. A. Astle-Bateman; C. 751
Publication of "All quiet on the western front" by W. R. Hearst. C. Looker; C 223
Remote control. J. W. Krutch; D..... 367
Reparations, war. See War debts and reparations
Reporters. See Journalists
Republican party
Breakdown shown at adjournment of special session of congress; EP..... 647
Criticized by N. M. Butler; EP..... 2
"Fit to rule"; E..... 704
Huston, C. H., new national chairman, out to hold southerners in line; EP.. 313
Republicans and the rest of us. B. B. Kendrick, Sr.; S..... 112
Rich, Stephen G.
Illustration of children's books; S..... 589
Rihani, Ameen
Zionism and peace of the world; S.... 346
Roads
Poor, advocated; Dt..... 586
Problem of the road; E..... 652
Robberies
Private more efficient than public; EP.. 399
Robbins, Howard Chandler; sermon on freedom and loyalty; E..... 6
Robin Hood. P. M.; D..... 758
Robinson, William J.
Commendation. H. E. Barnes; C..... 305
Rockefeller, John D.
John D., a portrait in oils, life by J. K. Winkler. H. Broun; S..... 7
Rocky mountain fuel company
Progress in improving relations with labor; EP..... 208
Roller, Arnold
Color in the Caribbean; IS..... 178
Roman catholics
Catholicism and tolerance. W. W. Ball; C 118
Church defended against criticism by R. Dell. J. McGarr; C..... 15
Dell, R., replies; IS..... 24
Index of prohibited books issued; E.... 767
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
Power program. S. I. Rosenman; S.. 302
Two recent addresses commended; EP.. 569
Roosevelt, Theodore, and Dwight F. Davis.
R. N. M.; C..... 16
Roosevelt, Theodore, jr.
In political menagerie in Porto Rico; EP 288
Rorty, James
Abandoned mill: New Bedford; P..... 250
Free woman, a; P..... 327
Meditations in a country churchyard; P 494
Not spring; P..... 722
Rosenbaum, Helen C.
One mother (on war); C..... 223
Rosenman, Samuel I.
Governor Roosevelt's power program; S 302
Rosenstein, Max
Denied diploma in Los Angeles as a communist; EP..... 79
Roucek, Joseph S.
Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia; S..... 67
Rowland, Courtney
Edison and electric lights; C..... 355
Rukeyser, Merryle Stanley
Challenge to labor standards; S..... 164
Rum running. See Prohibition
Russell, Bertrand
Use of Wisconsin university gymnasium denied for lecture. R. W. W.; C.. 627 View on feminine intellect disputed by M. Dudderidge; he replies; C..... 720
Russia
Buys steamships from United States shipping board; EP..... 611
Executions; EP..... 536
Executions denounced. P. Gordon; C.. 720
Fliers not welcomed by United States government; EP..... 570
From a car window, articles by O. G. Villard. I. The observer's problem; S 515
II. The industrial vision; S..... 542
III. Spirit of the government; S..... 576
IV. The unfolding of a great drama; S 619; letter..... 777
V. Soviets and the human being; S. 654
VI. The soviets and the future; S.... 712
Great Britain; agreement with; EP.... 399
Jews in Russia. M. Kadushin; C..... 16
Moscow sun worshipers. P. Tucker; C. 224
Non-recognition policy of United States stultified by action in Sino-Russian dispute; EP..... 129
Pick, E., inventor of Bolshevik "plots," convicted of forgery; EP..... 314
Recognition by Great Britain; EP..... 157
Recognition, and relations with; E..... 32
Relations with Great Britain to be resumed; EP..... 372
Sunday abolished as legal holiday; E.. 57
See also War, European, for soldiers who died in northern Russia
Russian-Chinese controversy. See Sino-Russian controversy

S

Saar. See Germany
Sacco-Vanzetti
Forgetting Sacco and Vanzetti. W. L. Cook; S..... 188
Laxness, H. D., may be deported for comment on case. U. Sinclair; C.... 91
Lewis, A. B., and J. Wales freed of charges in Boston; EP..... 289
Massachusetts decline since executions; E 184
Power of two ghosts. G. Jackson; S.. 190
See also Accorsi, S.
Saint Paul's chapel; Dt..... 248
Salt creek scandal. See Petroleum
Samuels, M. M.
Einstein and science; C, with editorial comment 196
Santo Domingo
Dawes commission. R. Veatch; S..... 110
Public utilities, profitable, sold to Southern cities utilities company; EP..... 237
Saws, new, for old; E..... 240
Sayler, Lucie R.
Long skirts?; C..... 384
Schiller, Philip
Armistice Sunday; C..... 627
See also Armistice Sunday
Schlatter, Richard
History as she is taught; C..... 720
Schlossman, Herman
Protest (against attitude of The Nation on the Palestinian situation); C..... 466 Schofer, Richard H. A.
Barriers to understanding between Europe and United States; C..... 628
Schoolma'am, A
Summer school is over; S..... 220
Schwimmer, Rosika
Freedom of belief—for citizens only; E. 30
Wins libel suit against F. R. Marvin; EP 3
Science and certitude; E..... 81
See also correspondence and editorial comment, 223
Scientists
Duty to the world; EP..... 182
Scotland Yard. J. W. Krutch; D..... 410
Scott, C. P. See Manchester Guardian
Scott, Evelyn
Cat; P..... 17
Scott, John A.
C. G. Dawes a man of culture; C.... 118
Scullin, James Henry. See Australia
Sea change, in terms, "port" and "starboard"; E..... 740
Seagle, William
State songs; S..... 88
Sea-gull, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 366
See Naples and die. J. W. Krutch; D..... 409
Seltzer, Louis B. See Cleveland Press
Senate, United States
Blocs. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 661
Control by "sons of the wild jackass"; EP 569
Sex
Dominant sex. T. S. Harding; S..... 166
Freedom; Dt..... 325
Sanity and sex; meeting of World league for sexual reform; E..... 239
Sex, if any. E. Hope; S..... 115
Shadwell, Bertrand
Says America needs larger navy; C.... 627
Shale oil. See Petroleum
Sharp, Waitstill Hastings
Armistice Sunday and its significance; S 519
Article indorsed. P. Schiller; C..627; J. C. Mortimer; C..... 751
Shastid, Thomas Hall
Edison light stamp; C..... 249
Shearer, William B. See Naval reduction
Sheppard, Morris. See Prohibition
Sherlock Holmes. J. W. Krutch; D..... 730 Shipping
Exit the captain as king; E..... 344
Ships by order; E..... 706
Shriners. Convention yields bottles; EP.. 29
Siloti's Liszt and Toscanini's Wagner. L. Adler; M..... 529
Silver tassie, the. J. W. Krutch; D..... 605
Sinclair, Upton
Communist "criminals" in California; S 582
Laxness, H. J., may be deported for comment on Sacco-Vanzetti case; C.. 91
Sino-Russian controversy
Chinese and the Chinese Eastern railway; map. E. K. Moy; S..... 138
Chinese-Eastern railway still in Chinese hands; EP..... 236
Crisis over Chinese Eastern railway; agreements of 1924; I..... 126
Countries at odds over Chinese Eastern railway; E..... 80
If Russia sent note to United States on Haiti; C..... 751
Military situation grave; EP..... 208
Muddle; EP..... 314
No international intervention in sight; EP 181
Non-recognition of Russia by United States stultified by action in Sino-Russian dispute; EP..... 129
Stimson move for intervention in Sino-Russian dispute; E.....705; 738
Stimson's bungle. L. Fischer; IS..... 788
Trying to settle dispute; EP..... 103
U.S.S.R. and the Chinese Eastern railway. H. Kellock; S..... 140
Skirts, short. See Fashions
Skyscrapers. See New York city
Slapikis, Frank. See Barkoski, J.
Sleep; EP..... 765
Need for; Dt..... 222
Slosson, Edwin E. Death; EP..... 479
Smith, Lewis. See Mooney and Billings
Snowden, Philip. See War debts and reparations
Socialist party
Definite program wanted. M. P. Hyde; C 628
Dropping of name to draw independent voters urged at New York meeting; EP 612
See also 720
Characterization of Socialists as "doctrinaire" brings reproof. H., B. and C. Haskel; C..... 720
See also 612
Songs, state. W. Seagle; S..... 88
Sons O'Guns. M. G.; D..... 758
South
Challenge to labor standards; S..... 164
Cotton mill conditions ameliorated; EP. 182
South Africa. See Union of South Africa
Southern California Edison company
Wants power from Boulder dam. R. Finney; S..... 714

Spain
Censorship. C. Beals; IS..... 50
Dictatorship.. C. Beals; S..... 11
Official corruption. C. Beals; IS..... 74
Speyer, Leonora
Trade rats; P..... 752
Sproul, Robert Gordon. See California, university of State department
Lying, official; E..... 159
State songs. W. Seagle; S..... 88
Steptoe, T. Y.
Southern race prejudice; C..... 144
Stet! (women and men before the law). L. Lakatos; C..... 41
Stimson, Henry L.
Bungle in Sino-Russian dispute. L. Fischer; IS..... 788
Extraordinary Mr. Stimson; action in Sino-Russian dispute; E..... 738
Stockingless fad and cotton manufacturing; EP..... 3
Stocks
Business to the rescue; E..... 651
Crash; after the whirlwind; E..... 614
Crash; the men who did it; E..... 539
Dividends; EP..... 341
Losses doubted; Dt..... 666
Permission denied to Edison electric illuminating company to split stock; EP 451
Taylor, Myron C., views on crash; EP. 703
Wall street and the world. C. Hodges; S..... 658
Wall street upside down. A. L. Bernheim; S..... 618
Wall street's crisis; E..... 511
Stolberg, Benjamin
Madness in Marion; S..... 462
Storey Moorfield
Death; EP..... 511
Stragnell, Gregory
Bazaar for P. Hibben memorial; C..... 587
Street sprinkling and housing; Dt..... 274
Stresemann, Gustav
Death; E..... 400
Strictly dishonorable. J. W. Krutch; D.... 392
Strikes
Anarchy versus communism in Gastonia. N. B. Lewis; S..... 321
Another Sacco-Vanzetti case?; E..... 106
Behind the southern textile strikes. M. Bonner; S..... 351
Broun, H., on Gastonia; S..... 319
Communist tactics arouse fanatical opposition; EP..... 340
Conviction and sentence of accused men, Gastonia; EP..... 477
Facts about Gastonia. L. Josephson; C, with editorial comment..... 304
From the Gastonia jail. F. E. Beal; C. 90
Hoffmann, A., fined and imprisoned in Marion riot case; EP..... 702
Jury, second, in Gastonia case; EP.... 398
Justice and chivalry in Carolina. P. Porter; S..... 214
Justice in Gastonia; E..... 160
Marion, North Carolina, help for. N. Thomas; C..... 493
Marion, madness in. B. Stolberg; S.... 462
Marion, massacre of strikers; EP..... 398
Marion. J. Herling; C..... 197
Marion strike lost by American federation of labor; EP..... 340
Marion manufacturing company profitable; EP..... 510
Meeting in Philadelphia broken up by police; EP..... 155
Mistrial, Gastonia case, due to juror's insanity followed by mob violence against defense; EP..... 289
Money for Gastonia. F. Bailey; C.... 144
Murdering strikers not a crime; EP.... 510
New Orleans trolley strike settled; public supported strikers; EP..289; correction; EP..... 315
Nine prisoners in Gastonia case freed; charge against others reduced to second-degree murder; EP..... 371
North Carolina finds trouble in proceeding against A. Hoffmann and others; EP..... 648
Prejudice against defendants at Gastonia; EP..... 53
Relief. N. Thomas; C..... 41
Tar heel justice. N. B. Lewis; S..... 272
Trial, Gastonia, opens; EP..... 237
Ware Shoals, South Carolina, strike lost; EP..... 130
Wiggins, E. M., murdered by mob at Gastonia; EP..... 313
Wiggins, Ella May, songs. M. Larkin; S..... 382
Wiggins case investigation ordered by Governor Gardner of North Carolina; EP..... 570
Strikes—Textile workers, British
Depression in industry brings proposed wage cut of 12½ per cent and strike and lockout; EP..... 130
Strong man's house, a. D. V. D.; D..... 367
Sugar. See Tariff
Sullivan, Major General John
On two-cent stamp; EP..... 55
Summer schools for the teacher. A Schoolma'am; S..... 220
Sun worship
Devotees at Laguna Beach, California, in trouble; EP..... 315
Moscow. P. Tucker; C..... 224
Sunday
Can we abolish it?; E..... 57
Hoover, President, bows to Lord's day alliance. H. Broun; S..... 213
Sunlight, taking advantage of. W. H. Edwards; C..... 66
Sunny side up. A. Bakshy; D..... 503
Sweet, William E.
Replies to H. Broun on defeat of Smith for presidency; C..... 588
Sweet Adeline; D..... 310
Sweltering sex; E..... 159
Swinburne, Algernon Charles
Material for biography sought. C. K. Hyder; C..... 493
Syntax. C. Carr; C..... 275

T

Talkies. See Moving pictures
Taming of the shrew, the. A. Bakshy; D. 784
Tanaka, Giichi. Death; EP..... 372
Tariff—United States
Before the senate; bitter fight expected; EP..... 207
Bill crumbles; EP..... 509
Bill reported to senate; EP..... 262
Bill still before senate; EP..... 452
Bingham, H., and G. W. Norris. H. N. Nagle; C..... 627
Export debentures; President Hoover says he will veto them; EP..... 479
Farm organizations demand "parity"; EP..... 763
Fight warms up; EP..... 313
Filibustering threatened; EP..... 339
Flexing down the tariff; E..... 401
Foreign protests against bill; EP..... 78
France backs down in controversy over valuation policy; EP..... 236
Grundy and us; E..... 537
Grundy, J. R., wants tariff bill written by Pennsylvania and Connecticut. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 579
Hawley-Smoot bill a license to steal. W. C. Murphy, jr.; S..... 136
Hoover and the tariff. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 518
Hoover appeal to senate to pass bill; EP 535
Land taxation, taking unearned increment, a substitute for tariffs. M. Lychenheim; C..... 668
See also E, 572
Lobbies for loot. R. A. Black; S..... 486
Lobbying, investigation; EP..... 397
Lobbying; Senator Bingham's "mistake"; EP..... 479
Logs, lumber, and shingles restored to free list; EP..... 155
Lying, official (about Canadian protest); E..... 159
Manganese ores put on free list by senate committee; EP..... 207
Misshapen bill passed by House; EP.. 2
New bill not the Hawley-Smoot measure. P. Y. Anderson; S..... 580
Protection swindle, the; E..572; letter 668
Search for raw materials, and the tariff; EP..... 648
Senate control by "sons of the wild jackass"; EP..... 569
Senator Bingham's use of experts in tariff legislation. F. Nelson; S..... 625
Smash it!; E..... 238
Sugar; EP..... 27
Sugar lobby in Washington; EP..... 763
Sugar plan abandoned; EP..... 182
Valuation provision means higher duties; EP..... 130
What is Bingham? B. Brown; C.... 587
Taxation, land
Substitute for tariffs. M. Lychenheim; C. 669
Taylor, Myron C.
Views on stock market crash; EP..... 703
Taylor, Robert, and Frank Butler
Coal and iron justice; S..... 404
Tea: not good in America; Dt..... 666
Teachers, incompetent. W. H. Galloway; C.. 385
Textile mills. See South; Strikes Theater, the
And the movies; E..... 513
Art for politics' sake; E..... 266
"Road," the, decline of; E..... 513
Tickets, prices of. H. Broun; S..... 741
Theaters, New York
To become swimming pools; EP..... 3
Thomas, J. H. See Great Britain—Unemployment
Thomas, Jesse O.
Blue shirt, the; S..... 407
Thomas, Norman
Help for Marion; C..... 493
Strike relief; C..... 41
Vote demonstrated need for new liberal party. C. Deutsch; C..... 666
See also New York city—Election
Thompson, Craig F.
New York's Jimmie; S..... 216
Todd, Earl D.
White knight; P..... 386
Toller, Ernst
Detention at Ellis Island; EP..... 372
Toscanini's Wagner and Siloti's Liszt. L. Adler; M..... 529
Trade, international
Search for raw materials, and the tariff; EP..... 648
Trespasser, the. A. Bakshy; D..... 729
Trolley strike, New Orleans. See Strikes
Trotzky, Leon
Denied admission to Great Britain; EP. 78
Trusts
Power and food trusts organized; EP.. 3
Tucker, Peggy
Moscow sun worshipers; C..... 224

U

Unemployment. See Labor
Unhappiness in books and on the stage. H. Broun; S..... 33
Union of South Africa
Diplomatic relations with United States to be established; EP..... 208
Natives and the land. J. H. Harris; IP 232
White man's justice; IP..... 102
United States
American or foreigner? J. M. Jacobson; S..... 193
And Great Britain; prize essay by C. E. Payne; EP....3; S..... 8
British ambassador; Sir R. Lindsay appointed; EP..... 613
Electric empire. P. Blanshard; S..... 34
Lawlessness; E..... 134
Laws; federal and state; E..... 289
Prosperity. See Prosperity
Surpluses; EP..... 53
Tax-free securities; EP..... 288
To lose Anglo-Saxon characteristics; Dt 520
Who are bad citizens? E. D. Mead; C. 117
United States of Europe. See Europe
Universities. See Colleges and universities

V

V. D., D.
Hundred years old, a, and other plays; D..... 474
Vagabond lover, the. A. Bakshy; D..... 784
Vallee, Rudy, new national hero; EP..... 737
Van Doren, Mark
Laboratory still life; P..... 356
Marriage songs; P..... 43
Phenomena; P..... 119
Three men; The experience; the player; the quartet; P..... 425
Vare, William S. See Philadelphia
Vaudeville
Must be saved. A. Bakshy; D..... 98
Prestige. A. Bakshy; D..... 258
Veatch, Roy
Dawes commission in Santo Domingo; S. 110
Veblen, Thorstein. Death; EP..... 157
Veneer. J. W. Krutch; D..... 669
Venezuela
Gomez, J. V., still rules. A. Brenner; IS..... 232
Vestris, steamship
Loss due to cupidity, says court of inquiry; EP..... 156
Veterans of foreign wars
All quiet on the northwestern front: annual encampment. J. O. Meyers; S 353
Vienna
Music in. B. H. Haggin; M..... 364
Opera audiences. J. Mayer; C..... 668
See also 364
Villard, Henry S.
Mediterranean fruit fly; S..... 244
Villard, Oswald Garrison
Russia from a car window. I. The observer's problem; S..... 515
II. The industrial vision; S..... 542
III. Spirit of the government, the; S.576; see also letter..... 777
IV. Unfolding of a great drama; S.619; letter..... 777
V. Soviets and the human being; S.. 654
VI. Soviets and the future; S..... 712
Virginia
Election; EP..... 182

W

W., R. W.
Use of Wisconsin University gymnasium denied to B. Russell; C..... 627
Wales, Jackson. See Sacco-Vanzetti
Walker, James J.
New York's Jimmie. C. F. Thompson; S..... 216
Wall street and the world. C. Hodges; S.. 658
See also Stocks

Walton, Eda Lou
Crusade; P. 778
Loneliness; P. 145
War
No neutrals in next war, British labor government declares; EP. 763
One mother's views. H. C. Rosenbaum; C. 223
War debts and reparations
American bungling; EP. 28
Bank for international settlements not favored by Hoover administration; EP 53
Bank for international settlements, statute made public; EP. 611
Belgian claim on Germany for redemption of worthless marks; EP. 78
France agrees to pay United States; EP 105
German bonds, difficulty in placing. B. Hall; C. 41
German "liberty law" sure of rejection; EP. 702
Hague conference; behind the scenes; EP. 236
Injustice to Germany. S. Knebel; C.. 143
Referendum, German. A. H. Feller; IS 672
Reparations tangle; E. 573
Snowden, P., at the Hague. S. K. Ratcliffe; S. 268
Snowden, P., attack on Young plan; EP. 181
Young and Dawes plans. W. MacDonald; IS. 205
Young plan, approval foreshadowed; EP 261
Young plan attacked by P. Snowden; EP 181
Young plan or national bankruptcy for Germany; EP. 737
Young plan, progress slow; EP. 208
Ward, Christopher
Use of "ilk"; C. 492
Warren, Whitney. See Louvain university
Waste and prosperity; Dt. 384
Watson, Blanche
Newspaper misrepresentations and suppressions; C. 224
Waterways, romance of; E. 512
Watts, Harold P. See Barkoski, J.
Webb, Margaret Dorland
Naturalization denied because of her refusal to bear arms; EP. 702
Webb, Sidney. See Passfield, Baron
Weed, C.
National income; C. 777
See also 619 and 622
Week end. J. W. Krutch; D. 564
Weimeister, H. H.
Memorial service for soldiers who died in northern Russia; C. 777
Weisman, M. Murray
Praise for Passion play article; C. 16
Welch, Marie de L.
Repulse; P. 250
West Indies
Color in the Caribbean. A. Roller; IS. 178
White, Eliot
Hatless heads have finest hair; C. 91
White, Hal Saunders
For the nursery; P. 276
Maine: November; P. 171
White man's justice; IP. 102
White mice. F. McAllister; S. 39
Who are bad citizens? E. D. Mead; C. 117
Wickersham, George W.
Prohibition enforcement plan; E. 107
Wickwire, Jonathan
Caribbean, life and property in. I. Protection of life; IS. 259
II. Protection of property; IS. 335; letter by R. H. Murray. 588
Doheny, Edward L., record; IS. 335; letter by R. H. Murray. 588
Wiggins, Ella May
Murdered by mob at Gastonia, North Carolina; EP. 313
See also Strikes—Textile mills, southern Wilm, E. C.
College, the, and Main street; S. 380
Wilson, Charles Morrow
Backhill culture; S. 63
Fruit people; S. 270
Winterbound. J. W. Krutch; D. 670
Wirkkula, Henry; story of killing by liquor patrolmen. A. I. Harris; S. 86
Wisconsin
Power fight. A. C. Reis; S. 298
Wisconsin, University of
Gymnasium use denied to B. Russell. R. W. W.; C. 627
Witches, pressing and hanging in Massachusetts. S. T. Byington; C. 587
See also Broun, H.; Boston
Wold, Emma
Women and citizenship; C. 550
Wolf Solent, by J. C. Powys; W. Durant on review by J. W. Krutch; C. 66
Woll, Matthew. See Communism
Wolman, Leo
Hoover's fillip to business; S. 710
Women
And citizenship. E. Wold; C. 550
And men, before the law. L. Lakatos; C. 41
Cabinet members. K. Arthur; C. 41
Dominant sex. T. S. Harding; S. 166
Intellect defended by M. Dudderidge, dissenter from view of B. Russell; latter replies; C. 725
Workers, underpaid. M. Losano; C. 91
Wonderful night, a (Fledermaus). L. Adler; M. 728
Wood, Charles G.
Uses official position to attack communists and F. G. Biedenkapp; EP. 314
World court. See League of nations
World league for sexual reform
Meeting; E. 239
Wurdemann, Audrey
Fiddler's green; P. 145
Stonehenge; P. 552

X

X-rayed; Dt. 549

Y

Yarros, Victor S.
Law—and law enforcement: S. 60
Young, C. C. See Mooney and Billings
Young plan. See War debts and reparations
Your uncle Dudley. J. W. Krutch; D. 730 Yucatan
Divorce; E. 318
Yugoslavia. See Jugoslavia

Z

Zionism. See Palestine
Zuckerman, William
England celebrates peace: S. 742
Myths in Palestine; IS. 412

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

Abraham Lincoln. The politician and the man. R. Holden; B. 691
Adam, the baby and the man from Mars. I. Edman; AN. 177
Adam, Karl
Spirit of catholicism, the. J. McCann, translator; AN. 560
Adams, Sir John
Everyman's psychology; B. 686
Adler, Cyrus
Jacob H. Schiff: His life and letters; AN. 388
Adler, Mortimer J.; R. 328
Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, the. T. Smollett; AN. 726
Adventures of Tommy, the. H. G. Wells; AN. 600
Aerial bombardment and international regulation of warfare. M. W. Royse; B. 556
After thirty years. Viscount Gladstone; B. 724
Alden, Cecil
White puppy book, the; AN. 600
Aldington, Richard
Death of a hero; B. 554
Alexander, J. A.
Life of George Chaffey, the; B. 174
Alice in wonderland. L. Carroll; AN. 450
Alice Meynell. V. Meynell; B. 630
All quiet on the western front. E. M. Remarque; B. 43
Allier, Raoul
Mind of the savage; B. 553
Along old trails. W. H. Simpson; B. 150
Als mariner im krieg. J. Ringelnatz; B. 69
Amazing Benjamin Franklin, the. Compiled and edited by J. H. Smythe, Jr.; AN. 502
America and Europe and other essays. A. Zimmern; B. 18
American architecture. F. Kimball; B. 46
American architecture, the, of today. G. H. Edgell; B. 46
American business adventure, an: the story of Henry A. Dix. M. H. Dix; B. 174
American colony. C. Brackett; AN. 448
American estimates. H. S. Canby; B. 20
American folk and fairy tales. Selected by R. Field; AN. 602
American legion in Iowa, the. J. A. Swisher; AN. 502
American party battle, the. C. A. Beard; AN. 49
Amerika und wir. Amerikanisch-deutsches ideen-bündnis. E. Jäckh; AN. 697
Ames, Edward Scribner. Religion; B. 123
Amidon, Beulah; R. 470
A mon gré. R. Glotz; B. 362
Andrew Johnson: a study in courage. L. P. Stryker; B. 19
Andrews, C. F.; R. 120
Andrews, Roy Chapman
Ends of the earth; AN. 756
Angel arms. K. Fearing; B. 22
Anonymous
Ex-Wife; AN. 310
Anthology of revolutionary poetry, an. M. Graham, editor; AN. 125
Anthony, Katherine; R. 496
Applegate, Frank
Indian stories from the pueblos; B. 597
Architecture, four books on; B. 46
Are we civilized? R. H Lowie; B. 553
Art in industry. C. R. Richards; AN. 782
Arvin, Newton
Hawthorne; B. 554
As far as Jane's grandmothers. E. Olivier; AN. 98
As God made them. G. Bradford; AN. 22
Ascent of humanity, the. G. Heard; B. 423
Aspects of biography. A. Maurois. Translated by S. C. Roberts; AN. 558
Attila the scourge of God. M. Brion. Translated by H. Ward; AN. 560
Auslander, Joseph, and F. E. Hill
Winged horse anthology, the; AN. 500
Austin, Mary; R. 597
Autobiography of Calvin Coolidge, the; B. 678
Autobiography of Ousâma, the. G. R. Potter, translator; B. 226
Ayres, C. E.
Holier than thou, the way of the righteous; B. 228
Azuela, Mariano
Under dogs, the. E. Munguia, Jr., translator; B. 689

B

Background of the Russian revolution, the. A. Meyendorff; B. 498
Balance, the, of births and deaths. Volume I: Western and northern Europe. R. R. Kuczynski; B. 70
Baldwin, Marguerite R.
Dark weather; AN. 98
Ball, Walter S.
Carmella commands; AN. 601
Bands and rebels. K. Wallis; B. 22
Banerjea, Pramathnatha
Indian finance. In the days of the company; B. 97
Barbarian stories. N. Mitchison; AN. 364 Baring, Maurice
Coat without seam; AN. 151
Barnes, Djuna
Night among the horses, a; AN. 700
Barnes, Harry Elmer
Twilight of Christianity, the; B. 722
Barnes, Harry Elmer; R. 636
Barrett, E. Boyd; R. 498
Barrie. The story of a genius. J. A. Hammerton; B. 524
Barton, William E.
Lineage of Lincoln, the; B. 148
Baskervill, Charles Read
Elizabethan jig, the, and related song drama; AN. 638
Bates, H. E.
Catherine Foster; AN. 782
Baumes law and thirteen-month calendar. J. E. Johnson; AN. 638
Beard, Charles A.
American party battle, the; AN. 49
Beard, Charles A.; R. 686
Beauclerk, Helen
Love of the foolish angel, the; B. 358
Bedel, Maurice
Molinoff or the count in the kitchen. L. S. Morris, translator; AN. 231
Beethoven the creator. R. Rolland; B. 441
Behre, Charles H., Jr.; R. 256
Bell, Bernard Iddings
Beyond agnosticism. B. 199
Belphegor. J. Benda; B. 95
Benda, Julien
Belphegor; B. 95
Benes, Eduard
My war memoirs; B. 280
Benét, Laura
Noah's dove; B. 254
Benét, Laura; R. 634
Benson, E. M.; R. 45
Bentham, Josephine
Outsiders; AN. 310
Berglund, Abraham, and Philip G. Wright
Tariff on iron and steel, the; B. 387
Berlioz, Hector
Evenings in the orchestra. C. E. Roche, translator; B. 753
Berrington, or Two hundred years ago. Sir E. A. Parry; B. 387
Beyond agnosticism. B. I. Bell; B. 199
Bhuta, Vithaldas K.; R. 97
Bill Haywood's book. An autobiography; B 121
Binding, Rudolf. Fatalist, a, at war; B. 69
Binkley, Robert C., and Frances Williams Binkley
What is right with marriage; B. 386
Biography of H. R. H. the prince of Wales, the. W. and L. Townsend; B. 680
Bird of God, the. The romance of El Greco. V. Hersch; B. 682
Birds and beasts of the Greek anthology. N. Douglas; AN. 560

Black buccaneer, the. S. W. Meader; AN.. 600
Black, MacKnight
Machinery; AN..... 96
Black opium. C. Farrère. Translated by S. Putnam; AN..... 449
Blake, William
Book of Urizen; AN..... 782
Blanshard, Paul; R.....46, 360, 694
Bloch, Blanche; R..... 227
Blue Juniata. M. Cowley; B..... 200
Blue ribbon stories. M. Robinson, editor; AN 600
Blunden, Edmund
Undertones of war; B..... 69
Boas, Louise Schutz
Great rich man, a: The romance of Sir Walter Scott; AN..... 500
Bogan, Louise
Dark summer; B..... 682
Book of airplanes, the. J. W. Iseman and G. G. Jackson; AN..... 601
Book of Indian tales, a. C. E. S. Wood; B 309
Book of sonnet sequences, the. H. Peterson; B 447
Book of Urizen. W. Blake; AN..... 782
Booth, Ernest
Stealing through life; B..... 94
Borchard, Edwin M.; R..... 556
Borgia. Z. Gale; B..... 725
Boroughmonger, the. R. H. Mottram; AN.. 363
Borrow, George. S. M. Elam; B..... 329
Bowers, Claude G.
Tragic era, the. The revolution after Lincoln; B..... 306
Bowers, Claude G.; R.....20, 436
Bowman, Isaiah
New world, the; AN..... 49
Boys' book of astronomy. G. D. Swezey and J. H. Gable; AN..... 472
Brackett, Charles
American colony; AN..... 448
Bradford, Gamaliel
As God made them; AN..... 22
Brainard, General David L.
Outpost of the lost, the. An arctic adventure; AN..... 256
Branch, Anna Hempstead
Sonnets from a lock box; B..... 558
Brandeis, Louis D.: A biographical sketch. J. de Haas; AN..... 782
Brenner, Anita
Idols behind altars; B..... 496
Brenner, Anita; R.....146, 553
Brett, Oliver
Wellington, a character study; AN..... 23
Brewster, Dorothy; R..... 19
Brion, Marcel
Attila: the scourge of God. H. Ward, translator; AN..... 560
British documents on the origin of the war. Volume IV. The Anglo-Russian rapprochement, 1903-1907. Volume V. The near east: the Macedonian problem and the annexation of Bosnia, 1903-1909; AN..... 698
Britten, Clarence; R..... 199
Broderich, John T.
Forty years with General electric; AN.. 502
Brooks-Bright prize essays, 1929; AN..... 450
Brown, Irving
Deep song. Adventures with gypsy songs and singers in Andalusia and other lands, with original translations; AN 388
Brown, John: A biography. O. G. Villard; AN 500
Bryan, William Jennings. P. Hibben; B.. 590
Buell, Raymond Leslie; R.....227, 280
Bugnet, Major Charles
Foch speaks; B..... 201
Bullets and bolos. Fifteen years in the Philippines. J. R. White; B..... 226
Burdekin, Kay
Children's country, the; AN..... 602
Bureau of prohibition, the: Its history, activities, and organization. L. F. Schmeckebier; AN..... 560
Burgess, Thornton W.
Burgess seashore book for children, the; AN 600
Burnett, W. R.
Little Caesar; AN..... 177
Burnette, William
An inside story of success: life of William Burnette. N. M. Clark; B.... 174
Burns, C. Delisle
1918-1928. A short history of the world; AN..... 72
Bushwhacking, and other Asiatic tales and memories. Sir H. Clifford; AN..... 257
Buxhoeveden, Baroness S.
Life, the, and tragedy of Alexandra Feodorovna, empress of Russia; AN.. 49
Bynner, Witter
Indian earth; B..... 558

C

Calverton, V. F.; R.....279, 677, 778
Cambridge History of India, the. Vol. III —The Turks and Afghans. Edited by Sir W. Haig; B..... 120
Cambridge History of the British empire, the; Vol. I, The old empire from the beginnings to 1783; B..... 198
Canada and the United States. H. L. Keenleyside; B..... 779
Canby, Henry Seidel
American estimates; B..... 20
Captive, the. M. Proust. Translated by C. K. S. Moncrieff; B..... 327
Capuana
Italian fairy tales; AN..... 598
Carlyle, Thomas
French revolution, the; AN..... 726
Carmella commands. W. S. Ball; AN..... 601
Carroll, Lewis
Alice in wonderland; AN..... 450
Collected verse; B..... 594
Carter, Burnham
Mortal men; AN..... 202
Casanova, Giacomo
Life and memoirs. A. Machen, translator; AN..... 726
Case, Shirley Jackson; R..... 755
Casey, Robert J.
Four faces of Siva: The detective story of a vanished race; AN..... 332
Catherine Foster. H. E. Bates; AN..... 782
Catlin, George E. G.; R.....18, 276, 356, 764
Cazamian, Louis, and E. Legouis
History of English literature, a; AN.. 782
Ce qu'il faut connaitre de l'âme Américaine. R. Michaud; AN..... 450
Cecil, Viscount Robert
Way, the, of peace; B..... 44
Cedar box, a. R. Nathan; B..... 150
Cement. F. Gladkov. Translated by A. S. Arthur and C. Ashleigh; B..... 695
Cendrars, Blaise
Little black stories for little white children. M. Biabco, translator; AN.... 599
Certain poets of importance. H. H. Sloss; B 447
Chadwick, Mary
Difficulties in child development; B.... 175
Chaffey, George, life of. J. A. Alexander; B 174
Chamson, André
Roux the bandit. V. W. Brooks, translator; AN..... 363
Changing New England. E. E. Whiting; AN 500
Chapter the last. K. Hamsun; B..... 468
Chase, Stuart. Men and machines; B..... 92
Chase, Stuart; R.....281, 690
Chéri, Colette. Translated by J. Flanner; B. 360
Chicago: A history of its reputation. H. J. Smith and L. Lewis; B..... 436
Chicago. C. E. Merriam; B..... 630
Chief modern poets of England and America. Selected and edited by G. D. Sanders and J. H. Nelson; AN..... 500
Children's country, the. K. Burdekin; AN.. 602
Children's books, illustrations of. S. G. Rich; S..... 589
Child's geography of the world, a. V. M. Hillyer; AN..... 599
Chimney corner poems. V. S. Hutchinson; B 594
Chinard, Gilbert
Thomas Jefferson: the apostle of Americanism; B..... 686
Chronicles of a gigolo. J. Swift; AN..... 310
Churches of France; AN..... 726
Civic training in soviet Russia. S. R. Harper; B..... 252
Claghorn, Kate Holladay; R..... 70
Clark, Jane Perry; R..... 692
Clark, Neil McCullough
Inside story of success, an: life of William Burnette; B..... 174
Clark, Thomas Curtis
Poems of justice; B..... 753
Clark, William Bell
When the U-boats came to America; B. 725
Clarke, Donald Henderson
In the reign of Rothstein; B..... 199
Class reunion. F. Werfel. W. Chambers, translator; B..... 120
Clavijo: embassy to Tamerlane, 1403-1406. G. LeStrange, translator; AN..... 257
Clifford, Sir Hugh
Bushwhacking, and other Asiatic tales and memories; AN..... 257
Coat without seam, the. M. Baring; AN.. 151
Coates, Robert M.
Eater of darkness, the; AN..... 310
Coatsworth, Elizabeth
Compass rose; B..... 22
Codman, Florence; R.....387, 468, 527, 682
Coffin, Robert P. Tristam
Golden falcon; B..... 150
Cold steel. M. P. Shiel; B..... 45
Cole, G. D. H.
Next ten years in British social economic policy, the; B..... 356
Colette
Chéri. J. Flanner, translator; B..... 360
Collected verse of Lewis Carroll; B..... 594
Come Christmas. L. Frost; B..... 753
Compass Rose. E. Coatsworth; B..... 22
Coolidge, Calvin, autobiography; B..... 678
Coolidge, Mary Roberts
Rain-Makers, the; B..... 47
Concert-goer's library of descriptive notes. R. Newmarch; AN..... 638
Constantin-Weyer, M.
Man scans his past. S. Brown, translator; AN..... 390
Contemporary American literature: Bibliographies and study outlines. J. M. Manly and E. Rickert; AN..... 638
Contre la guerre nouvelle. B. de Ligt; B. 227
Convent girl. H. Mullins; B..... 498
Courageous companions. C. J. Finger; AN 601
Courte histoire du célibat ecclésiastique. A. Houtin; AN..... 472
Cowley, Malcolm
Blue Juniata; B..... 200
Craig, Hardin, and J. M. Thomas
English prose of the nineteenth century; AN 639
Crawford, Nelson Antrim; R..... 230
Creating the short story: A symposium-anthology; AN..... 502
Creative understanding and the recovery of truth; review criticized. C. B. Chilton; C 587
Crowther, Samuel
Romance and rise of the American tropics, the; B..... 175
Cult of beauty in Charles Baudelaire. S. A. Rhodes; B..... 308
Curious life, a. G. Wehner; B..... 504

D

Daisy, Princess of Pless (autobiography); AN 558
Dakin, Edwin Franden
Mrs. Eddy: the biography of a virginal mind; editorial on..... 265
Dancing Catalans. J. Langdon-Davies; AN. 637
Danger zones of Europe: a study of national minorities. J. S. Stephens; AN..... 176
Dark, Sidney
Twelve bad men; AN..... 23
Dark summer. L. Bogan; B..... 682
Dark weather. M. R. Baldwin; AN..... 98
Daudet, Charles
Répertoire de personages de "A la recherche du temps perdu"; B..... 327
Davis, Britton
Truth about Geronimo, the; B..... 684
Davis, Royal J.; R.....439, 691, 755
Day of doom, the, or a poetical description of the great and last judgment. With other poems. M. Wigglesworth; AN.. 332
Days of fear. F. Gallagher; B..... 256
Death of a hero. R. Aldington; B..... 554
Deep song. Adventures with gypsy songs and singers in Andalusia and other lands, with original translations. I. Brown; AN..... 388
De Ford, Miriam Allen; R..... 94
De Koven, Anna
Horace Walpole and Madame du Deffand; B 682
De Kruif, Paul
Seven iron men; B..... 495
De Lacretelle, Jacques
Marie Bonifas. Translated by W. S. Whale; AN..... 151
Delmar, Vina
Loose ladies; AN..... 231
De Man, Henri
Joy in work; B..... 778
Densmore, Frances
Papago music; AN..... 782
Dessauer, A. Paul J.; R..... 229
Diana. H. Mann; B..... 45
Diary of a communist undergraduate, the. N. Ognyov. Translated by A. Werth; B 172
Diary of Dostoevsky's wife, the. Translated by Madge Pemberton; B..... 18
Diary of Tolstoy's wife, the. Translated by A. Werth; B..... 18
Dibble, R. F.; R..... 226
Dickinson, Edwin De Witt
Selection of cases, a, and other readings on the law of nations; AN..... 502
Dies, E. J.
Plunger, the. Story of the Wheat Pit; AN 49
Difficulties in child development. M. Chadwick; B..... 175
Dilemma of American music. D. G. Mason; B 227
Dime novels; E..... 574
Disarmament. S. de Madariaga; B..... 44
Dix, Henry A. American business adventure, an: the story of Henry A. Dix. M. H. Dix; B..... 174
Dix, Mark H.
American business adventure, an: the story of Henry A. Dix; B..... 174
Do what you will: Essays. A. Huxley; B.. 754
Dobie, J. Frank; R..... 254
Dodge, General G. M., life of. J. R. Perkins; B..... 330
Donovan, Frances R.
Saleslady, the; B..... 470
Don Segundo Sombre. R. Güiraldes; B.... 176
Don't call me clever. L. Drake; AN..... 782

Dorey, Jacques
Three and the moon; AN..... 598
Dostoevsky's wife, the diary of. Translated by M. Pemberton; B..... 18
Douglas, Norman
Nerida; AN..... 450
Douglas, Paul H.; R..... 630
Down the world's most dangerous river. C. Eddy; AN..... 756
Drake, Lawrence
Don't call me clever; AN..... 782
Duff, Charles
Handbook on hanging, a; E..... 402
Dumas, Alexandre, biography of; The incredible marquis. H. Gorman; B.... 436
Dunn, Frederick Sherwood
Practice and procedure of international conferences; B..... 692
Duns Scotus. C. R. S. Harris; B..... 20
Durant, Will
Criticizes J. W. Krutch's review of Wolf Solent, by J. C. Powys; C.... 66
Durant, Will
Mansions, the, of philosophy; B..... 71

E

East south west. F. V. Morley; AN..... 603
Eater of darkness, the. R. M. Coates; AN.. 310
Eddy, Clyde
Down the world's most dangerous river; AN..... 756
Edgell, G. H. American architecture, the, of today; B..... 46
Edman, Irwin
Adam, the baby and the man from Mars; AN..... 177
Egge, Peter
Hansine Solstad: the history of an honest woman. J. H. Jackson, translator; AN..... 699
Ehrenstein, Albert
Robbers and soldiers. G. Dunlop, translator; AN..... 231
Eighteen-seventies, the: Essays by fellows of the Royal society of literature. Edited by H. Granville-Barker; B..... 440
Eiker, Mathilde
Stranger fidelities; AN..... 700
Einstein, Carl
Kunst des 20. jahrhunderts, die; AN.... 202
Elam, Samuel Milton
George Borrow; B..... 329
Eldershaw, M. Bernard
House is built, a; AN..... 700
Electrical utilities: The crisis in public control. W. E. Mosher and others; B.. 307
Elizabethan jig, the, and related song drama. C. R. Baskervill; AN..... 638
Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. A biography. J. Redlich; B..... 147
Encircled serpent, the. M. O. Howey; AN. 330
Encyclopaedia Britannica, the. Fourteenth edition; B..... 467
Ends of the earth. R. C. Andrews; AN.... 756
English king, the. M. MacDonagh; B..... 443
English political portraits of the nineteenth century. G. R. S. Taylor; AN..... 560
English poor law history; two parts. S. and Beatrice Webb; B..... 146
English prose of the nineteenth century. H. Craig and J. M. Thomas; AN..... 639
Epistola ad fratres minores. William of Occam; AN..... 638
Era of the French revolution, the. L. R. Gottschalk; AN..... 177
Ertz, Susan
Galaxy, the; AN..... 699
Essays by divers hands. L. Binyon, editor; AN..... 562
Essays by James Gibson Huneker; B..... 780
Et demain? France, Allemagne et Pologne. P. Valmigère; B..... 362
Eulenberg, Herbert
Hohenzollerns, the; B..... 48
Europa year-book, 1929, the; AN..... *698
Evenings in the orchestra. H. Berlioz. Translated by C. E. Roche; B..... 753
Everyman's psychology. Sir John Adams; B 686
Every soul is a circus. V. Lindsay; B..... 594
Executive agents in American foreign relations. H. M. Wriston; AN..... 698
Exquisite tragedy, the: An intimate life of John Ruskin. A. Williams-Ellis; B.. 44
Ex-Wife. Anonymous; AN..... 310

F

Fadiman, Clifton P.; R.....68, 119, 225, 276, 329, 436, 497, 592, 684
Farewell to arms, a. E. Hemingway; B.... 497
Farewell to paradise. F. Thiess. Translated by H. T. Lowe-Porter; AN..... 699
Farmer, have you a daughter fair? M. Wallach; AN..... 310
Farrère, Claude
Black opium. S. Putnam, translator; AN 449
Fatalist, a, at war. R. Binding; B..... 69
Fate, the, of the jury. E. L. Masters; B.. 72
Fearing, Kenneth
Angel arms; B..... 22
Federal limitations upon municipal ordinance making power. H. Walker; AN..... 450
Ferrero, Guglielmo
Seven vices, the. A. Livingston and E. Abbott, translators; B..... 527
Ferril, Thomas Hornsby; R..... 47
Ferris, Helen
This happened to me; AN..... 601
Ficke, Arthur Davidson
Mountain against mountain; B..... 254
Fiddler, the. S. G. Millin; AN..... 782 Field, Rachel
Hitty: her first hundred years; AN.... 598
Fièvre jaune. S. Téry; B..... 175
Financial history of Baltimore, the, 1900-1926. L. O. Rea; AN..... 450
Finger, Charles J.
Courageous companions; AN..... 601
Finley, John
Thalia; B..... 150
Five and ten. F. Hurst; B..... 358
Flanner, Hildegarde
Time's profile; B..... 558
Flexner, J. A.; R..... 636
Foch speaks. Major Charles Bugnet; B.... 201
Ford, Worthington C.; R..... 94
Forty years with General electric. J. T. Broderich; AN..... 502
Four faces of Siva: The detective story of a vanished race. R. J. Casey; AN... 332
Four famous Greek plays; AN..... 639
France, Anatole.
Rabelais; B..... 69
Francis Joseph, emperor, of Austria. A biography. J. Redlich; B..... 147
Franklin, Benjamin, the amazing. Compiled and edited by J. H. Smythe, Jr.; AN..... 502
French revolution, the. T. Carlyle; AN.... 726
Frescoes of Diego Rivera; AN..... 726
From Confucius to Mencken. Edited by F. H. Pritchard; AN..... 49
Frost, Lesley
Come Christmas; B..... 753
Frye, Prosser Hall
Visions and chimeras; B..... 754
Full measure. H. O. Storm; AN..... 700

G

Gable, J. Harris, and G. D. Swezey
Boys' book of astronomy; AN..... 472
Galahads and pussy-cats. W. Speyer. Translated by M. Iuers; AN..... 598
Galaxy, the. S. Ertz; AN..... 699
Gale, Zona
Borgia; B..... 725
Gale, Zona; R..... 93
Gallagher, Frank
Days of fear; B..... 256
Gannett, Lewis S.; R..... 175
Garnett, David
No love; B..... 17
Garrod, H. W.
Profession of poetry, the, and other lectures; AN..... 500
Gate of a strange field, the. H. Heslop; AN 449
Gaus, John Merriman
Great Britain; a study of civic loyalty; B..... 252
George Borrow. S. M. Elam; B..... 329
Geronimo, the truth about. B. Davis; B.... 682
Gestalt psychology. W. Köhler; B..... 328
Ghent, W. J.
Road to Oregon, the; AN..... 756
Ghent, W. J.; R..... 684
Giacomo Casanova: his life and memoirs. A. Machen, translator; AN..... 726
Gibbon, John. Personal recollections of the civil war; B..... 122
Gibbons, Floyd
Red Napoleon, the; B..... 694
Gibson, Roland A.; R..... 174
Giddings, Franklin Henry
Mighty medicine, the; B..... 199
Giono, Jean
Hill of destiny. J. Le Clercq, translator; AN..... 637
Girl in soviet Russia, a. A. Viollis; AN... 388
Gladkov, Feodor
Cement. A. S. Arthur and C. Ashleigh, translators; B..... 695
Gladstone, Viscount
After thirty years (life of W. E. Gladstone); B..... 724
Gladstone and Palmerston (1851-1865)
Correspondence. Edited by P. Guedalla; B..... 724
Glasgow, Ellen
They stooped to folly; B..... 225
Glotz, René
A mon gré; B..... 362
Gluvas Williams book, the; AN..... 726
God have mercy on us. A story of 1918. W. T. Scanlon; B..... 754
Golden falcon. R. P. T. Coffin; B..... 150
Golden wind, the. T. Ohta and M. Sperry; B..... 723
Golding, Louis
Prince, the, or somebody; B..... 68
Those ancient lands. Being a journey to Palestine; B..... 278
Gorman, Herbert
Incredible marquis, the; B..... 436
Gottschalk, Louis R.
Era of the French revolution, the; AN.. 177
Government fund for unemployment. H. M. Muller; AN..... 638
Graham, Marcus, editor
Anthology of revolutionary poetry, an; AN..... 125
Grand manner, the. L. Kronenberger; AN. 363
Granville-Barker, Harley, editor
Eighteen-seventies, the; Essays by fellows of the Royal society of literature; B..... 440
Grattan, C. Hartley; R.....20, 95, 725
Great Britain: a study of civic loyalty. J. M. Gaus; B..... 252
Great love, a. A. Kollontay. Translated by L. Lore; AN..... 700
Great rich man, a: The romance of Sir Walter Scott. L. S. Boas; AN..... 500
Green, Henry
Living; AN..... 603
Green pipes. J. Paget-Fredericks; B..... 594
Greene, Graham
Man within, the; B..... 468
Group representation before congress. E. P. Herring; B..... 122
Gruen, William; R..... 71
Gruening, Ernest; R..... 689
Guedalla, Philip, editor
Gladstone and Palmerston (1851-1865). Correspondence; B..... 724
Güiraldes, Ricardo
Don Segundo Sombre; B..... 176
Haig, Sir Wolseley, editor
Cambridge History of India. Vol. III—The Turks and Afghans; B..... 120
Hakluyt, Richard, and the English voyages. G. B. Parks; AN..... 23
Haldeman-Julius, Marcet and E.
Violence; AN..... 448
Haley, J. Evetts
X I T ranch of Texas, the; B..... 254
Hall, Henry; R..... 526
Hammerton, J. A.
Barrie. The story of a genius; B..... 524
Hamsun, Knut
Chapter the last; B..... 468
Handbook on hanging, a. C. Duff; E..... 402
Hans Frost. H. Walpole; B..... 468
Hansine Solstad: the history of an honest woman. P. Egge. Translated by J. H. Jackson; AN..... 699
Haring, Douglas
Land of gods and earthquakes; AN.... 257
Harlow, Ralph Volney; R..... 752
Harper, Franz
Plus and minus. D. Wulff, translator; AN..... 310
Harper, Samuel Northrup
Civic training in soviet Russia; B..... 252
Harriet Hume: A London fantasy. R. West; B..... 632
Harris, C. R. S.
Duns Scotus; B..... 20
Hart, Joseph Kinmont
Social interpretation of education, a; B 199
Harvitt, Hélène; R..... 362
Hawthorne. N. Arvin; B..... 554
Haywood, Bill
Bill Haywood's book. An autobiography; B..... 121
Heard, Gerald
Ascent of humanity, the; B..... 423
Hearley, John
Pope or Mussolini; B..... 230
Heart's journey, the. S. Sassoon; AN..... 96
Heine's views on German traits of character. J. A. Hess; AN..... 562
Hemingway, Ernest
Farewell to arms, a; B..... 497
Herbst, Josephine
Money for love; B..... 592
Heredia, José-Maria de
Trophies, the, with other sonnets. J. M. O'Hara and J. Hervey, translators; AN..... 560
Hermit thrush, the. K. Millay; AN..... 96
Herodotus. Gordon King, editor; AN..... 598
Herrick, C. Judson
Thinking machine, the; B..... 686
Herring, E. Pendleton
Group representation before congress; B 122
Hersch, Virginia
Bird of God, the. The romance of El Greco; B..... 682
Heslop, Harold
Gate of a strange field, the; AN..... 449
Hess, Jon Ambrose
Heine's views on German traits of character; AN..... 562
Hesse, Hermann
Steppenwolf. B. Creighton, translator; AN..... 780
Hibben, Paxton
Peerless leader, the: William Jennings Bryan; B..... 590
Hibino, Yutaka
Nippon Shondo Ron, or The national ideals of the Japanese people. Translated by A. P. McKenzie; B..... 176

Hicks, Granville; R.....123, 360, 469, 554, 780
Higgins, A. Pearce
Studies in international law and relations; B..... 124
Hill, Caroline Miles
Twentieth century love poems; B..... 447
Hill, Frank Ernest, and J. Auslander
Winged horse anthology, the; AN..... 500
Hill, H. D.; R.....362, 556
Hill, Norman L.
Public international conference, the; AN 698
Hill of destiny. J. Giono. Translated by J. Le Clercq; B..... 637
Hillyer, V. M.
Child's geography of the world, a; AN.. 599
History of European diplomacy, 1451-1789, a; B..... 73
History of biology, the. E. Nordenskiöld; AN..... 125
History of Christianity in the light of modern knowledge, the. Various authors; B..... 469
History of English literature, a. E. Legouis and L. Cazamian; AN..... 782
Hitty: her first hundred years. R. Field; AN..... 598
Hobson, J. A.; R.....146, 201, 723
Hofmann, Josef, and G. Reismüller
Zehn jahre Rheinlandbesetzung; AN.... 502
Hohenzollerns, the. H. Eulenberg. Translated by M. M. Bozman; B..... 48
Holden, Raymond
Abraham Lincoln. The politician and the man; B..... 691
Holier than thou, the way of the righteous. C. E. Ayres; B..... 228
Holland, Rupert Sargent
Pirate of the gulf, the; AN..... 601
Holmes, John Haynes; R..... 309
Homer
Odyssey. G. H. Palmer, translator; AN 726
Hopper, James
Medals of honor; AN..... 560
Horace Walpole and Madame du Deffand. An eighteenth century friendship. A. de Koven; B..... 682
Horan, Kenneth
Parnassus en route; B..... 447
Hose, Reginald E.
Prohibition or control? Canada's experience with the liquor problem, 1921-1927; AN..... 282
Hoult, Nora
Poor women!; AN..... 177
Hour, an, of American history: From Columbus to Coolidge. S. E. Morison; B.. 73
House is built, a. M. B. Eldershaw; AN.. 700
Housman, Laurence
Life of H. R. H. the duke of Flamborough; AN..... 22
Houtin, Albert
Courte histoire du célibat ecclésiastique; AN..... 472
Howard, John Galen
Pheidias; B..... 72
How like a god. R. Stout; B..... 329
Howe, M. A. DeWolfe
James Ford Rhodes: American historian; B..... 94
Howey, M. Oldfield
Encircled serpent, the; AN..... 330
Hsi-Tseng Tsiang
Poems of the Chinese revolution; B.... 254
Huddleston, Sisley
Louis XIV in love and war; AN..... 560
Hughan, Jessie Wallace
What is socialism?; AN..... 202
Hulme, Edward Maslin
Middle ages, the; AN..... 330
Human nature and management. O. Tead; B..... 690
Humphry Clinker. T. Smollett; AN..... 639
Huneker, James Gibson, essays by; B..... 780
Hurst, Fannie
Five and ten; B..... 358
Hutchinson, Benjamin P.; biography. E. J. Dies; AN..... 49
Hutchinson, Veronica S.
Chimney corner pieces; B..... 594
Huxley, Aldous
Do what you will: Essays; B..... 754

I

Ichihashi, Yamato
Washington conference and after, the; AN..... 282
Idols behind altars. A. Brenner; B..... 496
Imperial dollar, the. H. Motherwell; B.... 755
In the reign of Rothstein. D. H. Clarke; B..... 199
Incredible marquis, the. H. Gorman; B.... 436
India in bondage; editorial paragraph on... 55
Indian earth. W. Bynner; B..... 558
Indian finance. In the days of the company. P. Banerjea; B..... 97
Indian scientists; AN..... 639
Indian stories from the pueblos. F. Applegate; B..... 597
Inside story of success, an: life of William Burnette. N. M. Clark; B..... 174
International arbitration from Athens to Locarno. J. H. Ralston; AN..... 528
International aspects of electrical communications in the Pacific area, the. L. B. Tribolet; AN..... 390
Intimate journal of George Sand, the. M. J. Howe, editor and translator; B..... 496
Irwin, Elizabeth; R..... 175
Iseman, J. W., and G. G. Jackson
Book of airplanes, the; AN..... 601
Italian fairy tales. Capuana. Translated by D. Emmerich; AN..... 598

J

J. Ramsay MacDonald: Labor's man of destiny. H. H. Tiltman; B..... 522
Jäckh, Ernst
Amerika und wir. Amerikanisch-deutsches ideen-bündnis; B..... 697
Jackson, G. G., and J. W. Iseman
Book of airplanes, the; AN..... 601
Jacob H. Schiff: His life and letters. C. Adler; AN..... 388
James Ford Rhodes: American historian. M. A. DeWolfe; B..... 94
Japan in recent times. A. M. Young; B.. 446
Japm. B. Musser; B..... 447
Jastrow, Joseph; R..... 686
Javits, B. A., and Charles W. Wood
Make everybody rich: industry's new goal; B....174; correction..... 275
Jefferson, Thomas: The apostle of Americanism. G. Chinard; B..... 686
John Brown: a biography. O. G. Villard; AN..... 500
John D., a portrait in oils, by J. K. Winkler. H. Broun; S..... 7
Review; B..... 174
John Henry. Tracking down a Negro legend. G. B. Johnson; B..... 494
John Keats. A. Lowell; AN..... 450
John Knox, portrait of a Calvinist. E. Muir; B..... 445
Johnsen, Julia E.
Baumes law and thirteen-month calendar; AN..... 638
Johns Hopkins: A silhouette. H. H. Thorn; AN..... 639
Johnson, Andrew: a study in courage. L. P. Stryker; B..... 19
Johnson, Burges
Little book of necessary nonsense; B.. 594
Johnson, Guy B.
John Henry. Tracking down a Negro legend; B..... 494
Johnson, Thomas M.
Without censor. New light on our greatest world war battles; B..... 360
Jones, Rufus M.
Trial of life in college, the; AN..... 471
Journals of the continental congress; AN... 782
Joy in work. H. de Man; B..... 778

K

Karoo the kangaroo. K. Wiese; AN..... 602
Kauffman, Andy, and his little sister
Tigers and things; B..... 594
Keats, John. A. Lowell; AN..... 450
Keenleyside, Hugh L.
Canada and the United States; B..... 779
Kellock, Harold; R.....434, 499, 594, 629, 680
Kellys, the, and the O'Kellys. A. Trollope; AN..... 562
Keyserling, Count Edouard von Tides; AN..... 97
Keyserling, Count Hermann
Creative understanding and the recovery of truth; review criticized. C. B. Chilton; C..... 587
Travel diary of a philosopher; AN.... 450
Kien, Walter; R..... 470
Kimball, Fiske
American architecture; B..... 46
Kite, Elizabeth S.
L'Enfant and Washington, 1791-1792; AN..... 450
Knox, John; portrait of a Calvinist. E. Muir; B..... 445
Köhler, Wolfgang
Gestalt psychology; B..... 328
Kollontay, Alexandra
Great love, a. L. Lore, translator; AN. 700
Koran. E. H. Palmer, translator; AN..... 450
Kronenberger, Louis
Grand manner, the; AN..... 363
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..17, 43, 121, 327, 386 423, 679, 725
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Review of Wolf Solent criticized by W. Durant; C..... 66
Kuczynski, Robert R.
Balance, the, of births and deaths. Volume I: Western and northern Europe; B..... 70
Kunitz, Joshua; R.....172, 695
Kunst des 20. jahrhunderts, die. C. Einstein; AN..... 202

L

Labor and internationalism. L. L. Lorwin; B..... 201
Labor movement in the United States, 1860-1895, the. N. J. Ware; B..... 281
Ladd, Henry; R..... 44
Lady is cold, the. E. B. White; AN..... 177
Lady of laws. S. Trautwein. Translated by H. E. Palmer and L. W. Charley; AN..... 231
La Fayette. B. Whitlock; B..... 752
Land of gods and earthquakes. D. Haring; AN..... 257
Langdon-Davies, John
Dancing Catalans; AN..... 637
Last home of mystery, the. E. A. Powell; AN..... 256
Last nights of Paris. P. Soupault. Translated by W. C. Williams; AN..... 638
Later letters of Lady Augusta Stanley. Edited by the dean of Windsor and H. Bolitho; B..... 554
Laut, Agnes C.
Romance of the rails, the; B..... 439
Lawrence, D. H.
My skirmish with Jolly Roger; AN.... 450
Lawrence, Joseph Stagg
Wall street and Washington; B..... 526
Lays of ancient Rome. Lord Macaulay; AN 601
Leaves in windy weather. E. Tietjens; B. 558
Le Corbusier
Towards a new architecture; B..... 46
Legion: The book of the British legion; AN 782
Legouis, Emile, and L. Cazamian
History of English literature, a; AN.. 782
L'Enfant and Washington, 1791-1792. E. S. Kite; AN..... 450
Léopold of the Belgians. Comte Louis de Lichtervelde. Translated by T. H. Reed and H. Russell Reed; B..... 388
Letters, the, of Katherine Mansfield. Edited by J. M. Murry; B..... 93
Lewis, Lloyd
Myths after Lincoln; B..... 329
Lewis, Lloyd, and Henry Justin Smith
Chicago: A history of its reputation; B 436
Lewis, Sinclair; R..... 680
Liberalism and some problems of today; AN 697
Lichtervelde, Comte Louis de
Léopold of the Belgians. T. H. Reed and H. R. Reed, translators; B..... 388
Life and labor in the old south. U. B. Phillips; AN..... 177
Life and letters of Stuart P. Sherman. J. Zeitlin and H. Woodbridge; B..... 675
Life of George Chaffey. J. A. Alexander; B 174
Life of H. R. H. the duke of Flamborough. L. Housman; AN..... 22
Life and tragedy of Alexandra Feodorovna, empress of Russia. Baroness S. Buxhoeveden; AN..... 49
Life of Michelangelo, the. J. A. Symonds; AN..... 23
Ligt, Barthelemy de
Contre la guerre nouvelle; B..... 227
Lincoln, Abraham, the lineage of. W. E. Barton; B..... 148
Lincoln, Abraham. The politician and the man. R. Holden; B..... 691
Lincoln, myths after. L. Lewis; B..... 329
Lincoln's boy spy. L. Newcome; AN..... 602
Lindsay, Vachell
Every soul is a circus; B..... 594
Lineage of Lincoln, the. W. E. Barton; B; 148
Lippincott, Isaac
What the farmer needs; B..... 230
Lippmann, Walter
Preface to morals, a; B..... 148
Liptzin, Solomon
Lyric pioneers of modern Germany; B.. 279
Little black stories for little white children. B. Cendrars. Translated by M. Bianco; AN..... 599
Little book of necessary nonsense. B. Johnson; B..... 594
Little Caesar. W. R. Burnett; AN..... 177
Living. H. Green; AN..... 603
Lobsenz, Johanna
Older woman in industry, the; AN.... 125
Loeb classical library; eight volumes; AN.. 560
Logan, Agnes
Necessary man, the; AN..... 700
Lohrke, Eugene
Overshadowed; AN..... 364
Loose ladies. V. Delmar; AN..... 231
Lorwin, Lewis L.
Labor and internationalism; B..... 201
Louis XIV in love and war. S. Huddleston; AN..... 560
Louis D. Brandeis: A biographical sketch. J. de Haas; AN..... 782
Love of the foolish angel, the. H. Beauclerk; B..... 358
Loving, Pierre; R.....360, 724
Low, Barbara
Psycho-analysis and education; B..... 175
Lowell, Amy
John Keats; AN..... 450
Lowie, Robert H.
Are we civilized?; B..... 553
Lyric pioneers of modern Germany. S. Liptzin; B..... 279

M

Macaulay, Lord
Lays of ancient Rome; AN..... 601
McCabe, Joseph
Story of religious controversy, the; B.. 469
MacDonagh, Michael
English king, the; B..... 443
MacDonald, J. Ramsay: Labor's man of destiny. H. H. Tiltman; B..... 522
MacDonald, William; R..48, 72, 147, 201, 252, 306, 362, 388, 467, 522, 634, 693, 799
Machinery. M. Black; AN..... 96
McKeon, Richard; R.....20, 280
Madariaga, Salvador de Disarmament; B..... 44
Make everybody rich: industry's new goal. B. A. Javits and C. W. Wood; B.. 174
correction 275
Man and his world: Northwestern university essays in contemporary thought; B... 696
Manly, John M., and Edith Rickert
Contemporary American literature: Bibliographies and study outlines; AN.... 638
Mann, Heinrich
Diana; B..... 45
Mann, Thomas
Three essays; B..... 679
Man scans his past, a. M. Constantin-Weyer. Translated by S. Brown; AN..... 390
Mansfield, Katherine, Letters of. Edited by J. M. Murry; B..... 93
Mansions, the, of philosophy. W. Durant; B 71
Man within, the. G. Greene; B..... 468
Marie Bonifas. J. de Lacretelle. Translated by W. S. Whale; AN..... 151
Marriage and morals. B. Russell; B..... 677
Marriage. E. Westermarck; B..... 386
Mason, Daniel Gregory
Dilemma of American music; B..... 227
Masters, Edgar Lee
Fate, the, of the jury; B..... 72
Maurois, André
Aspects of biography. S. C. Roberts, translator; AN..... 558
Meade, Norah; R.....256, 329
Meader, Stephen W.
Black buccaneer, the; AN..... 600
Medals of honor. J. Hopper; AN..... 560
Mediaeval culture. K. Vossler; B..... 280
Memoirs of an old parliamentarian. T. P. O'Connor; B..... 171
Men and machines. S. Chase; B..... 92
Mencken, H. L.; R.....440, 495, 722
Meyendorff, Alexander
Background of the Russian revolution; B 498
Meynell, Viola
Alice Meynell; B..... 630
Michaud, Régis
Ce qu'il faut connaître de l'âme Américaine; AN..... 450
Michelangelo, Life of. J. A. Symonds; AN 23
Middle ages, the. E. M. Hulme; AN..... 330
Mighty medicine, the. F. H. Giddings; B.. 199
Millay, Kathleen
Hermit thrush, the; AN..... 96
Millin, Sarah Gertrude
Fiddler, the; AN..... 782
Milne-Bailey, W.
Trade union documents; B..... 556
Mimi Bluette. G. da Verona; B..... 45
Mind of the savage, the. R. Allier; B.... 553
Miomandre, F. de
Written on water; AN..... 449
Mirrielees, Edith
Significant short stories; AN..... 639
Writing the short story; AN..... 639
Mitchison, Naomi
Barbarian stories; AN..... 364
Molinoff or the count in the kitchen. M. Bedel. Translated by L. S. Morris; AN 231
Money for love. J. Herbst; B..... 592
Montandon, George
Ologenèse humaine, l'; B..... 634
Montgomery, James Stuart
Virtue of the jest, the; AN..... 603
Morison, Samuel Eliot
Hour of American history, an; B.. .. 73
Morley, F. V.
East south west; AN..... 603
Mortal men. B. Carter; AN..... 202
Mosher, William E., and others
Electrical utilities: The crisis in public control; B..... 307
Motherwell, Hiram
Imperial dollar, the; B..... 755
Motherwell, Hiram; R..... 230
Mottram, R. H.
Boroughmonger, the; AN..... 363
Mountain against mountain. A. D. Ficke; B 254
Mowat, R. B.
History of European diplomacy, 1451-1789, a; B..... 73
mr. hermit crab. mimpsy rhys; AN..... 599
Mrs. Eddy: the biography of a virginal mind. by E. F. Dakin; editorial on..... 265
Muir, Edwin
John Knox, portrait of a Calvinist; B.. 445
Muller, Helen M.
Government fund for unemployment; AN 638
Mullins, Helene
Convent girl; B..... 498
Munson, Gorham B.
Style and form in American prose; B.. 358
Murry, J. Middleton, editor
Letters of Katherine Mansfield; B..... 93
Musser, Benjamin
Japm; B..... 447
Mussey, Henry Raymond; R.....92, 250, 307
My skirmish with Jolly Roger. D. H. Lawrence; AN..... 450
My war memoirs. E. Benes; B..... 280
Myers, James
Religion lends a hand: Studies of churches in social action; B..... 680
Myths after Lincoln. L. Lewis; B..... 329
Myths and tales of the southeastern Indians. J. R. Swanton; AN..... 782

N

Namier, L. B.
Structure of politics at the accession of George III; B..... 276
Nathan, Robert
Cedar box, a; B..... 150
There is another heaven; B..... 634
Nazhivin, Ivan
Rasputin. Translated by C. J. Hogarth; B 434
Nearer the bone. C. A. Wagner; B..... 22
Necessary man, the. A. Logan; AN..... 700
Neff, Wanda Fraiken
Victorian working women; B..... 723
Nerida. N. Douglas; AN..... 450
Neumann, Alfred
Rebels, the; B..... 276
Nevinson, Henry W.; R..... 171
New American caravan, the; B..... 684
New world, the. I. Bowman; AN..... 49
Newcome, Louis
Lincoln's boy spy; AN..... 602
Newmarch, Rosa
Concert-goer's library of descriptive notes; AN..... 638
Next ten years in British social economic policy, the. G. D. H. Cole; B..... 356
Nichols, Dudley; R..... 199
Night among the horses, a. D. Barnes; AN. 700
1918-1928. A short history of the world. C. D. Burns; AN..... 72
Nippon Shindo Ron, or The national ideals of the Japanese people. Y. Hibino. Translated by A. P. McKenzie; B.. 176
No love. D. Garnett; B..... 17
Noah's dove. L. Benét; B..... 254
Nobel: Dynamite and peace. R. Sohlman and H. Schuck; B..... 309
Nock, Albert Jay; R..... 432
Nordenskiöld, Erik
History of biology, the; AN..... 125
Norman, Charles
Poems; AN..... 96
Noyes, Alfred
Sun cure, the; AN..... 363
Nunn, William L.; R..... 176

O

O'Connor, T. P.
Memoirs of an old parliamentarian; B. 171
O'Donnell, Charles L., C. S. C.
Rime of the road, a; B..... 123
Odum, Howard W.
Wings on my feet. Black Ulysses at the wars; B..... 494
Odyssey. Homer. Translated by G. H. Palmer; AN..... 726
O'Faoláin, Séan; R..... 681
Ognyov, N.
Diary of a communist undergraduate, the. Translated by A. Werth; B.... 172
Ohta, Takashi, and Margaret Sperry
Golden wind, the: B..... 723
Old civilizations of the new world. A. H. Verrill; B..... 146
Old world masters in new world collections. E. Singleton; AN..... 332 Older woman in industry, the. J. Lobsenz; AN 125
Olivier, Edith
As far as Jane's grandmother's; AN.... 98
Ologenèse humaine. l'. G. Montandon; B 634
Orchard, W. E.
Present crisis in religion; B..... 552
Oriental and occidental culture: an interpretation. M. Parmelee; B..... 360
Our changing civilization. J. H. Randall, Jr.; AN..... 282
Our economic morality and the ethic of Jesus. H. F. Ward; B..... 46
Ousâma, autobiography of, the. G. R. Potter, translator; B..... 226
Outpost of the lost, the. An arctic adventure. General D. L. Brainard; AN.. 256
Outsiders. J. Bentham; AN..... 310
Overshadowed. E. Lohrke; AN..... 364
Oxford book of regency verse, the. Edited by H. S. Milford; AN..... 500

P

Packet for Ezra Pound, a. W. B. Yeats; B 681
Pack of Autolycus, the, etc. H. E. Rollins, editor; B..... 229
Paget-Fredericks, J.
Green pipes; B..... 594
Papago music. F. Densmore; AN..... 782
Parks, George Bruner
Richard Hakluyt and the English voyages; AN..... 23
Parliament and the British empire. R. L. Schuyler; B..... 693
Parmelee, Maurice
Oriental and occidental culture: an interpretation; B..... 360
Parnassus en route. K. Horna; B..... 447
Parry, Sir Edward Abbott
Berrington, or Two hundred years ago; B 387
Parsons, Alice Beal; R.....145, 358, 554
Pathway, the. H. Williamson; AN..... 151
Peerless leader, the: William Jennings Bryan. P. Hibben; B..... 590
People: the autobiography of a mystery writer. E. Wallace; AN..... 22
Pepysian garland, a, etc. H. E. Rollins, editor; B..... 229
Perkins, J. R.
Trails, rails and war. The life of General G. M. Dodge; B..... 330
Personal recollections of the civil war. J. Gibbon; B..... 122
Peterson, Houston
Book of sonnet sequences, the; B..... 447
Petrie, Sir Charles
Story of government, the; AN..... 560
Petroleum and coal: The keys to the future. W. T. Thom, Jr.; B..... 256
Pheidias. J. G. Howard; B..... 72
Phelps, William Lyon; R..... 524
Phillips, Ulrich B.
Life and labor in the old south; AN.. 177
Pilgrimage of Buddhism, the, and a Buddhist pilgrimage. J. B. Pratt; B..... 755
Pirate of the gulf, the. R. S. Holland; AN 601
Pitkin, Walter B.
Psychology of happiness, the; B..... 778
Plato: the son of Apollo. F. J. E. Woodbridge; B..... 676
Plattard, Jean
Vie de François Rabelais, la; AN..... 330
Plunger, the. Story of the Wheat Pit. E. J. Dies; AN..... 49
Plus and minus. F. Harper. Translated by D. Wulff; AN..... 310
Poconos, the. C. B. Tyson; AN..... 560
Poems. C. Norman; AN..... 96
Poems and the spring of joy. M. Webb; AN 96
Poems from the ranges. C. E. S. Wood; B. 150
Poems of justice. T. C. Clark; B..... 753
Poems of the Chinese revolution. Hsi-Tseng Tsiang; B..... 254
Political handbook of the world; AN..... 698
Poor women! N. Hoult; AN..... 177
Pope or Mussolini. J. Hearley; B..... 230
Potter, Charles Francis
Story of religion, the; B..... 469
Powell, E. Alexander
Last home of mystery, the; AN..... 256
Powys, John Cowper
Wolf Solent; review by J. W. Krutch criticized by W. Durant; C..... 66
Practical criticism. I. A. Richards; B.... 724
Practice and procedure of international conferences, the. F. S. Dunn; B..... 692
Pratt, James Bissett
Pilgrimage of Buddhism, the, and a Buddhist pilgrimage; B..... 755
Precious bane, and other books. M. Webb; B 145
Preface to morals, a. W. Lippmann; B.... 148
Present crisis in religion, the. W. E. Orchard; B..... 552
Price, Lucien; R..... 441
Prince or somebody. L. Golding; B..... 68
Pritchard, F. H., editor
From Confucius to Mencken; AN..... 49
Private Suhren. The story of a German rifleman. G. von der Vring; B..... 69
Problems of peace; AN..... 282
Profession of poetry, the, and other lectures. H. W. Garrod; AN..... 500
Prohibition or control? Canada's experience with the liquor problem, 1921-1927. R. E. Hose; AN..... 282
Proust, Marcel
Captive, the. C. K. S. Moncrieff, translator; B..... 327
Psycho-analysis and education. B. Low; B.. 175
Psychology of happiness, the. W. B. Pitkin; B..... 778
Public international conference, the. N. L. Hill; AN..... 698

R

Rabelais. A. France; B..... 69
Rabelais, François; all the extant works. S. Putnam, translator; B..... 432
Rabelais, François, la vie de. J. Plattard; AN 330

Rain-Makers, the. M. R. Coolidge; B.... 47
Ralston, Jackson H.
International arbitration from Athens to Locarno; AN..... 528
Ralston, Jackson H.; R..... 124
Randall, John Herman, Jr.; AN..... 282
Rasputin. I. Nazhivin. Translated by C. J. Hogarth; B..... 434
Ratcliffe, S. K.; R..... 725
Rattling the cup on Chicago crime. E. D. Sullivan; B..... 630
Rea, Leonard Owens
Financial history of Baltimore, the, 1900-1926; AN..... 450
Rebels, the. A. Neumann; B..... 276
Recent economic changes in the United States; B..... 250
Recouly, Raymond
Third republic. E. F. Bickley, translator; B..... 634
Redlich, Joseph
Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. A biography; B..... 147
Red Napoleon, the. F. Gibbons; B..... 694
Reismüller, Georg, and J. Hofmann
Zehn jahre Rheinlandbesetzung; AN.. 502
Religion. E. S. Ames; B..... 123
Religion lends a hand: Studies of churches in social action. J. Meyers; B..... 680
Remarque, Erich Maria
All quiet on the western front; B..... 43
Renn, Ludwig
War. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B..... 173
Répertoire de personages de "A la recherche du temps perdu." C. Daudet; B.... 327
Report of the committee on terminology (of the Federal council on art education); AN..... 450
Report of the wage and personnel survey (federal employees); AN..... 450
Reports of the experts submitted to the joint Palestine survey commission; B..... 278
Rheinbaben, Rochus, baron von
Stresemann. The man and the statesman. C. Brooks and H. Herzl, translators; B..... 470
Rhodes, James Ford: American historian. M. A. DeWolfe Howe; B..... 94
Rhodes, S. A.
Cult of beauty in Charles Baudelaire; B 308 rhys, mimpsy
mr. hermit crab; AN..... 599
Richard Hakluyt and the English voyages. G. B. Parks; AN..... 23
Richards, Charles R.
Art in industry; AN..... 782
Richards, I. A.
Practical criticism; B..... 724
Rickert, Edith, and John M. Manly
Contemporary American literature: Bibliographies and study outlines; AN... 638
Rime of the road, a. C. L. O'Donnell, C. S. C.; B..... 123
Rinehart, Mary Roberts
Strange adventure, the; AN..... 125
Ringelnatz, Joachim
Als mariner im krieg; B..... 69
River house. S. Young; AN..... 782
Road to Oregon, the. W. J. Ghent; AN.. 756
Robbers and soldiers. A. Ehrenstein. Translated by G. Dunlop; AN..... 231
Roberts, Donald A.; R..... 445
Robinson, Edwin Arlington
Collected poems; AN..... 562
Robinson, Luther Emerson; R.....148, 329
Rockefeller, John D. John D., a portrait in oils. J. D. Winkler; B..... 174
Rolland, Romain
Beethoven the creator; B..... 441
Romance and rise of the American tropics. S. Crowther; B..... 175
Romance of the rails, the. A. C. Laut; B.. 439
Romier, Lucien
Who will be master, Europe or America? M. Josephson, translator; B.... 362
Rootabaga country. C. Sandburg; AN..... 600
Rorty, James; R..123, 174; correction.... 275
Rothstein, Arnold: In the reign of Rothstein. D. H. Clarke; B..... 199
Roux the bandit. A. Chamson. Translated by V. W. Brooks; AN..... 363
Royse, M. W.; R..... 122
Ruskin, John: an intimate life; the exquisite tragedy. A. Williams-Ellis; B. 44
Russell, Bertrand
Marriage and morals; B..... 677

S

Sabin, Edwin L.
Wild men of the wild west; AN..... 602
Sale, John B.
Tree named John, the; AN..... 599
Saleslady, the. F. R. Donovan; B..... 470
Sand, George, intimate journal, the. M. J. Howe, editor and translator; B..... 496
Sandburg, Carl
Rootabaga country; AN..... 600
Sassoon, Siegfried
Heart's journey, the; AN..... 96
Scandinavian literature from Brandes to our day. H. G. Topsöe-Jensen. Translated by I. Anderson; AN..... 782
Scanlon, William T.
God have mercy on us. A story of 1918; B..... 754
Schiff, Jacob H.: His life and letters. C. Adler; AN..... 388
Schmeckebier, Laurence F.
Bureau of prohibition, the: Its history, activities, and organization; AN..... 560
Schneider, Herbert W.; R..... 552
Schoepp, Meta, and Louise Tausig
Scrapped; B..... 45
Schuck, Henrik, and Ragnar Sohlman
Nobel: Dynamite and peace; B..... 309
Schuyler, Robert Livingston
Parliament and the British empire; B.. 693
Schuyler, Robert Livingston; R..198, 443, 554
Science and thought in the fifteenth century. L. Thorndike; B..... 636
Science of psychology, the. R. H. Wheeler; B..... 686
Scott, Evelyn
Wave, the; B..... 117
Scrapped. M. Schoepp and L. Tausig; B... 45
Seagle, William; R.....148, 696
Second New Yorker album, the; AN..... 726
Ségur, Madame de
Sophie. The story of a little bad girl. M. F. Melcher, translator; AN..... 599
Seldes, George
Wings of the eagle, the; AN..... 782
Selection of cases, a, and other readings on the law of nations. E. D. Dickinson; AN..... 502
Seven iron men. P. de Kruif; B..... 495
Seven vices, the. G. Ferrero. Translated by A. Livingston and E. Abbott; B..... 527
Shakespeare, W., three comedies by; AN.. 562
Shapiro, H. L.; R..... 634
Sherman, Stuart P., life and letters of. J. Zeitlin and H. Woodbridge; B..... 675
Shiel, M. P. Cold steel; B..... 45
Shields, Art; R..... 121
Shipley, Joseph T.; R.....:308, 754
Shorey, Paul; R....676; letter..... 777
Significant short stories. E. Mirrielees; AN 639
Simon, Henry W.; R..... 753
Simpson, William Haskell
Along old trails; B..... 150
Singleton, Esther
Old world masters in new world collections; AN..... 332
Sloss, Hattie Hecht
Certain poets of importance; B..... 447
Smertenko, Johan; R.....279, 723
Smith, Alfred E.
Up to now; autobiography; B..... 629
Smith, Henry Justin, and Lloyd Lewis
Chicago: A history of its reputation; B 436
Smith, Lucy Humphrey; R..... 630
Smollett, Tobias
Adventures of Peregrine Pickle, the; AN 726
Humphry Clinker; AN..... 639
So say the wise; AN..... 639
Social interpretation of education, a. J. K. Hart; B..... 199
Sohlman, Ragnar, and Henrik Schuck
Nobel: Dynamite and peace; B..... 309
Son of Apollo, the. F. J. E. Woodbridge; B.....676; letter..... 777
Sonnets from a lock box. A. H. Branch; B 558
Sophie. The story of a bad little girl. Madame de Ségur. Translated by M. F. Melcher; AN..... 599
Soule, George
Useful art of economics, the; B..... 636
Soupault, Philippe
Last nights of Paris. W. C. Williams, translator; AN..... 638
Source book of American political theory. B. F. Wright, editor; AN..... 562
Soviet union and peace; AN..... 698
Soviet union year book, 1929; AN..... 698
Sperry, Margaret, and Takashi Ohta
Golden wind, the; B..... 723
Speyer, Wilhelm
Galahads and pussy-cats. M. Juers, translator; AN..... 598
Spirit of catholicism. K. Adam. Translated by J. McCann; AN..... 560
Stanley, Lady Augusta; later letters of. Edited by the dean of Windsor and H. Bolitho; B..... 554
Stealing through life. E. Booth; B..... 94
Stephens, John S.
Danger zones of Europe: a study of national minorities; AN..... 176
Steppenwolf. H. Hesse. Translated by B. Creighton; AN..... 780
Storm, Hans Otto
Full measure; AN..... 700
Story of architecture in America, the. T. E. Tallmadge; B..... 46
Story of government, the. Sir C. Petrie; AN 560
Story of religion, the. C. F. Potter; B.... 469
Story of religious controversy, the. J. McCabe; B..... 469
Story of the weather, the. E. Van Cleef; AN..... 782
Stout, Rex
How like a god; B..... 329
Strange adventure, the. M. R. Rinehart; AN..... 125
Stranger fidelities. M. Eiker; AN..... 700
Stresemann, the man and the statesman. Rochus, baron von Rheinbaben. Translated by C. Brooks and H. Herzl; B. 470
Structure of politics at the accession of George III. L. B. Namier; B..... 274
Stryker, Lloyd Paul. Andrew Johnson: a study in courage; B..... 19
Studies in international law and relations. A. P. Higgins; B..... 124
Style and form in American prose. G. B. Munson; B..... 358
Sun cure, the. A. Noyes; AN..... 363
Sunderland, J. T.
India in bondage; editorial paragraph on 55
Survey of international affairs: 1926 and 1927. A. J. Toynbee and others; AN 528
Swanton, John R.
Myths and tales of the southeastern Indians; AN..... 782
Swezey, Goodwin Deloss, and J. H. Gable
Boys' book of astronomy; AN..... 472
Swift, Julian
Chronicles of a gigolo; AN..... 310
Swisher, Jacob A.
American legion in Iowa, the; AN.... 502
Symonds, John Addington; Life, the, of Michelangelo; AN..... 23

T

Tallmadge, Thomas E. Story, the, of architecture in America; B..... 46
Tangle coated horse, the. E. Young; AN.. 600
Tariff on iron and steel, the. A. Berglund and P. G. Wright; B..... 387
Tasker, J. Dana; R.....96, 254
Tausig, Louise, and Meta Schoepp
Scrapped; B..... 45
Taylor, G. R. Stirling
English political portraits of the nineteenth century; AN..... 560
Taylor, Horace; R..... 387
Tead, Ordway
Human nature and management; B.... 690
Téry, Simone
Fièvre jaune; B..... 175
Thalia, J. Finley; B..... 150
There is another heaven. R. Nathan; B.. 634
They stooped to folly. E. Glasgow; B.... 225
Thiess, Frank
Farewell to paradise. H. T. Lowe-Porter, translator; AN..... 699
Thinking machine, the. C. J. Herrick; B.. 686
Third republic, the. R. Recouly. Translated by E. F. Buckley; B..... 634
This happened to me. H. Ferris; AN.... 601
This poor player. S. Watkins; AN..... 98
Thom, W. T., Jr.
Petroleum and coal: the keys to the future; B..... 256
Thomas, J. M., and Hardin Craig
English prose of the nineteenth century; AN..... 639
Thomas, Norman; R..... 44
Thomas Jefferson: the apostle of Americanism. G. Chinard; B..... 686
Those ancient lands. Being a journey to Palestine. L. Golding; B..... 278
Thorn, Helen Hopkins
Johns Hopkins: A silhouette; AN..... 639
Thorndike, Lynn
Science and thought in the fifteenth century; B..... 636
Three and the moon. J. Dorey; AN..... 598
Three comedies by W. Shakespeare; AN.... 562
Three essays. T. Mann; B..... 679
Tides. Count E. von Keyserling; AN..... 97
Tietjens, Eunice
Leaves in windy weather; B..... 558
Tigers and things. A. Kauffman and his little sister; B..... 594
Tiltman, H. Hessell
J. Ramsay MacDonald: Labor's man of destiny; B..... 522
Time's profile. H. Flanner; B..... 558
Toksvig, Signe; R..... 175
Tolstoy's wife, the diary of. Translated by A. Werth; B..... 18
Topsöe-Jensen, H. G.
Scandinavian literature from Brandes to our day. I. Anderson, translator; AN 782
Towards a new architecture. Le Corbusier; B..... 46
Townsend, W. and L.
Biography of H. R. H. the prince of Wales; B..... 680
Toynbee, Arnold, and others
Survey of international affairs: 1926 and 1927; AN..... 528
Trade union documents. W. Milne-Bailey; B 556
Tragic era, the. The revolution after Lincoln. C. G. Bowers; B..... 306
Trails, rails and war. The life of General G. M. Dodge. J. R. Perkins; B.... 330
Trautwein, Susanne
Lady of laws. H. E. Palmer and L. W. Charley, translators; AN..... 231

Travel diary of a philosopher. Count H. Keyserling; AN..... 450
Tree named John, the. J. B. Sale; AN.... 599
Trial of life in college, the. R. M. Jones; AN 471
Tribolet, Leslie Bennett
International aspects of electrical communications in the Pacific area, the; AN 390
Trollope, Anthony
Kellys, the, and the O'Kellys; AN.... 562
Trophies, the, with other sonnets. J.-M. de Heredia. Translated by J. M. O'Hara and J. Hervey; AN..... 560
Truth about Geronimo, the. B. Davis; B.. 684
Twelve bad men. S. Dark; AN..... 23
Twentieth century love poems. C. M. Hill; B 447
Twilight of Christianity, the. H. E. Barnes; B 722
Tyson, Carroll B.
Poconos, the; AN..... 560

U

Under dogs, the. M. Azuela. Translated by E. Munguia, Jr.; B..... 689
Undertones of war. E. Blunden; B..... 69
Unger, Hellmuth
White betrayal, the. D. Wulff, translator; AN..... 756
Up to now (autobiography of A. E. Smith); B 629
Useful art of economics, the. G. Soule; B 636

V

Vaillant, George C.; R..... 496
Valentine, Cyril H.
What do we mean by God?; B..... 552
Valmigère, Pierre
Et demain? France, Allemagne et Pologne; B..... 362
Van Cleef, Eugene
Story of the weather, the; AN..... 782
Van Doren, Dorothy; R..... 632
Van Doren, Mark; R.....494, 675
Verona, Guido da
Mimi Bluette; B..... 45
Verrill, A. Hyatt
Old civilizations of the new world; B.. 146
Victorian working women. W. F. Neff; B.. 723
Vie de François Rabelais, la. J. Plattard; AN 330
Villard, Oswald Garrison
John Brown: a biography; AN..... 500
Villard, Oswald Garrison; R..122, 226, 330, 360, 590
Violence. M. and E. Haldeman-Julius; AN. 448
Viollis, Andrée
Girl in soviet Russia, a; AN..... 388
Virtue of the jest, the. J. S. Montgomery; AN 603
Visions and chimeras. P. H. Frye; B.... 754
Vivas, Eliseo; R.....69, 228
Vossler, Karl
Mediaeval culture; B..... 280
Vring, Georg von der
Private Suhren. The story of a German rifleman; B..... 69

W

Wagner, Charles A.
Nearer the bone; B..... 22
Wales, Prince of, biography. W. and L. Townsend; B..... 680
Walker, Harvey
Federal limitations upon municipal ordnance making power; AN..... 450
Wallace, Edgar: People: the autobiography of a mystery writer; AN..... 22
Wallach, Mike
Farmer, have you a daughter fair?; B 310
Wallis, Keene
Bands and rebels; B..... 22
Wall street and Washington. J. S. Lawrence; B..... 526
Walpole, Hugh
Hans Frost; B..... 468
Walton, Eda Lou; R..22, 72, 150, 309, 448, 558, 594, 682, 753
War. L. Renn. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B..... 173
Ward, Harry F.
Our economic morality and the ethic of Jesus; B..... 46
Ware, Norman J.
Labor movement in the United States, 1860-1895; B..... 281
Warner, Arthur; R..... 679
Washington conference and after, the. Y. Ichihashi; AN..... 282
Watkins, Shirley
This poor player; AN..... 98
Wave, the. E. Scott; B..... 119
Way, the, of peace. Viscount Robert Cecil; B 44
Webb, Mary
Poems and the spring of joy; AN..... 96
Precious bane, and other books; B.... 145
Webb, Sidney, and Beatrice
English poor law history; two parts; B. 146
Wehner, George
Curious life, a; B..... 594
Wellington, a character study. O. Brett; AN 23
Wells, H. G.
Adventures of Tommy, the; AN..... 600
Werfel, Franz
Class reunion. W. Chambers, translator; B 120
Westermarck, Edward Marriage; B..... 386
West, Rebecca
Harriet Hume: A London fantasy; B.. 632
Wharton, James B.; R.....69, 173, 754
What do we mean by God? Cyril H. Valentine; B..... 552
What is right with marriage. R. C. and F. W. Binkley; B..... 386
What is socialism? J. W. Hughan; AN.... 202
What the farmer needs. I. Lippincott; B.. 230
Wheeler, Raymond Holder
Science of psychology, the; B..... 686
When the U-boats came to America. W. B. Clark; B..... 725
White betrayal, the. H. Unger. Translated by D. Wulf; AN..... 756
White, E. B.
Lady is cold, the; AN..... 177
White, John R.
Bullets and bolos. Fifteen years in the Philippines; B..... 226
White puppy book, the. C. Alden; AN.... 600
Whiting, Edward Elwell
Changing New England; AN..... 500
Whitlock, Brand
La Fayette; B..... 752
Who will be master, Europe or America? L. Romier. Translated by M. Josephson; B..... 362
Wiegler, Paul
William the first, his life and times; B 779
Wiese, Kurt
Karoo the kangaroo; AN..... 602
Wigglesworth, Michael
Day of doom, the, or a poetical description of the great and last judgment. With other poems; AN..... 332
Wildes, Harry Emerson; R..... 446
Wild men of the wild west. E. L. Sabin; AN 602
William of Occam
Epistola ad fratres minores; AN..... 638
William the first, his life and times. P. Wiegler; B..... 779
Williams-Ellis, Amabel
Exquisite tragedy, the: an intimate life of John Ruskin; B..... 44
Williamson, Henry
Pathway, the; AN..... 151
Winged horse anthology, the. J. Auslander and F. E. Hill; AN..... 500
Wings of the eagle, the. G. Seldes; AN.. 782
Wings on my feet. Black Ulysses at the wars. H. W. Odum; B..... 494
Winkler, John K. John D., a portrait in oils. H. Broun.....7; B..... 175
Wishnieff, Harriet V.; R..... 176
Without censor. New light on our greatest world war battles. T. M. Johnson; B. 360
Wolf Solent; review by J. W. Krutch criticized by W. Durant; C..... 66
Woodbridge, Frederick J. E.
Son of Apollo, the; B....676; letter.. 777
Woodbridge, Homer, and Jacob Zeitlin
Life and letters of Stuart P. Sherman; B 675
Wood, Charles Erskine Scott
Book of Indian tales, a; B..... 309
Poems from the ranges; B..... 150
Wood, Charles W., and B. A. Javits
Make everybody rich: industry's new goal; B.....174; correction..... 275
Wright, Philip G., and Abraham Berglund
Tariff on iron and steel; B..... 387
Wriston, Henry Merritt
Executive agents in American foreign relations; AN..... 698
Writing the short story. E. Mirrielees; AN. 639
Written on water. F. de Miomandre; AN.. 449
Wrong, George M.; R..... 779

X

X I T ranch of Texas, the. J. E. Haley; B 254

Y

Yeats, William Butler
Packet for Ezra Pound, a; B..... 681
Young, A. Morgan
Japan in recent times; B..... 446
Young, Ella
Tangle coated horse, the; AN..... 600
Young, Stark
River house; AN..... 782

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R..... 200
Zehn jahre Rheinlandbesetzung. G. Reismüller and J. Hofmann; AN..... 502
Zeitlin, Jacob, and H. Woodbridge
Life and letters of Stuart P. Sherman; B 675
Zimmern, Alfred. America and Europe and other essays; B..... 18

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 3, 1929 No. 3339

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 1
EDITORIALS:
Statesmen and Admirals 4
Chekhov—Twenty-five Years After 5
Empire Builder 5
Freedom and Loyalty 6
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 7
ENGLAND AND AMERICA. By Charles E. Payne 8
MODERN SPAIN—II. HOW STRONG IS THE DICTATORSHIP? By Carleton Beals 11
CONGRESS TAKES A HOLIDAY. By Paul Y. Anderson 13
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 14
CORRESPONDENCE 15
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 16
BOOKS:
Cat. By Evelyn Scott 17
The Novel and the Tale. By Joseph Wood Krutch 17
Scholar and Political Interpreter. By George E. G. Catlin 18
Wives of Great Men. By Dorothy Brewster 18
The Crucifixion of Johnson. By Claude G. Bowers 19
The Penalty of Being Right. By C. Hartley Grattan 20
The "Subtle Doctor." By Richard McKeon 22
Dollar Poetry. By Eda Lou Walton 22
Biographies in Brief 22
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Robert Dell Replies 24

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

WITH HIGH MASS on the hill of Guadalupe, ancient shrine of the Aztec mother of gods, the Roman Catholic churches reopen in Mexico. Thousands of pilgrims trot, plod, shuffle, crawl, to the monster fete. They kneel and drink water from the sacred well of the Madonna, they put their foreheads to the dust gathered on her altars in more than two years of solitude. But it is doubtful whether of all the clamorous thousands many understand what the quarrel between state and church was about, and just why it is now settled. They mourned in 1926; they shout hurrahs in 1929. But this quarrel is nearly a hundred years old. In that time any squabble develops niceties that only a Jesuit and a lawyer can follow. As a matter of fact church and state began making faces at each other in vice-regal days, largely over loot. Toward the end of the nineteenth century Juarez daringly cut the economic foundations from under the church, and though Mexico was supposedly Catholic and might have been expected to side against him, he forced the issue, evacuated convents and monasteries, required priests to register with the government and swear allegiance to the constitution which dispossessed them, and prohibited religious teaching in public schools and religious ceremonies outside of church and chapel. He was fulminated against in the metropolis, but the country as a whole shrugged its shoulders. The Holy Alliance sent Maximilian to straighten out the mess. He wrote that in the opinion of the Mexican clergy he could not be a good Catholic and a "just and liberal prince" at the same time; and he was shot for trying.

DURING THE REVOLUTION churches were sacked and images smashed wholesale. The constitution of 1917, written by men resentful of the church's consistent opposition to social reform, restated the laws of Juarez. In 1926 the Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Filippi, crowned Christ King of Mexico on the hill of Cubilete in the state of Guanajuato. He was expelled by the Obregon Government for violating the constitution. The clergy was ordered to register and to swear allegiance to that injured state document; convents and schools which had been operating clandestinely were raided and sealed; religious organizations which had been engaged in political activity, also in violation of national laws, were scolded. The church went on strike and attempted a business boycott. Disaster was in the air. Both sides tugged the situation to the breaking point. Calles aggravated the bishops and the bishops sulked stiff-necked. But because nothing happened to prove to either side that the masses beyond the city limits were its allies, peace parleys were begun, though they usually proved abortive. Time made anti-climax of the drama, and, according to the understanding just reached, the Vatican recognizes the constitution, in exchange for which it is extended the privilege of agitating for its reform. Priests will register, no religion will be taught outside the churches, and no religious ceremonies will be performed except in them. In return the government will abandon its tactics of encouraging schism, and will register none but priests approved by Roman dioceses. Among the vivas for the Pope and President Portes Gil, give Ambassador Morrow a little hand. He is a better diplomat than his predecessors, and than Maximilian.

FRIENDS OF PEACE will welcome the announced intention of Premier MacDonald to notify the League Assembly in September of Great Britain's acceptance of the so-called optional clause, Article 36, of the statutes of the Permanent Court of International Justice. This article, written by Elihu Root in 1920, binds a state accepting it to the obligatory submission of all purely legal questions, such as the interpretation of treaties and pecuniary claims for legal injuries. The little states, which would be able under this clause to take their big neighbors into court, have naturally favored it, forty-four out of fifty-one League members having already signed. The big Powers have been inclined to stand aloof, giving too much color to the idea that they preferred to trust their guns and navies. Germany, however, accepted last year, and France and Japan have indicated their willingness to do the same. If Great Britain now adheres, Italy will be the only great state in the League still outside. Newspaper dispatches indicate that British acceptance may be accompanied by certain reservations, but in the hands of Mr. MacDonald we may reasonably hope that such reservations will not do violence to the essential principle of the clause. As pointed out in our editorial of April 3, the United States has already signed an agreement with Latin-American states for obligatory arbitration of legal questions. We also suggested that the United States might offer to sign Article 36 if the four great Powers still standing out would do so.

WE HAVE RECEIVED several letters lately protesting against our attitude toward the prohibition law, one of which, from Jesse H. Holmes of Swarthmore College, we print this week in our correspondence columns. Mr. Holmes says we "ignore the fact that the law was fairly and constitutionally passed" and "apparently has the support of a large majority of our people." Undoubtedly the Eighteenth Amendment was constitutionally passed, but to what extent it is supported by the people of the United States is open to question. The Nation thinks that the Eighteenth Amendment should not have been presented to our State legislatures, which had no direct mandates from the voters, but that the alternative method provided by the Constitution should have been employed and the measure placed before State conventions specifically elected to vote on that subject and no other. Likewise we feel that the Dry majority in Congress is an inexact gauge of public sentiment. We have already said, and here repeat, that as a necessary preliminary to approaching prohibition enforcement there should be a national referendum, and we wish Mr. Hoover's commission would recommend such a course. We sympathize with the protest of Senator Glass against the effort to "submerge" prohibition in organizing the work of the commission. A commission on prohibition enforcement was what Mr. Hoover promised in the campaign and what Congress voted money for. The country is not interested in homilies on law enforcement in general; it would like specific advice as to what to do about the Volstead act.

OUR CORRESPONDENT COMPLAINS also that in deploring shooting and killing by prohibition agents we overlook the fact that they have to deal with armed desperadoes. Undoubtedly the work of prohibition-enforcement officers is both difficult and dangerous. We have just had an instance of it in the attack upon a customs boat in the Detroit River by a craft believed to be engaged in smuggling liquor. The attackers took the offensive, severely injured the customs boat by gunfire, and, although eventually driven to cover, continued to shoot even from Canadian waters. We also appreciate that many enforcement officers have been killed in the effort to carry out the prohibition law. We said last week that it would be absurd to disarm prohibition-enforcement agents, but we approve of the orders given to them to shoot only in self-defense. We understand that customs patrolmen, on the other hand, are permitted to shoot to prevent a felony, and we agree with our neighbor the New Republic that they should be limited as strictly as prohibition agents. If this course had been followed, Henry Virkula would not have been killed at International Falls, Minnesota. We cannot think of any kind of smuggling which is so serious as to warrant an officer in assuming the duty of jury and judge, and executing summary punishment. The Nation believes that violence begets violence and not respect for law. Present methods are stimulating the already excessive tendency of American police officers toward lawlessness and brutality. To show us a better way of approaching this question of prohibition is the exacting task which the American people ask of Mr. Hoover's commission.

PRESIDENT HOOVER is apparently learning a good deal about tariff making. It is reported that he not only wants, but expects to get, a tariff bill that will give adequate protection (whatever that may be) to agriculture, and that will relieve industries showing evident signs of distress and unemployment, and no others. Such simple faith in the possibilities of protection deserves something better than the misshapen bill passed by the House. The chorus of press protests against that measure continues to grow, while strenuous and well-justified objections from foreigners pour in. Our exports of goods last year exceeded our imports by more than a billion dollars. Our foreign customers cannot forever meet such a bill by their present methods of borrowing money from us and entertaining our tourists. The only solution consists in selling more to the outside world. If the Administration is willing to fight for such a program, even within the limits of its protectionist thinking, it may yet rescue something from the wreck of Mr. Hoover's "limited-revision" program. The close vote on Senator Borah's resolution shows that there is plenty of support in the Senate for a measure that would not be a general grab-bag, and the spread of information concerning what the proposed measure will actually do will certainly make its passage increasingly difficult. The battle against the bill ought to be waged with all vigor during the coming months.

SPEAKING OF THE TARIFF, Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, has indulged lately in a refreshing amount of criticism of the political party of which he has long been an honored member. Evidently he does not believe in the doctrine of our Secretary of the Navy, Charles Francis Adams, that the whole duty of a Republican is simply to peep "Me too." In his commencement address recently Mr. Butler defined the difference between true patriotism and "pharisaical nationalism," saying of the latter:

> It is this pharisaical nationalism which frames public policies as if there were no other members of the human family but ourselves. It acclaims international trade and international financial interdependence, and then proceeds to build tariff walls so high as to make both as difficult as possible. It permits private interest to insinuate itself into public policies which should be controlled solely and entirely by the larger interest of the whole people, and it thinks of a nation not as a moral personality with duties and ideals, but simply as an economic unit intent upon exalting itself in all possible ways no matter at whose cost or at what damage to the general welfare. It is unintelligent selfishness personified.
>
> Just now we may see all this in full sway at the national capital. The sagacious and constructive economic policy which, as expounded by Hamilton and Clay and Lincoln and Blaine and Garfield and McKinley in his last address at Buffalo, had come to be generally accepted as characteristic of our nation's public life, has now been > quietly superseded by the doctrine that the government must assure a profitable domestic market to every producer with political influence enough to insist upon having it provided for him, regardless of anything else.

We wish that a radio loud speaker might have relayed these words into the halls of Congress.

JUNE 20 was a big day for J. P. Morgan and Company, for on that day the firm announced two of the greatest industrial combinations in history: a half-billion-dollar power organization in New York State and a national food grouping of the Fleischmann Company, the Royal Baking Powder Company, and the Gillett baking-powder interests of Canada. From the consumers' point of view the new Morgan power combination is the more dangerous because it is almost certain to give to one group of holding companies a virtual monopoly of New York State power. At this writing the Morgan combination controls about 40 per cent of the electric power of New York and, if the expected merging with the Consolidated Gas system is completed, the new super-corporation will control about 88 per cent of the State's power. The consumer can only stand and weep, for the new combination is an organization of holding companies which are exempt under the law from control by public-service commissions. The key holding company used by the Morgan interests, the United Corporation, which was described in The Nation of January 23, does not engage in operating activities and is therefore in a position to overvalue its constituent companies and withhold from the consumer the gains of consolidation without adequate check by any regulating agency.

JUST WHEN we were beginning to feel deep pity for the textile manufacturers because of the feminine fancy for bare legs, an editorial from the Southern Textile Bulletin changed our whole outlook and proved that every shoe has its cotton lining:

> While the textile industry watches the progress of the stockingless fad, we are wondering if it is going to hurt the cotton manufacturing industry. When silk or rayon hose are removed, socks have to take their place because the inside of shoes does not feel good to the bare feet, and the socks will contain more cotton than the hose. The lady that runs around with bare legs will have to spend much time with her lower extremities in the bath-tub, and there will be a greater wearing out of wash rags and towels, or at least we hope that such will be the case. It is an ill wind that blows no good.

And where there are more towels there will be more laundries, more soap, more bath-tubs, more plumbers, more sponges, more bath-robes, more manicure sets, more jobs for podiatrists, more gold-plated safety-razors, more depilatories, more sunburn-proof ointment. Ultimately Lloyd George and bare legs will solve the problem of unemployment.

AFTER SUFFERING DENIAL of citizenship by the Supreme Court of the United States, Rosika Schwimmer can take some consolation from the award, by the Supreme Court of the State of New York, of $17,000 damages from Fred R. Marvin, head of the Key Men of America, for a libel action decided in her favor in the county courts a year ago. Mr. Marvin was so rash as to call Mrs. Schwimmer, among other things, "a German spy" and a "Bolshevik agent." In proof of these charges he adduced the once famous and now forgotten—except by some of the Key Men—Lusk Committee reports. Justice McCook of the State Supreme Court ruled that libel does not become privileged matter because published by a legislative committee, and added that such a report, to be privileged, must be fair and honest. And now, while Mrs. Schwimmer's suits in our American courts are fresh in our minds, we are treated to the spectacle of citizenship being denied by the federal District Court of New Haven to Douglas C. MacIntosh, a member of the Yale Divinity School faculty, because, although he spent four years in the army during the late conflict, he will not engage to support or fight in a war which he does not regard as "morally justified." "I will not," he said, "promise that I would support the government in a war in violation of the so-called Kellogg pact, for instance." To the editors of The Nation, who regard these sentiments as no more than a modicum of what is just and reasonable, the action of the United States Court seems at best only the necessary interpretation of a bad law.

COOLING NEWS comes from Broadway. Several theaters are to be transformed into swimming pools. The "legitimate" theaters have been driven to this pass by the "illegitimate" talkies. One of these theaters, it is pointed out, has been occupied only four months since its opening in 1927. The galleries will provide seats for spectators. The cupids on the ceilings, as we recall them, look as if swimming is just the exercise they need. The chorus girls need only buy swimming caps, although, like sailors, most of them probably can't swim. However, we must award the prize for hot-weather news to the enterprising Congressman from Ohio, Frank Murphy, for his project to help Mr. Hoover fight the Reds and preserve to America "sound government" by Republicans, as opposed, no doubt, to the silent variety. He proposes to do this by means of the National Republic—a monthly propaganda magazine for the G. O. P.—and as many ten-dollar contributions as he can extract from "friends of the administration," like Senator Watson and Hubert Work, who have indorsed his campaign. Mr. Hoover, in his more scientific moments, must enjoy the neolithic antics of his Republican colleagues.

TO CHARLES E. PAYNE, professor of history at Grinnell College, Iowa, we extend hearty congratulations for winning The Nation's essay prize of $150 for the best discussion of What is Making for War with England. Certainly no moment could be more appropriate than the present for bringing Mr. Payne's thoughtful discussion before the public. His article, which is printed elsewhere in this issue, was awarded first prize by Charles A. Beard, Norman Thomas, and Willmott H. Lewis after reading a selection of essays from almost every State in the Union and a dozen foreign countries. We wish to express our deep appreciation not only to the judges but to the many contestants who analyzed the British-American situation so ably that the task of the judges was made exceedingly difficult. Among the many excellent essays submitted those of Walter Phelps Hall of Princeton and Albert F. Coyle, former editor of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers' Journal, should receive honorable mention.

Statesmen and Admirals

THERE was some disappointment over the lack of definiteness in the pronouncements of Messrs. MacDonald and Dawes concerning naval reduction. Instead, there might well be satisfaction over the advance indicated in the probable methods of approaching the question.

The dismal failure of the Geneva Conference of 1927 was attributed, correctly enough, to the too great influence of naval experts. There seems to be reason for hoping that the next conference will be one not of admirals, whose business it is to make war effectively, but of statesmen, whose business it is to make peace effectively. The two groups are concerned primarily with different questions, and there is no reconciling the two points of view. The admirals are busy with the danger of defeat in war; the statesmen, with the danger of war itself—a danger which, be it said, under modern conditions is graver than the danger of defeat, since modern war knows no victors in the old sense. Unless the two questions are kept distinct, there is no getting forward. The hopeful sign at present is the indication that the questions are being kept separate, and that the right question rather than the wrong one is to be tackled. Ramsay MacDonald, as the world knows, has the root of the matter in him, and the first public utterance of our new ambassador suggests that Washington also is alive to the actual needs of the time.

Mr. Dawes spoke to the Pilgrim Society not without confusion, yet with recognition of the main issue. He said:

> The naval officer has his duty to perform to his state and it is primarily to secure it against attack. He therefore trusts to his ships and armament. It is the duty of the statesman to remove from his state danger of attack. Upon the latter primarily lies the duty of peace-making, and in these negotiations he must hold the initiative. He is the one to build up a new order, to start a new policy, guided as he goes by the advice of those competent, patriotic, naval experts who serve him.

The distinction of tasks here is clear, and the primacy of the statesman's work is clearly set forth. He is to build up a new order and start a new policy. So far so good.

In what sense, however, is he to be guided in this task "by the advice of those competent, patriotic, naval experts who serve him"? Here is the sticking-point, and here Mr. Dawes falls into error and confusion from the standpoint of us extreme pacifists whom he so felicitously brackets with the extreme militarists as the lunatic fringe. Mr. Dawes would have the admirals of each nation first work out a definition of abstract equality and then would let the statesmen fashion a compromise between these definitions as a working formula for reduction. If this means that the statesmen are to take their admirals seriously, we are landed back just where we were, depending on our guns and ships for safety, and there can be no effective reduction. If on the other hand, the admirals and their influence are to be effectively kept out of the negotiations, then there is reasonable ground to hope that something substantial may be done. The most hopeful interpretation to put on the remarks of our Ambassador is that Washington and London alike, unable to scrap their admirals, intend to keep them out of the conference and to limit their power for mischief-making to a minimum. That is the best we can hope for as things stand.

As a matter of principle, the case is perfectly clear. If war between the English-speaking peoples is "inconceivable," as we daily assert, then the question of naval equality loses all interest. We must start with the assumption either that we may some day fight or that we shall never fight. The admiral, by the nature of his job, makes the first assumption. The statesman, on the other hand, may choose either alternative, but in fact he, too, generally chooses the first, thereby falling into the hands, because he falls into the thinking, of those whose business it is to make war.

Aside from the enormous economic gain involved, the most important result of any movement toward lessened armaments is probably the encouragement it gives people to think of national safety in other terms than those of a preponderance of force. A great opportunity now faces Mr. Hoover to help Americans think in those other terms. The existence of the MacDonald ministry gives him an extraordinary opening which we are eager to believe that he will seize. He cannot scrap the army and navy, but he can say like a sensible man that we have no wish or intention to fight anybody, least of all our British friends, that we are eager to save the burdensome taxes involved in carrying out our silly fifteen-cruiser program, and that we are willing to unite with other nations in almost any reasonable plan of naval reduction, without too meticulous consideration of the details of guns and ships. Such details are unimportant in a world where people do not mean to make war, and if we do not succeed in avoiding war they will make little difference anyway; for we shall all go to perdition together.

If the governments of Great Britain and the United States will only take a strong lead in a program of naval reduction, based on the assumption of mutual good faith and good-will, there are already indications of the willingness and eagerness of other governments to join with them. The cost of armaments is so heavy, the dread of war and ensuing civil disturbance is so great, that they all have the strongest motives to pay almost any price for peace. The people who pay the armament taxes are eager to be relieved of that burden, which they carry only because they have learned no better way of being safe. If the United States and England will muzzle their admirals as Mr. Dawes has suggested, and bring out their statesmen, we may see something done. It will never be done, however, if those statesmen think in ultimate terms of war. As is pointed out in our prize-winning essay elsewhere in this number, we have plenty of occasions of difference with our English as with our other friends; we have none that is worth or ever will be worth a war, and our statesmen must realize this fact. Mr. Hoover and Mr. MacDonald now have a chance to lead in taking a step that will begin to give meaning and reality to the words that were spoken at Paris last summer. The road is difficult, but not impossible. Down with the admirals and up with the statesmen!

Chekhov—Twenty-five Years After

IN the middle of July, 1904, the body of Anton Pavlovich Chekhov leisurely traveled from Badenweiler, Germany, to St. Petersburg, where it was buried. Admirers who at various railroad stations, some time in the midst of the night, came to take leave of the dead were shocked to discover, upon inquiry, that the coffin was conveyed in a car bearing the legend "Oysters." A fitting incongruity for the finale of one who had been primarily the poet of life's incongruities.

It has been the fate of Chekhov, in life and after his death, to be mercilessly interpreted. In Russia a writer without a pronounced "tendency" was regarded as an anomaly second only to that of a Russian without a passport—an unimaginable freak in a Polizeistaat. Chekhov felt mildly amused at the efforts of friend and enemy to label him definitively and drag him into one camp or another. He who had no use for reforms, revolutions, and similar palliatives could not but chuckle when a story or play of his would cause him to be simultaneously praised or damned as a reactionary and a radical, a Marxian materialist and a neo-Kantian idealist, a champion of the village and a protagonist of urban Russia, and so on to infinity. On the eve of the revolution of 1905 resolutions of various political groups ended with a quotation from Chekhov: "Tak zhit' nielzia," that is, one cannot, one must not, live such a life! Anton Pavlovich, in his grave, may have smiled at being thus utilized.

In Soviet Russia Chekhov is considered obsolescent. Shakespeare, Molière, dramatized Dickens and Jack London, and such Russians as Gogol and Ostrovsky are more appropriate and timely than the author of "The Cherry Orchard." At the same time the Western world, notably England and the United States, is beginning to appreciate Chekhov more and more. The pseudo-Marxian explanation of this phenomenon, by relegating Chekhov's writings to bourgeois art, will hardly do. Molière is being produced by workers' clubs in Moscow; does that classify Molière as a proletarian writer? A more plausible reason for the change in Chekhov's fortunes may be found in the fact that while Western audiences have become more sensitive for nuances, the Soviet public, in any event its present aristocracy, demands less subtlety than the pre-revolutionary intelligentsia. The ruling class in Russia, having had no yesterday in art appreciation, demands the obviously tragic, the obviously comic, or the immediately contemporary. Meierhold knows his clientele, and he brings the drama down to its level. Poster-like directness and striking effects, Constructivist scenery suggestive of the machine age, actual automobiles speeding up stage through the audience—that is digestible.

Chekhov has been baffling to critics, particularly to Russian critics whose prevailing penchant for the social or sociological method made their work serve a political rather than literary purpose. The Russians have found it exasperating to squeeze Chekhov into the Procrustean bed of definitive formulas. The difficulty of evaluating Chekhov in words is due to the fact that his is more than a verbal art, that it is infinitely suggestive of moods and of as many complex contradictions as life itself may contain. As a rule Chekhov's starting-point is the humor of the grotesque misplacement and the incongruous in life. If the humor turns out to be of the tragic variety, it is because Chekhov's keen eye observes not the exceptional but the ordinary and common. Chekhov insisted on "The Cherry Orchard" being a comedy. Stanislavsky overruled the author and presented the play as a tragedy. Who was right? Both, undoubtedly. The resolution-makers of 1905 were not wrong in choosing for a slogan Chekhov's "Tak zhit' nielzia." The word nielzia means both one cannot, physically, and one must not, ethically. Chekhov taught no message, he had no ax to grind. He showed life as it is, in all its incongruities, and only rarely suggested the inevitable deduction that one cannot and must not live thus. Were the Soviet audiences and producers a bit subtler, they might realize how profoundly nonconformist and revolutionary Chekhov is.

Empire Builder

PERHAPS the most important figure in the entire history of Central America—the man who has done most to steer the destinies of the Caribbean countries—was Minor Cooper Keith. Yet comparatively few of the headline-scanners of 1929 recognized the name when they read, on June 15, that Minor Keith, aged 81, had died.

Upon his tomb might well be inscribed the words "He built railroads and planted bananas." Those were his major activities and with them for more than half a century he remade nations. When he died his dream of a railroad that should link North America with South was still five hundred miles short of fulfilment, but he had built the major links, some of them over swampy jungle land where neither white man nor red had been able to live; and he had proved that they could be made to pay. He planted bananas to provide freight for his railways, and with his bananas transformed the whole East coast of Central America. His name was a byword in four republics, all of which had at times virtually put the entire settlement of their foreign debts in his hands.

Minor Keith belonged to an epic elder generation. He was no cool Wall Street head, planning from afar the exploitation of alien resources. He went to Costa Rica—from a Brooklyn lumberyard via a Texas ranch—at twenty-three, and he grew up with the country. Many of his first employees were veterans of William Walker's roistering filibusters. His uncle had built the famous Oroya Railway that meanders upward 15,000 feet in the Andes in Peru. Minor Keith lived his life in the tropics, and he married the daughter of a former President of Costa Rica. Central Americans, although they sometimes feared him, counted him one of themselves. And while there are stories of ruthless methods employed by the great United Fruit Company in squeezing lesser rivals out of its empire, the company boasts—it is significant and encouraging that it does boast—that it has never called for a marine or a battleship to protect it. More powerful than many nations, it has done its own negotiating and its own protecting.

In 1872 Minor Keith and his elder brother rode mule-back down to Limon on the Atlantic Coast of Costa Rica. There was no railroad to the interior in these days, and hardly even a trail to the miasmic swamps along the Atlantic Coast. The old saying was that a man who made the trip to the coast once was a hero; if he went twice he was a fool. Keith went a hundred times. Once he took with him a corps of happy-go-lucky New Orleans dockhands, who first mutinied and then died of fever. Another time he brought in a few thousand Italians; some of them died and the rest deserted. Thousands of lives were lost; Keith and the Republic of Costa Rica both almost went bankrupt. It took twenty years to lay the rails up to the capital; meanwhile Keith, realizing that Costa Rican coffee, in spite of its excellent quality, would not supply enough freight, began planting bananas along the railway route and cultivating them with the black labor he had found best adapted to the country. Today the whole East coast of Central America is a waving mass of gigantic banana leaves; its population is largely black, and English is more current than Spanish. It is the empire of the United Fruit Company.

The United Fruit Company is the product of a merger between the Keith interests in Central America and Boston interests which had built up a fruit business in Jamaica. Today it has an investment of some two hundred million dollars in tropical fruit; it employs 50,000 men in the Caribbean region alone, and keeps more than as many again busy growing fruit for it on their own plantations. It owns, directly or indirectly, four-fifths of the railways of Costa Rica and all its ports, and virtually all the railways of Honduras, Guatemala, and Salvador; and its investments in Nicaragua, Panama, and Colombia are considerable. It has built cities; it antedated Gorgas in controlling tropical disease; it maintains hospitals and schools. And all this enormous efflorescence of industry in what had seemed uninhabitable jungles —its operations have been slightest in the upland coffee country settled by the Spaniards—is largely due to the vision, the ruthless energy, and the organizing ability of Minor Keith. Younger men have grown up in the business under him; but he is universally recognized in Central America as the grand old man of bananas, the grand old man of railways, the greatest single force in building up the region economically.

But bananas, revolutionary as they have been, are mild compared to the ultimate influence of railways. Minor Keith's railways are still local fruit roads; but he dreamed them linked into an iron backbone of the Americas. Already it is possible to travel by rail from New York almost to the frontier of Nicaragua. Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, and Salvador are united by rail. And over the rails, even of the lesser fruit roads, come Detroit motor cars, Cincinnati candles, Pittsburgh aluminum pots, phonographs, radio sets, breakfast foods, and cigarettes. The old local crafts begin to disappear; they will soon be gone, unless the Indian stock of Guatemala and Mexico can continue to resist the effects of hard roads and cheap factory goods. It seems hardly likely. A whole culture is doomed by Minor Keith's banana and banana railroads. He himself had the wisdom occasionally to ponder what he had done; but the bright young men who have grown up under him have no doubts. And though they never need marines or gunboats, the effect of their bustling activity is a subtler, profounder, and more revolutionary imperialism than that which spreads its more obvious wings under the protection of Uncle Sam's soldier-boys.

Freedom and Loyalty

IN the course of his baccalaureate sermon at Columbia University Dr. Howard Chandler Robbins, the former dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, bade the students play the part of free men, > preserving in its integrity your personal life and never allowing it to be controlled and dominated by opinions and judgments forced upon you from without. If you feel impelled to do so [he continued], you will plead in San Francisco for Tom Mooney's release; you will question in Boston the justice of the Sacco-Vanzetti executions, and you will proclaim at conventions of the Daughters of the American Revolution (if they will let you) the rights of Quakers and pacifists to citizenship, though you yourself happen to be neither.

When so much worth saying has been so admirably said it is perhaps ungracious to raise any objections, but if we may judge from the printed reports we are afraid that Dr. Robbins left the loophole which the ministerial mind is, perhaps, even more likely than any other to be careful to leave. His subject was not Freedom, but Freedom and Loyalty. And when you link the two you raise a difficulty which Dr. Robbins does not seem to have solved. He told his hearers that the two ideals lay at opposite poles; he urged them to be "as free as you are loyal and as loyal as you are free"; but he did not, unfortunately, tell them how this feat was to be accomplished, and to us it seems that he thus stopped short at the very point where any possibly fruitful discussion of Freedom and Loyalty should begin.

We have no doubt that the Grand Kleagle himself would agree with Dr. Robbins "in principle." Certainly Mr. Wilson professed to do so at the very time when he sanctioned the conscription of all youth and the persecution of conscientious objectors. But the fact remains that to insist upon Freedom and Loyalty is not to announce a principle but to indulge an evasion, because whenever anything fundamental is at stake the problem must always resolve itself into one of choice. No one who succeeded in being "as free as he was loyal and as loyal as he was free" ever got into any trouble with even the Daughters of the American Revolution or the Ku Klux Klan, but no one with an independent mind ever succeeded in convincing himself that he could always reconcile the two unreconcilables. One or the other must come first.

Every fundamentalist believes in Faith and Reason, just as every member of the Society for the Suppression of Vice believes in Liberty without License, but no specific problem was ever solved by the enunciation of either one of these seductive phrases. Nor will any student at Columbia ever be brought to a clear decision by pondering the mystical unity of Freedom and Loyalty. When a book is published, a strike is called, or a war is declared, he will be urged one way by a group shouting "Loyalty" and another way by a group shouting "Freedom." What he will have to do is make a choice, and Dr. Robbins must have discovered the fact during the course of his late disagreements with his superior, that high-pressure promoter who happens to be the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of New York. It is too bad that he could not bring himself to admit it to the graduates of Columbia.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

IN his lively biographical sketch "John D., A Portrait in Oils," John K. Winkler directs attention to one of the major achievements in the life of the magnate. And according to the judgment of the author, the financier's growth in public esteem has been a matter of shrewd foresight. Mr. Winkler believes that the oil king's vast gifts for health and education have wholly altered his station in the public eye. He seems to think that shrewd press agentry, pictures for newspaper photographers, and silver dimes for caddies have altered the whole temper of a nation's thinking.

With all due respect to Mr. Ivy Lee, I think that deeper causes have contributed to the abatement of the hot hatred which once flowed out of the community toward John D. Rockefeller. It does not seem to me that even now the people of America are actually adoring in their attitude toward the old gentleman though he has been accepted as an interesting personality. I believe and hope that Americans have outgrown a naive and absurd way of thinking in regard to economic matters. Time was when every rich industrialist was of necessity a villain. The captains of finance were the men behind the trusts and the trusts ground down and exploited the poor. Once upon a time the notion held sway that if the Government would only compel competition in every form of business we should all be rich, happy, and the possessors of full dinner pails.

I would not for a moment suggest that John D. Rockefeller formed a giant combination out of altruistic motives, and yet I think that he is sound in his contention that the Standard Oil Company has, on the whole, been beneficial to the citizens of the United States. I say this in spite of the citations of evil practice brought forward by Ida Tarbell. Sooner or later the American consumer must face the hard fact that he will never benefit in the long run from cutthroat competition, be it in oil or meat, transportation or woolen garments. After all price must depend ultimately upon cost of production, and too many cooks not only spoil the broth but make it more expensive.

To be sure, the innocent bystander may profit for a little while through a price war, but such deadly struggles are of short duration, and you may be sure that what the consumer saves during the strife he will later make up in an indemnity to the winner. The Sherman and the Clayton acts are relics of legislation enacted in the days when political economics was in the kindergarten stage. For the time being there is need of a close alliance and understanding between big business and men of a radical turn of mind. For the most part the Socialist has been wise enough to see that the Fords, the Rockefellers, and the Morgans are all unconsciously the friends of his philosophy. It is the vast organizers who have shown us how great are the economies in combination. They have proved that a high standard of living can be maintained only in lands where monopoly is allowed to flourish. A commercial war, like any other, is generally destructive to all concerned. It is practical wisdom for the Socialist to say: "Combine and merge, grow big and bigger, and at the proper time we'll take you over."

Utopian dreams of the four-hour day and the five-day week assume immediacy only when they are translated into terms of industrial unification and organization. Of course, the scheme of fattening trusts up for the public good has its dangers. In the case of utility corporations, for one, we have seen the manner in which giant combinations tend to seek control of public opinion and to influence information and control legislation. No one should deny that there is a risk in allowing the erection of vast citadels of capital. But the risk must be taken. There is no other way. In spite of persuasive sentimentalists no one can seriously consider a return to the old days of handicraft. While it is true that the artisan of an age which is passed may have had more fun in his job than a Ford employee pressing some single gadget it is well to remember that he had to stick to his bench during hours which now seem inconceivable to most of us. Most of the tears which have been shed over the passing of the candlestick-maker and the weaver and the tinsmith were not shed by any of the members of those arduous occupations.

The world is coming to think of work as a necessary evil. Organize, and it can be reduced to a minimum. Some of us today take setting-up exercises that we may live. We don't pretend to think that it is enjoyable to touch the fingers to the toes a dozen times or yet a hundred. But the whole business may be stuffed into a small compass. So it may be in time with labor. But first we must rid the world of that grinding false god called competition, which actually means that three people perform a task which could be better done by one under more shrewdly devised circumstances.

If competition is the actual ogre who has robbed our days of playing and our nights of sleep then we owe Mr. Rockefeller a vote of thanks and not any measure of hatred whatsoever. Yet I would not go so far as to lead a cheering squad to the high fence in Tarrytown. Just as I never regarded John D. as an arch-villain so do I now refuse to hail him as a shining hero.

It has become the custom to salute each of the great industrialists as a genius. I quarrel with that because there seem to be so many of them and when one dies or steps down another moves forward to take his place. Few will deny that the elder Morgan was a man of more forceful personality than his son who now rules the great banking house. And yet the affairs which went on under the hand of the dead leader were insignificant in scope compared to the undertakings of the present firm.

Three names are mentioned as America's greatest. Ford, Rockefeller, and Edison comprise the trio. Edison is, of course, no financier at all, although his inventions form the very core of every merger in public utilities. Ford is a curious combination of engineer and practical organizer. Rockefeller is sheer financier. Obviously the nature of American life has been vastly influenced by these three. Your house and mine show in every corner the touch of their fingers. That is if you will allow me to include the garage. And yet I believe that in a hundred years all three will be virtually forgotten. They have come into our homes and not into our heads. After a century only the intangibles can be seen or felt or heard.

HEYWOOD BROUN

England and America*

By CHARLES E. PAYNE

JUST before the Great War the United States and Great Britain celebrated the completion of one hundred years of peace between the two nations. Commenting on this record, Lord Bryce said: "Whenever there were bad manners in London, there was good temper at Washington and when there was a storm on the Potomac, there was calm on the Thames. The moral is that peace can always be kept, whatever the controversy, between peoples that wish to keep it."

In spite of this unique record, the post-war years have gradually developed an exceedingly dangerous tension. This has become so serious that even as realistic and level-headed a statesman as Ramsay MacDonald has declared that a war between the two peoples is by no means unthinkable. This startling and sinister change has not been desired by either Government and, least of all, by either people. Nevertheless we have blindly drifted into the same atmosphere of mutual jealousy that has resulted in past wars.

In an analysis of this situation, it should be noted that there has always existed a certain amount of dislike in each nation for the other. In America, this has been partly an inheritance from the Wars of '76 and 1812. It has been kept alive by the nationalistic type of textbook in our schools, has been sedulously stimulated by certain organizations which would appear to exist for no other purpose, and has been too frequently capitalized by ignorant or unscrupulous politicians. It has been fostered, too, by immigrants from certain other countries and notably by the Irish who have always played an active part in our political life. By centuries of mistreatment, England has instilled into the Irish a deep hatred which they not unnaturally brought to this country. While the Irish question is now settled the old hatred still plays its part.

The British dislike for Americans is grounded in the belief that we are a provincial people; it finds expression in a "certain condescension" which James Russell Lowell once deprecated. For this attitude, Americans themselves are not altogether blameless. The American traveler abroad must frequently blush for the noisy and self-assertive type of his countrymen. Of course, an irritating type of Britisher visits America but he comes in smaller numbers.

Another contributing factor to this permanent misunderstanding is the existence of a highly nationalistic and irresponsible type of newspaper which indulges in misrepresentation of the other people and plays upon the vanity of its own. This game of international "window-smashing," as Bismarck once called it, is highly profitable to the newspapers, but as the same statesman pointed out, every country eventually pays for the windows which its papers smash.

Equally offensive and far less excusable is the sort of statement occasionally indulged in by public officials. President Coolidge's Armistice Day speech illustrates how strikingly inept a provincial mind can be when it lacks both humor and imagination.

The irritating factors thus far discussed, while more or less permanent, would never in themselves have produced a crisis. They have been offset down to the Great War by the large fund of common sense and good humor in each people, supplemented by mutual confidence and respect. Down to that time, too, there had been no great clash of economic interests. While the United States and Great Britain had been expanding rapidly they had expanded in different spheres. Great Britain had been developing the "Second British Empire" whereas the United States had been advancing westward. Thus no serious rivalry developed at sea or for the markets of the world. Indeed, the two Powers served each other's economic needs admirably. Great Britain as a creditor nation was looking for good investments, and thus it happened that our transcontinental railways were largely financed by British capital.

With the end of the Spanish American War, however, the United States expanded beyond this continent and began to develop the interests of a World Power. With the resources of a continent behind us and with our agencies for organization, we soon became a rival of Great Britain for world markets and began to emerge from a debtor to a creditor nation. It became evident to shrewd observers that the United States was destined eventually to surpass Great Britain as an industrial and financial power. This change, indeed, was precipitated by the Great War which weakened Great Britain's economic position, almost eliminated her rival Germany, and left the United States the strongest economic power in the world. Hardly was the war over, when Great Britain began to feel the danger to her supremacy. On July 1, 1919, that astute observer, Colonel House, wrote President Wilson from London: "Almost as soon as I arrived in England I sensed an antagonism to the United States . . . our position is much more favorable. It is because of this that the relations between the two countries are beginning to assume the same character as those of England and Germany before the war.

"By her industry and organization, Germany was forging ahead as the first Power in the world but she lost everything by her arrogance and lack of statesmanship. Will it be Great Britain or the United States who will next commit the colossal blunder?"

The decade which has elapsed since these pregnant words has not definitely answered his question as to whether the United States or Great Britain will make the "colossal blunder." It is certain, however, that the friction between the two peoples has been greatly intensified, and that neither nation can claim a clean bill of conduct as to responsibility.

The British feel that we have joyously accepted the advantages of our new position but have refused to assume the corresponding responsibilities. Our failure to join the League, to adhere to the Court unless given a privileged position, and our unwillingness to guarantee any kind of sanctions for the Kellogg-Briand Pact are interpreted as evidence of our irresponsible attitude. In a recent visit to England, the writer heard this view expounded by scores of

* The prize-winning essay in The Nation's recent contest on the status of British and American relations.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Englishmen of all classes. Whether just or unjust, it is one of the grave causes of the existent ill feeling. A second grievance is the debt settlement which the average Britisher feels has proved entirely too burdensome. Since he is paying the highest income tax in the world and since both Italy and France were treated more leniently, he is deeply disgruntled. Great Britain like France has her "devastated region." It consists of a serious falling-off in her export trade due to a general decline in world markets. Since the war, her exports have never been more than 75 per cent of their pre-war level. This factor together with the demoralization of her coal industry and trade has left Great Britain with a permanent body of over a million unemployed which has to be sustained at the public expense. In this harassing condition she has tried desperately to recapture a higher per cent of her pre-war markets but in so doing the British producer has come up against the American tariff wall and the keen competition of American mass production.

Finally, America is now challenging the most deeply cherished of all British traditions, her right to control the trade of neutrals with a nation whom she is fighting; a tradition older, dearer, and even more vital to the British than the Monroe Doctrine is to Americans. Little wonder that John Bull is both sore and indignant!

Looked at from our side, however, Uncle Sam has his grievance and his case. Over here, industrialization has gone on apace and has gradually passed into the hands of "Big Business" which has developed organization and mass production on an unprecedented scale. The home market no longer suffices either for the consumption of our products or surplus capital. In consequence, we are attempting to capture foreign markets and to find fields for investments abroad.

Then, there is the question of raw materials. The automobile industry is largely American and depends upon cheap oil and cheap rubber. There has been sharp competition between British and American oil interests in Mexico, Persia, Turkey, and Irak. As for rubber, almost the whole output is British and there has been severe criticism from American buyers of her regulation of this monopoly.

"Big Business" (including rubber and oil companies) demands that its interests—its investments, loans, and markets—be protected by a strong foreign policy. This pressure found expression in Mr. Coolidge's declaration that "our citizens abroad are part of our national domain," and a determined effort has been made by propaganda to educate the public up to this principle of foreign policy. Along with these developments there has grown up a determination not to tolerate in the future Great Britain's regulation of neutral trade when she is at war. The "freedom of the seas" has become almost an article of faith with the American people and it brings us into direct conflict with the most cherished of all British traditions. It is this question which is really at the bottom of our present naval rivalry. In other words, the clash of economic interests has produced naval competition and the two together are chiefly responsible for the present critical character of Anglo-American relations.

Attempts at naval agreements have failed because they have not come to grips with the vital issue, the freedom of the seas. Within limits, the Washington Conference was a great success. It settled certain Far Eastern problems, averted war with Japan, and established parity in battleships. It succeeded because strategy was subordinated to policy. This angered the friends of the big navy, and they have discredited the conference ever since. At the Geneva Conference, they had their day—policy was subordinated to strategy—the result was failure. Both the British and American delegations were about equally responsible for the failure but the press of each country threw the blame entirely upon the other delegation. Then came the highly unfortunate Anglo-French naval agreement. Britain herself has overwhelmingly repudiated it but it has left deep suspicion in the American mind. Finally, the Kellogg-Briand Pact was offered the world as our contribution to peace. At the same time, however, we passed the Fifteen Cruiser Bill revealing our own lack of faith in the new program.

So in this wise, it has come about that Uncle Sam and John Bull, friends for a century, look across the Atlantic, each a little truculent, and both very suspicious while Thomas Hardy's "Spirit Ironic" mockingly comments, "Yet both peoples want peace!"

The prospect, however, is not hopeless. "Peace can always be kept between peoples that wish to keep it." What then is the way out?

So far as economic rivalry is concerned, immediate action is not imperative. A geographical division of economic supremacy seems to have developed, the United States predominating in South America, Canada, and the Far East; and Great Britain in the rest of the world. Eventually as competition becomes sharper, some sort of international control of raw materials and perhaps of markets may be necessary. Public opinion, however, is not yet ready for such measures. In the meantime, very practical steps can be taken along three lines: (1) The education of the public as to the issues involved and the forces creating them; (2) the establishment of a machinery for the peaceful settlement of differences; (3) the solution of the freedom of the seas issue.

In the matter of educating the public the press is the most important factor. It is unfortunate that international good-will should turn upon the whims and prejudices of correspondents and the desire of publishers for large profits. It seems unlikely that any great reform in this direction will originate in the press. The greatest hope lies in the reading public itself. There is much evidence that even now the American public is beginning to resent the kind of foreign news service which it has thus far received. A healthy skepticism and objectivity are being rapidly developed by the Foreign Policy Association, the World Peace Foundation, the Williamstown Institute of Politics, and conferences of a similar kind. It would be difficult to exaggerate the magnificent work done by such organizations. The further development and multiplication of this type of institution by internationally minded millionaires would be one of the greatest contributing factors to future world peace.

It is only just to add that an influential part of our press and the better weeklies on both sides of the Atlantic have done yeoman service in this same direction. For the most part, they have been singularly liberal and detached in their judgment, and constructive in their criticism. Good service, too, has been done by the college professors of the country in changing the character of our school textbooks. Many texts are now available in which the drum and the trumpet play a less prominent part and which reflect an unbiased attitude toward Great Britain. This newer type of history is slowly making its way into the schools.

These combined forces, the textbooks, the responsible part of the press, and the various agencies for the study of international problems, are making it increasingly difficult for the demagogic type of newspaper or politician to influence national policies.

When it comes to establishing a machinery for the peaceful settlement of differences, we shall have to adjust our thinking to our position as a World Power. So far as governmental action is concerned, the first feasible constructive step will be to join the World Court and give it our hearty support. If the Root formula is not effective, we should continue our efforts until a satisfactory formula is found and thus demonstrate our faith in judicial processes.

It is unlikely that American opinion will go as far as to accept the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court. On the other hand, public opinion will approve an agreement with Great Britain to arbitrate all questions which cannot be settled by diplomacy or judicial methods—even questions of vital interest and national honor. Our experience of over a century in settling disputes with Great Britain would entirely justify such a step. These two measures will establish a machinery for settling all difficulties and obviate any necessity of ever resorting to war as "an instrument of national policy."

An arbitration treaty will be certain of approval by both peoples if the vexed question of the freedom of the seas can first be disposed of. The most practical solution of this century-old problem seems to be that now advocated by Wickham Steed, editor of the English Review of Reviews. Mr. Steed urges that Great Britain declare that she will "recognize absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas outside territorial waters except as seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action, for enforcement of international covenants." He argues that sea power would then become the servant of law and the road would be open for cooperation in peace with the United States and like-minded nations.

This suggestion has met with a good deal of approval in Great Britain and will meet with more if the United States will agree as a quid pro quo not to interfere with an economic blockade imposed by a unanimous vote of the League of Nations Council. There will then be no neutrals since we shall have renounced the right to trade with an outlaw nation which, in almost every conceivable case, will have also violated the Kellogg Pact. Surely this will be no great renunciation if we are really interested in a world organized for peace rather than war. On the other hand, in a case where the Council of the League is not unanimous, Great Britain will have renounced the right to interfere with our trade.

Of course, it will be objected that for the United States to permit an outside organization to determine whether or not it may trade with another nation is too great an infringement of our national sovereignty. But Great Britain will be renouncing an equally great privilege—one, in fact, even more vital to her existence. Moreover, the limitations will be self-imposed. We will voluntarily limit our sovereignty by our own sovereign will just as we would do in signing a treaty.

As John W. Davis has recently pointed out, too much of our thinking on this all-important question is based upon the false assumption that in the wars of the future Great Britain will always be a belligerent of the "old-fashioned" type and the United States will always be a neutral of the "old-fashioned" kind. As a matter of fact, with the existence of the League, the Locarno Pact, the Four Power Treaty, and the Kellogg-Briand Pact, "the controlling idea in the world of today is world peace against all disturbers." With the United States committed to the side of peace in advance it is hardly likely that any nation in the future will make itself a disturber.

Such an understanding with Great Britain is to be preferred to the adoption of the Capper Resolution which provides for an arms embargo against, and non-intercourse with, any nation which in the President's judgment violates the Kellogg-Briand Pact. The Pact, however, permits "defensive wars" without defining the term. Further, it has been so limited by reservations that its violation by any one country is largely a matter of interpretation. To put the onus of interpretation and decision upon the President is to impose upon him a great responsibility which is certain to bring upon him not only charges of injustice but great unpopularity at home and abroad. Such a responsibility is essentially international in character. For a single nation or its representative to have power to declare another nation an outlaw would be an anachronism in a world internationally organized for peace.

Then, too, the Capper Resolution makes us responsible for preventing our own nationals from trading with the outlaw nation. Mr. Morrison of the Christian Century and many other Americans are vigorously opposed to such a policy. Finally, the Capper Resolution leaves the question of the freedom of the seas exactly where it is now—full of potential danger.

A compulsory arbitration treaty with Great Britain and a settlement as to freedom of the seas would remove all excuse for naval competition. A naval conference might then succeed. Perhaps it would be appropriate that the call for the next conference should come from Great Britain. It is needless to say that the ground should be carefully prepared and that, like the Washington Conference, it should be dominated by statesmen more concerned with general policy than with the illusion of mathematical parity.

The plan sketched above would settle the only immediately dangerous problem, the freedom of the seas. It would justify reduction in armaments, it would demonstrate to Great Britain and the world that the United States is willing to cooperate by joining one world organization (the Court) and lending its official support to another (the League). It would express our faith in the Conference method, settlement by judicial processes, and arbitration. Finally, by establishing a machinery for the peaceful settlement of differences, it would enormously strengthen the Kellogg-Briand Pact.

To those who are convinced that international agreements will always be broken and that the only protection lies in superior force, these measures will not appeal. So far as Great Britain is concerned, our century of peaceful relations is a striking refutation of such a view. Moreover, the world is fast losing patience with that type of thinker. The more realistic of us are realizing that the principles of Hugo Grotius are steadily gaining ground over those of Machiavelli, and that the future lies with the spirit of cooperation and moral force. Given a machinery through which these forces can function and the rest can be safely left to the common sense and good-will of the two peoples.

*Modern Spain

II. How Strong Is the Dictatorship?

By CARLETON BEALS

Madrid, June 12

RECENTLY the Spanish authorities fined Señor Indalecio Prieto, editor of El Liberal in Bilboa, one thousand pesetas for publishing a photograph in which the niece of the Pope appeared at a social function in short skirts revealing very neat knees. (The Pope's sentiments at that time regarding the moral boundaries of the female anatomy were being broadcast.) "Five hundred pesetas for each calf (pantorrilla)?" exclaimed Señor Prieto to me. "Really too much even for very nice calves!"

Doctor Gregorio Mariñon, a Republican leader and one of the most prominent physicians in Spain, was giving a public course in sex hygiene—things told freely in every high school in the United States. At the instigation of the clergy his course was closed by the police. He was arrested and fined 100,000 pesetas by the Dictatorship.

Two years ago the Bishop of Madrid engaged in civil action for the possession of certain properties connected with the Institute of San Isidro, and the Supreme Court ruled that titles pass to the state. But the Dictator, in spite of this decision, delivered the disputed properties to the Bishop, plus several million pesetas interest.

These by no means exceptional occurrences indicate the relation between church and state, between the church and the Dictatorship. The 100,000 odd priests, nuns, and monks in Spain (one for every forty families, a burden heavier than that of the officer caste) enjoy special privileges and fueros. Save for gr[illegible], are still immune from civil punishment. High officials of the church occupy important government posts and are found in the hand-picked "national" Assembly of Primo de Rivera. The religious press is well subsidized by the Dictator, and the Jesuit periodical El Debate is considered an official organ. Prelates are the guests of honor at every official function.

From the first the church rallied to the side of the Dictator. The Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, Primate of Spain, the Archbishops of Valencia, Valladolid, Siguenza, and the Bishop of Madrid, all issued pastoral letters urging support of the new regime. In the political struggles of the nineteenth century the army and church were ever at loggerheads; but today, with the menace of more radical tendencies, the two groups now meet for mutual support in the halls of government. Primo owes much to the church; and the church owes much to Primo.

In this, Primo is, of course, merely carrying out the traditions of the dynasty. When Alfonso XIII visited the Vatican several years ago, he delivered an address of charming provincialism, in which he promised to combat heresy and punish infidels—which has been done to the best of the Dictator's ability. In return the King asked the Pope to admit Spaniards into the Papal Guard, to create more Latin-American cardinals, and to stop the separatist propaganda being carried on by the Catalán priests. Unfortunately the King, so informed persons tell me, has no exalted concept of religion, but is profoundly superstitious and places great faith in personal physical salvation from bombs and sickness in the intervention of particular saints, through the use of holy water, scapularies, medallions, etc. He backs every intrenchment of clerical power.

And Primo de Rivera has consistently made concessions to the clerical elements. The Augustine college of the Escorial and the Jesuit college in Bilboa, despite their deficient humanistic curriculums, have been given the right to issue university degrees. The closing of the national engineering school of Madrid has strengthened the Jesuit school in the same capital. This year a decree provided that the university examinations throughout Spain would be conducted by joint committees of professors and priests. These, and similar concessions to the military schools, precipitated the students' strike of March, which resulted in the closing of five universities, the wholesale arrest of students, the discharge and resignation of professors, and bloody riots. The Dictator has been obliged to suspend the decree relating to examinations.

Public education has consistently suffered in order to benefit religious schools. The amount spent on primary education per pupil in Madrid and in many other places has steadily declined, though doctored government statistics would show a slight increase in the number of schools. In Madrid the amount per pupil is less than one-fourth that spent in the most backward of the sixty largest cities of the United States. Through the pressure of the collaborating Socialists, the Dictator reluctantly began building six new primary units in Madrid, where over 80 per cent of the public schools are ungraded, single-teacher, single-room affairs thrust in the dark corners of private medieval buildings, without proper playground, heating, or toilet facilities. But the work on the six new buildings was delayed as much as possible. And though two of the units have been completed for two years, clerical opposition (according to leading educators) has prevented these units from being inaugurated. They stand empty, useless.

The outstanding humanist in Spanish education is Señor Luis Bello, a remarkable, unassuming, lovable man. During the past three years Bello has journeyed throughout Spain in the most humble fashion, visiting public schools, traveling to the remotest hamlets. He discovered schools that nobody knew existed; but he also discovered conditions more depressing than ever had been imagined. He has written over five hundred articles and has published four books, demanding more schools, better schools, more and better teachers, and better pay. His efforts have aroused the country. Through personal, patient contact with the townspeople of all Spain, single-handed, he has created a current of public opinion. Never in the history of the land have so many people and commissions called upon the Ministry of

* The second of four articles by Carleton Beals. The next, Censorship at Its Worst, will appear in an early issue.—Editor The Nation.

Education, demanding schools; never has the Government been so swamped with letters and petitions. Bello is a man reverenced throughout Spain. Though half-starving he refused to accept a position with the present regime, and though offered a thousand pesetas to give an address at an official ceremony he declined. But in spite of public clamor for schools, little has been done. The Government promises, passes orders, authorizes the appointment of a teacher, announces the creation of a school in the official statistics, but nothing happens.

"And why?" I asked Señor Bello.

"The greatest obstacle to public education, in fact the one real obstacle in the towns and cities of this country, is the clerical opposition. Undoubtedly, in spite of unfavorable conditions and poor pay, the best teachers are in the government schools, but the best-equipped schools are the religious institutions. The religious schools block every effort to expand public education. Their schools are all pay schools, but they keep an eye on the poor students in the government schools, and as soon as a child shows promise he is offered a religious scholarship.

"Recently I visited districts in Spain where the people are absolutely cut off from intercourse, villages which live absolutely isolated, without wheeled communication, where the people are much the same as before the coming of the Romans and speak an almost unintelligible tongue. In these and other villages I have called the attention of the authorities to the utter lack of education. What has been the result? The church immediately used influence to have the local priest appointed school-teacher. The Government is afraid to take this step, yet it does not wish to offend the church by denying it anything. So nothing is done. Perhaps, after all, these delays are just as well, for what kind of education can we expect from the Dictatorship? Perhaps we can oblige it to erect new buildings. Even if we construct at the rate of a thousand buildings a year, decades will be required before we catch up to fairly normal condition."

"And are the religious schools the only barriers to a proper public school system?"

"In the towns and the cities. But in the rural districts the main obstacle is found in the large landed proprietors, who desire to prevent public education, because they fear that the children when they grow up will refuse to work from sun-up to sun-down for from two to three pesetas a day (28 to 42 cents) and a ration of bread dipped in vinegar."

In southern Spain the backbone of the Dictator's support comes from the large landed proprietors and bull-breeders. In this region exists the worst absenteeism in Spain, with the low wages mentioned by Señor Bello. One proprietor boasted to me that he drove his cattle from Galicia in northwest Spain clear to Andalusia in the far south, without ever leaving the estates he owned. Great tracts are devoted to the raising of bulls for the ring. In some places the only meat the people taste is that of the bull and the horses after they have been slaughtered in the ring. The founder of the Unión Patriotica in Sevilla (an organization fomented by the Dictator and the military officers to take the place of defunct political parties no longer permitted to function, an organization within which Primo declared there was "ample room for all shades of political opinion") was Señor Benjemea (brother of the Minister of Fomento, Count Guadelhorce), the owner of large bull-raising estates in Andalusia. The public calls the members "los mansos de Benjemea"—a manso being a bull that won't fight and gets hissed from the ring.

The only old-time political group which the Dictator has permitted to flourish openly has been the Socialist Party and the allied Unión General de Trabajadores (General Confederation of Workers). For the Socialists this has been a tactic of self-preservation. The arrival of the Dictatorship, in fact, salvaged the Socialist Party from decline. Primo has rewarded the Socialist leaders with jobs in the Government. Largo Caballero is on the Council of State; special posts have been created for Angel Saborit, head of Socialist Youth, and for Fabra Rivas. In part this collaboration has been a question of gratitude. While Professor Fernando de los Ríos, Alvarez del Vayo, and other Socialists have refused openly to follow the majority, the decision of the party to support Primo de Rivera is born of anterior circumstances.

The Moroccan disasters, terrible economic conditions, parliamentary ineptitude led prior to 1923 to a considerable increase in Communist strength in northern Spain and to the rapid growth of the Syndicalist movement (Confederación Nacional de Trabajo) in Cataluña, later in Madrid itself. The Communists captured the elections in the important industrial center of Bilboa and throughout much of the Basque region, and drove their erstwhile comrades out at the point of the gun, planting their red standard in the Casa del Pueblo. They also secured control of most of the miners. The Syndicalists also made inroads. Earlier the Socialists had been given guaranties by the Catalán authorities, where Primo was commandant, to carry their propaganda into the Syndicalist camp, but with limited success. The Syndicalists, for their part, countered by directing their propaganda at Madrid itself, the traditional Socialist stronghold ever since the patriarchal Pablo Iglesias put the party on the map. Shortly before the Primo coup, the Syndicalists gained possession of the Casa del Pu[illegible]cialists from control of the U.G.T. of the capital. The Socialist Party was in difficult straits. The arrival of the Dictatorship reversed roles. Primo immediately flung Communists and Syndicalists into jail, and to the joy of the Socialist leaders stamped out the Syndicalist movement in Barcelona with an iron heel. At the same time the Dictator issued a manifesto declaring labor must limit its demands, work longer hours, increase its output and efficiency. The Socialist Party mildly protested in favor of existing social legislation. The Dictator replied that he had no intention of abolishing existing labor laws and congratulated the party for its disciplined and sensible attitude, immediately appointing Socialists to government jobs. Strike committees, half U.G.T.-half proprietor, with a government chairman were appointed. Thus the Socialist Party serves as one of the supports of the Dictatorship, maintaining labor forces in a neutral position and blocking popular organization against the regime. The Socialist Party, like the Catalán industrialists, fears the Syndicalists and Communists more than it hates the Dictator.

The only open opposition to the Dictatorship thus far has come from (1) the Conservative Party, ex-Premier Sánchez Guerra being associated with the artillery plot of last January. He is now imprisoned on a battle-cruiser; (2) the students and professors and practically all the intellectuals, who have been ruthlessly persecuted; (3) the Republicans. The last deserve more extended comment.

With the downfall of the Republic in 1873 and the final restoration of the Bourbon dynasty, republicanism fell into disrepute. In spite of the sharp swing toward reaction and clericalism, the monarchy more or less respected the liberal constitution of 1869, dug up from the debris of the Carlist wars; and though church and state were not separated, and the Senate remained a ludicrous aristocratic-military-clerical haven, on the whole a measure of popular expression was guaranteed in the Chamber. The Spanish public, tired of internal disorder, felt that the country could best be served by a modified English parliamentary system. The Republic Party subsided to one of so many other parliamentary groups, a name rather than a reality, a guaranty of parliamentary liberties rather than a revolutionary menace. Republic leaders were known to be on the Crown pay-roll; and though the noisy Lerroux occasionally shook his fist, the Conservatives and Court Liberals smiled indulgently. For Lerroux is a rabid Fascist, a believer in the Moroccan imperialism and all the other paraphernalia of the existing regime—except the monarchy.

Today, however, the repressions of the Dictatorship have created a radical republican sentiment. The thinking public is convinced that Alfonso XIII is and always has been basically an absolutist; it considers him equally responsible for the repressive acts and robbing concessions of Primo. His Majesty's signature appears on all decrees; he has muddied himself in the same pool. And so, several weeks ago, Lerroux came out with a manifesto attacking Primo de Rivera and the monarchy, declaring that only two courses were open: collaboration or revolution, adding cynically that he, because of his age, accepted collaboration. Lerroux remains on the extreme right of the Republican movement. The middle wing is led by Dr. Gregorio Mariñon, previously mentioned, in collaboration with Jiménez de Asúa and Ortega y Gasset, the latter Spain's best-known philosopher, who recently resigned, after fourteen years of service, from the University of Madrid, in protest at the treatment of the students. The leaders of the left Republican wing are Alvaro Albornoz and Marcelino Domingo. Whereas the Mariñon group declares that it is sufficient to oust the King, the left wing declares that a sound republicanism can only be built on social reform. When I arrived in Spain, Albornoz was being held in jail. I greeted him when he stepped out of the Carcel Modelo after fifty-six days of confinement. The program of his group, now organized on a semi-secret basis, calls for a courageous attempt to face the problems of Spain: overthrow of the monarchy; break-up of the large estates in the south; the creation of normal-sized patrimonies in Asturias and the north, where subdivision has created anti-economic units; an enlightened labor code; the freeing of Spain from the terrible incubus of clericalism; separation of church and state; the abolition of special ecclesiastical privileges; the creation of an independent judiciary, and the reestablishment of trial by jury.

Yet it is necessary to face reality. The Conservatives, though now in great part against the King, are the outs, desiring a return to their favored pre-1923 position on a parliamentary basis. The student strike was sporadic and isolated; the intellectual elements are without political orientation. The Republicans are woefully split. The Catalán separatists cannot offer a national solution.

Congress Takes a Holiday

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, D. C., June 24

DURING the two months that Congress was in special session before going into summer recess, it considered four major subjects of legislation—farm relief, census-and-reapportionment, immigration, and tariff. It disposed of the first three, leaving tariff, the most contentious and important of the lot, for final action in the fall. This special session of the first Congress under the Hoover Administration afforded some interesting tests. First, it demonstrated that the House, with its unwieldy Republican majority, has simply ceased to function as a legislative body, and has degenerated into a mere Presidential rubber stamp. But the Senate, despite Democratic losses in the last election, remains almost evenly balanced—thanks to the courage and independence of the Western Progressives—and in this balance resides the only surviving guaranty that important measures will undergo full and open discussion. President Hoover has failed to display great capacity as a leader. I am reluctant to criticize him; he is so far superior to his predecessor in almost every way that one is inevitably tempted to give thanks for his virtues and forget his faults. But the honest chronicler must be concerned with absolute—not comparative—facts, and the fact about Mr. Hoover's relations with Congress thus far is that he has exhibited two conspicuous traits: that he will not fight unless he is sure of victory; and that he will not do directly what he believes he can do deviously. This Oriental habit of mind has already got him into trouble, and will surely get him into more unless he abandons it.

In surveying the work of the session, we should bear in mind the purposes for which it was summoned. Mainly, these were to relieve the farmers and to perform limited revisions in the tariff. The farm bill which was passed is almost universally regarded as a makeshift. To achieve the smallest measure of success it must have the fullest cooperation of the farm organizations, and for the most part they have manifested nothing but skepticism and hostility. Leaders in some of the largest have gone so far as to express a conviction that the bill was designed by their enemies for the purpose of destroying them. In appointing the eight members who will compose the Farm Board (with the Secretary of Agriculture as a member ex-officio), the President will have an opportunity to restore some of the confidence which is essential. The board ultimately will have half a billion dollars at its disposal, and if Mr. Hoover appoints men who have the confidence of the farm organizations some good may be accomplished in the direction of more systematic marketing. If he relies upon the advice of such confidantes as Julius Barnes in making his choices, the program will virtually be foredoomed from the start. Should it accomplish the utmost that is hoped from it, it will do no more than partially ameliorate the ills from which agriculture suffers by reason of the consistent and brazen pampering of industry at agriculture's expense. Responsibility for the bill rests solely upon Mr. Hoover; he got what he wanted.

He has been conspicuously less successful in getting what he asked in connection with the tariff. The revision, as carried out by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, was limited by nothing more immediate and compelling than the blue sky and the conscience of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association. If finally enacted in its present form the bill would add to the annual living costs of the American people a sum estimated at from $600,000,000 to $800,000,000. Nor is there any assurance that it will be altered in the direction of sanity and decency by the Senate Finance Committee, which has undertaken the job of rewriting it during the recess. Chairman Smoot, with a degree of cheek possible only to a man of God, and possible to him only when engaged on the Lord's business, blandly designated himself to head the subcommittee which will write the sugar schedules in which the Mormon church is so deeply interested, and then proceeded to demonstrate his obliviousness to evil tongues by naming Dave Reed, of Pennsylvania, as head of the subcommittee which will write the steel schedules. Other subcommittee appointments showed an equally nice feeling for the proprieties. Whether the Senate will undo the mischief when the bill is reported is doubtful. Cunning—if not intelligent—selfishness, has guided the hand of the Republican leaders, and they have arranged to hand out certain plums that will be sufficient to purchase the votes of a number of Democrats.

Will Mr. Hoover veto a bill which so contemptuously flouts his request for limited revision? I doubt it. He will veto it, I think, only if the Senate succeeds in inducing the House to write the export debenture plan into it. There are some who believe that he would like to see the plan incorporated in the bill, as affording him a perfect reason for vetoing it. But in view of the vote on debenture in the House, that seems impossible. My belief is that the bill in its final form will be practically as bad as it was when it came from the House—and that Mr. Hoover will sign it.

The passage of the double-barreled census and reapportionment bill, largely through the persistent and indefatigable labors of Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, marked the end of a nine-year period of nullification by the House of the Constitutional provision for a reapportionment of seats in the House of Representatives every ten years. This mean-spirited display on the part of members who feared for the loss of their seats through reapportionment, was relieved by one bright spot—the earnest and persistent advocacy of the measure by Representative John J. Cochran of Missouri, to whom it means certain retirement. An important result of the reapportionment, which will be based on the 1930 census, will be to increase the representation from the cities at the expense of the rural districts. For this reason it was fought by some of the Dry elements, who anticipate, probably correctly, a decrease in the size of the Dry majority in the House. However, it will not be reduced sufficiently to make any difference in the votes on prohibition measures. Efforts of Senator Wagner of New York to forestall an orgy of pie-grabbing by placing under Civil Service the 100,000 census enumerators who will be employed, were defeated. The sad example of Mrs. Knapp was lost on her Republican brethren at Washington—who have become habitually skeptical of all examples issuing from Albany.

President Hoover's earnest entreaty that the national origins act, as a basis for fixing immigration quotas, be repealed, was rejected by a Senate combination consisting of the stalwarts of his own party, led by Reed of Pennsylvania, and a group of Southern Democrats, who are just naturally agin' furriners. The act, which Hoover of his own experience has pronounced unworkable, thus goes into effect immediately, if any way of making it effective can be discovered.

Senator Norris's hoary resolution for the submission of a Constitutional amendment to abolish "lame-duck" sessions was adopted by the Senate for the fifth time. Its principal opponents this time were Blease of South Carolina, who argued for the preservation of the Constitution "just like she was written," and Bingham of Connecticut, who said virtually the same thing in slightly more cultured accents. As a result of the Rules Committee's idiotic and ignominious attempt to punish the United Press for publishing a secret roll call, an amendment was adopted providing for open executive sessions on a majority vote, to be taken secretly. It was a spurious and insincere gesture at abandoning a discredited practice.

In the Driftway

AN American insurance company has announced a new policy by which it will pay owners of houses and other property for damages caused by falling or alighting airplanes. The newspaper announcement refers to the new policy as "protection." What is meant, of course, is not "protection" but compensation, which is by no means the same thing but often the best substitute which a not-quite-perfect world affords. The appearance of this new kind of insurance is said to have been precipitated directly by a recent accident in New Jersey, when a plane hit the roof of the summer home of the Governor of the State and came gracefully to rest in one of the rooms below, where the occupants of the flying machine disembarked unhurt. The house was less lucky, for existing architectural styles in New Jersey provide no ingress for airplanes through the roof without considerable damage. Eventually, as in the case of automobiles, insurance for damages will probably have to be assumed by the airplanes rather than by the owners of the property which they injure, but that is a detail. Of more consequence is the fact that on the same day on which the press published an announcement of regular insurance for damages by airplanes young Mr. Lindbergh returned from his honeymoon and began some tests of "foolproof" airplanes for the Guggenheim Foundation. A "foolproof" plane was necessary, he said, before airplanes would be adopted for personal use in large numbers, just as a similar sort of automobile had to be devised before the polloi got behind the steering wheel.

WITH the advent of a "foolproof" airplane the rain of hardware from the sky which has long been humorously forecast will become a reality. Farmers in the vicinity of air fields have for some years been the recipients of unexpected visits from aviators—dead or alive. It has been a nice question how mad a farmer should get when an airplane canters across a quarter of a mile of young oats in dropping down for an informal call. Generally the farmer regards the occurrence as an adventure and invites the survivors—if any—into the house for a glass of applejack. But with repetition this hospitable spirit is bound to lessen. The first transatlantic airplane stowaway may be forgiven, but the second is likely to get a kick where it will do the most good. So with the farmer's unexpected guests by airplane. As for how mad he should get over his lost oats, the Drifter predicts that he is going to get madder and madder. The pioneer aviators may be received with applejack, but later comers are more likely to be welcomed with bootjack. An afternoon call from a pretty flapper who sets out to visit her manicurist and lands instead in some tomato patch may be amusing, but when college boys, after a round of their favorite speakeasies, begin an aerial joyride and crash the barnyard gate at 4 a. m. in the midst of milking, even the most air-minded agriculturist is likely to seek farm relief with a handy pitchfork instead of through an orderly ballot for the Republican Party.

* * * * *

BUT the farmer's wrath will do no good. Let him remember the automobile which preceded the airplane—how it scared his horses and spoiled his roads and eventually made him pay for roads which wouldn't spoil so easily. There is no protection from the airplane. Compensation, through insurance, is the best that a not-quite-perfect world affords. The only recourse is to take the cash and let the airplane go. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Prohibition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a subscriber and supporter of The Nation for many years I am writing to protest against what seems to me its narrow, intolerant, and essentially dishonest attitude toward the prohibition law and its enforcement. I have no objection at all to your open disapproval of the law or to advocacy of its repeal; but I do emphatically object to the constant attitude of sneering at those who believe in it, of playing up any incidental evil in connection with its enforcement, of innuendo and exaggeration whenever it seems possible to discredit it. You ignore the fact that the law was fairly and constitutionally passed, that it apparently has the support of a large majority of our people, that Congress which presumably represents the desires of its constituents is increasingly Dry, and that the whole influence of the scornful attitude you take is to encourage lawlessness and to put the stamp of your approval on the criminal bootleggers and their patrons.

For instance you sneer at the British Ambassador for falling in line with the law of the country to which he is accredited, and suggest that in so doing he is "meddling in a domestic question." You speak of the prohibition agents as "shooting and killing with cold-blooded abandon," with no reference to the fact that they are dealing with armed desperadoes engaged in criminal violation of law. I have not noticed that you refer to the fact that the Illinois killing was apparently in self-defense according to the testimony of the woman victim's own son, nor that Secretary Lowman has absolved from blame the agent who killed Virkula in Minnesota. Should we repeal the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments because they are violated? Or the First because free speech is suppressed? Do you actually think it proper for citizens to violate laws of which they disapprove? In every case or, if not, in what cases?

Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, June 18 JESSE H. HOLMES

[A reply to this letter is published in the editorial pages of this issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

From a Catholic Churchman

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is Mr. Robert Dell, whose article, The Papal-Fascist Alliance, appears in your issue of March 27, a man of the breadth and poise fitting him to deal with great international and historical questions such as the one here under discussion? To me his attitude smacks rather of Senator Heflin and the Fellowship Forum than of a student of history and international problems. He takes his place among the bigots of the recent Presidential campaign, with whom he declares himself in agreement that a Catholic should be denied high political office because of his religion. To rule out 20,000,000 American citizens from the rights granted them by the American Constitution is not intolerance in the eyes of Mr. Dell. His silly bugaboo about the Catholic church attempting to capture the diplomatic service of England, and his flimsy arguments to prove it, are almost on a level with Senator Heflin's charges that the Pope is preparing to descend upon Washington. I am not surprised at these silly charges in Heflin and the Fellowship Forum, but I am surprised to find them in the supposedly studied articles of The Nation's foreign correspondent in Paris.

As to the charge of the church being always and hopelessly reactionary, that is a matter that must be settled first by an understanding of the terms and secondly by a careful investigation of the facts. Might I ask Mr. Dell: Does a treaty and concordat with any Power mean an alliance with that Power; or does it follow that the Pope by such treaty and concordat approves of all the policies of the party in power, all the more when these negotiations were entered into in 1919 before Fascism came into the ascendancy? I also challenge Mr. Dell to show me in any country controlled by a Catholic majority such intolerance and denial of personal liberty as we see today in Russia and in Mexico, governments which he no doubt considers products of modern civilization. I invite him further to investigate conditions in the Irish Free State and then in Ulster, and see in which of the two states the minorities are allowed the greater freedom to exercise their liberties. And I challenge him to point out a case in any Catholic country of our day, such as Ireland, Belgium, Spain, Austria, or Italy, an instance of a Catholic majority denying a man high political office because of his religious belief.

I would respectfully recommend The Nation to supply Mr. Dell with a hood and gown, let him set up his flaming cross in Montmartre, and thence start his crusade for modern civilization as opposed to the threatening tyranny of reactionary Rome.

San Jose, California, April 8 JOHN MCGARR

[The reply of Mr. Dell to this and other letters of protest from Catholic readers is printed in the International Relations Section of this issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Jews in Russia

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Jessica Smith's summary of Yarmolinsky's book "The Jews and Other Minor Nationalities Under the Soviets," which appears in The Nation of June 19, gives the impression that the Jews are granted cultural and economic freedom under the Soviets. It states that "out of the richness of their ancient culture and their new freedom a vital literary movement is developing." The facts are quite otherwise. Hebrew, which is the language of their ancient culture, which is the vehicle for all of its literature, and which has now been revived as a spoken language in Palestine, cannot be taught legally in Russia. The Zionists who are the proponents of the ancient culture have been classified as anti-revolutionary and have been exiled in large numbers to the waste places of Siberia, there to die a slow death from starvation and disease. Those who have recently been released are the few who have been forced by their miserable lot to surrender their nationalist aspirations.

The unspeakable degradation of the vast masses of the Jews in Russia today, their position as pariahs under the new economic order, may be explained, and I suppose excused, as an incidental tragedy occasioned by the great economic experiment. The persecution of their religion, the confiscation of their synagogues, the jibes and propaganda to which they are exposed, today more effective than their counterpart in the Middle Ages, can be explained I suppose by the general Soviet anti-religious policy. But the persecution of the Zionists, who are mainly pure Jewish nationalists, and the proscription of Hebrew are clearly not in accordance with the treatment meted out to other national minorities. The only hope for amelioration consists in the avowed disapproval of liberal public opinion.

Chicago, June 17 Max Kadushin

Codeine and Morphine

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In an article entitled Drug Limitation in the United States in The Nation for May 1, Miss La Motte makes much over the fact that codeine was omitted from the United States Treasury report on drug consumption. She says, "the per capita consumption is based upon the three tons of morphine, with the four tons of codeine left out—a trick so raw and crude that it is only exceeded by the stupidity in calling 'particular attention' to it"; and goes on to calculate the opium consumption, complacently assuming that the amounts of morphine and codeine may be used additively for this purpose. For two reasons the calculation cannot be made in this way: (1) Codeine occurs with morphine in opium and is isolated at the same time from the same material as is the morphine; (2) further quantities of codeine are manufactured from morphine, and it seems likely to me, although I do not know it to be the case, that part, at least, of the morphine reported as "domestic sales" is later converted to codeine.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, April 26 G. H. Hitchings

Applause

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Permit me to applaud enthusiastically all parties to the publication in The Nation of June 12 of the article about Mr. Gest and his Passion Play—the author, for a straightforward bit of honest reporting and his convincing revelation of a public fraud; the publishers, for their courage in printing a story which necessarily reflected upon the New York press in its gullibility or in its lack of discrimination in accepting theatrical advertisements; and both, for their mutual interest and concern in closing a theatrical spectacle which is considered by most people to be at best a vulgarization of a sacred chapter in religious history.

New York, June 17 M. Murray Weisman

Roosevelt and Davis

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your remarks on young Mr. Roosevelt and the governorship of Porto Rico deserve several rounds of hearty applause. The dynastic rights of the family to office must be respected, no matter at what expense to public administration in Porto Rico. Sending Roosevelt to Porto Rico is no worse, however, than utilizing the Philippines as a snug harbor for superannuated tennis champions, with bank rolls and an itch for social expansiveness. The spirit in which the Philippines were endowed with a new Governor-General is indicated in the news announcement of the Davis appointment by the World's Washington correspondent, who unquestionably was touching on facts when he said that Davis, after plugging hard but vainly for a cabinet position or a high ambassadorship, finally had "decided to take what he can get, to remain in public life." You might add to your dossier of Roosevelt's record as a statesman a brief note of the manner in which, under petroleum persuasion, he nearly blundered us into a real war with Mexico in July, 1921. The story of that little affair constitutes an exceedingly interesting and comparatively unknown chapter of our relations with Mexico.

New York, June 5 R. N. M.

The Nation radio hour will continue through the summer months on Station WMCA of New York every Monday at 8:30 p. m. Nation readers may hear lively discussions of current topics by the editors by turning their radio dials to 526.

Contributors to This Issue

Charles E. Payne is professor of history at Grinnell College.

Carleton Beals, who contributed a series of articles—With Sandino in Nicaragua—to The Nation, has just left Spain.

Paul Y. Anderson is national correspondent of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Evelyn Scott's latest novel, "The Wave," is the Literary Guild's book for July.

Joseph Wood Krutch is the dramatic editor of The Nation.

George E. G. Catlin is a member of the boards of directors and of editors of the Realist.

Dorothy Brewster is assistant professor of English at Columbia University.

Claude G. Bowers is the author of "Jefferson and Hamilton."

C. Hartley Grattan is the author of "Bitter Bierce."

Richard McKeon is in the department of philosophy of Columbia University.

Eda Lou Walton is the author of "A City Day."

Robert Dell is The Nation's correspondent in France.

Books

Cat

By EVELYN SCOTT

Cat,
Petulantly,
Like a sleek volcano,
Tosses that stiff morsel of inertia—Mouse.
Cat,
Choking with an arrogance magnificent,
Is dowagerlike.

The demure mouse,
Modestly stunned,
Beyond display of suffering,
Yet must rouse
To meet his obligations,
Scramble to escape.

Alas!
In the cradle of torture,
The little weepless one,
May lie asleep once more.
Cat,
Like a foretold doom-at-midnight,
Delights,
Innocently.
Mouse,
Not caring to be shriven,
Dies.

The Novel and the Tale

No Love. By David Garnett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

NOT every tale worth the telling needs all the complicated machinery of the modern novel, and yet there are few writers today who know how to dispense with any of it. Hence nearly every story, short or long, is set forth with all the paraphernalia devised during the past two hundred years for achieving social background, realistic setting, psychological analysis, and dramatic immediacy. We seem, for example, to have forgot that the genealogy of the hero is not necessary except for certain particular purposes, and that his motives do not have to be analyzed unless they cannot be guessed. We have acquired the habit of assuming that a short history of the Industrial Revolution, a sketch of the Victorian Age, or an account of the Settlement of the Middle West is indispensable for the understanding of any story, and we do not, in short, know how to take anything for granted. The result is that almost the only contemporary works of fiction which achieve an artistic success are those on some grand scale like that of "The Magic Mountain" or "Memory of Things Past" because anything less than they is nearly certain to be lost in over-explicit irrelevancies.

David Garnett's "Lady Into Fox" created something of a sensation, not merely because of its intriguing fable, but because its author seemed to have discovered a refreshingly simple method of story-telling. He took a tale which could not be told in the conventional manner, and in order to tell it at all he had to invent a method which reminded many of the eighteenth-century conte simply because it adopted that particular sort of verbal shorthand which is called wit. Instead of explaining, as though for the benefit of some man from Mars, all that every reader of contemporary fiction already knows about post-war society or the effect of a puritanical upbringing on a sensitive child, he began at the real beginning. He assumed between himself and his reader a common understanding of the world and he merely alluded in crisp sentences to events, and moods, and motives when no more than an allusion was necessary. His characters did not leave the page and live as the characters of some of the great novels do, but he established between himself and the reader that sense of intimate contact with the skilful teller of something quite frankly a story which is, in its own way, quite as delightful as any purely dramatic effect can be.

Now it was obvious that "Lady Into Fox" was a tour de force. One did not expect Mr. Garnett to go on writing stories of exactly the same sort. But what one did at least hope was that he would manage to reinvent the tale, to write books different from the standard model of the modern novel in the apparent simplicity of their manner. Unfortunately, however, though "No Love" begins with an assurance and a brevity which promise well, this latest book shows its author moving quite definitely in the direction of the conventional novel. When, for example, near the very beginning, he introduces a female freethinker who held that "but for the mistaken belief in God, mankind would already be living in a condition of almost unimaginable bliss and moral elevation" he is exactly in his own tradition, for he is there assuming that his reader will understand, without further elaboration, exactly what he means to convey by that ironic phrase. And there are other touches of the same sort, particularly in the first few pages. But as the story develops it slides almost imperceptibly into another manner and becomes, before it is finished, all but indistinguishable from countless others.

Somehow the author seems to lose his grip upon his own style and to fill out with the stereotypes of his fellows. The tale wanders on from generation to generation. There are the boyhood adventures, the adolescent trials, and the war-time experiences which have become almost the sine qua non of current fiction. One wonders where the author is going, and so little indispensable do many of the incidents seem that for a long time one is not sure whom the story is about or to what kind of conclusion it is leading. The machinery of biography and of social history merely blurs its outline without contributing anything to its purpose, and one gets, in the end, not the perfectly proportioned tale one had expected but instead a rather wandering narrative which might be taken to illustrate that feebleness of structure which is likely to be produced by a perfunctory use of the machinery of the novel.

It seems to me obvious that there exists today a considerable body of readers who can meet upon a common ground of knowledge and feeling sufficiently well defined to serve the purpose of the teller of tales as distinguished from the novelist. We may have no tradition as compact as that of the eighteenth century, but from the turmoil of the past twenty-five years has gradually emerged a particular variety of ironic sensitivity whose existence can be taken for granted and in the mood of which the writer can write with a reasonable assurance that he will be comprehended. No more is necessary to furnish the cultural homogeneity necessary to make the tale possible, and if it is distressing to see Mr. Garnett attempting to write novels it is only because he seemed a man who might possibly take advantage of the new opportunity.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Scholar and Political Interpreter

America and Europe and Other Essays. By Alfred Zimmern. Oxford University Press. $3.

THIS is a series of essays, all of them good and some of them as excellent as was Professor Zimmern's "Learning and Leadership," one of the most inspiring books of recent years. In the title essay on America and Europe we see Professor Zimmern's mind at its best, a mind preternaturally alive to those subtleties, sometimes entirely determinant of the nuances of the psychological relationship between nations, which escape clumsier souls, a mind which moves to its solutions with the elegance and beauty of the play of chess champions.

Mr. Zimmern is the only European with whom the reviewer is acquainted who can be said to have a comprehension of the significance of American culture in the way in which, for example, the Beards and Waldo Frank have it. In too many cases we have simply "the literary gambols of over-smart Europeans"; even where we have more serious studies they are disfigured by misinterpretation, as is M. Siegfried's monumental book by his overemphasis upon the influence of Puritanism. The ordinary European, who essentially regards culture as an act of introversion culminating in self-cultivation and the formation of such groups as "The Souls" in England, the "beautiful-souled" cult of Novalis in Germany, and in similar manifestations, is almost incapable of comprehending that an extroverted culture can be culture at all. Happily and with pardonable left-handedness Mr. Zimmern compares our modern pontiffs of culture with the Athenian philosophers who declined to listen to Paul—although the former have the less excuse in that they seek to ignore a nation with a history of pragmatic accomplishment instead of an individual with (to the unbeliever) a history of epileptic vision. But pragmatic accomplishment is to precious spirits itself an offense. Mr. Zimmern, with his reflective temperament and his passion for history, is thoroughly a European, but his wisdom is such that he can give that cardinal advice, which should be handed out with their passports to all transatlantic travelers, to drop preconceived standards overboard and acquire "the faculty for reeducation."

It is not practicable to comment on even a tithe of Professor Zimmern's wise sayings, as, for example, that we must "depoliticize nationality and deemotionalize politics" or that "politics cannot be studied sincerely and truthfully from behind university Common Room curtains." It is, however, impossible for the reviewer to pass over the remarks of Professor Zimmern, who at one time occupied with distinction a teaching position at Cornell, upon American education. At a time when many leaders of American education are seriously talking about distinguishing between those who seriously want a scholarly education and those who do not, it is comforting to read:

> It is one of the glories of the American university that it is not yet the home of a leisured class; and the fact that . . . the overwhelming proportion of the students support themselves by their own labors during the summer, instead of climbing in Switzerland or shooting grouse on their father's moors, is of distinct intellectual advantage. The American student has a fund of living experience.

There is much indeed to be said for "the love of the little platoon" and for the introduction into such a university as Harvard of the Oxford system of colleges. But it is well to bear in mind that the next great step to be taken in English education is the utilizing of American experience; the stress upon the importance of education as an element, not of the accomplishment of a learned clerkly caste, but of citizenship; the breaking down of the distinction between a "university man" and an ordinary business man or citizen; and the return to the old Scottish system whereby a man could work his way through the university. The best teaching which Oxford has to offer is that the essence of college life is "discussion," not Ph.D. theses; when a man has taken his Baccalaureate he is expected to get out into public life, and for that (not schoolmastering) he is trained. The glory of American education, despite its inevitable academic embarrassments, is that it has a yet broader conception of public life. It would be an impertinence to ask whether the American Constitution and the historic American tradition are good things; but, assuredly, for good or evil, they rest (pace the planters and dominie Adams) on social—not political—democracy; and the social democracy rests on the public school and the open university. It says much for the catholic spirit and the wisdom of Mr. Zimmern, sometime Fellow of the College of Our Lady of Winchester in Oxford, that he recognizes how great is that educational and political heritage; but then, Mr. Zimmern knows his Plato and does not endeavor to distinguish politics from education.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Wives of Great Men

The Diary of Dostoevsky's Wife. Translated from the German edition by Madge Pemberton. The Macmillan Company. $7.

The Diary of Tolstoy's Wife. 1860-1891. Translated from the Russian by Alexander Werth. Payson and Clarke. $3.50.

WHEN someone said to Mr. Dooley, "Geniuses are unhappy married," he retorted, "And so are their wives." These volumes furnish much support for Mr. Dooley's contention. In the first year of her marriage Countess Tolstoy writes: "I feel abandoned during the day, in the evening, at night—all the time. I am a source of satisfaction to him, a nurse, a piece of furniture, a woman—nothing more. . . . He was so gloomy that I nearly wept. He won't speak to me. It is terrible to live with him. What if he once again suddenly develops an affection for his People, and begins to love me no more than his school, nature, the People, or his literature. . . . The physical side of love matters a great deal to him. That's dreadful, for it is exactly the other way around with me." Nearly thirty years after, she suffered from the fear of again becoming pregnant, "for everybody will hear of this disgrace and gleefully repeat the recent Moscow joke—'Voilà le véritable postscriptum de la Sonate de Kreutzer!' " The later entries are crowded with details of all the business matters that were left for her to decide and ignored by husband and children except when she made what they considered a mistake: "It is always I who have to decide everything. I get terrified and want to weep; I feel as though I had been caught in a trap and the task of running this Christian household is still the greatest curse that God has sent me."

Almost equally convincing extracts can be picked out of Mme Dostoevsky's record of the months spent in Dresden and Baden-Baden soon after her marriage, when Dostoevsky's gambling fever was at its height. "He seems to think it of little consequence the way it must hurt me when my frocks have to be pawned and my coat and other things. . . . It doesn't seem to strike him that he ought to try to insure a quiet life for his wife that she should not have to tremble perpetually at the thought of where the next meal is to come from." Yet after reading four hundred pages about these five months, one is amazed at the infrequency of Mme Dostoevsky's unhappy moods. Here was her husband suffering frequent epileptic attacks. He was embarrassingly petulant and quarrelsome in public—if someone pushed him at the crowded roulette table, or a clerk at the Russian embassy had a supercilious air, or an attendant told him it wasn't permitted to stand on a chair to look at the Sistine Madonna. He gambled away all the money they had, all his publishers advanced, all her family could send them, all he could obtain by pawning their clothes, her keepsakes, even their wedding rings. Though she was expecting her first child, he left her alone day after day in a strange city, to await his periodic returns from the Rooms with pleas for another ten gulden from the store set aside for food and rent. Yet outbursts like those quoted above are rare. Usually she could turn their quarrels into a joke. Usually, no matter what the day had held, he would come to her room at two or three in the morning to kiss her good-night and tell her how dear she was, and they would talk happily.

This girl of twenty-one learned rapidly how to deal with her neurotic husband of forty-six, and she displays a simple, clear intelligence about it, with none of the self-torment of Countess Tolstoy. Recognizing that she had to evade and to lie sometimes to keep her beloved Fyodor from becoming overexcited, she remarks, "I hate it, but what can I do?" and thereupon dismisses the matter. We can see in the diary the beginning of the process of adjustment that ended by her achieving a competent ordering of their life together. "There is no doubt that Fyodor needs protecting, not only from others but from himself." She is learning how to protect Fyodor while letting Fyodor think he is protecting her. The diary is a delightfully naive document. Even the keeping of it implies no special self-consciousness or introspective habit, for it was for her mother that she recorded all the petty details of life abroad. One may conclude that Dostoevsky was in many ways a dreadful person and that to be his wife would have been an appalling experience; but one has to admit that it wasn't such for Anna, and that Dostoevsky was for once lucky when in the gamble of life he won her love.

The sense of deep disharmony in the Tolstoy marriage remains even after allowance is made for the fact that the countess used her diary to work off a bad mood: "I always write in my diary when we quarrel. . . . When I don't write in my diary for a long time I always feel sorry that I have not said anything about how happy I have been in the interval." The marital drama overshadows in interest the valuable notes recording her husband's artistic activities—his ideas for new works, his progress with "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenina." Yet these entries suggest the understanding and sympathy on which Tolstoy must have confidently relied. One is more impressed with the indications of the masochist and the sadist in her temperament; with her intense pride of person and of class, her possessiveness and her desire for power. She is aware of these things and only partly rationalizes them. She never recovered from the shock of reading those diaries of his youth that Tolstoy gave her before their marriage. She had as intense a desire for purity in her bridegroom as any sensualist has for virginity in his bride; and as torturing a retrospective jealousy of those who had previously possessed her husband. "If only I could burn his diary and his whole past!" His youth could never be her property. "If I could kill him and then make another man exactly like him I should do it joyfully." Twenty-eight years after the marriage she writes, "I copy his diaries with the zest of a drunkard and my drunkenness consists in working myself up into a state of jealousy over the women he describes." She resented "The Kreutzer Sonata," yet it was through her influence that the ban upon it was removed. She lacked the happy conviction of Mme Dostoevsky that the perversities in her husband's novels had nothing to do with him: "There is such an obvious thread connecting the early diaries with 'The Kreutzer Sonata,' and a buzzing fly is struggling in the web—and the spider has sucked its blood"—a darkly suggestive image. "He cried out aloud today that his most passionate desire was to get away from his family." And so the curtain is rung up on the last act of the drama that had still twenty years more to play itself out.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

The Crucifixion of Johnson

Andrew Johnson: A Study in Courage. By Lloyd Paul Stryker. The Macmillan Company. $6.

IT has always been inevitable that with the passing of time and the cooling of passions, and with the writing of history by men not personally touched with the utter madness of the period of Reconstruction, justice would be done the courage, patriotism, and wisdom of Andrew Johnson. Just now, as never before, he is becoming a favorite topic of the biographers. With the recent decision of the Supreme Court on the power of the President over appointments in the executive department of government he has again been vindicated. It would be an easy matter to prove that he fought the most valiant battle for constitutional liberty in America of any of the Presidents; none has been so frequently vindicated by the Supreme Court.

Quite recently Judge Winston gave us a well-rounded biographical study covering the entire period of Johnson's life in some detail, and now Lloyd Paul Stryker offers another biography which differs in that it is confined very largely to the eight years beginning with the Civil War and ending with his retirement from the Presidency. The Winston biography has an advantage in that it paints in the background of a remarkable career, is more closely knit, more concentrated, and moves more smoothly and consecutively. It is more judicial in its estimates of men as well.

Even so, the Stryker book is intensely interesting and valuable. Even where it may treat a phase disproportionately—it gives 164 pages to the impeachment trial alone—it serves a purpose. A condensation and a moderation of the characteristics of Johnson's enemies, with the elimination of some matter not necessary to the illumination of the subject of the book, would have made it better; but it is good. It is easy to understand the fervor and indignation with which the author wrote. It is difficult to know the facts pertaining to the crucifixion of Johnson and restrain one's contempt for his enemies. The fact that these enemies have, in so many instances, been painted large and bright in history, while Johnson has been maligned, contributes to a just man's sense of outrage. It is intolerable that men notoriously dishonest, in every way, should have their monuments while their victim, an honest man, is pilloried in so many histories as a contemptible character. Mr. Stryker, in possession of the facts, has treated them and the enemies of Johnson as though he were prosecuting attorney presenting the case to a jury. Some of the men who fall foul of the author's reproaches deserve them fully; some were a mixture of good and bad, and the failure of the writer to discriminate as to shades may weaken the effect of an otherwise just condemnation. Perhaps a vivid presentation of the bare ugly facts without comment would have been more effective.

Neither Mr. Stryker nor Mr. Winston has given sufficient attention to the purely party motive behind the persecution of Johnson. Stevens and Morton frankly avowed it in House and Senate. Nor have the biographers considered the influence of Johnson's hostility to corruption and favoritism in government in arraying the powerful elements against him. The corruptionists and monopolists of his day hated him because he threatened their graft. It was something more than his policy of conciliation toward the South that invited the enmity of Jay Cooke, who had many axes to grind on the labor of the people. It is not a far-fetched conclusion that Johnson's ardent devotion to democracy and his warnings against the perils of unscrupulous organizations of wealth had more to do with the distrust of potent factors in the North than his militant attempt to carry out the reconstruction policies of Lincoln.

To the preparation of his book, which has the appearance of a labor of love, Mr. Stryker has given great pains in the matter of research. He has followed the public records, and the book is bomb-proof as to major points in its citations of authority. The publishers have given it an attractive dress and it is richer in illustrations than Winston's. It is well worth while and completely vindicates Johnson against the charges long discredited by close students of the times. It belongs by right in the library of every student of the dreadful four years that followed the death of Lincoln. It pays a deserved and too long delayed tribute to one of the greatest and most slandered of all the Presidents.

CLAUDE G. BOWERS

The Penalty of Being Right

American Estimates. By Henry Seidel Canby. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

IT is not for the information of the readers of this review that I mention that Dr. Canby is editor of the Saturday Review of Literature and editor-in-chief of the Book-of-the-Month Club. No doubt they know who he is as well as I do. It is rather to underline the fact that he is, in no small way, a director of literary opinion; he is a man of influence. Naturally then his opinions have an interest beyond those of men who merely contribute to journals and write books.

"American Estimates" is not a very interesting book. It is repetitive—points are made over and over again; it is lacking in emotional force; and it is not distinguished by any extraordinary intellectual acuity. It is distinguished rather by an unusual command over the data of modern literature and the clarity of the writing. Dr. Canby suffers by being presented in extenso. He is better in small doses. Two hundred and eighty-seven pages of his prose leaves one with the feeling of exhaustion. One wonders if what he has said really matters after all. But it does, for he tells us in this book exactly where he stands.

Dr. Canby is a middle-of-the-road man. He is intelligent, well-informed, firm in his desire to know the past as well as the present, and deeply concerned that something be made (in an intellectual sense) out of modern life. He wants more than analysis, more than disdain and disgust. He wants values. His acquaintance with modern life prevents him from accepting the fallacious doctrine that values can be found in the past and drafted for service in the present. Acceptance of modern life is part of his program, and if he seems to be prone to excuse and justify facts more severe and exacting minds would excoriate it is because he finds them to be normal expressions of trends that cannot be exorcized by words and because he has an optimistic belief in the triumph of what is good. This last trait of mind, as much as anything that will be said here, marks him as an old-fashioned man. In seeking to comprehend the present he embraces science with a vague discomfort. He feels that science is in the van and literature trails behind. Science, indeed, is so far in advance that the mulling over of its facts is next door to impossible, which impedes the construction of the very values he feels are so urgently needed. Yet without a recognition of the place of science in modern life he knows that one cannot hope to comprehend modern literature. Having posed this dilemma he is done and devotes his talents to understanding trends. He recognizes the necessity but does not go on to offer a solution of the major perplexity of modern intellectuals. In other words, he feels, like so many others, that understanding is not enough, but he cannot, like T. S. Eliot, embrace Anglo-Catholicism and monarchy, or, like Waldo Frank, a mystical doctrine of the Whole. Perhaps his neutrality is the better part of editorial wisdom.

Yet even as one who stands on the sidelines and seeks comprehension he fails to be interesting. Something there is in him that prevents his thinking from being at all stirring. He is so everlastingly right that he is dull. I don't mean that there is nothing in his book to which one can object, but that objection to anything Dr. Canby has to say is pointless. Standing in the middle of the road and "understanding" everything that passes his way, he has eliminated all angularities from his mind, destroyed every jagged edge, until he is as smooth and well-rounded as a billiard ball. He writes of Emerson, Thoreau, D. H. Lawrence, James Joyce, nature, Mencken, Christopher Morley, criticism, how to write, and various editorial minutiae with equal urbanity and tolerance. But one reads without the slightest desire to say a word for or against any opinion he may announce.

Apparently that is his ideal, for he says of Mark Twain: "What he lost in vehemence he made up in wisdom." Wisdom, then, to Dr. Canby's mind, is understanding, tolerance, and aspiration to some sort of good life controlled and made meaningful by values constructed out of modern materials. Surely an admirable ideal. But it seems to me that it is better for the intellectual health of all concerned to be a little vehement and just a wee bit wrong than to be so awfully right and so dull.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

The "Subtle Doctor"

Duns Scotus. By C. R. S. Harris. Two volumes. Oxford University Press. $15.

FOR the past few decades in France and Germany there has been appearing a steady succession of scholarly studies of aspects of the work and thought of Duns Scotus. No single book that could be considered definitive has yet emerged from the discussions and controversies in those languages. English scholars had remained almost entirely aloof from these preliminary learned maneuvers, but now an Oxonian has appeared to make estimation of the Subtle Doctor, whose shade is still invoked for even the casual visitor to Merton College Library. Dr. Harris, moreover, undertakes more than the exposition in full of the thought of Duns Scotus; he has in addition a dogmatic point to make—that in Scotus rather than in Thomas Aquinas scholastic philosophy reaches the highest point of its development, that Scotus shows a wider range of thought, a greater degree of consistency, and above all, a far deeper appreciation of the philosophical needs of Catholic Christianity than his more famous rival.

Caution had doubtless deterred the half dozen continental scholars who have written learnedly and wisely on Duns Scotus from venturing beyond restricted phases of his philosophy. For there is no critical edition of his works, and the authenticity of all save five of his writings has at some time or other been called into question. Dr. Harris stepped into this controversial situation somewhat incautiously, and the dangers of his bravado must have been evident to him before the publication of his book; both volumes are marked with notes placed at the end of chapters and appendices added to volumes, such as are needed for afterthoughts that occur when the text of a book has already been set up. The "Grammatica Speculativa" is accepted as authentic in the text, and admitted as spurious in a note, but with no more serious consequence than that the probable influence of Bacon on Scotus, concerning which Dr. Harris speculates, is left without documentary basis. More serious, however, are the notes in which the objections to the authenticity of the "De rerum principio" are considered: Dr. Harris's interpretation rests on it perhaps more than on any other single work, and his contention that Scotus is superior to Thomas depends entirely on its acceptance—unfortunately the tendency of modern scholarship is to assign it to a period somewhat earlier than Scotus, and (according to a study published since the appearance of this book) at least in part to Cardinal Vitalis a Furno.

The controversy may be reduced to a simple non-scholarly statement. The "De rerum principio" is a very Augustinian work; the mature work of Duns Scotus is a very subtle critical continuation of scholastic philosophy matured (along lines that lead back to Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas) by a fine insight into Aristotelian principles. If the two can be read together as the work of a single man, there will be discovered a philosophy which on the one hand opposes to Thomas the traditional Augustinian theses, and at the same time shows a full awareness of the implications of Thomism and even extends further the rationalist analysis of Thomas. The writer of this philosophy is superior therefore to Thomas, since he is at once more orthodox and broader; but if the "De rerum principio" is spurious, the proposition is the simple and erroneous one, that two men are better than one, and that two opinions are preferable to a single one. Of course, there are frequent contradictions, but Dr. Harris regards them as evidence in each case of an earlier view—he loses sight of the consequence: if the "De rerum principio" expresses an earlier view, then wherever it contradicts a later view there is evidence of an evolution away from Augustinism.

Dr. Harris has several very definite convictions about scholastic philosophy—none of them is more significant than the recurrent judgment that the philosophy of Aristotle is incompatible with Christianity. Thomas (since Dr. Harris views his philosophy as an attempt to effect a reconciliation between the two) and Duns (in so far as he made a similar attempt) are doomed in that to failure. This Dr. Harris never questions, and it need not be questioned here. But it is regrettable that, although the entire first volume of Dr. Harris's work is devoted to the background of Duns's thought, no clear statement is attempted, before Thomism is condemned, of what Thomism is. It is Aristotelian; but it need not therefore be un-Augustinian. For when the Aristotelian works became current in Western Europe in the thirteenth century, they placed the Augustinian tradition in an awkward predicament: the Augustinian doctrine of divine illumination was sufficiently like the Averroistic doctrine of the active intellect to suggest that they were identical—but with disastrous consequences, among which would be a denial of personal immortality, a denial of all contribution on the part of the individual in the act of knowing, a denial of personal freedom and responsibility. Two courses were open—the traditionalists prohibited Aristotle, but since he represented the sum of scientific knowledge of the time, Thomas seems to have labored to show that the fundamental principles of Aristotelianism are not in disaccord with the fundamental principles of Augustinism. Dr. Harris has totally ignored this; indeed he gives little statement of the Thomist doctrine, except when Duns Scotus (or the author of the "De rerum principio") attacks it. But he reads as a work of Scotus, a work of the traditionalist school, the "De rerum principio," which is Augustinian and anti-Aristotelian; and with its aid he finds that the Aristotelian conception of God is un-Christian, that matter as a principle of individuation is absurd, particularly in that it endangers the immortality of the soul, and that Thomism is committed to an Aristotelian (?)

the most exciting book of the season

THE MAGIC ISLAND

William B. Seabrook

author of "Adventures in Arabia"

H. P. Davis author of "Black Democracy," says in the Forum:—"A vivid and amazing narrative, but . . . Mr. Seabrook has done a far greater and more important thing than write an absorbing story. He has . . . given to the world the first and only authentic interpretation of the soul of this people."

Carl Van Doren, in The Nation:—"Cannot be neglected in the literature which treats of the universal human mind.

Illustrated by Alexander King, $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

FRONTIERS OF HOPE

by Horace M. Kallen

"He resembles Ludwig Lewisohn... he writes a rich, warm-textured prose. I know of no cooler, more detached picture of Jewry in East Europe and Palestine, though it tempts to argument and disagreement on every page."
—Lewis Ganett, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"His humor, philosophic detachment, his keen psychological observation, genuine human sympathy, and wide background of experience make this book a most valuable one."
—Everett Dean Martin.

"An inspired record—written with warm simplicity, lyrical beauty and delightful humor."
—Jacob Billikopf

$3.00

CHRISTIAN and JEW

A Symposium for Better Understanding

Edited by ISAAC LANDMAN

"Dr. Landman's symposium is remarkable. The discussion of the main issue lacks nothing of cogency, vigor and even passion."—John Haynes Holmes, N. Y. Herald Tribune.
Second Printing. $3.00

HORACE LIVERIGHT N.Y.
GOOD BOOKS

doctrine of the eternity of the world. The suspicion may be suggested that, besides being unfortunate in questions of authenticity (that is a doom under which all medieval scholars walk), Dr. Harris has read a medieval controversy too naively and has taken his judgment of one of the protagonists from the estimation the other makes. And with that suspicion arises the further suspicion that Dr. Harris does this because he has some conviction concerning which side should be right.

RICHARD MCKEON

Dollar Poetry

Compass Rose. By Elizabeth Coatsworth. Nearer the Bone. By Charles A. Wagner. Angel Arms. By Kenneth Fearing. Bands and Rebels. By Keene Wallis. Coward-McCann. $1 each.

POETRY has always come high. A slim volume of fifty verses in decorative binding is priced, usually, at $2 or $2.50. The price may explain why poetry does not sell. Poets peddle their manuscripts from publisher to publisher and are told ungently that they might quite as well throw them into a convenient waste-paper basket and save shoe-leather. When because a poet is very tenacious or has very persistent friends a publishing house is prevailed upon to accept a volume, the firm takes pains to let the poet know himself the recipient of charity of no mean kind. And every year the several volumes appearing take shelf-room in respectable bookstores for a few weeks only and may be found thereafter, thumbed but still unsold at $1.50, in the several second-hand book markets along the side streets.

Coward-McCann is attempting a revolution. This enlightened publishing house would make poetry sell. To this end it has released the first four volumes of a series, "Songs of Today," neatly bound, well printed, on fair quality of paper. To this end, very probably, it has chosen readable poets. The series for 1929 includes Kenneth Fearing's "Angel Arms," Charles A. Wagner's "Nearer the Bone," Elizabeth Coatsworth's "Compass Rose," and Keene Wallis's "Bands and Rebels." If this group is successful we are promised from four to eight such volumes of verse annually. The idea is enormously welcome to poets and to readers of poetry.

The selection has been made, it seems, with a rather larger public in mind than that sought by the exclusive and expensive lyricists. Keene Wallis, Missourian, is a young writer of narrative in verse. His seven stories are dramatic, well motivated, and very human. His characters are young tramps escaping the city, and young clerks caught in city-monotony. One reads tale after tale rapidly. The medium of verse is never in the way; rhyme and rhythm come without hitch. The reader need never stop to examine an image more closely. The story is the thing.

Kenneth Fearing is a poet of the city who has no sentimental longings after meadow or barn. He has gone to school to both Sandburg and John Weaver. From the former he caught the trick of repetitive parallelism as basis for free-verse rhythm and from the latter, something of the "American" language. His lyrics and dramatic studies are of street characters. His desire is to indicate the intensity and poetry which these very dulled minds may be capable of. Although "none of their faces are cooked enough" (which is, I think, a perfect phrase), these characters are capable of their own worship of a flashing jazz beauty. They know their own yearnings and contemplate life and death as breakfast with coffee, and as no breakfast with coffee. The volume is alive and democratic in outlook.

Charles A. Wagner, enthusiastically introduced by John Erskine as capable of giving the reader "a poignant sense of having met reality" and as having published two books "among the most promising of our day," is likewise a city-bred artist. He, too, is much concerned with an automatic civilization where nickels transfer human beings and dish up to them their food. His work is uneven; he is not yet a good critic of his own writing. But he has much to say and is deeply in earnest.

"Compass Rose," by Elizabeth Coatsworth, the only woman in the group of four, offers the most mature writing in the series. Miss Coatsworth has published before and knows her method. But her book lacks the core of idea which each of the others has. It is merely a collection of lyrics about many lands and many episodes and many moods. It has no particularized attitude toward life. It is not, therefore, as vital as it might be. The most successful poems are, to me, those descriptive of the Southwest, its color, its ancient fixity of purpose, its desert-like bloom. She knows the land well, feels it sensitively and keenly. A much-traveled woman whose poems are a note-book of her adventures, she comes again and again to the dramatically colored section of America which Spaniards and Indians sought and settled.

EDA LOU WALTON

Biographies in Brief

The Life of H. R. H. the Duke of Flamborough. By Laurence Housman. Payson and Clarke. $2.50.

A rather ineffectual attempt to parody the intimate, debunking biography of our day. Sooner or later some one was certain to try his hand at this sort of thing; but this book too frequently offers heavy-handed humor for the pointed pertness and arch flippancy that abound in really good burlesques. Perhaps Mr. Housman would have done better had he parodied only one typically modern biographer instead of a whole school.

People: the Autobiography of a Mystery Writer. By Edgar Wallace. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

Hugh Walpole has written that Mr. Wallace is "the wonder-child of our period," who "has touched with his books more English hearts than anyone since Dickens." The author of 140 or more mystery stories, he has also written some twenty plays, innumerable newspaper articles, and he has a keen interest in racing horses. The same terrific rush of incident upon incident that characterizes his detective tales is likewise observable in his life's story. He dictates his "stuff" into a dictaphone every forenoon and casually "dashes off" a play or so over a week-end. The story runs that a friend, calling Mr. Wallace by telephone, was informed that the writer was busily engaged upon a play; the friend thereupon remarked that he would "hold the wire" until Mr. Wallace had finished the last act.

As God Made Them. By Gamaliel Bradford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Psychographs of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Greeley, Edwin Booth, Francis James Child, and Asa Gray. One is tempted to suggest that a better title for this book might have been: "As Mr. Bradford Makes Them." For everywhere, omnipresent on every page, the always capable if rarely exciting craftsmanship of our most indefatigable biographer stands out—almost never is one allowed to forget that Mr. Bradford is speaking. He is always eminently fair-minded, perspicuous, and sympathetic, as well as occasionally humorous in a gently quizzical sort of way; but one cannot help wishing that he would for once—just once—forsake his everlastingly competent craftsmanship and emit one bloodthirsty Menckenian war-whoop or one of Mr. Strachey's soft but terribly annihilating chuckles.

Richard Hakluyt and the English Voyages. By George Bruner Parks. American Geographical Society Special Publication No. 10. American Geographical Society. $5.

Mr. Parks has written, in addition to the biographies of Richard Hakluyt the elder, lawyer, and Richard Hakluyt the younger, clergyman, enough of the history of Elizabethan geography and commerce to make clear just what after all was the contribution of these enthusiastic men to the record of British civilization. The result is a body of knowledge much less romantic than the nothing we knew of Hakluyt before, but much more interesting.

The Life of Michelangelo. By John Addington Symonds. The Modern Library. 95 cents.

John Addington Symonds's famous but to the modern taste perhaps somewhat prosy "Michelangelo" has been issued by the Modern Library. While one does not wish to criticize such an excellent volume, considering its price, it might have retained, from the more expensive editions, the letter of Michelangelo to Giovane Francesco Fattucci which throws such an interesting light on Michelangelo's relations with Julius II, and on an artist's problems in that day.

Wellington, A Character Study. By Oliver Brett. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

Here is an admirable study of Wellington, conceived and executed in a spirit that would have delighted the general. The Hon. Oliver Brett writes as befits his subject—clearly, sensibly, and honestly, with no pretense on the one hand to exhaustive historical scholarship, nor on the other to psychological interpretation. There is no attempt to review the military career of Napoleon's conqueror, nor to rewrite the political and diplomatic history of his age. What concerns the author is the personality of the man, and in his effort to disengage the individual from the tangled web of circumstances in which Wellington's career was fixed, Mr. Brett has more than succeeded. The Iron Duke emerges, for all his shortcomings, a more distinct and a greater figure.

Twelve Bad Men. By Sidney Dark. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.

Many books about bad men have appeared of late, most of them written in a variety or styles as little commendable as the lives of the subjects described. But Mr. Dark writes with graceful distinction; he is concise and pithy, and yet he omits nothing of importance. His rogues' gallery includes such famous scamps as Cesare Borgia, Benvenuto Cellini, Judge Jeffreys, Casanova, Talleyrand, and Robespierre.

Sailings to

SOVIET RUSSIA

July 16—S. S. "Berengaria"
Aug. 21—S. S. "Aquitania"
Sept. 18—S. S. "Berengaria"

Register now for a tour full of fun —interest—novelty—unforgetable! Stop-overs at European Capitals.

Ten full days in

LENINGRAD & MOSCOW

Write for Booklet D—a detailed itinerary

TOURS from $385

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 5th Ave., New York. Tel. Algonquin 6656
Chicago office—308 W. Washington St., R. K. Zetland, Mgr.

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Starting this Sat., June 29th
For One Week Only!

Theodore Dreiser says:

"I recommend

DOSTOIEVSKY'S

CRIME and PUNISHMENT

Enacted by the Moscow Art Players and directed by ROBERT WIENE director of "Caligari" as the most brilliant and artistic psychologic study the Cinema has ever achieved."

—and on the same program—

Anatole France's

superb satire on law and justice

"CRAINQUEBILLE"

splendidly interpreted by a brilliant cast headed by Maurice de Feraudy, the French "Emil Jannings."

FILM GUILD CINEMA

52 W. 8th St. [Just W. of 5th Ave.] Spring {5090 5095
Continuous Daily 2 P. M. to Midnite.

Direction: SYMON GOULD

Now Playing—Thurs., June 27—"VARIETY," with Jannings. Fri., June 28—Jannings in "Othello" with Werner Kraus as Iago, and on the same program "Sins of the Fathers."

"Still amuses with a kind of careless gaiety which no other revue has managed to capture."—Joseph Wood Krutch.

THE 1929 Grand Street Follies

with Albert Carroll, Dorothy Sands & Paula Trueman

BOOTH THEA. W. 45 ST.—Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents

Journey's End

By R. C. Sheriff

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

Employers:—
For intelligent employees advertise in The Nation. You reach fewer readers than through a large newspaper, but those you reach are worth while. And your advertisement in The NATION is READ.

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising with remittance to

THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT
20 Vesey Street, N. Y. or Phone Fitzroy 9074.

International Relations Section

Robert Dell Replies

THE NATION has received numerous letters in answer to Mr. Dell's article, The Papal-Fascist Alliance, which appeared in our issue of March 27. One of these has already been printed. Another appears in this issue. All were forwarded to Mr. Dell. We print below his general reply to this correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The letters of your Roman Catholic correspondents about my article in The Nation of March 27 are a flattering tribute to my accuracy, for not one of them even seriously contests a single statement of fact made in the article, much less attempts to refute one. John McGarr, however, suggests rather than says that I was wrong in saying that the Italian Concordat makes religious teaching compulsory in the schools for all pupils and gives the church the control of marriage. I will, therefore, deal with these two points before going on to the general questions raised by your correspondents' letters.

Signor Belluzzo, the Italian Minister for Public Instruction, recently sent to his subordinate officials a circular regulating the religious instruction in the schools in accordance with the Concordat, in which he said that the Catholic religion would henceforth be a "compulsory subject of instruction." The teachers are to be prepared in the training schools to give this instruction which will be under the control of the ecclesiastical authorities who will have a voice in the nomination of the teachers by whom it is to be given and the right to deprive any teacher of the power of giving it, if they consider him unsuitable. There is not a hint in the circular of giving any parents the right to withdraw their children from religious instruction. Protestants and Jews are a very small minority in Italy, but a very large number of Italians are freethinkers. Even if some concession should ultimately be made to Protestants and Jews—and at present there is no sign of it—it is clearly the intention to treat the children of freethinkers as Catholics and force Catholic teaching on them. Freethinkers have as much right to freedom of conscience as Protestants and Jews, but the Catholic church has always denied the right of freedom of conscience. Gregory XVI, in 1832, denounced "that false and absurd maxim, or rather frenzy: that everybody should be given and guaranteed liberty of conscience," and liberty of conscience is among the "modern liberties" condemned by Leo XIII in 1888.

The principles of Gregory XVI and Leo XIII, which are the unchanging principles of Catholicism, are applied in the Italian Concordat. Italian teachers will be deprived of liberty of conscience, for, although Signor Belluzzo says in his circular that it will be no disgrace to a teacher to be forbidden to give religious instruction, it is clear that in practice only those able to give it will have any chance of promotion, and freethinking teachers, of whom there are many in Italy, will be obliged to violate their consciences by teaching what they do not believe or sacrifice their careers.

Article 34 of the Italian Concordat fully justifies my statement that marriage will be under the control of the church. Judicial separation—there is no divorce in Italy—is left to the jurisdiction of the civil courts, but cases of nullity of marriage are transferred to the ecclesiastical courts, whose judgments will be executed by the civil authorities. By Catholic canon law the marriage of a Catholic is null and void if it is not performed by a priest, and a priest cannot marry a Catholic and a non-Catholic unless a dispensation has been obtained and the non-Catholic party gives certain undertakings. This now becomes the law of the land. Existing marriages hitherto legal become annullable at the request of either party, and although civil marriage is retained no civil marriage of a Catholic will in future be legally valid. It follows that no Catholic will legally be able to marry a non-Catholic without the permission of the Catholic authorities. Undoubtedly freethinkers will be considered as Catholics, at any rate if they have been baptized. The Catholic ecclesiastical courts will alone be competent to annul the marriages even of non-Catholics and unbaptized persons, but on what principles such cases will be dealt with it is difficult to say.

This adaptation of the law of the land to canon law and the execution of the judgments of ecclesiastical courts by the civil authorities, for which the Italian Concordat provides in certain other matters besides marriage, are unknown in any other modern state and are a return to medieval conditions. The Concordat in fact sets up a theocracy in Italy and admits the "rights" that have always been claimed by the Catholic church which may be summed up by the dictum of Boniface VIII in 1303: "The temporal authority must be subject to the spiritual power."

Your Catholic correspondents try to evade the issue. There is no question of attacking their "religious beliefs," which are their own affair and with which the state is not concerned. Nor is there any resemblance between my point of view and that of the Ku Klux Klan. I am sure that movements like that of the Ku Klux Klan do a lot of good to the Catholic church. Years ago we had in England a fanatical Protestant agitation led by a gentleman called Kensit, who used to tell stories about walled-up nuns and Jesuits disguised as housemaids. The net result of it was that, as the absurdity of the Kensitite charges against Catholics was easily demonstrated, the English public got the impression that the Catholic church was a harmless institution and that impression is only now wearing off and being replaced by a more realistic view.

The Catholic church is not a harmless institution, but a very dangerous one, not, however, on account of its theological dogmas. It is not in the same category as other religious bodies. Very likely the Methodist church interferes in politics in America, as one of your correspondents says, but the Methodist church is not an international political institution, claiming to be a "perfect society" superior to civil society and governed by an absolute monarch to whom its members are bound to blind obedience even in political matters. If a member of the Methodist church did not follow the political instructions of its pastors, he would hardly be excommunicated, but, if a French Catholic joins the Radical or the Socialist Party, he is ipso facto excommunicated. It is impossible to be at once a good Catholic and a good Socialist or a good Liberal, and if any Catholics sincerely think it possible it is because they are ignorant of the political doctrine of their own church.

It is no more intolerant to refuse to vote for a Catholic than to refuse to vote for a Tory or a Liberal or a Socialist. Why should we be expected to vote for a member of a political organization whose political principles are fundamentally opposed to our own? If he says that he agrees with our political principles, our reply is that he can prove it only by coming out of that organization, and that he should have no objection to so doing, for if he really agrees with us he is already a heretic and probably ipso facto excommunicated. And if he says, as Daniel O'Connell is alleged to have said, that he takes his religion from Rome, but not his politics, he is doubly a heretic, for he is guilty of the heresy condemned by Pius X under the name of "political modernism."

This heresy—that Catholics are not bound to obey their ecclesiastical authorities in political matters—was the theological ground of the recent condemnation of the Action Française League and its paper by the present Pope. In his encyclical of June, 1881, on the duties of Christians as citizens, Leo XIII declared that in their capacity as citizens Catholics owed "complete submission and obedience of will to the church and to the Roman Pontiff, as to God Himself" and that this obedience must be "absolute and perfect in every particular."

Leo XIII also preaches the duty of passive obedience to the rulers of the state, unless "the laws of the State are manifestly at variance with the Divine Law" as laid down by the Roman Pontiff who is "the supreme Teacher in the Church," in which case "to resist becomes a positive duty, to obey a crime."

This has been the constant teaching of the Catholic church, which has never changed, and it is inevitable that it should be. What theologians call the ordinary magisterium of the church is not restricted to theological matters but extends to the whole of human life, and the Pope is infallible when he defines a dogma concerning morals as well as faith. The liberal principle of toleration is based on the fact that, however strongly we may hold an opinion, we cannot be absolutely certain that we are right, for we are not infallible. If, as the Catholic church teaches, we could learn the absolute truth from an infallible teacher, it would manifestly be wrong, as that church also teaches, to tolerate "error."

Of course intolerance is not confined to Catholics. The majority of mankind have always been intolerant. But although too many religious people in particular are still intolerant, the Catholic church is the only religious body in the civilized world that regards toleration as wrong and preaches intolerance as a principle, or perhaps I should rather say that intolerance is a principle only of the Catholic church. When liberty raises its head, the Catholic church recognizes its worst enemy and strikes at it. On April 23, 1791, Pius VI condemned the Declaration of the Rights of Man as "contrary to religion and society." The principles of the Declaration of the Rights of Man are those of the Constitution of the United States of America. How can a Catholic swear fidelity to that Constitution and remain faithful to his church?

The political doctrine of the Catholic church has not changed since 1790. I refer anybody wishing for full and authoritative information about that doctrine and able to read French to a collection of fifty-five formal pronouncements on political and economic questions by nine successive Popes, edited by my friend, M. Georges Michon, which will, I hope, be published in a translation in England and America.[1]

The "modern liberties" condemned by Leo XIII, which he rightly calls the principles of "the supporters of liberalism," are liberty of worship, liberty of conscience, religious equality, liberty of speech, liberty of teaching, and liberty of the press. The last had been denounced by his predecessor, Gregory XVI, as "the most deadly of liberties, an execrable liberty, which we shall never hold in sufficient horror." Leo XIII, however, explains that "in the extraordinary conditions of these times" the church is obliged unwillingly and as a matter of expediency and a provisional measure to tolerate "error" and allow the state to tolerate it and to "acquiesce in certain modern liberties" in order "to avoid greater evils." In plain English, the church acquiesces in toleration and "modern liberties" when and where she is not strong enough to do otherwise and Catholics, being in a minority, would be the first sufferers by their suppression. In "happier times," however, as Leo XIII says, the church applies its own principles, as now in Italy.

Socialism is condemned by Pius IX in his Allocution at Gaeta (April 20, 1849) and his encyclical "Nostis et Nobiscum"

[1] "Les Documents Pontificaux sur la Démocratie et la Société Moderne." Publiés avec une introduction et des notes par Georges Michon, Docteur ès lettres. Paris: Les Editions Rieder. 25 francs.

BURTON RASCOE
Former Book Editor of The Chicago Tribune, Associate Editor of McCall's Magazine, Editor of the Bookman, etc.

BURTON RASCOE
becomes
ASSOCIATE EDITOR of PLAIN TALK

BEGINNING with the August issue of Plain Talk Magazine Mr. Rascoe will write the greater part of the book reviews and will conduct a department of his own, in addition to collaborating with the editor on special features.

Mr. Rascoe's experience is as long and varied as his performance has been brilliant. His first literary fame was achieved as Book Editor of the Chicago Tribune, where he laid about so lustily that he attracted the attention of the entire country and, more than any other person, founded the Chicago "school" of modern writers, which produced men now famous in the annals of American literature.

He left Chicago to become Associate Editor of McCall's Magazine in New York, and then was Literary Editor of the New York Tribune.

Mr. Rascoe syndicated a daily column under his name through the Central Press Association to 400 newspapers. He was also editor of the Bookman, and is a member of the board of judges of the Literary Guild and Literary Editor of Arts and Decorations.

The policy of PLAIN TALK will in no way be affected, as the acquisition of Mr. Rascoe is an attempt to increase the excellence of our standards without any idea of changing our creed.

COMING
The UNPUBLISHED Letters of Guy de Maupassant

These famous letters were written to Gustave Flaubert in the years 1878-1880, during which time the rising young French author published his first book of verse. His aspirations, enthusiasms and youthful passions so clearly portrayed within the paragraphs of these letters give us an intimate picture of this unusual young man whom nations were to honor in later years.

Introductory Offer

Save 75c by sending only $1 for the next 5 issues of Plain Talk, to Dept. 1107, Plain Talk, 381 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

(December 8, 1849), and by Leo XIII in his encyclical "Quod apostolici" (December 28, 1878), in which he examines Socialist economic theories more closely than his predecessor and also condemns Christian socialism, which had then made its appearance. The condemnation of socialism was repeated by Leo XIII in the encyclical "Rerum novarum" (May 15, 1891), in which he ordered Catholic workmen not to join general trade unions, but to form Catholic unions, as has been done in several European countries. He had already recommended in the encyclical "Quod apostolici" the formation of "associations of handicraftsmen and laboring men which, placed under the sheltering care of religion, may render the members content with their lot and resigned to toil, inducing them to lead a peaceful and tranquil life." Rude trade unionists call them blacklegs.

The principle of democracy was condemned by Leo XIII in the encyclical "Immortale Dei" and elsewhere. The authority of rulers, he said, was derived from God, not from the people. It was not, however, "of itself wrong to prefer a democratic form of government, if only the Catholic doctrine be maintained as to the origin and exercise of power." This is not a mere theoretical distinction. Leo XIII, like the other Popes, also taught that rebellion against "princes" or rulers was never in any circumstances permissible, unless of course ordered by the church, as in Mexico. It follows that if, for instance, a constitutional monarch overthrows the constitution which he has sworn to maintain, or acquiesces in its overthrow, as the kings of Spain and Italy have, Catholics are bound to submit. It is for this reason and because a dictatorship is more in harmony with Catholic principles than any other form of government that the Catholic church supports Mussolini, Primo de Rivera, and other European dictators.

Among the other principles laid down by the nine Popes whose pronouncements M. Michon has collected are the following: The church is a "perfect" and "universal society" superior to civil society, and the Catholic religion should be the only religion of the state. The state must exercise no sort of control over religious orders, which should be in a privileged position and above the law. Private property, especially in land, is a "natural right," with which it is not permissible to interfere, even by heavy taxation. The poor must be contented with their lot, for class distinctions and inequalities of wealth are ordained by God and it is impious to try to get rid of them. "It is in conformity with the order established by God that there are in human society princes and subjects, masters and proletarians, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, nobles and plebeians" (Pius X). Besides, almsgiving is a Christian duty and it involves the existence of poverty. The "social question" is primarily a moral and religious, not an economic one, and is to be solved by "Christian charity" and by "the rules of morality and the judgment of religion."

Clearly Pius IX was right when he "reprobated, proscribed, and condemned" the proposition that "the Roman Pontiff can and ought to be reconciled and come to terms with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." And Democrats, Liberals, Radicals, and Socialists cannot be reconciled or come to terms with the Roman Pontiff and his subjects. We will give them the liberty that they would refuse to us if they had the power, but we will not commit political suicide by giving our votes to members of a political organization with such principles as these, which every member of that organization is bound to accept. We will not choose as our representatives men who cannot be true to us without being false to their church, and who, if they are true to their church, are bound to be our strongest political opponents. This is not intolerance; it is just common sense.

Paris, France, June 6 ROBERT DELL

ENGRAVING

100 Genuine engraved calling cards in the newest style mailed postpaid for $3.50

Check or money order.

STEVENS ENGRAVING, Suite 611, Jewelers Building, Los Angeles, California.

LECTURES

the songlore society, 263 W. 11th St. at 8:30 every sunday evening presents daca, composer and chansonneur, in songlore lecture recitals. exit fee $1. tickets 63 washington sq. and 83 greenwich ave.

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN Short course. Conversational methods. Experienced native teachers. Daily 9 to 9. FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES 75c an hour 1264 LEXINGTON AVE., Bet. 85th and 86th Sts, N. Y.

CHILDREN'S SCHOOLS

MANHASSET BAY SCHOOL

A progressive school within commuting distance of the city for day and boarding pupils. Boys and girls 4 to 12 years.

Write Mrs. J. H. Renson, Manhasset Bay School, Port Washington, N. Y.

BEACON HILL SCHOOL, Harting, Petersfield. Bertrand and Dora Russell. Some vacancies autumn especially girls from four to six years; large wooded grounds; individual initiative; free access to knowledge; attempt at intellectual achievement and social behavior without damage to emotional spontaneity. Terms and Prospectus on application.

POSITIONS WANTED

GERMAN lady wishes position as governess or nursery governess for summer or permanently. Could also tutor in German. Experience in England. Excellent references. For information apply to President W. A. Neilson, Smith College, Northampton, Mass.

COLLEGE graduate (20); lively and versatile intellect; writing ability; wishes any kind of work. Special interests: literature, social science, educating. But will consider anything, including teaching and ditchdigging. Box 2093, % The Nation.

WOMAN, Master's Degree, accountancy training, experienced teacher and executive secretary, social interests, desires responsible position. Box 2095, % The Nation.

RESEARCH worker, translator (French, German, Russian, Spanish), statistician, editorial assistant. Columbia Ph.D. (woman). Box 2096, % The Nation.

COMPANION-TUTOR, teaching experience in Germany, Italy, and United States. Languages—music—athletics. Desires summer position, willing to travel. Excellent recommendations. Miss Lemmel, 414 W. 118th St., N. Y. C.

COLLEGE SENIOR, intelligence unimpaired, however, seeks summer position. Literary ability. Box 2086, % The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—Alert men and women to represent The Nation in every community. Our circulation is on the up-curve and our commissions are as liberal as our editorial policy. If you would like to earn extra money by making friends for The Nation, write to Department 11, % The Nation.

PROPERTY FOR SALE

IN Adirondacks—130 acres—7 rooms—cellar—fireplace—2,600 feet elevation. Price $2,100. Part cash. Other camps and cabins. Earl Woodward, Hadley, N. Y.

FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE

FOR SALE or exchange, beautiful modern country home, all conveniences. Spacious grounds, trees. Located Tannersville in Catskills. Wonderful setting. Would consider city or Long Island sea shore property. Box 2094, % The Nation.

FURNISHED APTS. FOR RENT

COOL, COZILY FURNISHED 2 ROOM AND BATH APARTMENT. Electrical cooking equipment. Truly unusual at $50 a month. Bjornson, 57 Horatio St. Chelsea 9722.

UNFURNISHED APARTMENTS

15TH—242 East, opposite Stuyvesant Park, 2 rooms, bath and kitchenette.

WESTERN TRIP

AM looking for pleasant people to join me on a camping trip by car to Yellowstone Park. Will start about July. Dr. Schein, Phone Jerome 7929.

Classified advertisers:

To get in the issue following this one, dated July 10 which will go to press a day earlier (Monday morning, July 2), on account of the Holiday, advertisements must be in our office by noon Friday, June 28th.

THE NATION 20 Vesey St.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1929 No. 3340

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 27
EDITORIALS:
Freedom of Belief—for Citizens Only 30
"Say It with Deposits" 31
The Gangster 31
Back to Russia 32
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 33
UNCLE SAM'S ELECTRIC EMPIRE. By Paul Blanshard 34
FLYING FROM OCEAN TO OCEAN. By M. de M. Porter 36
CAPTAIN COLL—LEGIONNAIRE. By C. E. Payne 38
WHITE MICE. By Francis McAllister 39
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 40
CORRESPONDENCE 41
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 42
BOOKS:
Marriage Songs. By Mark Van Doren 43
Glorious War. By Joseph Wood Krutch 43
Ruskin Revealed. By Henry Ladd 44
Toward Peace. By Norman Thomas 44
Importations. By E. M. Benson 45
Economics and Christian Morals. By Paul Blanshard 46
Creative Building. By Talbot Faulkner Hamlin 46
An Indian Handbook. By Thomas Hornsby Ferril 47
The Story of a Dynasty. By William MacDonald 48
Books in Brief 49
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Modern Spain—III. Censorship. By Carleton Beals 50

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

SENATOR SMOOT is doing his simple duty, under our accepted theory of protection as a prize for the greediest grabber, in trying to boost the sugar duty for the benefit of his beet-growing constituents. But the deal is so raw, and the American producers who stand to suffer from the increase are so powerful, that he is running into rough water. Cuba is by soil and climate the best place in the world to grow sugar, and it lives by growing sugar, some 84.6 per cent by value of its exports during the past five years having been sugar. Its total crop during the past year was no less than 5,000,000 tons, more than one-sixth of the world's production. Under our reciprocity agreement, Cuban sugar has since 1904 entered our market with a rebate of 20 per cent of any existing duty. As a result of all these conditions, American capital has flowed into Cuba in great amounts. The Department of Commerce estimates its total at $1,250,000,000 invested largely in sugar, sugar railroads, and other industries dependent on sugar. This is more than five times the total investment in our domestic sugar industry both beet and cane. We are thus witnessing a pretty three-cornered fight between the American interests in Cuba, which naturally do not want their throat cut by having to pay higher duties, the American interests in Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, which enjoy free entry for their sugar, and the domestic producers, notably the beet growers. Last year Cuba furnished some 47 per cent of our sugar, the insular possessions 31 per cent, and the domestic producers about 21 per cent.

TO RAISE the existing full duty of two and two-tenths cents to the three cents of the House bill would increase the cost of landing sugar here from Cuba by sixty-four hundredths of a cent per pound, and would probably raise the price of sugar by nearly that amount, increasing our national sugar bill by something like $100,000,000. Somewhat less than half of this would go to the government and the rest would be a gift to the sugar growers in the insular possessions and to our domestic growers of cane and beets. Professors Commons, Perlman, and Hibbard, of the University of Wisconsin, estimate the increased cost to consumers at $150,000,000. Of this they figure that farmers would pay $33,000,000, while sugar-growing farmers (less than 3 per cent of the total) might get $26,000,000—a net loss of $7,000,000 to the farmers and a striking example of how not to help the distressed agriculturist. An increase of duty would result in an increase in the supply of insular and high-cost domestic sugar, the shutting off of the American consumer from the benefits of Cuban soil and climate, which he may share if Congress will let him, the enrichment of a handful of American producers by the plunder of a hundred and fifteen million American sugar users, and a deadly blow at the prosperity of Cuba and the American capital there invested. We have no greater tenderness for American capital in Cuba than in Colorado, but we do have a great tenderness for common-sense and international decency.

ALTHOUGH THE ADMINISTRATION has hushed up the Salt Creek oil scandal, we predict that it will not stay hushed. When Attorney-General Mitchell announced on June 23 that he did not think any legal basis existed for suits attacking the validity of the leases held by oil companies in the government fields of Wyoming, he did what everyone familiar with the situation in Washington expected him to do. The Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior have never been interested in pushing the investigation of the leases in this field to a disturbing conclusion. Attorney-General Mitchell may be honest enough in his judgment, but the fact remains that he has based that judgment upon the old, incomplete evidence concerning the Salt Creek fields in the files of the Department of the Interior. What the situation needs is not a judgment of present evidence but a thorough probe for more evidence. That probe, as Paul Blanshard pointed out in an article in The Nation of February 20, has never been made. The titles to leases of government land in one of the richest oil fields in the world, involving perhaps a billion dollars, are clouded with suspicion and charges of fraud. The trail of juggled titles and theft from the government goes back much farther than any investigations of the Senate Public Lands Committee have thus far reached.

OWEN D. YOUNG, who has won the applause of his countrymen for his masterly handling of the recent reparations conference in Paris, earned their gratitude again when upon his return to America he slipped quietly home, refusing an official reception from Grover Whalen, who imagines he earns his salary as police commissioner of New York City by going down the bay at government expense to welcome almost everybody from kings to peanut vendors. Before and during the reparations conference the Washington Administration reiterated the old song that German payments had no connection with the Allied debts to America and insisted upon the unofficial character of our delegates in Paris. But no sooner were these men back than they were summoned to the capital for a long powwow with President Hoover and his official family. Then Secretary Stimson gravely repeated his previous announcement that there would be no participation by the Federal Reserve Board or any other government agency in the management of the projected International Bank of Settlement. Interesting but not important. For American finance is not controlled in Washington and even now Wall Street is probably planning its part in the world bank. It would be exceedingly embarrassing to Europe if it were not. And Wall Street has no notion of embarrassing Europe—in just that way.

OUR CAPACITY FOR BUNGLING in regard to the debts owed us by the Allies seems to be unlimited. Ten years ago we stood out for full payment instead of admitting the impossibility of such a feat and making generous cancelations to the Allies in return for similar concessions by them to Germany. As payment was not forthcoming, we entered eventually into refunding arrangements which in most cases will return us only a fraction of our money even if they are carried out—and they won't be. Such an arrangement is still pending with France, but her Parliament has taken the reasonable position that it will not ratify the scheme until sure of the money with which to pay through general acceptance of the Young plan, something which will take a number of months. Meanwhile a post-war debt to us of $400,000,000 for army supplies falls due on August 1. Under the proposed refunding scheme payment of this would be postponed and carried along with the war debt. So Congress, before adjourning, voted to extend the time of paying the $400,000,000 for nine months in order to permit the ratification meanwhile of the refunding scheme. But in the last-minute hurry the resolution was not signed by either Speaker Longworth or Vice-President Curtis, and Secretary Stimson thinks that he cannot carry out the resolution. Probably he is right, but it puts the United States in the ugly position of seemingly trying to bludgeon France into signing the debt agreement at once. There is an alternative. France can simply ignore the debt due on August 1, and we have no idea that Paris will be occupied by American marines if she does.

"IN THE NAMES of their respective peoples"—that is a part of the phraseology with which the President of the United States, the Emperor of Japan, and the other "High Contracting Powers" renounce war in the so-called Kellogg pacts. For most of the Powers the phrase was a mere phrase. In Japan it created a political tornado. Old patriots maintained that it was unconstitutional, an insult to the sacred person of the Emperor, an implied limitation upon his absolute sovereignty. Eventually the Privy Council voted to sign the pact with an "interpretative declaration" explaining, in effect, that the phrase was not to be taken seriously. Three of the Elder Statesmen voted against such a halfway ratification, two because they objected to any modification of the form negotiated with the Western Powers, one because he objected to even so mild an implication that the Emperor of Japan derived his authority from the people. The debate was a striking revelation of Japan's position on the borders of medieval feudalism. Her people have democratic rights accorded in a Constitution granted by an Emperor who was in fact more radical than his people. Such contradictions abound. Constitutionally, Japan's ministries are not yet responsible to the Parliament or the people. Yet whereas the Elder Statesmen still stir up tempests in teapots over a Kellogg phrase, the business men of Japan, without constitutional sanction, have just demonstrated anew their power to force a change in government policy. In the last two months Japan has executed another right-about-face in its policy toward China, and the Japanese Minister, installing himself at Shanghai while other diplomats linger in Peiping, has gone further than any of his colleagues in manifesting sympathy with the Nationalist Government.

FENG DIDN'T GO TO WAR with Chiang after all and China has another breathing spell. Never has there been a more comic anti-climax to a great national crisis than the recently announced Feng-Chiang agreement. The Nationalist armies of Chiang Kai-shek had been drawn up in battle array against the rebel forces of Feng Yu-hsiang, many bridges had been destroyed, the formal declaration of war had been broadcast throughout China, and both generals had issued scorching statements about each other. But in the pause before the firing news came of the surprising victory of Chiang's southern forces against the rebels near Canton, Chiang's subordinates outmaneuvered Feng in Shantung, and, most important of all, the revenues of the Nanking Government began to purchase Feng's supporters. Money looked very tempting to men who had had no pay for months, as Feng's soldiers had not, and to various northern military leaders who had flirted with Feng. In the end Feng saw that his forces were hopelessly outnumbered, and he sold out for $3,100,000—$3,000,000 for his soldiers and $100,000 for his own "traveling expenses." He is going to Germany to act as special investigator of foreign economic affairs for the Nationalist Government. How euphemistically the Chinese avoid the word "exile"! At least it is alleged that he is going. The Nation's department of Chinese prophecy is feeling very low at the moment. Hereafter we intend to refer to General Feng only in the past tense.

RELUCTANTLY, one imagines, Baron Passfield of Passfield Corner will take his place in the House of Lords. But his wife, Beatrice Webb, is to be subject to no such pressure of nobility. For many years Sidney and Beatrice Webb have been leaders in the thought and authority of the British Labor Party. At the urgent request of the Prime Minister, who wished the Cabinet to be represented in the House of Lords, Sidney Webb, at the same time that he accepted the position of Minister for the Colonies, consented to what must seem to him a little like a sacrifice of his identity and accepted a baronetcy. Beatrice Webb, however, has announced that she will not be called Lady Passfield, thus establishing a precedent in the refusal by a wife of her husband's title. Good Lucy Stoners, who would have denied her a seat in their midst because she called herself Beatrice Webb instead of Beatrice Potter, cannot but applaud her now. She has herself lent distinction to the name of Webb, separate from the distinction of her husband. In refusing to let the name be lost to British history except as it stands in explanatory parenthesis after that of the newly created Baron, she has made a very pretty gesture, both for feminism and for loyalty.

REPRESENTATIVE OSCAR DE PRIEST, whose wife was invited to tea by Mrs. Hoover, has remained sensible and tolerant under the storm of protest occasioned by that simple fact. Texas, Florida, Mississippi, and Virginia have expressed themselves as fearful over the future of the white race because the President's wife asked a colored woman, whose husband was the duly elected representative of certain of the voters of Illinois, to a social function at her house. Mr. De Priest put the whole discussion on a sane and decent level when he remarked:

> My wife was invited not because she was white or black, Republican or Democrat. She was not invited because Mrs. Hoover thought anything of her personally. She was invited because she happened to be the wife of a man who was a member of Congress. That's all there was to it.

This is admirable and exactly the tone which Mr. De Priest must take. If he took any other tone he would bring about his ears not a storm but a tornado. The Nation, which does not have to fear Southern tornadoes, can and does take a little different tone. It is true that Mrs. De Priest was invited to the White House as a matter of political routine; but if Mrs. Hoover had invited her as a personal friend, if she had come not only to tea but to dine, if she had been a week-end guest with her husband and her five children, supposing her to have so many, the white race would, so The Nation firmly believes, still rest strongly on its foundations, the world would not flop over on its side, the stars would still serenely maintain their courses, and not a single Southern Democrat would have any right to be late to his dinner in consequence. Some day just this sort of thing may happen in the White House: that is, a President or his wife may invite as a guest one of his or her friends who happens to be a Negro. Then we shall see a real storm; but it will be in the best of causes.

OUR RIGHT HAND ACHES in sympathy with that of Mr. Hoover, who on a recent Wednesday welcomed 1,176 persons visiting the White House for no other purpose than to tell the folks back home that they had been received by the President. No European country would think of subjecting its king or prime minister to so nonsensical a waste of time and strength. Doubtless the custom survives in this country to prove the "democracy" of a government which in fact has ever less and less of such quality. Mr. Roosevelt, the most democratic President of this century, abolished the weekly reception of miscellaneous visitors, probably through confidence that his reputation required no such spurious bolster. The affable but ineffective Mr. Harding reestablished the rite, and both Mr. Coolidge and Mr. Hoover have accepted it. If the 1,176 hands that Mr. Hoover shook the other day were laid end to end, they would reach from Washington to the Milky Way or from the Edict of Nantes to the Battle of the Somme. Translated into foot-pounds, the energy that Mr. Hoover wasted would make four carloads of coughless cigarettes or support a missionary in Africa for three years. If Mr. Hoover is not interested in such enterprises, he could keep his hand in his pocket, which is said to be a silly habit but cannot possibly be as much so as the weekly White House reception. And if there is no other relief, the boys of the future (every one of whom, we know, is a potential President) should be taught to shake hands ambidextrously, so that when the zero hour comes, and they are sent to the shaking-line, they can rest themselves by changing from one hand to the other.

VERNON LOUIS PARRINGTON, who died the other day in England at the age of fifty-eight, was that rare thing among university professors of English, a man who was familiar not only with literature but with the things out of which literature is made—politics, economics, sociology, theology, to mention only a few. For twenty-one years he had been professor of English at the University of Washington; the men and women with whom he came in daily contact thought him a great man; his most important work, "Main Currents in American Thought," two volumes of which appeared about two years ago, was generally recognized as an extraordinarily significant contribution to American letters. He was a thorough scholar and at the same time completely aware of what was taking place in the world around him. His opinions were radical and none more so than the concept which guided him in his chef d'œuvre—that literature is not a nun set chastely separate from "life" but an expression of a given culture, part of the pattern of society and governed by the pattern as a whole. The Nation was only one of a number of periodicals which welcomed contributions from him whenever they could be obtained. It is melancholy to have to record his death when he was hardly past middle-age, and it is only a measure of consolation that the third volume of "Main Currents" is actually finished except for final revisions, and will be published by Harcourt, Brace and Company.

LITTLE COMMENT is required on the following dispatch to Variety from Los Angeles:

> Recent Shriner convention netted Jake Timberg, local bottle dealer, $3,800 profit. Holding the exclusive empty-bottle concessions with eighteen local hotels, Timberg's bookkeeper produced a summary showing the following amount of glassware passing through his warehouses during the week following the convention—98 gross of gin bottles, 236 gross ginger-ale bottles, 63 gross of fancy Scotch, 22 gross of champagne, 42 gross fancy wine, 182 gross miscellaneous pints, 49 gross beer, and 33 gross of tonic bottles. These bottles are all reconditioned, resold, and will eventually find their way back again to Timberg's bottle emporium for another Turkish bath.

We suppose that the 33 gross of "tonic" was consumed by the scrupulously law-abiding contingent of the Shriners.

Freedom of Belief—for Citizens Only

HOW far does our country propose to go in making war on private conscience? Recent court decisions in the Schwimmer and MacIntosh naturalization cases bring this question sharply to mind. It looks like a war on peace-makers at a particularly inopportune time, just when we are trying to find means of making anti-war treaties effective. Though both cases involve the question of the citizen's responsibility in war, the issue is really much wider; for the problem of the rights and duties of the citizen as against the state is an eternal one.

In the Schwimmer case, Justice Butler, speaking for the majority of the United States Supreme Court, declares it the duty of the citizen "by force of arms to defend our government against all enemies whenever necessary"—a doctrine that no small number of us utterly repudiate and are prepared to resist if necessary. Justice Butler continues: "Whatever tends to lessen the willingness of citizens to discharge their duty to bear arms in the country's defense detracts from the strength and from the safety of the government"—from which again, as thus stated, we dissent, believing the Justice to be completely mistaken, and holding that the strength and safety of the government do not at bottom reside in its armed force, as he holds. Under the Schwimmer decision, apparently, no alien who honestly avows these views may be admitted to citizenship, no matter how well qualified he may be otherwise. Those of us who happen to have been born here cannot be deprived of citizenship for holding these ideas, but acccording to Justice Butler's reasoning we lack an essential qualification of citizenship, as, indeed, most people seem to have thought during the war. Under these circumstances, we heretics who are already citizens have a certain measure of freedom of conscience, but our fellowship is not to be augmented by the admission of aliens of like faith.

In the case of Professor MacIntosh of the Yale Divinity School, Judge Burrows (who will be recalled as presiding at the recent trial of Mary Ware Dennett) goes farther in a way than the Supreme Court. Professor MacIntosh is not even a conscientious objector to all war. Asked whether he will defend the Constitution and laws against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and whether he is willing, if necessary, to take up arms in defense of this country, he replies, in words that do him honor,

> I am willing to do what I judge to be in the best interests of my country, but only in so far as I can believe that this is not going to be against the best interests of humanity in the long run. I do not undertake to support my country, right or wrong, in any dispute which may arise, and I am not willing to promise beforehand, and without knowing the cause for which my country may go to war, either that I will or that I will not take up arms in defense of this country, however necessary war may seem to the government of the day.
>
> It is only in a sense consistent with these statements that I am willing to promise to support and defend the government of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Ready to place allegiance to country "above private interest and mere individual preference and second only to my allegiance to what I take to be the will of God," Professor MacIntosh yet could not promise to support our government in a war violating the Kellogg pact. Judge Burrows refused him citizenship. The decision of Judge Burrows means that no alien is eligible to citizenship who is unwilling to pledge himself in advance to support, to the extent of bearing arms himself, any war in which the country may engage, no matter how wrong in his judgment. Judge Burrows, or the naturalization law, or both are wrong No man who was willing to take such a pledge could possibly be a good citizen.

Furthermore, the pledge is a flat contradiction of our historical policy. "In every war this country has waged," as we stated in our earlier discussion of the Schwimmer case, "some Americans have refused to bear arms," and some have gone farther in active opposition. The government itself has generally relied on the volunteer system, thus leaving the question of bearing arms to the citizen himself. In our latest great armed conflict we resorted to conscription, but even so we made provision for certain classes of conscientious objectors. Certainly no one can defend the doctrine of compulsory service by hiding behind the word "American."

In time of war these ideas against which the courts would defend us do create serious problems for those whose business it is to wage war. None the less, the state for its own sake must tolerate them. Military force has proved inadequate to keep peace and we are working out a new technique and a new body of ideas that may make peace possible. In that work we must allow liberty of thought and expression to those who can see other ways than the discredited ones of military force, and our government will do well to adhere to the principle of free thought "with regard to admission into as well as to life within this country," as Justice Holmes suggested.

In the practical operation of this principle of free thought there is bound to be compromise and at times perhaps confusion, but the state must recognize at the last the supremacy of the individual conscience, must remember the words of Emerson:

> The law is only a memorandum. We are superstitious and esteem the statute somewhat: so much life as it has in the character of living men, is its force. The statute stands there to say, yesterday we agreed so and so, but how feel ye this article today? Our statute is a currency, which we stamp with our own portrait: it soon becomes unrecognizable, and in process of time will return to the mint.

The state, then, must be forever in process of adjusting the law to the ideas and the character of its citizens. Let it refuse the new ideas at its peril! It is just this that our government would seem to be undertaking in respect to the newer ideas of war and peace. At a time when we imperatively need new and fruitful ideas, it is refusing citizenship to men and women just because they are not tied absolutely in the bonds of the older and discredited notions. But new tasks forever demand new ideas.

"Say It with Deposits"

THE choicest bit of evidence that has come out of the whole eighteen-months' investigation of power interests by the Federal Trade Commission was published on June 27 just before the commission adjourned its inquiry until autumn. The evidence, which was in the form of a letter from one power executive to another, described how the Pacific Gas and Electric Company uses the little banks of California to spread propaganda for itself and against public ownership. A. F. Hockenbeamer, president of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, wrote to A. W. Robertson of Pittsburgh:

> We discovered the country bankers quite a number of years ago. . . . We came to the conclusion about fifteen years ago that as a practical incentive to get them to work with us there is no substitute for deposits. . . . We have at this time accounts with 230 country banks scattered all over our territory, and while our policy keeps an average of around a million and a half dollars tied up in balances in these depositories, we believe it is well worth while; first, because the service they render to us as bankers is worth something, and secondly, because it cements their friendship and cooperation. Incidentally, we require no interest on these deposits. [Italics ours.]
>
> . . . We have had occasion to test their friendliness on a number of occasions and they have never failed us. During our two big campaigns against the so-called Water and Power Act (a scheme to put California in the power business with an initial issue of half a billion of bonds) they literally sent out hundreds of thousands of personal letters and pieces of literature to their depositors and stockholders, as well as campaigning against the act personally. My impression is that the other power companies in California follow pretty much the same policies as I have outlined.

Along with this letter evidence was published to show that this same Pacific Gas and Electric Company contributed $50,000 to Stanford University while the present Secretary of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, was president, and also gave support to the university's School of Business Administration.

It is to be hoped that the Federal Trade Commission, when it resumes the investigation in September, will be able to go behind the evils of power propaganda and expose the whole financial structure of the power industry. This was the original idea of the Walsh resolution, but when the effort was made last year to disclose the operations of the Electric Bond and Share Company, that organization refused to reveal its books. Now the commission has gone to the courts to force a surrender of the records. Meanwhile enough is known of the process of gradual concentration of control in the power industry to arouse general alarm. The latest report of H. S. Raushenbush of the Committee on Coal and Giant Power of New York shows that "over one-half of the electric power production of the country is in the hands of four holding companies." It is useless to inveigh against these super-corporations for their incidental activities in controlling the press, the colleges, and the banks unless their methods of making surplus profits are revealed and those profits recaptured by the community.

The Gangster

THE typical gangster is emotionally deficient, according to Dr. William J. Hickson, director of the psychopathic laboratory of the Chicago Municipal Court, who has examined 40,000 criminals during the last twelve years. For the most part also the gangster is mentally deficient, having a mental age of twelve to thirteen years. He is the dementia praecox type and is just as insane, says Dr. Hickson, as the dementia praecox, hyperemotional type to be found in insane asylums. The leaders of gangsters, however, are not mentally deficient. They are, in fact, above the average in intelligence. But like their less intelligent underlings, they are emotionally infantile. Given this emotional deficiency, intelligence and education merely fit them for greater crimes.

The emotional incompetence of the gangster is the far more serious defect from the point of view of society, which has the problem of controlling him. The gangster commits murder without a quickening of the pulse, "with no more emotion than would grip the ordinary person saying 'How do you do?' to a slight acquaintance." He goes to the electric chair without a tremor, for he can contemplate his own death without any change in his heart or blood pressure, if we are to take the word of Dr. Hickson. Because of this lack in the emotional make-up of the criminal, punishment meted out to a fellow-gangster is no deterrent whatever.

Dr. Hickson scouts the idea that the gangster is motivated in his killings by the desire for revenge. It has been a tradition that revenge is written large in the code of the gangster. Dr. Hickson points out that the gangster is superstitious and talks a great deal about religion. He is probably also very sentimental, and sentimentality is an aspect of emotional infantilism which might easily give rise to the acceptance of a childlike "code of honor" which would have no basis whatever in real feeling. Therefore a gangster might avenge a comrade's death not out of a desire to do so but because of this artificial code—set up probably not by himself but by someone more intelligent higher up whose motive was purely a business one. For Dr. Hickson feels that shooting is just part of the gangster's business, that he is incapable of feeling the desire for revenge just as he is incapable of remorse. He removes a rival who interferes with his business. In other words, his real motive, though he may call it revenge, is no different from that of a business man who removes a rival by financial ruin.

Dr. Hickson has no panacea to offer, nor even any comfort. The defects of gangsters, he says, are hereditary and therefore incurable. The typical gangster comes from a defective family whose members are criminal, feeble-minded, or insane. The gangster is born a gangster. The gangsters of the future are now in the schools making life miserable for teachers. "As boys," says Dr. Hickson, "they are haled into juvenile court. Perhaps they get short terms in the reformatory—at any rate, they never are able to reform. Sooner or later they launch into murderous careers." Time and again, Dr. Hickson asserts, his laboratory has labeled youths as killers, only to have the prophecy fulfilled. His only remedy is segregation, and in his opinion segregation should take place before the crime.

> Gangsters should be taken from the schools before they get big enough to be gangsters. They should be segregated on State farms, not punitive, until such time as they are pronounced cured. In nearly every case that would mean life segregation. Commitment should be made after examination by a commission, which would report to the courts on just what type each criminal is. . . . Segregation would keep them from both crime and propagation.

Dr. Hickson's theory of emotional deficiency seems to us inadequate to cover all cases of criminality, but it is doubtless an important contributory cause; and it would tend to explain the fact that capital punishment is apparently no deterrent to murder. Moreover, we cannot feel so hopeless as Dr. Hickson does toward the problem of reform. Environment, while not as important perhaps as heredity, has much to do with making the criminal. Certainly we cannot agree with Dr. Hickson in his zeal for segregating gangsters before they become gangsters. With insanity in its present undefined and diffused state, we should not trust any commission to pick, before the fact, the sane from the insane for so serious a commitment. We doubt that Dr. Hickson himself would undertake such a task; we are sure he would not delegate it.

Back to Russia

ENGLAND'S Labor Government had no sooner begun smoking the underslung pipe of peace with Ambassador Dawes than it turned to relight the pipe of peace with Russia. Normal diplomatic relations, begun in Ramsay MacDonald's first term of office and rudely interrupted by the Arcos raid two years ago, will be resumed.

It was on February 1, 1924, that England first recognized the Bolsheviks. Only Germany, the Baltic countries, and some of the Near Eastern Powers had established de jure relations with the outlaw Muscovites. But England's action was electric. Italy followed suit on February 7, Norway on February 13, Austria on February 20, Greece and Sweden in March, China in May, Mexico in August, France in October, and Japan in January. Belgium, Czecho-Slovakia, Hungary, Rumania, and Switzerland also have established de facto relations with Russia. Since England gave the initial impulse, in fact, all the important Powers except the United States have assumed more or less friendly relations with the government founded by Lenin.

Little of the good and evil variously prophesied as a result of diplomatic recognition has ensued. Those who predicted an outburst of Communist propaganda have been disappointed; the Communist movement has continued to decline in all the Western countries. On the other hand, those who foresaw a vast increase in Russian trade and a solution to the problem of unemployment in Britain have been equally disillusioned. Russian trade has continued to grow, but slowly; and it has directed itself along economic rather than political channels. Russia did not buy to favor nations that recognized her; she bought what she needed where she could buy it most cheaply. In large degree, she bought cotton in the United States.

Last year, in fact, Russia bought some $54,300,000 worth of cotton in the United States, which is more than Russia's entire purchases from the United States, of all kinds, amounted to in any year before the war. In other words, despite the barrier of non-recognition the United States is doing a vastly larger business in terms of money with the Bolsheviks than she did with the duly recognized Government of the Czar in 1913. Despite the poverty of Soviet Russia we even buy nearly twice as much of her as we did of Czarist Russia.

The hullabaloo over the question of recognizing Russia seems somewhat absurd in the light of these facts. As little as five years hence probably the fuss will seem utterly incomprehensible. Already the change is complete in England. Ramsay MacDonald was attacked for recognizing Russia in 1924; no one attacks him now. He was defeated in the fall election of that year in large part because of a forged letter trumping up a fake Red scare; in the recent campaign Winston Churchill's attempt to raise a Red bogy only bored the British voters. As late as 1927 a group of anti-Bolshevik oil promoters were able to force the Government into the melodramatic Arcos raid which led to a temporary break in formal relations; today even the financiers of the City welcome the return to normalcy. We shall not hold out long in this country.

Essentially, Washington's long refusal to recognize Russia has been an effort to force Russia to revise her legal system and to change her attitude toward the profit system. The effort has been camouflaged—at first with shouts that the Bolsheviks were pro-German, then that their power was waning, then that it was impossible to deal with them anyway—but most of the proclamations of our successive Secretaries of State have not lacked frankness. They have called it insisting that Russia "recognize her international obligations," but their definitions of "international obligations" have been plain enough. Other nations have been permitted to "refund" their debts to us—partial payment in lieu of repudiation. The Russians have not been allowed even to discuss whether and what they should pay. Secretary Hughes used to insist that they must first "demonstrate their good faith," apparently by revising their laws in regard to property.

Business men are less interested in general principles. They have felt their way toward business with Russia slowly, but with vastly more interest in practical results. The Chase National Bank and the Equitable Trust Company have discovered that it works to give the Russians short-term credit for their cotton purchases; the Standard Oil Company has learned that Russian oil is a good buy, Colonel Cooper that the Russians will pay for good dam-building. The General Electric Company and Henry Ford, observing the experience of these others and suspecting that Russia may be the greatest undeveloped market in the world, have offered longer credits and better business terms. Business flows where money is to be made. Its course can hardly be altered by politics, though it may be checked and retarded. The continued refusal of our Government to give diplomatic recognition to Russia deprives our citizens in Russia of consular protection, it makes long-term credit in the United States difficult, and interferes with the flow of gold. Undoubtedly it has delayed the development of American trade with Russia, but that is all. Utterly without effect upon Russia's internal policies, it is a sort of sermon in a vacuum.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

"THERE'S so much unhappiness in the world," says Aunt Clara (Uncle Joe's wife), "that I don't see why we should spend money to see shows and read books that remind us about it."

"The man worth while," she says, "is the man who can smile when everything goes dead wrong."

The novelists of our day don't cater to Clara very much. She found "All Quiet on the Western Front" extremely sordid. Still, practically all the plays in town are written just to please her. She lives in Pelham and knows very little about Freud or Jung. I tried to convince her once that practically all of what we know as the civilized world is inhibited. She interrupted to say that the last lecturer at the Woman's Study Club had advanced the same claim about Mars.

Maybe it would be just as well to leave Aunt Clara out of the discussion and go on to explain why the so-called gloomy modern novel is really more stimulating to the ego than the aggressively cheerful modern play. Most of us admit that a novel or a play or any form of art is an escape from reality. To be sure, a good many plays in the season just ended were hardly calculated to give anybody much of a start on the bloodhounds.

Consider the most humdrum person of your acquaintance, and you will probably be able to tag him as an inveterate patron of the movies, loud or silent. Lacking romance in real life he gets it by watching Greta Garbo in the moonlight and seeing Douglas Fairbanks jump over gates. Your friend will never be in the moonlight to any serious extent himself, and he would not think of vaulting fences. The screen has amply satisfied his romantic cravings.

The man in the theater, or the man who reads a book, identifies himself with one of the characters—hero or villain as the case may be. While the spell is on he lives the life of that fictional character. Next morning he can punch the time clock with no regrets. An interesting thesis might be written as to the exact relationship between the eyebrows of John Gilbert and the declining rate of marriage in the United States.

Assuming then that art—and for the sake of the argument motion pictures and mystery plays will be included under the heading—takes the place of life for a great many people, what do we find about the pernicious effect of happy novels and plays upon the community in general? Simply, that the man who is addicted to seeing plays and reading books in which everybody performs prodigies of valor and virtue is not ever going to the trouble of doing so much as one good deed a day upon his own account.

A season or so ago I went with a friend to see a play about a kindly man of middle age who adopted an orphan. My friend glowed with as complete a spirit of self-sacrifice as I have ever seen. This mood continued through three acts. He projected himself into the story and felt that he was actually patting ingenues on the head and adopting them and trimming Christmas trees. On the way up town he let me pay for the taxicab and also buy the newspapers. He was curt and short. All his kindly impulses had been drained off during the performance. He was fit company for no one throughout the entire week.

Being rather more regular in theatergoing than my friend, I failed to make any complete identification with anybody on the stage in this particular piece, but I was also somewhat depressed. The saintly old lady in the play had spoken of "the tinkling laughter of tiny tots" and this made me reflect on the imperfections of life. It did not seem to me at the time as if any of the children in the flat next door can be truly said to tinkle. I felt dissatisfied with things as they are.

One week later I watched "Hamlet" and the effect was precisely the opposite. After they carried the corpses of the dead and dying into the wings I went out into the warm evening walking upon my toes. This was much more like it. Everything in the play tended to make life seem more cheerful. In many respects the young Prince was ever so much worse off than I was. And he, too, mentioned his need of getting rid of excess flesh. After observing the rotten state of affairs in Denmark, my penthouse apartment in Fifty-eighth Street seemed entirely satisfactory.

I hope next year will provide us with an ample quantity of Ibsen, for he's an author even more inspiriting to the distressed than William Shakespeare. It is no accident that the Scandinavian drama is generally gloomy. Ibsen understood the psychology of his countrymen. He lived in a land of long, cold winters and poor steam heat. If he had written joyfully and light-heartedly, thousands, well say hundreds, of Norwegians would have gone home to die or at least to harbor such a wish. Instead he gave them folk like Oswald, and all the Norse playgoers went into the night skipping and laughing.

And for some reason which I can't explain, tragedy whets the appetite for food. "Ghosts" goes better with ham and eggs than any play I know. In fact at times when Oswald has dallied a bit in dissolution I've found my mind wandering away from the tragic situation into a speculation as to whether a preliminary order of pancakes would be too heavy at such a later hour. After seeing "Ghosts" there is no place like Dave's Blue Room with all the smoke and chatter.

I wish the Broadway dramatists of today were half as shrewd as Ibsen. Then we should have plays in which the heroine's mother failed to raise the mortgage and lost the old homestead in the very last scene. If she tottered out to starvation in a blinding snowstorm I might be minded to forget how perfectly abominable all my luck has been at poker in these last three months. I might even appreciate our janitor if only the old lady would wring her hands just before the final curtain and exclaim, "How bitter is the wind tonight!"

And if the wild young men and wilder women in these younger generation pieces would only cease reforming for the sake of a happy ending. Always they climb back to respectability out of degradation. It makes me weep to watch them, but when the thing is ended the sorrow has never been sufficient to come between me and the pancakes.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Uncle Sam's Electric Empire

By PAUL BLANSHARD

WHEN the prosperous citizen of Chile presses an electric-light button in his Santiago house the current that floods the bulbs comes from the Chile Electric Company which is owned by the South American Power Company which is owned by the American and Foreign Power Company which is owned by the Electric Bond and Share Company which is owned by certain persons in the United States who have surplus money. When he lifts the receiver from the telephone he is buying a privilege from the Chile Telephone Company, Limited, which is owned by the International Telephone and Telegraph Corporation of New York. When he rides to Valparaiso on the newly electrified Chilean State Railways he is using the electric equipment made by the Westinghouse Electric. And so on.

The story of Uncle Sam's expanding electric empire in Latin America is the latest, and in many ways the most dramatic, chapter of American economic conquest. The world war for oil, coal, and rubber still goes on; the war for the control and development of electric power is just beginning. As in so many other economic contests the chief figures in this struggle are the United States and Great Britain, with the United States forging steadily into the lead. One New York company already controls more than half of all the telephones of Latin America. Another controls through its subsidiaries one-third to one-half of all Latin-American power. With the power and the telephones go cables, telegraph lines, and radio communications.

The extent of our new electric empire was revealed in outline by the recent annual report of the American and Foreign Power Company, the investment subsidiary of the Electric Bond and Share Company which is the second-largest power concern in the United States. In the year 1928 the American and Foreign increased its investment accounts $177,000,000, taking control of companies in Argentina, Chile, Mexico, Cuba, Brazil, Colombia, and Costa Rica. Notable among its purchases were four great British and Canadian concerns, the Whitehall Electric Investments, Limited, which did a $15,000,000 business in Valparaiso (Chile) and in Vera Cruz, Tampico, Puebla, Cordoba, and Orizaba (Mexico); the Atlas Light and Power Company, Limited, which owned the power and traction facilities of four cities in Argentina; the Northern Mexico Power and Development Company, Limited, and the North State Power Company, Limited, both of which operated in Chihuahua. As if this conquest of what had been British economic territory were not enough the American and Foreign entered the sacred precincts of Shanghai where the diehard British majority on the Municipal Council finally sold the electric plants of the International Settlement to the American firm after it outbid all British competitors. On December 31, 1928, the American and Foreign Power Company controlled the electric light and power service of 627 communities in Latin America, and the expansion of the company's territory is continuing at a dizzy pace.

In addition to the American and Foreign, the other great pioneer of our new electric empire is the International Telephone and Telegraph Company which operates in its chosen field of electrical communication. Like its counterpart in the field of power development it has specialized in the last two years in buying up competing companies and consolidating them until today it controls half the telephones in Latin America and is assuming a commanding place in the control of cable and radio communication. It owns 200,000 telephones in Argentina alone. Since 1926 it has bought up two telephone systems in Uruguay, the Argentina monopoly, the chief Chilean concern, and the dominating company of southern Brazil. Only one other British concern in South America today can compare with it, the Brazilian Traction Company, which is owned in Canada and operates in central Brazil. The International since 1926 has also acquired All-America Cables and the Mackay-Postal Telegraph and Cable system, making it possible to compete on at least even terms with the new British communications combine throughout Latin America. Its assets are almost four hundred millions. Through its newly acquired radio rights in Colombia, Ecuador, and Peru and through its subsidiaries in Argentina and Chile it hopes to build up a South American network of radio communication that will touch every important point on the continent.

Superior showmanship and surplus wealth are the two chief factors in the building of this new empire. When the American and Foreign goes into a Latin-American town it tears down the old and usually dilapidated headquarters, erects a display plant on a display corner, and uses every artifice of big show-windows, conspicuous elegance, and real comfort in advertising new lighting methods, vacuum cleaners, electric irons, refrigerators, and fans. In one city in Brazil it gave away "electric waffles" in the public park to barefoot Indians. At a Chilean county fair it presented an elaborate display of everything electrical from cow-milkers to sawmills. In one small city, Guatemala, it has sold over 600 electric ranges. It is breaking down the sales resistance of the Latin Americans with increasing success. Exports of American electric equipment are now higher than they ever were, totaling over 110 millions last year, most of which went to the Western Hemisphere. These exports jumped more than eight millions last year while exports of British electric equipment have stood still for several years. Last March Brazil and Cuba, for example, each bought $31,000 worth of American electric refrigerators, and Argentina purchased $90,000 worth of our radio receiving sets. Already more than half of the electrical equipment of the world is made in the United States, chiefly by General Electric and Westinghouse, and this reckoning does not include the great equipment factories of the International Telephone and Telegraph Company in Europe. How rapidly we are displacing the British in the whole Latin-American field is revealed by the fact that our total Latin-American capital issues in 1928 were four times those of the British.

The Latin-American electric market is almost boundless. It is not surprising that prophets of our economic future are bullish when they contemplate it. The telephone which has been accepted as a necessity in the United States is still in most parts of Latin America a luxury. We have sixteen telephones for every 100 people, Latin America has sixty-five hundredths of one telephone. If American firms can bring Latin-American consumption to the level which they have achieved in Cuba, two telephones for each 100 people, they will be able to treble the present Latin-American schedule and bring the number of customers to more than two million. Today there are about 725,000 telephones in all Latin America while we have nearly twenty million. Brazil, which is larger than the United States, has fewer telephones than Milwaukee.

In the present state of the public mind the financing of our electric expansion in the South is as simple as taking up a collection. Every time one of the great power concerns which carries on its list of directors the names of an Owen Young, or a Charles Mitchell, wishes to invest in new companies it passes the hat. Lured by the magic reputation of power stocks the little and big investors rush to the counter and fill the company's coffers with all that is needed. The method is as follows:

The American company sees a British concern in possession of a South American territory. Usually the British concern is solid, conservative, and timid in its salesmanship. Believing in the great future profits to be reaped from electric expansion the Americans approach the British and suggest purchase. The British do not surrender easily; they demand a price 50 per cent higher than present earnings justify. The Americans promptly compromise on a 25 per cent overvaluation. They buy the British plant without expending a cent of their current funds by a new issue of common stock to their preferred stock-holders who are given the chance to buy at a price somewhat below the official market figure. It is a gamble in future values which the American investor is willing to take, and the present lords of the power industry are quite willing to have him take it because they are so situated in the inner circle of investment that they can realize the maximum on their own holdings with little risk. The American and Foreign Power Company has never paid a cent of dividends on its common stock but it has been able to raise millions for speculating in new developments by offering its common stock as a free bonus to the original purchasers of preferred, and by selling new issues of such common to its preferred stock-holders for $25 a share. That the gamble has been justified in the speculative sense is shown by the fact that the common stock given away as a bonus when the company was formed is now selling at $108 a share. This does not mean that the immediate dividends from our new electric empire are large. It simply means that investors think the electrification of Latin America is inevitable and that pioneer companies with a vigorous salesmanship can some day reap large profits from the control of a public necessity.

Power leads to politics, and the whole lesson of our economic expansion in Latin America is that investors from the United States use governments to insure and increase their profits. If the power interests can defy, purchase, and outmaneuver the leaders of government in the United States, how much more easily can they manipulate the governments of Latin America! These governments are weak and poor; it takes less money to buy their officials than is needed to purchase college professors and editors in the United States.

Take Cuba as an example. In Cuba the American power interests have not stopped with the purchase of a Senator or an editor here and there: the President himself has served them faithfully both in and out of office. Before becoming President of Cuba Gerardo Machado was a relatively poor man who had been made vice-president and purchasing agent of the Compañia Cubana de Electricidad, which is the Cuban subsidiary of American and Foreign Power. Taking office under the most suspicious circumstances, it is charged that he continued to act as vice-president of the power company until the Havana El Dia, edited by Armando André, fearlessly exposed his power connections. Then Major André, like so many of President Machado's enemies, was mysteriously assassinated. Meanwhile, since becoming President, Machado has put through the Cuban legislature an astounding law exempting the power companies from past and future taxation, a privilege which has not been extended to other Cuban industries. Since the power industry of Cuba is controlled almost entirely by the American and Foreign Power Company, this is a direct gift to President Machado's former employers. For good measure the Machado Government wiped off the Cuban tax books two millions in back taxes owed by the Havana Electric Railway, Light, and Power Company, a subsidiary of the Compañia Cubana de Electricidad. Machado's brother, Congressman Carlos Machado, even tried to persuade the Cuban Legislature to grant franchises to light and power companies in perpetuity but for some reason or other the legislators balked.

Now President Machado is reported to be a very rich man, and the American power interests are well content with him and his administration, which is scheduled to last until 1935, since Machado broke his pledge not to ask reelection. They dominate the whole Cuban field and charge what is said to be one of the highest rates in the world. In 1927 while the average electric rate for domestic and rural consumers in the United States was 6.8 cents per kilowatt hour the Cuban people were paying 17 cents. The Compañia Cubana de Electricidad, after being attacked for extortion by that small section of the Cuban press which dares to criticize, finally and magnanimously lowered its rate to 15 cents in view of the fact that it had been exempted from taxation. In Ontario under the public ownership of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission domestic light and power sells for an average of 2.08 cents. In Guatemala a subsidiary of the American and Foreign company sells power for 6 cents a kilowatt hour.

In nearly all the Latin-American countries the regulatory system is feeble and inadequate. It is easy to imagine some future Latin Senator Norris storming against the overvaluations and excessive rates of the privileged power interests who have the consumers at their mercy. His protests, we predict, will be futile, for by that time the forty-six leading dailies, seventy-four weeklies, and nineteen, more or less, monthlies which control Latin-American public opinion will probably be owned by a pretty corporation with some such a name as the South American People's Press, Incorporated, which will be owned by the South American Paper and Power Company, which will be owned by the International Power Syndicate of New York, which will be owned by certain persons in the United States who are fortunate enough to have surplus money.

Flying from Ocean to Ocean

By M. DE M. PORTER

How can I but as here chanting, invite you for yourself to collect bouquets of the incomparable feuillage of these States?

—WALT WHITMAN
"Leaves of Grass," Our Old Feuillage

YOU are great, Walt Whitman, for this one reason among many others: you saw with the eyes of your spirit what I saw with the eyes of my body: the magnitude of these States, their united diversity, the uniqueness of each one, which makes them all submit joyously to a superficial uniformity.

In one day and one night and yet another half of a day, I came from the Pacific to the Atlantic. I saw both oceans and what lay between: California, Nevada, Utah, Wyoming, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York.

I saw these as they are, freed from the distortion of space and time, freed from the limitation of my paces, and the limitation given by the height at which my eyes can see when I stand; freed from the prison of the motionless horizon of those who become the center of any landscape or seascape they contemplate.

I saw your States, my States, in relation to each other only, with the boundaries that they really have and the essential distinctions which they had before men gave them the distinctions of their names. I saw them as they are now, but also as they were in the distant past, when they were shaping and building themselves.

I saw America in one sweep, I held the width of it in one glance, I spanned it with my outstretched arms.

California. The earth is still sleeping in the blankets of mist, still warm of yesterday's sun, but the sky is awake, newly washed by the dawn.

The aeroplane is all silver, like the surrounding sky, and her slender frame vibrates in the wind.

We have already lost sight of Los Angeles, and, one by one, as we would the beads of a rosary, we drop town after town. I look down on the houses and the gardens and the roads; on the orange groves—curly-headed, prim trees on parade. I can see the fields, also. (O little men, little men, do gather your hay in neat little piles! It is of very great importance indeed.)

We are so high now that we seem to be motionless, having caged space between our four wings.

We are crossing the mountains, crouched like big mangy animals; the grass and the trees are rare on their patient backs. I notice that fir trees alone resist the distortion of perspective; they keep their familiar shape, and I do not doubt their identity; but those bushes there, perhaps, are mighty oaks.

The desert—a symphony of tans—shapes and color-values, no meaning, no reason, or explanation; nature for nature's sake, and not for use by man.

And suddenly, amid the impersonal brown of the plain, a wide stretch of green—water; vegetation welcoming the sun, with all the certitude of its moistened roots. Water—the age-long symbol of motion and life and change. Water, which peoples the sky as well as the earth, for the sky would be empty but for clouds or rain or fog or mist.

Will man some day, with dams and pipes, and the machines brought forth from his brain, fill this waste with towns and gardens and fields? O citizen of these States, with plenty of elbow-room today within your boundaries, will your children tomorrow, in need of more land, be able to put the desert to work, to make it feed and clothe them? Already the twin arrow of the railroad track has laid the seal of man on this solitude.

Las Vegas, Nevada; a railroad town. Need I say more? Need I describe it? Need I speak of the men and women who have dug wells and planted trees and built streets and settled here? They play golf at the edge of the desert, and laughingly say that they bury their dead in overcoats to prevent them from freezing in hell.

You may not care for geology; the formation of the earth may be of remote interest to you; you may have no curiosity concerning the continent where you were born, but how could you remain indifferent if you had seen, as I did, the bottoms of seas that had been; stretches of sand still holding up some forgotten island, dejectedly waiting for the tide that will never come back to restore its aloofness.

I have seen mountains—the symbol of strength and solidity—which could not conceal the decadent shapes of their liquid past, nor the heavy folds of their syrupy origin.

I can better love these States now that I know their weaknesses as well as their glory, and they cannot bluff me with their brand new make-up of trees and cities and skin-deep sod.

You must be very proud of your name, Utah. You have painted a gigantic white U on the side of the mountain, thus protecting yourself from anonymity. But do you know that that initial of yours looks like one of the flour letters the child finds in his soup and forgets on the side of the plate? And Salt Lake City, your capital, laid out in equal squares, nestles at the bottom of the drained plate. Poplar-bordered roads lead to it, framing green fields.

I turn my back to the setting sun. The lemon sky behind the mauve hills is reflected by thousands of odd-shaped lagoons. I am going toward the snow-powdered range, flying into another sky, heavy with clouds and evening.

The ship gathers all of her possibilities of strength and speed. She rears and roars, impatient to conquer the range. She cannot falter nor rest; she must reach at once the safety of altitude, where she will be beyond the reach of the air-currents lying in wait for her in the valleys.

I can see peak after peak, solitary and silent. I can see the shadows where men live, following the curves of the river. Yet I do not share either the solitude of the peaks, or the companionship of the valleys. I listen to the song of the motor. If it were to stop, my falling body would have no other use than to be the improvised yardstick by which to measure the distance which separates me from death.

The plain now. A flock of sheep, oval and white, like a handful of spilled rice. Then a farm washed by rains and bleached by the sun, with a fence around it, containing all the life thereof.

How vast and rolling you are, Wyoming! How unconcerned about man, and yet gentle in your indifference. You welcome the houses and the roads, for you make them your own; they lose the aggressiveness of their individual shapes and colors, they have to fit themselves to you.

I am not on the earth looking up to the sky. I am between them both, and, with my eye, I blend them, a little of each, until the picture is complete. I do not doubt now that each sky is made to fit the land it caps; flat skies for the plain, tumbling skies of rounded clouds for the mountain country.

The great meadows have stopped. A fortress of greenish-gray stone stands watching, defending the waste land. Defending it from that petrified dragon with thousands of feet clawing the ground.

Because you have no trees and no grass, you made, O little town, all your roofs bright green and you look like a lawn amid the rocks!

It rains. If I were on earth I should only know the rain; but now I can ignore it and turn my face toward the north, where I can see, through an opening in the clouds all bathed in golden dust, the snowy range of the Canadian Rockies. For me there are five different landscapes with five different weathers. Over there it is going to rain tomorrow (the sunset is too red and the mountains too blue against the sky); on that side, the evening promises a peaceful dawn; while there, night is sulkily creeping alone, ignoring the storm in the south.

Look! at the straight edge of the plain, which I believed to be endless, a mass of unspotted white. Have the billowy clouds settled on the horizon? It is the sunshine on the face of some hills which I will reach presently.

A cement road without a curve. Why should it bend? There are neither towns to avoid or approach, nor rivers to jump over, nor hills to enfold. Are there even people to travel on it? And where does it lead?

You are sleepy now, Wyoming, and you think the whole world is sleepy also, because you cannot see, as I do, the West still parading your hand-me-down sunset?

The hum of the ship fills the night, which the clouds prevent from being all moonlit; but the wily rivulets catch whatever moonlight there is and make patterns in the emptiness below.

Another day, which should not have come yet, were it not for the silver bird on which I ride.

As far as I can see, the prairie with short grass and unconvincing bushes. The horizon is but a line, as at sea. Not a tree cracks the sky. Are there countries where men suffer from overcrowding, while this infinity exists exclusively for the benefit of the sky, offering its distances as a gift to the sky, which does not need them?

Yellow flowers, white ponies. I walk in the wet grass. We had to come down, lest we be ground between the green disk of the prairie and the gray disk of the descending fog—the only master, the impalpable fear of the air. It dissolves direction, it swallows light, it fills every crevice of sky and earth with its blind dread. We will wait, we are waiting. Yesterday at last is catching up with us.

Not quite. We are back again where there are no shadows except our own, where our eyes can choose their images, avoiding the compulsion of the immediate.

Nebraska, you are still spacious, yet you have softened and mellowed. You are the fertile plain with many houses hidden between trees, and many brooks, and a variety of little round knolls. You have submitted yourself to furrowing and planting. Your geometrical patterns are confined within two colors, but unlimited are the shades of greens and browns repeating themselves into infinity. The acid new green and the deep softness of the full-grown leaf or blade. How dark the upturned sod is in places, and in others it is that indefinite pink tan which reminds me of the neck of the turtle dove.

It is Sunday; thus there are no tillers to disturb my illusions with the reality of human toil.

A graveyard encircles a church. White tombs. Four people stand among the dead—a shiny new car has brought them. They lift their heads as we fly by.

We frighten the chickens and all the birds. The pigs roll like balls into their pens; cows are merely curious, if not busy chewing, and slowly follow us with their upturned blank faces. A little wood. How many picnics and trystings has it known? The soil in Iowa is chrome colored. It has lost the deep purple quality it had in Nebraska.

I salute you, Mississippi, Father of Waters, lying flat, peaceful, and yellow between your wooded banks. I recognize you, Illinois, because of your roads which lure motor cars with their smooth expanse. And I remark that farmers do not play golf.

Of Chicago I can say nothing. It is so shrouded in its veil of smoke that I cannot escape the irony of comparing it to an Eastern woman. You keep your beauty for your own men, O Lady of the Lake!

Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey. I must call out your names all in one, as you have given yourself so completely to man that you have lost your uniqueness. Or is it because you have sacrificed yourselves to shield your fellow-States from conquest? Patiently you remain imprisoned in the net of railroads and highways. You are manacled by cities, weighed down by factories and tall buildings.

I watch with detachment the shifting scenes of human endeavor. If only I could retain my present perspective!

The sky is to my right, the earth to my left; yet I have only an optical knowledge of my position; I could still believe myself perpendicular to the ground. I will never again contest the relativity of all things. I know better. You will not catch me championing the absolute any longer.

Look at me, Manhattan! I am rich with the gold of California, the deserts of Nevada and Utah, the spaciousness of Wyoming, the fertility of Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, the factories of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York. I am bringing you a continent.

You can be proud, indeed, O City of Cities, to be the daughter of these States, their favorite child, the fulfilment of their gigantic dreams.

Via Air Mail route, May, 1929

Captain Coll—Legionnaire

By C. E. PAYNE

Seattle, Washington, June 10

TALL, slim, very straight in figure, born in western Connecticut of Irish-born parents, trained and by nature inclined to an abiding faith in the power of inherent integrity and honest Americanism, student at Louvain University until his studies were interrupted by German shells, captain in the United States army and with his command in France twenty-one months during the Great War, once service officer and still a member of an American Legion Post in Washington, insurance solicitor with no employment because of his past eight months' course of action, a hearty handclasp, a pleasant smile—such is a brief description of Edward Patrick Coll, American Legionnaire and blood cousin of Eamon De Valera.

What has he done that he is out of employment? He has acted as a conscience for the American Legion, the same legion that was used as a catspaw by certain powerful interests to cause the death of five men in Centralia, Washington, on Armistice Day, 1919, and that later helped force the unjust conviction and incarceration of eight others as a result of that tragedy. Let him state his own case:

"My work as an insurance man in Hoquiam and Aberdeen has taken me into practically every business place in these communities. I have mingled with the workers in the mills. I have conversed with people of every walk of life in their homes. Seeing that I was a member of the legion, many people to my surprise expressed themselves as dissatisfied with the legion, owing to the part that the organization played in the Centralia trouble.

"Moved by these sincere statements and being at that time unfamiliar with the facts in the case, I began a careful study of the entire Centralia tragedy."

He began the study to prove the legion men were not in the wrong, that people who criticized them were misinformed. He wished to clear the legion's name.

"When I arrived in the State of Washington in March, 1928, my only knowledge of the Centralia trouble was the memory of former press reports stating that members of the I. W. W. had formed a plot and without the least provocation had brutally fired upon an Armistice Day parade of ex-service men and four veterans had been killed."

Captain Coll once asked for a frank discussion of the Centralia case in the Legion Post and it had been promised. Then a prominent member told him no such discussion could take place, because it contained "enough dynamite to wreck the post." Also, that the whole case would be passed over in silence by the coming State convention of the legion. "Imagine my surprise a few days later when the newspapers told us that the convention had passed a resolution opposing the pardoning of the Walla Walla prisoners!

"I was curious to discover who was responsible for the resolution that opposed the liberating of the prisoners at Walla Walla. I was frankly told that it was 'Chet' Cunningham of Centralia. This same C. D. Cunningham was counsel for the prosecution along with W. H. Abel, who has since the trial petitioned the Governor to release the prisoners.

"The vital question in the Centralia tragedy has always been: 'Who began the attack?' Well, the Parole Board today has the sworn affidavits of about thirty Centralia citizens stating that members of the Centralia division in the Armistice Day parade broke ranks and began the attack. Three affiants, former friends of Warren O. Grimm who was one of those killed, even admit that they saw him breaking in the door of the I. W. W. hall before a shot was fired.

"Then there are the sworn statements of seven of the jurors repudiating their verdict in the light of present-day facts. Many members of the American Legion have told me the attack was begun by the Centralia ex-service men. Some of the Legionnaires even mentioned the names of men who had helped lynch Wesley Everest."

Captain Coll once stated: "I charge C. D. Cunningham with being guilty of murder. And I hope he libels me for it." But the glint in his eyes promised no easy time for one trying it.

"Now just why did those legionnaires in Centralia kill Wesley Everest and send Eugene Barnett to the penitentiary on a framed-up charge of murder? I will tell you! Wesley Everest fired at the legionnaires in self-defense and in defense of his constitutional rights as an American citizen. Had he not been murdered he could, and doubtless would, have claimed responsibility for killing all four legionnaires and thus have exonerated all the others whom the men back of the legionnaires wanted out of the way.

"And why did they frame Barnett? Because he had been in the front room of the Roderick Hotel alongside the I. W. W. hall when the raid took place and had seen it all from the very start. He had been talking with the couple who owned the hotel and could have proved every statement he would have made. The prosecution knew that he could prove there had been a raid by the legionnaires. So they made him a defendant to keep him from being a witness, and to do that they placed him across the street in the upper window of the Avalon Hotel with a blazing rifle in his hands.

"I have been charged with being a 'Red.' But I am not. I am not working for the release of the eight men now in Walla Walla penitentiary because they are I. W. W. What I am trying to do is to clear the good name of the American Legion, and this can be done only by a partial measure of belated justice in having those eight innocent men released. Already the legion has suffered through the star-chamber activities of some of its members who are unable to see the handwriting on the wall.

"As in the famous Dreyfus case in France, so in this State of Washington a great wrong has been done and the innocent party has suffered. Yet the day is coming when the prison doors will open to liberate the innocent Walla Walla prisoners, for a day of justice will yet dawn when the memorial statue on the pedestal in that city park of Centralia will assume the appearance of the battered and mutilated Wesley Everest, and beneath that statue will be inscribed the terrible indictment: 'Mobbed and lynched for upholding his constitutional rights.'"

Captain Coll did at one time pin Cunningham down to a discussion of the Centralia case in his Legion Post. When the latter had been driven from one position to another until he could no longer claim justification for his actions, he exclaimed: "Even if we admit that those within the hall had a right to shoot, that does not give those over on the hill any justification for shooting."

To this Coll replied: "Listen, Cunningham. In my neighbor's yard, not far from my home in Aberdeen, there is a big tree that commands a view of both entrances to that home. If I hear that you are coming with a mob to raid my home, I will get behind that tree with every gun I can lay my hands on, and when you do come I will shoot every damn one of you."

So Captain Coll is no longer employed to solicit insurance and has moved from Aberdeen with his family. A few workers are contributing funds for a meager living for the family so that Coll himself can go about the State of Washington trying to free the innocent Centralia men and remove the stigma from the American Legion which declares its purpose to be

"To uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to inculcate a sense of individual obligation to the community, State, and nation; to combat the autocracy of both the classes and the masses; to make right the master of might; to promote peace and good-will on earth; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of Justice, Freedom, and Democracy."

White Mice

By FRANCIS McALLISTER

IT was at Paszkowski's in Firenze. Paszkowski's is a cafe which faces upon Piazza Vittorio Emanuele. It consists of one long room with a raised stage for an orchestra and many tables, and another room with more tables where unescorted "ladies" may take their ease. Together, these rooms form the letter L. One goes to Paszkowski's to drink beer and listen to the music. The music is indifferent. The beer is not as good as Pilsener—it is not even as good as Alsatian brew. It is too sweet, and also very strong. I had happened to stray to this cafe because I did not know any better. I was new to Italy, having landed at Genoa the week before.

On the night in question the place was packed. It seemed to me that at least half the population of Firenze was present. I could not imagine how they had all got in. The plate-glass windows made the place appear like an aquarium, an aquarium so replete with fish that the occasional flick of a tail was the only motion possible.

After circumnavigating the room several times, I found a table. It was a table of six seats, located in an obscure corner. Only one seat was occupied. An elderly man sat there, a man with humorous dark eyes and an iron-gray beard. He wore baggy, black clothes, and his tie might have been arranged by a sail-maker. But I liked his appearance. When I seated myself, he smiled pleasantly and bowed. I said, "Good evening," and he answered, "Good evening, signore." He made no comment while I was ordering my beer.

The orchestra began to play excerpts from "Aïda," mangling the music brutally. I shuddered, and the elderly man gave vent to a chuckle. "It is frightful, isn't it?" he said.

I replied that it was not only frightful but actually criminal, whereupon he roared with mirth. I decided that I liked him immensely.

"You are no Italian," he said presently. "One may gather that from your accent. Oh, American? So—what a pity that I speak no English But perhaps you would be at home with French?"

I changed to that tongue gladly. Matters became much more simple. My companion plied me with questions about New York and the United States in general, and, after a time, said, "Now tell me what you think of us," emphasizing his inquiry with an all-embracing wave of the hand.

I replied guardedly. I had been warned that free speech was a vice south of the Alps. This man, for all I knew, might be an ingratiating agent provocateur. But he would have no ambiguity. "I can see that you dislike us," he said. "You do not enjoy Italy as a spectacle of efficiency. So—I will tell you a little riddle. I myself escape it by keeping several white mice in my home. I keep them in a wicker cage."

I was puzzled and somewhat startled. I began to wonder if I had an amiable maniac for a drinking-mate. Before I could formulate an adequate reply, two men approached our table. One of these muttered "—permesso," and both took chairs.

The first was tall and lean and wore the uniform of the Air Force. The second, small, nervous, and plump, had a rimless monocle fixed in his right eye, and in his lapel sported an enameled emblem of red, white, and green with gilt fasces and the letters "P. N. F." (Partita Nazionale Fascista) imposed upon it. As they came up my new friend said, "Sh!" Then he began to talk once more of America.

The aviator regarded us with disfavor. "Well," he remarked to his companion, "it seems that they talk French."

The other said: "A hideous language. It lacks grace."

Under the table I felt myself kicked by the elderly man. Perhaps he had seen the anger in my eye. I said "Uh" instinctively. He had kicked me rather hard.

The monocled one said: "Also, it would seem that one of them grunts—much in the manner of a prize pig."

Very politely, the elderly man requested a match of the aviator, speaking in Italian. And as the other handed him a patent lighter he added: "If our French happens to annoy you, signore, there are other tables. I myself am Sicilian, but the signorino is from America and our language is not easy for him."

The monocled one said hastily, "Not at all—not at all." His companion added, "Excuse us, signore. We now understand. We thought you both from France, and the French are hardly popular."

"They either do not comprehend the strength of Fascismo or are jealous of it," said the monocled one.

Endeavoring to be tactful, I remarked in my best Italian: "It is always difficult, the question of understanding between nations."

The aviator said: "It means nothing if we are understood or not. Nothing! If necessary, we can impose our will. . . . Italy today is not the Italy of 1913 or even of 1918. Even you, a foreigner, can see that. Under Fascismo, Italy is a giant awakened from refreshing sleep."

I said: "How very interesting! But don't expect me to realize this all at once. I've been in the country but a week."

"Ah," said the monocled one, "then you have had only a glimpse. You shall see, signore! Our army becomes the most formidable in Europe. Our ships are on all seas. Everyone works—for the sake of the state rather than for gain. Even Rome is to be rebuilt and its ancient splendor restored."

"Yes," said the aviator, "Mussolini is a surgeon and Fascismo the knife which cuts away decadence." He made a slashing gesture in the air with his forefinger to illustrate the point.

At this moment two more men approached and saluted those already present in the Roman fashion. The twin prophets of rejuvenated Italy responded in kind. There were explanations of my nationality, and it appeared that I was to be converted to ways of righteousness on the spot. I was told of the marvels of standardization. This, they said, I should comprehend and value since I was an American. I was also told how the railways were being electrified, how the lira was on the ascendent, how poverty was to be entirely abolished, how a tax was to be put upon bachelors, and how, under Mussolini, the Fascist Government had assumed a preeminent place in world affairs. "What we need, must have, and will have," said the aviator, "is more territory. We are overpopulated and will find an outlet, no matter at what cost. For this we will fight to the death!" His conviction charmed me.

Meanwhile, the elderly man watched silently. I thought there was a smile lurking somewhere behind his eyes. Suddenly the smile took shape and emerged in the form of a remark. "There is only one thing that Fascismo has not done —it has failed to produce a single artist!"

The assembled disciples were ruffled. Objections arose like a small gale. Was not Il Duce himself a true artist, they asked? Did not his love of music and his concepts in architecture show this? And in any case literature and art would soon be subsidized by the state. I gathered that men like Pirandello and Carducci were to be produced en masse by the government at need.

"Yes," said the elderly man, "but subsidized genius becomes sycophantic posing."

He arose to go in the middle of a shower of dark glances. Courteously, he offered to guide me to my hotel. I accepted with pleasure; I was finding the new Italy a trifle overwhelming. As the elderly man was putting on his coat, the monocled one took occasion to whisper to me, with an air of great importance: "Beware of that one, signore! You do not understand these things as I do. He is a most sinister character."

In silence we walked to Via Tornabuoni. Hard by the bulk of the Palazzo Strozzi, the elderly man paused. "No doubt," he said, "you are still wondering just why I keep white mice in a wicker cage. It is a little joke, that, for the mice could gnaw their way out in a trice had they the wit to see it. Thus, playing a game, I say to myself that I am Il Duce, and that the mice are the Italian people. Sometimes I poke them with a match and watch them scurry. Yet, as I say, they could gnaw their way out in a trice. Now do you see?"

I saw a great deal. Mice struck me as unique symbols—unique as a method of expressing an opinion without committing oneself. The elderly man pointed down the street. "On that farther corner," he said, "my brother-in-law was beaten to death by the Fascisti. Doubtless it was a step necessary in the rebuilding of Italy. My sister died of shock a day later. So I—I play with white mice, like any patient old fellow."

In the Driftway

A CORRESPONDENT who signs himself "the Shifter," and gives his address "at present" as Los Angeles, California, sends along a letter in which he says:

> I often wish that out of all the thick smoke of discussion of the cigarette advertisements someone would emerge long enough to see that the tobacco companies have taken the wickedness out of cigarettes and put morality into them, have evolved a persuasion that the ladies may "reach" or "walk a mile" without stooping too much, have probably reduced to ashes the hopes of the Anti-Cigarette League for another prohibition amendment in the Constitution, and have (for this relief much thanks) saved us from a bitter taste of bootleg cigarettes.
>
> And I have thought that you are the one to emerge and see and tell of these benefits which the tobacco companies have given us by exaggerating goodness no more than the anti-cigaretters exaggerate badness. In what no doubt you have often been told is "your own inimitable way," you might elaborate on the possibilities of bootleg smokes by going back into our youths to the days when we suffered the monoxide of buggy-whip, dry corn-silk, coffee, sage-leaf, Q-beb berries, and other such substitutes.

* * * * *

HARDLY any one will dispute that the cigarette is now not only respectable but fashionable—something of a contradiction in an age in which, generally speaking, respectability is not fashionable. But the advertising of the cigarette manufacturers, although an important recent influence, should not get all the credit (or blame) for the evolution. What may be called the respectabilization of the cigarette has been going on for a quarter of a century, and the one greatest boost was given by the Young Men's Christian Association during America's participation in the World War. Before the cigarette was made respectable among women it had first to be made respectable among men. When the Drifter was a boy in the Middle West no man smoked cigarettes. Men smoked cigars or pipes; cigarettes were used only by dudes and other scum from the "effete East." Little by little cigarettes climbed the social ladder, but to many persons they were still "coffin nails" (believed to be more noxious to health than cigars or pipes) until 1917. Up to that time, too, smoking of any sort was forbidden in the sacred precincts of Y. M. C. A. buildings all over the country. But under the great moral uplift of universal bloodshed the Y. M. C. A. had a change of heart; it sold, and gave away thousands of packages of "coffin nails" in regions where there was no time for coffins.

* * * * *

AS a boy the best surreptitious smokes which the Drifter enjoyed (or did he?) were from puffing the dried pods of the catalpa tree. These pods, when dry and brown, had much the appearance of a Pittsburgh stogie, and probably tasted about as good. The Drifter used to make his pipes from acorns. They were beautiful though small. Corn-silk never seemed to be much good as fuel. It all went up in a puff and a dark-brown taste. The Drifter tried tea and various combinations of grasses and leaves from trees. Generally it was more fun to gather and blend than to smoke them (an admission which the Drifter may guardedly make at this date but could not have been wrung from him at the time). Cotton was perhaps the best substitute for tobacco which he ever tried. Tobacco itself was unthinkable; its use by a boy would have sent him to hell without benefit of clergy or purgatory.

* * * * *

NO, now that the women have adopted cigarettes there is no danger of a Twentieth Amendment (against smoking). One wonders if the women had adopted the cocktail before instead of after prohibition if there would have been an Eighteenth Amendment or a Volstead law.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Stet!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Two justices: One for the skirt, one for the pants. Excuse me, my dear reader, for the phrase, but only with these words can I express the spirit of the following facts:

In Staten Island a young man killed not long ago a girl because she made improper advances to him. The young man is behind the bars for many long, long years. What had happen if the girl had killed the young man for the same reasons? All the hysterical women societies had jumped to their feet to protect the honor of the sex! Has a young man no sex honor?

In Long Island a man was sent to jail because he committed bigamy in which his own legal wife assisted him and the wife No. 2 knew very well that she is acting against the law. In this case only the man was convicted. Now it happened that a woman committed bigamy in New Jersey and the man and an other woman knew about it; the circumstances were the same as in Long Island with the reverse actors—but in New Jersey again the man was he who was sent to the prison and not the woman who took without legalities her second husband!

A woman in the Bronx is in conspiracy with a few man to accomplish a robbery; part of the man are already in the jail, the other half on a second trial—and the lady? She is the star witness and will go free in a robbery in which she had the leading part! In another robbery the young man gets fifteen years, the lady with the gun in the hand is sent to the reformatory or such thing for six months; in still another case the he-robber got two and one-half years, the she-robber one hundert—dollars nine!

Five drunken people were brought in to the courthouse; the four drunken ladies got suspended sentences, the drunken bum-man got fifteen days jail. This plain facts I collected within a short time here in New York from the newspapers. But I dare not to waggle with my head, it might be interpreted as contempt of the court and I'm not willing to go "up the river" in the high university for criminals on account of that judges who help to disrespect the laws.

New York, June 20 L. LAKATOS

Sagacity

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The difficulty that the Germans have had in placing their bond issue even after extending the time, finding it so insufficiently subscribed, suggests that the Germans have an underlying feeling that their grandchildren will not be inclined to pay debts they did not contract, and, which they conclude, were of no benefit to them. In many editorials like yours I find questions asked as to whether the United States will exact the full payment or any payment for the last twenty or thirty of the fifty-seven years. Is it not probable that the Germans were willing to concede almost anything provided that the payment did not come too soon, well knowing that public opinion would neither require nor sanction the payment of these debts after a few years?

New York, June 19 BOLTON HALL

Strike Relief

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief wishes to thank readers of The Nation for contributions toward strike relief. Since May 1 the committee has transmitted more than $6,000 for necessary relief to striking textile workers in the South and striking shoe workers in Massachusetts. Specifically, $4,550 has been sent to the rayon strikers in Elizabethton, Tennessee; $1,000 to the textile strikers near Greenville, South Carolina; $500 to the United Shoe Workers in Boston, Massachusetts, and $50 to the textile strikers in Gastonia, North Carolina, through the Workers' International Relief. This relief has been of inestimable importance, but is not sufficient. Approximately 5,000 operatives in and near Greenville, South Carolina, are now striking in protest against the stretch-out system, and new strikes are occurring weekly. The "settlement" at Elizabethton, Tennessee, is at best a truce; the basic causes of unrest—miserably low wages, long weary hours, and industrial feudalism—still remain. The committee earnestly bespeaks continuing support of these strikers.

New York, June 20 NORMAN THOMAS

Women Cabinet Members

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In an editorial in the last issue of The Nation, headed The Labor Cabinet, you speak of Ramsay MacDonald as "the first to break the all-male tradition of cabinet appointments." Do you recall the fact that Denmark appointed as Minister of Education Madam Nina Bang who died within a year or two? It was she who had a law passed forbidding audiences to rise during the national anthem as "not for the good of the common people."

West Philadelphia, June 16 KATHARINE ARTHUR

Why Farmers Are Discontented

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I'm on a side hill overlooking a valley lovely to view, and fertile. Not a home in it but can be bought at about half what it would have brought during the past ten years. Perhaps you hold me to be an extremist. I am. If a farmer plants four rows of potatoes he must give the product of three of them to the railroad to haul the crop to market. New russets, our pride crop, just in and bringing 65 cents a hundred pounds, 39 cents a bushel. If he plants apples he must give for freight the product of two out of three rows. We get around 60 cents a box—the Idaho Delicious sells for 10 cents each on the stalls. I can see a blurred line below me, on the side of a small hill: apple trees the farmer rooted out this spring, young, healthy trees. Thousands of acres of prunes in which last year—and four years ago—the fruit was not even picked. A million tons of hay rotted in the stack in Idaho three years ago. Freight on hay is ten dollars a ton to points of market (stockyards and packing centers). Average price at these points is fifteen dollars, and as these cities are closer to hay fields of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas the Western farmer can't compete, for they cut the price when the Westerner ships and he gets a net amount less than cost—under five dollars, and it costs to harvest the bale and haul to the depot about seven dollars per ton.

There are wires strung along the highways carrying light and power. The rancher pays nine cents per kilowatt hour for lighting, four for heating. The power company buys this power from the government—our government—for three-quarters of a cent and carries it sixteen miles only. The Idaho Power and Electric is bonded and has issued stock to the degree that there is $439 per horse-power against it. We know that the city of Tacoma built and maintains a plant which furnishes electricity for half a cent, and there have been issued against it stocks and bonds to the extent of only $38 per horse-power. And Tacoma will pay its obligations in seven years while this lasts forever.

The Weyerhauser company near here is the largest lumber company in the world and holds most of the privately owned timber of the State. Yet the rancher here pays more for lumber than the people in Los Angeles, or Kansas City, pay for the identically same lumber, shipped from this point. The excuse? "O, we have competition at those points," the local head told me. Legislate? We have tried and failed. Write it up, broadcast it? We get—indifference. But even Mr. Borah sensed that the Idaho farmer is aroused as never before, laid aside legalistic tenets, turned his back on Mr. Hoover, and advocated the debenture. Gooding, Senator deceased, did battle for the ranchers and "common folk" here, fought for reduction in freight rates, and would have put it over had he lived. Borah is too much absorbed in advocating Russian recognition, or battling the World Court, or sticking a stiletto in British ribs, or lecturing France about debts, to give time to the most vicious monopolies in America right here in his own bailiwick.

Boise, Idaho, June 10 Fred Fletcher

The Nation radio hour will continue through the summer months on Station WMCA of New York every Monday at 8 p. m. Nation readers may hear lively discussions of current topics by the editors by turning their radio dials to 526.

See pages 52, iii and iv

Contributors to This Issue

Paul Blanshard is associate editor of The Nation.

M. de M. Porter flew across the continent with the air mail.

C. E. Payne is a resident of Seattle.

Francis McAllister is a resident of Boston.

Mark Van Doren is author of "Now the Sky and Other Poems," and editor of "An Anthology of World Poetry."

Joseph Wood Krutch is dramatic editor of The Nation.

Henry Ladd is a member of the department of English at Columbia University.

Norman Thomas is the Socialist Party's candidate for mayor of New York City.

E. M. Benson, a contributor of the Outlook, is a free-lance writer.

Talbot Faulkner Hamlin is a New York architect, and the author of "The American Spirit in Architecture."

Thomas Hornsby Ferril was the winner of The Nation's poetry contest in 1927.

William MacDonald is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

Carleton Beals, who contributed a series of articles—With Sandino in Nicaragua—to The Nation, has just left Spain.

A HOME

can stand on its own feet

You still have to help it with some cash and work, but not nearly so much as you give now.

Read the series of articles by Ralph Borsodi, expert economist, in which he describes his experiment in getting more comfort for less money.

ONE WAY OUT

The story of a man who fights the factory by domesticating the machine.

The New REPUBLIC

421 West 21st Street, New York City

☐ $1 enclosed. Send New Republic till October, including Borsodi series.

☐ Send New Republic for a year at $5.75 with Stuart Chase's new book, "Men and Machines."

Name _____

Address _____

N 7-10

armament. Next he recounts with all the authority of his experience as chief of the Disarmament Section of the League of Nations Secretariat the history of efforts after disarmament since the Peace of Versailles. Finally he advances his "prospective" of the problem, ending with the outline of a program.

Such legitimate criticism as might be made of Señor Madariaga's main thesis would have to do, I think, with his somewhat insufficient stressing of economic factors in the world as it is and in his proposed world community. He does not deal with imperialism with quite his wonted explicitness. Yet he is aware of economic difficulties and imperial rivalries and doubtless had them in mind in the fourth division of his conclusions—conclusions which, by the way, are worth stating:

> 1. Disarmament is a world problem. It can only be solved by the world as the world organized in a community.
>
> 2. This world community must possess a court with compulsory jurisdiction on all judicial questions.
>
> 3. The world community must possess a political organization with powers:
>
> (a) to seek the solution of disputes of a non-judicial character by all possible means,
>
> (b) to deal with threat of war and war,
>
> (c) if necessary to lead the world in any action, moral or even physical, against law-breaking nations.
>
> 4. The world community must possess a technical organization which will gradually bring under the world control the study and solution of a growing number of problems which are taking on a world-wide scope.

Lest this program by itself should seem to imply that its thor despairs of any immediate progress in disarmament, I sten to add that he expressly argues that efforts toward disrmament may play a great part both in measuring and prooting progress along the way to enduring peace. He goes so r as to suggest that the United States and Great Britain intly propose complete naval disarmament, including demilirization of narrow waterways—a suggestion I myself have ade before various audiences without ever evoking any valid gument against it.

Turning from Señor Madariaga's principal argument to his chant criticism of men and things, I should be inclined to issue with him on two or three points: (1) From his ng pro-League point of view he is, not illogically, critical e Kellogg-Briand pact and does not sufficiently consider its sible psychological or pedagogical advantages in preparing way for more direct advances in disarmament. (2) There nd still is a somewhat better case, psychological and prac- against the sanctions of the famous Protocol, rejected by All Quain and looked at askance in America, than Señor Madaga, again from his beautifully logical position, has allowed. 3) There certainly was a better case for the United States to remain out of the League in 1919 than Señor Madariaga here admits. And it was not a case made only by nationalists. I believe that the time is at hand when on conditions comparatively easy of attainment the United States should join the League. But had the United States joined in 1919, given the temperament of the times and the nature of the Treaty of Versailles, the moral and financial weight of our country would inevitably have underwritten not internationalism but the imperial aspect of the League as a victors' alliance. The growth f the League as an agency of internationalism was made possible—as Señor Madariaga has elsewhere admitted—by the comparative neglect of the League by the imperialist rulers of the Great Powers following America's failure to join.

By comparison with Señor Madariaga's splendid analysis and record of events, Lord Robert Cecil's book is unimportant though high-minded. It is a collection of essays and addresses. As such it is repetitive of certain ideas and phrases and not well rounded in its presentation of the whole subject. The book shows how one can be a conservative and a lover of peace. Whether one can help achieve as well as love peace and still keep Cecil's point of view is less certain. How, for instance, can one fulfil his injunction that "we must learn to think not only imperially but internationally as well." The least harmful use of the word "imperially" implies an attitude of mind at odds with internationalism. This ex-Minister of the Blockade in the World War is not very high in my list of heroes of peace. Yet his resignation from the Baldwin Cabinet after the fiasco of the Geneva naval conference did him honor.

NORMAN THOMAS

Importations

Cold Steel. By M. P. Shiel. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.
Diana. By Heinrich Mann. Coward-McCann. $2.50.
Mimi Bluette. By Guido da Verona. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.
Scrapped. By Meta Schoepp and Louise Tausig. Covici, Friede. $2.50.

SOME day a grade-school history teacher will ask her most brilliant student: "Peter, can you tell us why the Great War was fought?" And Peter's reply will be: "So that novelists could write about it." Post-war novels of readjustment have littered in recent years. "Scrapped" is Meta Schoepp's kitten, and a sick one at that. It is the story of two jobless ex-warriors aimlessly wandering through disemboweled, disillusioned Germany. Fred picks up a stupid intrigue with the wife of a traveling salesman. His companion in misery, Dietz, walks proudly from one job to another with his mongrel Pit, and while he ends by marrying a farm-maid his friend enjoys the oblivion of suicide. The book is as sunless as a submerged cathedral, as tiresome as a diet of pigs' knuckles.

In comparison, Guido da Verona is an epicurean; and Mimi Bluette—danseuse by profession, courtesan by inheritance—the dainty morsel of his palate. Gaily and garishly she dances into the heart of Paris, and into the bed of a Minister of State, ultimately abandoning herself to a real affair of the heart that ends in frustration and self-destruction. She gets to be a bore after a hundred pages, and what was at first a pleasantly sophisticated, wittily corrosive tale peters out into silly twaddle.

Heinrich Mann bears no resemblance to the foregoing writers either in style or subject matter. "Diana," the first part of a trilogy, "The Goddesses," and written more than a decade ago, shows the author to be a stern artist and a completely disenchanted social thinker. In no way does he resemble his more tranquil brother Thomas. That he does not believe that people can even be bribed to accept "justice" is indicated in this book by the futile attempt on the part of the captious Duchess Violante of Assy to free the effeminate kingdom of Dalmatia from the tyranny of its degenerate rulers. Turning to Rome for help, she only finds there an aristocracy gone to seed, a selfish church, and amiable Latin parasites who help her spend her fortune. In the end she is thoroughly convinced that the "life of a few thousand people . . . is a matter of complete indifference" to her. It will be interesting to see what comes of the author's diabolic cynicism, his Flaubertian contempt for the bourgeoisie, in the volumes to follow.

Of these four novels only M. P. Shiel's "Cold Steel" can be said to be an important literary contribution. It is a highly seasoned stew that few readers are likely to enjoy—but those few will cherish. It is a glorious excursion into the incredible. There is nothing remotely like it in the archives of English literature. Call Shiel a "sport" if you will, but remember that T. S. Eliot is also a "sport" and Virginia Woolf another, not to mention James Joyce and Marcel Proust.

What does it matter if the facts of history are shuffled or scotched so long as the men and women in this book breathe out their unreal lives in brilliant flames of permanent remembrance. Do not run to your Hackett to verify the King Henry that you find here, for your search will go unrewarded. What does it matter if beautiful Laura Ford and her sister Bessie were never really chased through bush and bramble by the kings of France and England; or if Anne Boleyn was not quite the treacherous devil she is painted; or Cardinal Wolsey not quite so sly? Here they are, nevertheless, in the lasting essence of a grandiloquent farce. E. M. Benson

Economics and Christian Morals

Our Economic Morality and the Ethic of Jesus. By Harry F. Ward. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

GOLF and intelligence are two important reasons why millionaires do not go to church, but I am inclined to credit the phenomenon chiefly to the fact that millionaires can no longer count upon preachers to agree with them. At least this is true in many Protestant churches of the North. Until the period just preceding the World War American Protestantism supplied business men with many of their most plausible moral pretexts for getting rich without working. Since 1910, however, there has been a decided drift to the Left in the economic opinions of dissenting homilists. A new generation of preachers has arisen to make millionaire pewholders uncomfortable by using Christianity as an excuse to talk about social justice. In the large modernist Protestant seminaries like Union, Boston, and Garrett, student opinion is far more "radical" than in the State and private universities. Harry Ward of Union Seminary is, more than any other man in America, the father and archetype of this new tribe of preachers, and his stamping ground, the Methodist church, is the most strategic place in the land for spreading a new economic gospel among unredeemed standpatters. After making many Christian millionaires uncomfortable to the verge of apoplexy and after inspiring several generations of theological students with a new social vision, Mr. Ward has put the gist of his thinking about our economic behavior in a book which happily loses none of his fire and persuasiveness in print.

Selecting as his targets the trinity of modern capitalism: competition, private profit, and property, Mr. Ward takes careful aim and shoots them full of holes. Condemning the amoral teaching of economics in many universities he says that such teaching "should be listed under its proper name of chrematistics—the science of money making." If economics is to be a genuine social science, the human consequences of economic behavior must be considered first. Our economic system—which is not really a system at all but a collection of selfish habits—has failed to reward men according to merit or to guarantee a living minimum to those who keep the world running. We cannot escape from the profund immorality of the profit basis of society until we have altered this basis itself, until goods are produced for use and natural wealth is cooperatively controlled.

Mr. Ward has covered the familiar ground traversed by Shaw, Hobson, and Tawney in England and by Veblen and Walter Rauschenbusch in the United States, but he brings fresh insight and new data to make an original contribution to the subject. What I object to in his treatment is the constant dragging in of "the ethic of Jesus." Is it necessary for a professor in a theological seminary to pretend that a sound economic morality must come from Jesus? Anyone who reads the Gospels with an impartial eye will discover that Jesus's teaching concerning economic values was confused, fragmentary, and quite inapplicable to a world of tickers, billionaires, and communists. What Mr. Ward really means by "the ethic of Jesus" is the ethic of Harry F. Ward, and I don't see why he should be so modest about saying so. Paul Blanshard

Creative Building

The American Architecture of Today. By G. H. Edgell. Charles Scribner's Sons. $6.

The Story of Architecture in America. By Thomas E. Tallmadge. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.

American Architecture. By Fiske Kimball. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $4.

Towards a New Architecture. By Le Corbusier. Translated by Frederick Etchells. Payson and Clarke. $5.

ARCHITECTURE is becoming more than fashionable; the congestion of our industrial cities, the continual thrusting up of new buildings before our eyes has at last awakened a naturally somnolent curiosity. Each of these four books has some special answer to give.

Professor Edgell's volume is an attempt to picture the complete panorama of modern American architecture against a historical background, the presentation of which is the best chapter, clear, vivid, concise, and with a sane grasp of the combined practical and aesthetic bases which underlie all building. With the plethora of modern architectural work he is less sure, because less definite; one seeks in vain for some controlling taste or even any dominant theories by which the mass of buildings that he illustrates and admires may be related to one another. The author's continuous enthusiasms offer little constructive help to the layman lost in its mazes.

Mr. Tallmadge's book is a more popular work, a sort of gossipy history whose message is in no wise helped by its supposedly smart manner. Architecture is a great subject, and the most valuable quality of its finest work is nobility. Its criticism demands an equal nobility; the true popularizing of an art comes through clear thinking and careful, simple writing, not through lack of dignity. Mr. Tallmadge is at his best in his treatment of the part of the history which he knows best and with which he was in the closest personal touch—the movements in American taste from the time of Richardson down to the early years of the twentieth century.

Fiske Kimball's "American Architecture," though much the shortest of the three, conveys the clearest picture out of the enormous mass of material which his scholarship presents. He has evolved a pattern clear, simple, and beautifully designed. Out of it rises the craggy and arrogant personality of Louis Sullivan as the hero of the drama, and Fiske Kimball alone has clarified the relationship between classicism, romanticism, and that new god of design, functionalism. He has seen architecture as creative building, and style as passing fashion.

Le Corbusier's book has long been known in the original French to students of modern art movements, and one cannot but be glad that it is now rendered available to all readers. It is a stimulating book, a breath-taking book, a question-making book, more fruitful of discussion than of opinion. Refreshing in its analyses of Roman, Greek, and Renaissance work; cutting and sound in its grasp of "the illusion of plan"; full of self-confident austerity almost Franciscan, it nevertheless, by some psychological perversity, succeeds in developing, out of its clarity, its keenness, and its idealism, designs of a fantastic and monotonous ugliness, towns of rectangular harshness, and interiors like the inside of an operating room. It is a disturbing book because so completely doctrinaire and yet so persuasive.

Talbot Faulkner Hamlin

An Indian Handbook

The Rain-Makers. By Mary Roberts Coolidge. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THREE shelves sagging under the weight of eighty-seven volumes of Bureau of Ethnology Reports would come crashing down on my typewriter were I to suggest that Mary Roberts Coolidge in "The Rain-Makers" adds materially to the store of information on the Indians of the Southwest. Thank heaven this is true! Mrs. Coolidge is soundly aware that while special data continue to accumulate it is extremely important, from time to time, to edit the current inventory. Her book is another good summary of the facts, if not always the feeling, of that glorious country.

The author is a member of the State Board of Education of California. She has supplemented her wide reading on the Southwest with years of intimate contact with the Indians of New Mexico and Arizona. She has made wise selections and quoted extensively from the best authorities. The book is direct, refreshingly free from the errors of first enthusiasm and those minor prejudices on which others devote whole chapters: whether a "kiva" should be called an "estufa," whether the swastika is indigenous, or who discovered what first.

On the interpretative side there are lapses. Now and then you run across sentences like this: "The Indian mind is not literal, specific, scientific. It is philosophical, vague, and poetic." Thus to oppose the specific and poetic, if I may pounce upon two intended extremes among these six ideas, seems excessively inaccurate. Generalization comes late in cultural experience. For instance, the Cherokees, according to Max Eastman, are without any general verb "to wash," but they have many specific verbs meaning "wash my head," "wash another person's head," "wash my face," "wash a child," etc. The basic beauty, indeed, of the poems quoted by the author from the Natalie Curtis collection, derives from primitive specification that excludes vagueness. In the second cycle of the Navajo creation myth the first name given for the turquoise goddess is given as "Young woman who becomes old and goes away and comes back young again," an identification full of literal irrelevancies, still lacking the simplification of the hero labels of the "Iliad."

May such quibbling, however, deter no one from the pleasures of this excellent handbook. I intend to take it with me next time I visit those charming friends whose Christmas "thank-you" letters arrive just in time to remind you that somebody lacks bus fare to attend an August fiesta at a neighboring pueblo.

Mrs. Coolidge gives a remarkably useful picture: the history of the peoples, customs, social life, ceremonies, and dances (with a good calendar of where and when), arts, industries, architecture. The chapters on pottery and basket-making are packed with information. She discusses the hypothesis of Oriental origin of the tribes, cites the causes of devitalization prior to the Spanish invasion of the sixteenth century, and describes the cruelties and benefits under the American government. The Navajos, she finds, are the most verile and prosperous. Unlike the Pueblos, the Navajos are steadily increasing in numbers—from less than nine thousand in 1869 to thirty-five thousand at present. The superb courage of the Apaches, which made them resist subjugation longer, has contributed to their pitiful plight today. They are weak and diseased, with a late start in adapting themselves to a dislocated order. With them, cultural progress depends on first rebuilding physical vitality.

The title of the book comes from what Mrs. Coolidge believes to be one of the two main ideas of the Southwestern mind: "Desire for rain and belief in the unity of all life."

THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL

THE HOUSE OF JOY

By Jo Van Ammers-Kuller

"NEVER before has stage-life been described so cleverly and vividly, so true to life . . . with all it moments of delirious happiness, of great temptations, of sensuous vulgarities, of cruel disappointments," writes Henriette Hendrix-Holst, America's noted critic of Dutch literature. The author is recommended to you by such men as Hendrik Van Loon, Gamaliel Bradford, Edwin Arlington Robinson, Harry Hanson, Van Wyck Brooks, Hamilton Holt, Charles Finger, Edwin Slosson.

The Dutton Prize Book For July $2.50

THE MAN IN THE QUEUE

By Gordon Daviot, Author of Kit

BRIGHT lights and laughter—the first-night of a famous star—suddenly a man dropped dead. No one saw him stabbed as he stood in the queue at the ticket window; no one suspected his enemy—but Scotland Yard was on the trail. How was the murder solved with only this clue, the killer was left-handed?

The Dutton Prize Mystery For July $2.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Inc.

LABOR AT THE HELM

England has elected labor representatives as the dominant political party.

The manner of government under Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is of pulsating interest to all students of democratic government.

The Manchester Guardian

WEEKLY

will give accurate reports, unbiased by party considerations, of all the doings of England's first elected Labor Government.

It will also keep an inspired watch on the newly revived efforts towards the establishment of peace and disarmament among the nations of the world.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings.

You should start taking The Manchester Guardian Weekly regularly now at the beginning of this thrilling period in the world's history.

MAIL THIS COUPON

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
220 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:—

Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY to the below address.

Name _____

Address _____

The Story of a Dynasty

The Hohenzollerns. By Herbert Eulenberg. Translated by M. M. Bozman. The Century Company. $4.

THE net impression made by this sprightly book is that the twenty-odd rulers of the Hohenzollern family, although exceptionally well endowed with the customary human frailties, have been on the whole somewhat maligned. Herr Eulenberg puts the two sides of the case very well in his preface. "The princely race of Hohenzollern," he writes, "has, like every other, produced men good and bad, strong and weak, men of noble character and men of coarser mold, rulers bellicose and—the fact needs especial emphasis—rulers peace-loving, mild, and conciliatory. Owing its sovereignty in the Mark of Brandenburg as it does to the diplomatic ability of one of the line, the dynasty can show a whole succession of compliant, unwarlike, and amenable persons among subsequent rulers of the race." Their worst family trait was "the overweening sense of their own power, the tendency to despotism, which is to be found in most of them." The Germans have chiefly to reproach them because "most of them took very little interest in their people, either in great matters or small," and few of them "cared a straw for the intellectual and aesthetic history of the German race." Even Frederick the Great, who "tried to bring on his aristocracy" as a means of cultivating a "society" in Germany, "gave them up as intellectually incapable of development."

This, of course, is hardly the conventional view, especially since the last ruler of the line went hustling into exile. Readers to whom Prussia and Germany are interchangeable terms will be surprised to learn that until well into the nineteenth century, when the Electors of Brandenburg and later Kings of Prussia had become Emperors of Germany, the interests of Prussia and the old empire often clashed. It was the Great Elector who enabled Louis XIV of France to annex a large part of Alsace-Lorraine, while William I, the last Prussian king to crown himself at Königsberg, stood out after the battle of Sedan "almost as stubbornly as his brother Frederick William had done against the acceptance of the German imperial crown." "How can my Prussian heart," he exclaimed, "bear to see the kingly title which has attained and accomplished so much give place to the title of 'Kaiser,' which for centuries has been at enmity with Prussia?"

Herr Eulenberg admits that he has "plied a more flamboyant and broader brush" in the present instance than is his wont, but he justifies himself by observing that "in an age with no great taste for ancient history I had to do my best to portray these princes in the freshest colors on my palette, to give them the warmth and glow of life." Warmth and glow his pictures assuredly have, whether the subject be John Sigismund, facing a volley of plates and glasses hurled at his drunken head by an irate queen and exchanging "a few furious blows with his future son-in-law," Gustavus Adolphus; or the Great Elector, "a double-dealer from the first," the "best deed" of whose life was the Edict of Potsdam, offering asylum to the persecuted Huguenots of France; or Frederick William I, with his passion for tall soldiers and aversion to war, his baths five times daily, and his care "for the replenishing of his scantily populated dominions with inhabitants"; or Frederick William II, victim of premature sexual decay (he counted two "secondary" wives and a "permanent" mistress in addition to his queen), whose body lay so long unburied that "the horses in the riding school took fright and lost condition"; or Queen Louise, a "very natural, sensual woman," a "magnificent, roguish, childlike, guileless creature," and not at all the "saint and exalted heroine" of the school history books.

3 MONTHS ABROAD $390

POCONO PEOPLES COLLEGE

ANNOUNCES

1 The second regular European Study Session Aug. 31-Nov. 30, 1929 in co-operation with Peoples Colleges, educational organizations and internationally prominent educators in England, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, The Netherlands, France and Russia.

ELIGIBILITY: Young men and women who can supply evidence as to their acceptability in homes and Peoples Colleges abroad.

EXPENSE: Round trip New York back to New York, including tuition—$390.

Ten days in Russia $90 extra.

2 Seven months' travel course with special training abroad in physical education, adult education or economics—inclusive costs round trip—$675.

For information address:

Pocono Study Tour

THE OPEN ROAD, INC.

20 West 43rd St. New York

TOURS from $385

Sailings to

SOVIET RUSSIA

Aug. 21—S. S. "Aquitania"
Sept. 18—S. S. "Berengaria"
Oct. 23—S. S. "Aquitania"

Register now for a tour full of fun —interest—novelty—unforgettable! Stop-overs at London—Kiel Canal —Helsingfors.

Ten full days in

LENINGRAD & MOSCOW

Write for Booklet D—a detailed itinerary

WORLD TOURISTS, Inc.

175 5th Ave., New York. Tel. Algonquin 6656
Chicago office—308 W. Washington St., R. K. Zetland, Mgr.

Employers:—

For intelligent employees advertise in The Nation. You reach fewer readers than through a large newspaper, but those you reach are worth while.

And your advertisement in The NATION is READ.

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance, to

THE NATION ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT
20 Vesey Street, N. Y. or Phone Fitzroy 9074.

The picture of William II is firmly but mercilessly drawn. Thanks to the narrow bigotry of an early religious training, the last of the Kaisers brought to the throne a "piety incarnate," and a mind easily imbued with the doctrine of the divine right of kings. Sermons on his private yacht prepared the way for such exhortations to soldiers about to depart for China as "Give no quarter!" "Make no prisoners!" "Ravage like the Huns!" "There can be no reasonable doubt," Herr Eulenberg declares, "that at the bottom of his not very courageous soul he was a lover of peace. . . . What he lacked was that repose of spirit which the brave possess as a matter of course, the composure of the man who has strength within himself."

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

The American Party Battle. By Charles A. Beard. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Mr. Beard has added to the World Today Bookshelf of which he is editor this concise historical sketch of political parties in the United States. Rejecting the view of Bryce that the party struggle in America has been chiefly a battle between the advocates of central and of State government he outlines the economic, social, and racial factors which enter into political strife. Here is historical realism at its best.

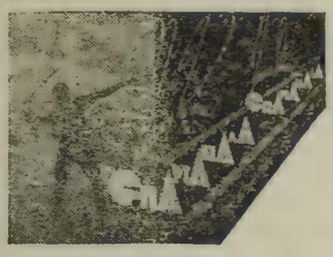
The Life and Tragedy of Alexandra Feodorovna, Empress of Russia. By Baroness Sophie Buxhoeveden. Longmans, Green and Company. $7.50.

As a virtually lifelong servant and lady-in-waiting to the Empress Feodorovna, Baroness Buxhoeveden is eminently well qualified to tell the harrowing tale of the Emperor Nicholas II and his family. Considered only as an historical document, the book possesses the fundamental value of being the product of an eye-witness of noteworthy events; and as a literary exercise, it at least illustrates the virtues of clearness, simplicity, and comparative candor. Naturally enough, the Baroness shows little sympathy for the Bolshevist regime.

From Confucius to Mencken. Edited by F. H. Pritchard. Harper and Brothers.

This vast compilation of prose from hundreds of authors in dozens of countries is manifestly an attempt at the impossible, since there has been so much prose that no one volume, however big, could do more than scratch the surface. Mr. Pritchard has worked carefully, however, within these fatal limits; so far as he goes he goes interestingly, and much that he gives us was worth digging out.

The Plunger. The Story of the Wheat Pit. By E. J. Dies. Covici Friede. $3.



A breathless biography of Benjamin P. Hutchinson, "Old Hutch," who was Wheat King in Chicago in the days of Daniel Drew and Jay Gould.

The New World. By Isaiah Bowman. World Book Company. $6.

The post-war world has changed so rapidly that new geographies must be published almost continuously to keep pace with the changes. Isaiah Bowman, president of the American Geographical Society of New York, first published his comprehensive summary of world conditions, "The New World," in 1921. Now he has written a complete revision of that book with late material concerning Europe, South America, and the Orient. The elaborate maps and economic summaries make the new edition even more useful than the earlier one.

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Starting this Saturday, July 6

First Showing in America

Actual! Vivid! Thrilling!

celebrating the physical culture renaissance of the Soviet Republic

SPARTAKIADA

A remarkable Sovkino film-record of the

RED OLYMPIAD

recently held in Moscow, showing the workers of Russia and other countries exhibiting splendid skill, speed and strength in all forms of athletics

— and on the same program —

CHARLIE CHAPLIN in "The Circus"

FILM GUILD CINEMA

52 W. 8th St. [Just W. of 5th Ave.] Spring { 5090 5095

Continuous Daily, 1 P. M. to midnite.

Now! — Last 4 Days — Wed., Thurs., Fri.—July 3-4-5

Dostoievsky's "CRIME and PUNISHMENT" and Anatole France's "CRAINQUEBILLE"

Direction: SYMON GOULD

"Still amuses with a kind of careless gaiety which no other revue has managed to capture."—Joseph Wood Krutch.

THE 1929 Grand Street Follies

with Albert Carroll, Dorothy Sands & Paula Trueman

BOOTH THEA. W. 45 ST.—Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

GILBERT MILLER

(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)

presents

Journey's End

By R. C. Sheriff

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street

Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Please use following blank for notification of change of address during the summer. Do give us two weeks notice in advance of the date with which the change is to take effect.

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York

You have been sending the magazine to

Name .....

Address .....

Beginning with the issue of .....

☐ For ..... Weeks } please send the magazine to ☐ Until Further Notice }

New Address .....

.....

International Relations Section

*Modern Spain

III. Censorship

By CARLETON BEALS

THE flood of official notes by Primo de Rivera, which all newspapers are required to print without remuneration and to which no one is permitted to reply, reveal a man whose overweening ego is childishly sensitive to criticism, vulgarly avid for flattery, arrogantly boastful, capriciously vindictive, or absurdly generous yet utterly ignorant of the broader canons of justice and equity, disconcertingly subject to sentimentality, anger, or false pride; more full of undignified pose than Coolidge with his five-gallon hats; fond of rhetoric and inflated adjectives; condescendingly paternal yet somewhat humanized by his weakness for wine, women, and gambling, however inappropriate these may be in the administration of a national enterprise. His language alternates between that of the bull-ring and the pompous periods of a Pangloss and a Parolles; the Dictator, with his uncertain Andalusian temperament, is ever anxious to be, at one and the same time, a good fellow, a benevolent god, an Alexander and a Mussolini. A communiqué concerning the opening of the Barcelona exposition is a gem:

> I do not wish to close this telegram without communicating to your Excellency [Minister of Interior Martínez Anido], in order that it may be made public, my emotion at the attitude of the twenty thousand spectators in the bull-ring on the entry of Don Jaime, and shortly after, myself, and the good behavior of the public at a performance which, though the admission was exorbitant, proved in every way wretched, save for the Goya-like parade [of bull-fighters], and the ability of the Portuguese star; and at the attitude still more outstanding and affectionate of the enormous multitude covering the streets of the route for several kilometers, who, without having witnessed the spectacle, with their faces incomparably happy, with expressions noble and sympathetic, once more demonstrated the temperament and kindness of our race, moving the heart to cry, "Long live Spain, and Long live this great Barcelona, industrious, intelligent, and patriotic!"

Censorship of the press has been severe and capricious. In spite of the fact that every periodical bears the slogan, "Revised by the Censor," papers are arbitrarily suspended and fined for subject matter already passed by the censor. El Liberal of Bilboa, as previously mentioned, was fined a thousand pesetas for printing a photograph of the niece of the Pope in short skirts. On May 8 the police presented themselves in the office of El Heraldo de Madrid, one of the oldest dailies, and stopped the presses, because, under a heading which had slipped by the editor and the censor, entitled Sevilla for the Tourists, appeared an account of a street brawl. The paper was obliged to pay a fine of 50,000 pesetas in the form of a check delivered personally to the Dictator. When a delegation from the sister papers of the capital waited upon Primo to protest, he insulted them. However cautious they try to be, editors and writers continually pass in and out of jails. Writers incurring the displeasure of the regime are frequently censored and deprived of a living even though their work is purely literary. (Except for the temporary ban upon the works of Blasco Ibañez, books have not been suppressed—perhaps because the Spanish public reads very few books!) Luis Jiménez Asúa writes in the introduction to his book, "Politica-Figuras-Paisajes":

> If a government believes—mistakenly it seems to me—that censorship is necessary to prevent the propagation of news which is alarming or inconvenient for the public ends pursued by the ministers, its scope should be confined to this objective. Censorship ceases to be the instrument of dictatorial government, transforming itself into something else meriting stronger terminology, when it swerves from its proper ends and is put at the service of the basest passions.
>
> A censorship which permits a governor to launch against his adversaries, in official notes, the most harsh accusations and does not permit those injured to exercise defense, is not censorship, but police protection of the monopoly of offense.
>
> The censorship which consents that a daily such as La Nación (personal organ of the Dictator) hurls against me the most ridiculous abuse without letting me refute the pretended arguments, is not censorship but blind support of ignorance.
>
> A censorship which, abusing its power, diverges from its functions, is not censorship, but iniquity.

The Dictatorship constantly attacks private individuals, yet permits them no opportunity to reply. Recently a correspondent of Le Matin arrived at the gunboat where the Conservative ex-Premier Sánchez Guerra has been confined since the artillery plot with permission from the Dictator to celebrate an interview. Sánchez Guerra refused to receive him, whereupon the correspondent wrote an apocryphal interview very incriminating for a man whose life was hanging in the balance. This was reproduced, but the Dictatorship denied Sánchez Guerra the right to declare the interview false. Such accounts could be endlessly multiplied.

The only counter-weapon has been the circulation of clandestine hojas, which pass from hand to hand, giving information, or correcting the statements of the Dictatorship. Yet the police have also made use of this method. Recently a secret sheet appeared advocating regicide, signed by prominent men of all parties. The police then proceeded to arrest them on the evidence the police had manufactured.

Along with censorship of the press occurs the prohibition of public assemblage. None of the political groups may hold meetings except the official Unión Patriotica and the Socialist Party. Men have even been arrested for reputed statements at private banquets.

Another blow at personal liberty has been the abolition of trial by jury. Personal freedom is thus conditioned to the whim of judges appointed by the Directorate, who imprison and fine arbitrarily, and against whom there is no recourse. On the other hand, Primo de Rivera caused a review of all sentences for five years prior to 1923, largely to benefit friends of the military group. High officials constantly intervene with the judges to secure punishment or immunity. The most notorious cases of interference with judicial verdicts have occurred. Primo personally set aside a civil verdict against the Bishop of Madrid and in favor of the nation, and thereby turned public properties over to the church along with millions of pesetas of interest. Still more notorious violation grew out of Primo's personal interest in La Caoba, the most fashionable Madrid courtesan. La Caoba was arrested and sentenced in a morphine scandal, but through Minister of Justice, Galo Ponte, a man thoroughly discredited before the arrival of the regime, Primo forced a revision of the sentence and her liberation. Several of the most outstanding cases of judicial arbitrariness have been the fining of the prominent lawyer Ossorio y Gallardo (just elected national president of the Spanish bar association, elections arbitrarily annulled by Primo) for criticisms made in a private letter to ex-Premier Maura; the fining of the wealthy Liberal and ex-Premier, Conde de Romanones; the imprisonment of the novelist Valle-Inclán; the deporting of Unamuno; the arrest and fining of Doctor Mariñon; the imprisonment of Antonio María Sbert, president of the students' federation, who was held for months, incomunicado, in a remote unhealthy castle prison; and thousands of minor injustices. Men are constantly taken out of their homes, locked up, and permitted to languish for months in jail, without a charge being preferred against them. A friend of mine, half-owner of a publishing house, in this wise has spent from one to nine months in jail every year since the dictatorship began.

* Third in a series of four articles on Spain by Carleton Beals. The fourth and last, Official Corruption, will appear next week.

Lack of judicial guaranties is tied up with the loss of local self-government. The most vicious onslaught upon local liberties, as I indicated in a previous article, has been that made upon Catalán regionalism. The rest of Spain has fared little better. When the Directorate came into power, military governors immediately supplanted military governors, "to replace civil corruption with the honesty and integrity of the army." (I have already discussed the utter lack of honesty and integrity in the army.) At the same time the Dictator abolished the 9,254 ayuntamientos, or elected municipal councils, replacing them with new bodies appointed by hand-picked committees from the wealthier taxpayers. These bodies naturally control the local judiciary. The result has been an offensive against the properties of all enemies of the local tyrants and against any one opposing the regime, reducing many a prosperous citizen to a state of pauperdom. Another result has been the rapid spoliation of the communal reserves of the villages. Harking back to prefeudal days, the villages in Spain have always conserved a certain amount of communal land, waters and woods. These, on orders from the center, have been sacrificed. Official favorites are skimming off the cream of these at ridiculously low prices. Nevertheless this has temporarily filled the municipal treasuries and has led to a rapid pushing of public works, sanitation, paving, building, monuments, what not, which has given to the Spanish rural districts an air of bustle and progress previously unknown. This has allowed for plenty of graft and has built up a corps of greedy and dishonest office-holders, completely servile to the regime. But at the same time it has weakened the economic reserves of the villages, where the margin of existence is treacherously low.

The old Cacique or boss of the village was often a powerful and dishonest person, but he had to achieve his ends, in part, by appeal to local sentiment. The new municipal administrations, supported from the center, do not need to do this; they need only consider the few powerful and wealthy men of the community. Their power is absolute; and as there is no independent judiciary or trial by jury, any dissidents are promptly disposed of, along with their property.

In addition to extending the brutal somaten constabulary of Barcelona to all of Spain, hundreds of military officers circulate through Spain as mentors. Secret-service agents are thick as flies: no man knows, when he is holding a private conversation in the cafes or on the street-cars, but what he will be tapped on the shoulder and taken off to jail, or worse, for a royal decree has authorized the secret agents and somaten to utilize any violence or aggression against people talking in public against the regime, and are guaranteed complete immunity. The jailed man has no defense against the word of the agent who has taken him in custody. It will mean weeks or months in jail. Another punishment meted out is arbitrary deportation to isolated places. The well-known writer, Enrique Mesa, was thus arrested and deported from Madrid to the melancholy mountain town of Soria. After sixty-seven days, since he received so many visits even in that remote place, the authorities deemed it wiser to permit him to return. For the opening of the Sevilla exposition, the authorities rounded up scores of people suspected of lacking sympathy for the regime, loaded them on to trucks and dumped them up in the mountain villages, threatening them with worse punishment if they returned to their families and professions. The equatorial island of Fernando Po is full of political prisoners dying a slow death at hard labor under the annihilating sun.

Scarcely a prominent intellectual figure or writer of Spain but has been persecuted, arrested, fined, discharged from teaching positions, or deported. In his struggle with the university elements, Primo brazenly declared that the universities were not essential for the well-being or progress of Spain. Five universities were closed. The rest were maimed. All are being "reorganized" by a Crown commission, which is eliminating doubtful professors and students. (No wonder the students of Madrid University this morning pulled down the statue of the king in the Paraninfo and sawed off his head.) A few professors, whom Primo de Rivera incorporated into his personally chosen "national" Assembly, cravenly apologized for the attitude of certain professors and students, but in general the teachers of all Spain protested vigorously; numbers of them resigned. These protests, owing to the censorship, never saw the light. The one exception was the pointed letter of Professor Menéndez Pidal, president of the Royal Spanish Academy, Spain's most eminent scholar.

This procedure was on a par with Primo's earlier closing of the Madrid Ateneo, that center of Spanish intellectual light, with its brilliantly chosen library and its accessible periodicals from every corner of the globe. Primo arrested the administrative body of the Ateneo, appointed a new administrative council (though the Ateneo is an independent civic organization), and then allowed it to reopen. Its one-time famous open forum no longer functions. A similar fate met the Ateneo Mercantil of Valencia.

The legal excuse for this procedure is a royal decree permitting the Dictator to depose or name the officers of all private, partisan, and civic organizations in Spain. It is as if Mr. Hoover should appoint Mr. Mencken to run the W. C. T. U. or Mr. Schwab as head of the Workers' Party.

Spain is asking when Primo will begin shifting the heads of families.

SUMMER

Trout Lake Camp

An Ideal Camp for Adults

ON TROUT LAKE

Tennis Golfing
Horseback Canoeing
Handball Dancing
Basketball Hiking
Baseball Fishing

Splendid Social and Athletic Staff

Unsurpassed Cuisine

Write for Souvenir Booklet

City Office
489 Fifth Ave., Room 409
Tel. Vanderbilt 4197

P. O. Lake George, New York

IDEAL OF SMALL CAMPS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE

A Glorious Vacation

The rendezvous for real campers. EVERY modern convenience for comfort and sport. Capacity limited to 150.

New York Telephone
PENnsylvania 8313
R. B. NUDELL
A. B. SILVER

In the Heart of the Adirondacks

TIMBERLAND

Pottersville New York

Where Congenial Folk Gather

Accommodations in Bungalows—modern in every respect.

Excellent Sport Facilities

TENNIS — HANDBALL — GOLF — SADDLE HORSES—WATER SPORTS. SOCIAL ACTIVITIES and DANCING.

Directors	N. Y. Office
ESTHER R. KESSLER	33 WEST 42ND ST.
MORRIS HARKAVY	PENNSYLVANIA 7668

Booklet on request

SCAROON MANOR

HOTEL comforts CAMP activities

"In the Heart of the Adirondacks"

WELCOME —To a Perfect Paradise—
Sandy Bathing Beach—Golf—
Finest Hungarian Cuisine
—Modern Dietary Laws—
7 Clay Tennis Courts

ON SCHROON LAKE N.Y.

JOS. FRIEBER MGR-DIR.

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

INDIAN HEAD

on Echo Lake, Warrensburg, N. Y.

AN IDEAL CAMP FOR ADULTS

Swimming Baseball
Fishing Tennis
Canoeing Basketball
Rowing Handball
Dancing Horseback

Only five miles from Lake George. All facilities for sport and social recreation. FOR THE 4th OF JULY WEEK END $20.00 which includes transportation from Albany to Camp and back. Take Albany night boat on Wednesday, July 3rd and meet bus at the Albany pier on July 4th.

Booklet on Request

New York Address: 885 Brook Ave., Bronx, N. Y. Tel. Melrose 1821

Camp Address: Warrensburg, N. Y. Tel. Warrensburg 136

SECOR LAKE LODGE

on beautiful Secor Lake, N. Y.

One of the few large lakes within 50 miles of New York. Well stocked with game fish.

An ideal summer camp with excellent facilities for BATHING, BOATING, FISHING, TENNIS

$30 Weekly—Weekends $6 daily

Particular attention paid to menu

Guests met at Lake Mahopac station, N. Y. Central. Write or phone for booklet

SECOR LAKE LODGE
Mahopac Falls, N. Y.
Mahopac 175F3 City: Riverside 9499

DELAWARE CLIFF LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults A Rest-Retreat for Families

In the Kittatinny Range, Flatbrookville North, New Jersey. 85 Miles by motor from Hoboken, 2 hours by train.

All conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows—Bathing, Boating, Canoeing on the Delaware—All Sports—Excellent Food—Attention to personal Diet requirements.

Atmosphere and Refinement.

Telephone: Bushkill (Pa.), 19 R. 2

Sonia Schneider, Director

For Your Summer Recreation

The Connecticut hills with their little-traveled roads and trails here afford delightful opportunities for riding and tramping. We keep good saddle horses, and give instruction. Swimming. Environment adapted for rest and concentrated work. Only 1½ hours from New York. Make reservations now for the summer.

TOPSTONE FARM
Mail address: Ridgefield, Conn.
Tel. Ridgefield 648

Workers and Radicals—join

GOLDEN'S BRIDGE COLONY

A cooperative community, situated at the foot of the Berkshire mountains, 44 miles from New York, 7 minutes walk from N. Y. Central Station. Ideal for commuting and as a summer place. For information, apply to M. Millstein, 698 Melrose Ave., N. Y.

SECLUDED Country Resort—Conducive to enjoyable relaxation; wholesome table; tennis; 1½ hours from Grand Central; $25 weekly. HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 15-J.

Perpetual Summer Joy
Congenial Atmosphere
Land & Water Sports Modern Facilities
Rational Food and otherwise
HOTEL RIVIELLE
Rock Hill, N. Y.
Box 62 Monticello 983-R
Buses twice daily from Hotel Astor direct to Hotel.
Miss I. Bernstein, Prop. City—Ambassador 1718

CAMP TOPSTONE—For Adults
A JEWISH CAMP WITH A FINE AMERICAN SPIRIT

All land and water sports, with free instruction. Splendid social activities. Excellent strictly kosher meals.

Write for illustrated booklet

SHAPIRO BROS. Branchville, Conn.

The Lester House, Roscoe, N. Y.
Sullivan County
Pavilion for sun baths to entire body. Good food. Rates $25 per week.

A DELIGHTFUL FARM deep in the country. Accommodations in house and Shack-in-woods. Vegetarian menu supplied by farm's own gardens. Swimming pool. Two hours by Hotel Astor bus. $21 to $25 a week. Threefold Farm, Spring Valley, N. Y. Telephone Circle 9990.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 17, 1929 No. 3341

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 53
EDITORIALS:
Lions Lie Down with Lambs 56
Can We Abolish Sunday? 57
Let the Negro Ride! 57
No Laws for Dawes 58
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 59
LAW—AND LAW ENFORCEMENT. By Victor S. Yarros 60
REVOLT IN HOLLYWOOD. By Somerset Logan 61
BACKHILL CULTURE. By Charles Morrow Wilson 63
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 65
CORRESPONDENCE 66
BOOKS:
Lines from an Ungallant Lover. By Irwin Edman 68
A Creator of Myths. By Clifton P. Fadiman 68
Rabelais. By Eliseo Vivas 69
War from the Front. By James B. Wharton 70
Births and Deaths in Western Europe. By Kate Holladay Claghorn 71
A Sentimental Sage. By William Gruen 71
Concerning Narrative Verse. By Eda Lou Walton 72
History Briefs. By William MacDonald 72
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Modern Spain—IV. Official Corruption. By Carleton Beals 74

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

DANIEL IN THE LIONS' DEN never needed a more miraculous rescue than the fifteen men and women who go to trial on July 29 in Gastonia, North Carolina, for the murder of Chief of Police Aderholt of that city. And, unfortunately, the prisoners in Gastonia are no Daniels come to judgment. Many of them have been reckless in talking to impressionable crowds, some are Communists, some are Northerners, some are foreign-born, and one was actually caught with a Russian grammar. It would be hard to exaggerate the prejudice that they will encounter when they go on trial before a Southern jury from which has been eliminated every person expressing sympathy with the cotton-mill strike. The strikers who actually killed Chief Aderholt seem to be in much less danger than the leaders of the strike, because the killers are unknown (they shot from a darkened building) while the leaders have been the object of bitter hatred from the beginning of the struggle. Affidavits produced at the habeas corpus hearing in Charlotte indicate that the prosecution will attempt to convict Fred E. Beal, Vera Bush, and Amy Schechter, three strike leaders, of first-degree murder, and the penalty for first-degree murder in North Carolina is the electric chair.

TO GOVERNOR C. C. YOUNG of California we extend best wishes for a thoughtful vacation. Governor Young has promised during this summer's vacation to read the record of the Mooney case and to decide whether he would be justified in pardoning the man who has lived twelve years within the walls of San Quentin prison because he was convicted of bombing the San Francisco preparedness parade on evidence which the trial judge and the jury have repeatedly branded as perjury. For Mooney there will be no vacations until he is given an unconditional pardon. "I will rot and die within the walls of San Quentin prison before I will accept a parole," he says. "Parole is for the guilty." Tom Mooney's indomitable spirit and the overwhelming proof of his innocence have at last caught the imagination of the public. On the floor of the Senate at Washington Senators Nye and Wheeler have exposed the whole story of the outrageous frame-up which led to his conviction. In the twenty-six Scripps-Howard papers throughout the country a campaign of editorials and articles has been going on for weeks to arouse national protest. At the University of Oregon the members of the faculty of the law school have declared, after investigation, that they believe Mooney and Billings to be innocent. The volume of protest has become so great that even a California governor cannot afford to ignore it.

PROHIBITION as it is practiced has claimed two more lives, this time in Oklahoma. Though there is confusion as to who fired the first shot, certain important facts are established: James Harris and his brother-in-law, farmers living near Tecumseh, are dead; they were fatally wounded in a dry raid for which no warrant had been issued; the raid was conducted by a federal prohibition officer, W. W. Thomason—who claims, however, to have been "across the road" during the shooting—and three "deputies" who held no commissions but were, apparently, merely voluntary assistants to Thomason; Thomason and his three musketeers are in jail charged with murder. Meanwhile, the county attorney makes a statement which is coming to be heard with ominous frequency: "No liquor was found"; and the local American Legion Post (both victims were World War veterans) has petitioned President Hoover not to extend the Government's "protecting hand to thwart prosecution" of the accused men. There is an irony to be added to the story. The fatal, illegal, and perhaps inexcusable raid took place on Independence Day.

IT IS PLAIN that the Administration is desperately afraid of the political dynamite involved in the proposed Bank of International Settlements. For political purposes in this country, there is no connection between reparations and Allied debts to the United States. Economically, and in fact, Germany's payments have come to hang largely on what her creditors must pay us, and Messrs. Young and Morgan, like sensible economists and business men, frankly acknowledged the relation in the arrangements they made. Further, a world bank is as much anathema politically as the League of Nations or the World Court. Actually, no matter what happens politically, there will be an international bank, because economically there must be. Out of the political situation came Secretary Stimson's emphatic declaration that the Government would "not permit any officials of the Federal Reserve system either themselves to serve or to select any American representatives as members of the proposed international bank." To this Thomas W. Lamont quietly replied that if any central bank refused to take part officially, alternative arrangements had been provided whereby "the same end is intended to be attained."

THEN HE CARRIED the war into the enemy's country by his statement in World Trade, the official organ of the International Chamber of Commerce, that the bank in its natural course of development "may become an organization not simply or even predominantly concerned with the handling of reparations, but also with furnishing to the world of international commerce and finance important facilities hitherto lacking." He suggests that it will provide a common meeting ground for the governors of the various central banks, thus making possible the cooperation that has proved essential to the stability of credit. "If in years to come," he says, "it takes on broader functions [than handling reparations] it will be because and only because there is a practical and specific use for it in branches of economic life which are not now served." Here is economic reality unpretendingly set forth by one who is in the midst of financial affairs—a world bank coming into existence because it must. If Mr. Hoover and the rest of the government choose for political reasons to ignore it and pretend it is not there, the bank will still exist, only our government will not have any control over it.

THE GREATEST SECRETARY of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton is certainly the world's luckiest fiscal officer. While his European confreres sweat blood in their efforts to balance the budget, Uncle Andy, having turned over the thankless task of prohibition enforcement to Mr. Lowman and Commissioner Doran, is able to spend the long summer evenings with his numerous friends playing that ancient game so well loved by children, "Surplus, surplus, who's got the surplus?" It's no great trick to be Secretary of the Treasury in a country like this one, where over a series of years the revenues persist in overtopping your best guesses by anything up to half a billion dollars. It may hurt your reputation as a guesser, but it eases your task as a disbursing officer. The budget estimate was for a surplus of $37,000,000 for 1928-1929 as against the four-hundred-million surplus of 1927-1928. When Congress began increasing appropriations, there came from the White House a sour warning of a deficit. In fact, as a result of undeserved financial good luck, we took in only nine million dollars less during the fiscal year just closed than during 1927-1928, and though we spent two hundred millions more, we yet closed the year with a surplus of $185,000,000. The public debt, which has been cut during the year by $673,000,000, is now less than seventeen billions, against its maximum of more than twenty-six billions in 1919, and there is no reason why we should not pay it off at a faster rate.

THERE IS, OF COURSE, renewed talk of a tax cut. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury fortunately speak cautiously about this possibility. Mr. Mellon points out that the surplus is more than accounted for by the "remarkable increase" of $220,000,000 in individual income-tax receipts, owing, he says, after a proper bow to prosperity and the reduction of surtax rates, "more specifically to increased income realized on the sale of capital assets, due, in the main, to an exceedingly active and constantly rising security market"—in other words, to the profits of stock-market speculation. It is a shaky foundation for a surplus, and we should be glad to see the Administration resist the immediate temptation to a tax cut, at the same time that it takes vigorous action to make possible the prevention of the projected waste of money on cruisers, uses real economy (by which we do not mean the Coolidge starvation of socially useful government activities), fights vigorously the ever-present danger of plain pork-barrel projects, and uses the surplus of another year, if we are again so fortunate as to have one, for yet further debt reduction. Despite our inevitable grumbling, federal taxes are not burdensome. The real danger of an overflowing treasury lies in the temptation it offers to extravagance and waste. The past year's surplus would have been even bigger but for tax refunds, which from June 1 to December 31, 1928, totaled $105,569,893 in cases of more than $75,000.

RAILROAD CONSOLIDATION under the Transportation Act goes slowly forward, and may produce results by the end of the century if the big carriers can compose their differences. The New York Central on July 3 received permission from the Interstate Commerce Commission to embody in its system the Michigan Central and the Big Four, on condition that it take over six short lines whose maintenance is required in the public interest. To say nothing of the competing interests of the big roads, which ever since the passage of the Transportation Act have bedeviled the question of consolidation in trunk-line territory, the problems involved in putting the roads together are extremely complex, in view of all the clashing private and public interests involved, as the present order clearly illustrates. Commissioner Eastman, for example, in dissenting from the order of his fellow-commissioners, objects that the proposed terms require the New York Central to pay a 50 per cent dividend on the outstanding minority stock of the Michigan Central, a proceeding which seems to him "an indefensible anomaly." Commissioner McManamy, who also dissents, objects that out of seventy-two short lines connecting with the New York Central only six are specifically dealt with in the commission's order. The numerous disagreements between the commission and the roads over specific questions and even over major issues suggest how inadequate the motive of private interest alone is to bring about the most desirable form of grouping. Without assuming that the commission is always right and the roads always wrong, we see here fresh evidence of the need for a central coordinating authority whose sole business is to see to it that we have an efficient and economical transportation system.

IT IS REFRESHING to read that the Board of Regents of that giant corporation, the University of California, has chosen a business man as its new president. Robert Gordon Sproul is a self-made man. He began as a newsboy, earned his way for the most part through school and college, and soon after his graduation returned to the university as its cashier. He was promoted to be assistant comptroller and then comptroller and vice-president. Now he has been promoted to the highest office in his "firm." This is as it should be. President Sproul is completely familiar with the ramifications of an institution which has an enrolment of 22,552 students in branches scattered throughout California, of whom less than half are centered at Berkeley, the seat of the university. The fact that he has no Ph.D. will certainly not hamper him in the executive position he is called upon to fill. It is high time that our big American universities should be recognized for what they are—business organizations for mass production in education. The sooner this fact is admitted the sooner we shall be able to gauge the demand for universities in the true sense of the term, i.e., institutions devoted to scholarly and creative pursuits. Already the distinction is being made between those who go to college for general background and contacts—valuable and worthy purposes both—and those who go in search of learning. Colleges designed for the first type of person should be open to all who come and headed by competent executives who need not pretend to be scholars. The inner circles of learning should be strictly limited, and the men who direct them should not be burdened with the highly unscholarly cares and intrigues of big business.

WHEN THE UNIVERSITY of the State of New York in 1926 conferred on Emily Howland the degree of Doctor of Letters, Harry Emerson Fosdick as orator of the day said:

> There can have been in history few times when an independent minority was more deeply needed than now—men and women who dare to think their own thoughts, stand on their own feet, take charge of their own lives. We need men and women who know that the economic order cannot remain as it is, that we must look forward to a more decent day when the profit motive sinks and the service motive rises into the ascendancy; men and women who see that a narrow nationalism will not do, that patriotism is not enough.

The death of Miss Howland in her one-hundred-and-second year closes a life that shows to the full the best possibilities of individual living. A Friend throughout life and a consistent follower of the Inner Light, Miss Howland gave a full three-quarters of a century to the unpopular cause of Negro education. Independent, unpretending, gentle, enthusiastic, strong withal, she served no less effectively in behalf of temperance, woman suffrage, and peace. Without bitterness, without weariness, without fear, she was in truth one of those who do justice and love mercy and walk humbly before the Lord. Here was an American of the sort that constitutes the glory of any country.

WILL NO ONE come to the defense of George Washington? The "true" biographers and the debunkers have had their day and ceased to be, but now the Post Office Department is carrying on a hot-weather war of its own that threatens to deprive the Father of his Country of his place in the sight, if not in the affections, of his countrymen. When asking recently at the stamp window for "a dollar's worth of twos," we found ourselves gazing in horror not on the pink and cherubic countenance of Washington, but on the equally pink figure of a rotund warrior. Inquiry among the Nation staff yielded contradictory results. One oracle maintained that Major General John Sullivan had a distinguished Civil War record; another that he was the best-known world "champeen." That vehicle of British propaganda, the Encyclopaedia Britannica, informed us that General Sullivan, with four thousand men, defeated the Iroquois and their Loyalist allies near Elmira in 1779, burning their villages and destroying their orchards and crops—for which exploit he was severely criticized but none the less received the thanks of Congress. Our patriotism is broad enough to cover any number of major generals; but in view of all the sesquicentennials that a historically minded Post Office Department can think up, what is to become of George Washington? Have we old-time patriots no rights?

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA, in all its majesty, has suppressed a book, "India in Bondage"—which we hope will soon find an American publisher—written by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, who was born in England but has spent the greater part of his life in America where he now resides. Since his first trip to India in 1896 as a member of a commission sent by the British Unitarian Association to study and report upon the educational, social, and religious conditions of the Indian people, Mr. Sunderland has followed Indian affairs closely and is the author of several books on the country. "India in Bondage," as its title indicates, is sympathetic to India's desire for independence, but violence has no place in its program. Mr. Sunderland presents a sober, factual case against British rule. His theme is the right of men, including Indians and Englishmen, to govern themselves. On May 24 the printer and publisher of the book, which was brought out in Calcutta, was arrested and charged with sedition, while forty-eight copies, including the original manuscript, were seized. "Mother India" was allowed to circulate freely in India, though its inaccuracies and insinuations wounded the sensibilities of every intelligent Indian. No doubt another recent book, "India on Trial," by J. E. Woolacott—which states the case for Great Britain—will be permitted on the bookstalls of India. It is a panic-stricken government that dares not allow both sides of a question to be stated. There is a crumb of comfort, however, for Mr. Sunderland. The action is abundant proof that the title of his book is justified.

AN EXTRAORDINARY TRIBUTE has been paid to C. P. Scott in connection with his retirement at the age of eighty-three from the editorship of the Manchester Guardian. But great as the tribute has been, it has not been—hardly could be—excessive or undeserved. Mr. Scott has been the editor of the Guardian since 1872, and under him it has come to be a commanding influence in the English-speaking world in the development of liberal and well-informed public opinion. The adjective "greatest" is a dangerous one to apply to anything, but one may fairly say that over a long period of years the Guardian has been, in respect to its editorial pages, at least, the world's greatest daily newspaper. Although retiring as editor, Mr. Scott will continue to be managing editor of the journal and is quoted as saying of his staff: "I could still sack the lot if I were not satisfied." The necessity will probably not arise as he is succeeded as editor by his son, E. T. Scott, who has been with the staff since 1912. We can wish the new editor no greater success than that the newspaper shall continue to hold the place it has long so honorably occupied.

Lions Lie Down with Lambs

WINSTON CHURCHILL, long the Tory Chancellor of the Exchequer, tauntingly promised Ramsay MacDonald "cordial cooperation in the Government's self-imposed task of carrying out the Conservatives' policy and making the world easier if not safer for capitalism." And indeed there was little in the King's speech of a Socialist Government which might not have been written by a Liberal or even by such a member of the Conservative Party as Lord Robert Cecil. It pledged cooperation with the United States toward disarmament, which surely no man in England would oppose; it promised a policy of conciliation on the Continent; it pledged the most earnest effort to solve the unemployment problem, without suggesting any radical Socialist solution; and it looked, if the Dominions should agree, to signature of the compulsory clause of the World Court plan, in the preparation of which English statesmen heartily opposed to Labor had collaborated. Finally, it declared for resumption of relations with Russia—a policy warmly welcomed by British business men and financiers.

Does this prove that British Labor has gone conservative? It seems to us that it proves rather that in some respects business men and politicians of other parties have caught up with Labor. The British Labor Party never was a Marxian revolutionary party, and it is not today. In colonial policy it is likely to hold close to the old traditions, but in international relations it has consistently advocated a policy of open-hearted conciliation, and it has not receded from that. The great achievement of Ramsay MacDonald's first term in office was to persuade the French and German statesmen to sit down together as friends. That led to Locarno, and if Locarno did not solve Europe's problems it at least produced an attitude which made further mad adventures like the invasion of the Ruhr impossible.

It is for such a change in the spirit of Anglo-American relations that we look to Mr. MacDonald now. It may be that he and Mr. Dawes will not be able to discover a satisfactory "international yardstick" by which to measure the parity of our navies. But if they fail they will at least fail as friends, and the spirit is more important than the formula. The ghastly disgrace of the Geneva Conference in 1927 was not that the British and American admirals could not reach a formula, but that they parted as they had met, distrustful and suspicious of each other, breathing fire and talking war possibilities. Agreement upon cruiser types and tonnages is vastly less important than the spirit in which naval rivalry is discussed.

It is significant that Mr. MacDonald's speech and attitude have commanded such universal approval in Great Britain. Violently as it would oppose nationalization of the mines, British business gives Ramsay MacDonald its cordial support in his program as regards America, the Rhineland, and Russia. Mr. Churchill was right in saying that Mr. MacDonald's foreign policy seemed today to be one of making the world safer for capitalism; but he forgot that it was not Mr. MacDonald but Mr. Churchill who had changed his mind. Mr. MacDonald has always preached peace and stability, believing that Labor would have the best chance of winning its economic demands in a peaceful and friendly world; Mr. Churchill, high priest of capitalism that he is, has advocated browbeating Germans and maintaining barbed-wire barriers between Communist Russia and the rest of the world. He has learned despite himself that such policies do not aid business; he admits it in his taunt to Mr. MacDonald. And therein lies a significant and hopeful fact. Increasingly, the conservative business forces which once thought in narrowly nationalistic terms see that their own interest lies in the direction of Labor's dream of an internationalized world.

Indeed, it may well be argued that business is the most powerful force for peace in the world today. It has not the conscious idealism of the old international labor congresses, but it has a power of influencing governments which they lacked, and almost nothing happens in the world today to which business is unitedly opposed. The Labor Government comes into power in England partly because a section of British business has ceased to fear its domestic policy and has come to respect its international program. And on the other side of the world Japanese business has just played the major role in forcing a change in Japan's positive policy in China. Japanese labor is still too weak to affect government policy; but Japanese business found that mere nationalism in China hurt Japanese trade. The Tsinanfu expedition and the suspicion of Japanese participation in the plot that killed Chang Tso-lin aroused a resentment in China which made itself felt in Osaka and Kobe—very sensitive to declining export figures.

In this country, too, despite the Grundys and the other tariff maniacs, despite the threats of oil wars in the Near East and the power rivalries in South America, one may count upon the support of the substantial business community in any reasonable program of Anglo-American friendship. And when the United States finally gets around to recognizing the existence of twelve-year-old Soviet Russia (which Mr. Hoover now indicates may be in the near future), it may well be that only the hidebound reactionaries of the American Federation of Labor will be found repeating the old curses of 1917, while hard-headed business men, shepherded by the enigmatic Ivy Lee, will demand those normal diplomatic relations which give business its best protection.

The millennium has not yet come. Business has not changed its hankering for profits, and occasionally profits coincide with conflict. There were those who, in 1914, felt assured that the interlocking interests of British and German capital would prevent the cataclysm. Business was not a unit then; it is not a unit today. It is no more a unit than is labor, say in this country, where the old guard and the Communists hate each other with far more bitterness than either of them directs against the employers. But there is a trend. The gory lesson of 1914-1918 has not gone utterly unheeded; the distresses of Europe in the post-treaty period of national rivalries were even more impressive. And behind these is the impelling influence of the swelling economic tide of international trade.

Can We Abolish Sunday?

TO distribute leisure equitably in a machine age without an undue waste of productive power is no easy task. Borrowing our practices from the pre-machine age we have accepted the notion that there is only one sound method of distributing leisure, that is to choose one day in every seven as a compulsory legal holiday and close factories, stores, banks, and schools on that day. If it has occurred to some that this distribution of leisure is tremendously wasteful in view of the overhead expense required to maintain machinery in idleness, the practice has not been subject to severe attack because the institution of Sunday has seemed to be the only device that would guarantee leisure to everybody. So, while Sunday as a religious holiday has declined in the face of higher criticism and the motor car, the day as an institution of leisure has acquired new sanctions from enlightened public opinion. We have been anxious to defend it from the seven-day-a-week employer, so anxious in fact that we have not stopped to ask whether the basic idea of a universal weekly holiday may not be outmoded as the machine process enters into new areas of our life.

Now comes the Soviet Government rushing in where individualists fear to tread and abolishes Sunday as a legal holiday by decree. The decree, which is scheduled to go into operation this month, did not receive in the American press the attention that it deserves, perhaps because American editors interpreted the new policy as simply one more anti-religious gesture by an atheist government. Walter Duranty of the New York Times, however, sensed its full importance when he said:

> Whoever conceived this measure is little short of a genius, for it kills at least five big birds with one small stone. First, it will increase factory output 20 per cent. Second, it will provide jobs for workers eliminated by industrial "rationalization." Third, it will be a powerful weapon in the Soviet anti-religious campaign against Sunday and church holidays. Fourth, it will give "more backward" countries like England and Germany a new idea for their struggle against unemployment. Finally, it will reduce overhead by the elimination of the weekly "let-down" both of machines and man-power.

Of course the Soviet Government does not propose to sacrifice a single hour of the workers' rest-time by this new plan. It will try to establish in place of Sunday and Saturday afternoon a stagger plan of leisure, giving every worker one day and a half to two days of holiday every week. Ultimately it expects to make the five-day week universal for the workers and the seven-day week universal for the machines.

When one asks if such a plan could be applied to American industry numberless difficulties suggest themselves. What if the courtship of John and Jane were progressing satisfactorily by virtue of mutual, languorous week-ends together when suddenly the government or the corporations declared that Jane's holidays from the office should come on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, and John's on Thursdays and Fridays? The thought of millions of Johns and Janes and Mr. and Mrs. Johnses and little Johnses being separated from one another or from chosen friends during their holidays creates sympathy in our heart for them and for any Chief Distributor of Holidays in an American industrial Utopia. Also, the plan is useless for farms because they could not be run economically under a stagger system of labor forces unless they were prodigiously large; and the plan implies much more social control of industry than exists in America today or is likely to exist for many years to come. The Russian government is not only the commander-in-chief of national industry but the chief employer, directing the scope and methods of industry through the Gosplan as a general directs an army. With our negative conception of government as a strolling policeman we could not put into effect a coordinated plan of work-distribution that would guarantee leisure. The simple, clumsy scheme of weekly universal holidays now in force seems to entail the maximum of social control that our employers will tolerate.

But when we have said that the Soviet plan of abolishing Sunday is not practical for America today we have not destroyed the prophetic significance of the experiment. Whether we like it or not, we are moving in the direction of this plan. Thousands of American industries now keep in operation seven days a week with a shifting labor force and the stagger system of leisure: for example, railroads, steamship lines, motion-picture theaters, newspapers, electric and gas companies, police, fire, and water systems, gasoline and repair stations, dairies, hotels, restaurants, and drug stores—to say nothing of homes. As our life has become more interdependent and complex these industries have gradually been accepted as seven-day necessities, although many of them are not. During the war we promptly abandoned our conventional notions of Sunday and leisure as far as the factory system was concerned. In the light of these experiences and tendencies the Soviet plan of distributing leisure is neither so fantastic nor so revolutionary as it seems at first glance.

Let the Negro Ride!

NORTH CAROLINA is witnessing a strange perversion of the notorious "Jim Crow" laws. Whereas originally these were intended to discriminate against the Negro by separating him from the white race, today certain Tar Heels are invoking their "Jim Crow" law in order to guarantee the Negro accommodations equal to those provided for whites. In other words, the civil rights of the North Carolina Negro are receiving protection through the much-maligned "Jim Crow" measures.

In the past six years North Carolina whites and blacks have put more than $120,000,000 into hard-surfaced roads. Their system has received nation-wide attention. Recently this was indicated by a poll of the American Automobile Association in which 78 per cent of the motorists listed North Carolina as their favorite touring State. This development has been financed chiefly by motorists—white and black alike, according to the relative power of the white man's Lincoln or the Negro's Ford. In this respect there has been perfect equality of the races. Not a trace of racial discrimination. Graciously the whites have allowed the Negro to pay as he rides and to ride as he pays.

Following in the wake of this highway construction has come another economic development in which the Negroes have not been allowed to participate. This is the modern system of motor-bus transportation, the foundation of which rests on the good roads of the State. So far as Negroes are concerned, busses are closed vehicles. By day and night they thunder over the highways partially built by black money, but in light and darkness they carry only passengers of fair skins. The Negro's money is legal tender when it comes to buying cement and crushed stone, but no Negro's dollar passes at the ticket office. Take a Negro in Asheville who wishes to visit his mother in Raleigh, or do some cotton picking with his folks in Cumberland County. If he has an automobile, he can go ahead; if he hasn't, and there is a train running to his destination, he can board a "Jim Crow" coach; if neither of these is possible, he is faced with a long walk, for he cannot buy a ticket on a bus, even though the company has a franchise as a common carrier. For years the Negro may have been paying gasoline taxes, automobile taxes, accessory taxes. But that makes no difference. North Carolina roads are built by the whites and the blacks, but "For Whites Only" read the signs in the Tar Heel busses.

Certainly this is a strange situation. But stranger yet, and highly welcome, is the movement now under way in North Carolina to remedy the situation—to give fair treatment to the Negroes by forcing the busses to transport passengers regardless of their race. This movement is headed by a group of prominent whites who are associated in an interracial commission. Realizing that efforts to allow Negroes to ride side by side with whites would prove futile, these North Carolina residents have played their legal cards skilfully. They knew that the "Jim Crow" law required all common carriers to provide separate compartments for white and Negro passengers. So they applied to the State Corporation Commission for an order directed to the bus lines. The Corporation Commission side-stepped. It admitted that the law was with the interracial body, but denied that the matter was in the jurisdiction of the commission. So the interracial organization went to the courts for an order to require busses to transport Negro passengers. It won. On April 27 Judge Barnhill ruled from the Superior Court bench that bus lines were common carriers and must "provide equal, but separate, accommodations for white and Negro passengers."

For years persons believing in justice for the Negro have objected to "Jim Crow" laws. The protests started in 1881 when Tennessee passed the first measure requiring separate compartments or coaches on railways for the two races. Other Southern States soon enacted similar laws to separate the two races on trains and steamboats, in cafes, in restaurants and theaters, and sometimes even cities and towns. Protests against these laws have continued, in some cases going into the courts, but to no avail. Even the United States Supreme Court has approved the constitutionality of the "Jim Crow" laws. This court held that where equal accommodations were provided, separate accommodations were not illegal discriminations. Today certain liberal-minded Southerners have seized upon this for the benefit of the Negroes. They are not thinking of political equality, nor are they striking at white supremacy. They wish equal opportunities in economic life for all, and their fair-mindedness is full of promise for better racial relations.

No Laws for Dawes

YEARS hence, when the contemporary papers of the State Department are published as red, white, and blue books, the dispatches of Charles G. Dawes, our ambassador in London, will prove rich reading, thinks a correspondent of the New York Times. He writes:

> When asked today if the ambassador was as candid in his correspondence with the department as in his speeches, Secretary Stimson said that he was more so. The public, the Secretary of State added, has a restraining influence on the ambassador which he himself did not seem to have.

We anticipate that some of Mr. Dawes's dispatches will read about as follows:

London, June 26, 1929

DEAR STIM: So this is London! Well, Hell and Maria, if this is London give me Peoria. Went to the Queen's court last night. Wore pants same as in God's country. No knee britches for me! What's good enough for Chicago is good enough for London. "How's tricks, your Majesty?" I asked, wanting to be nice to Mary. She looked at me like a pain in the neck for a full minute. Then she just said "Oh?" I suppose that's the English idea of a snappy comeback. DAWES

P. S. The coffee here tastes like the Chicago drainage canal used to smell.

London, July 2, 1929

DEAR STIMMY: Lloyd George came around for tea, as he called it, though I'd had it put in all the papers that I wasn't serving any hootch at the embassy. (It's not worth while; this foreign stuff hasn't any pep to it.) He bragged about winning the election. "How do you get that way?" I asked. "All the papers had Mac winning." "But the Liberals have the balance of power," he said. "Listen, Bo," I answered, "I notice Mac and the Labor boys have all the offices. In God's country the boys who get the offices have all the power they want, and anybody is welcome to the balance." CHAS.

London, July 8, 1929

DEAR OLD ELK: The French Ambassador called this morning and I asked him to hang around and have lunch. As it was the hired girl's day off, I took him to a Lyons restaurant, wanting to make a good impression. I asked him what he'd have, and after a glance at the bill of fare His Excellency (like hell!) looked at me and said: "Toad in a hole." "Toad yourself," I came right back, "and frog too. The only industry your country's got is the manufacture, transportation, and sale of immoral post cards. Besides, Frenchie, you owe us a lot of money and if Andy Mellon doesn't have a check by the first of the month he'll put the bill in the hands of a collection agency."

Had dinner last night at Lord Highhat's of the Cold-cream Guards. Sat by Lady or Duchess Somebody-or-other. I can't remember which or who and didn't give a cuss. I couldn't understand her English and so got out my pipe and smoked. Finally I made out she was asking me how I like the English summer. "Well," I said, "it's not so hot." "Not so hot as what?" she asked, the dumbbell. It sure is true the English have no sense of humor.

Lord Highhat invited me to visit him in August for the shooting. Hell and Maria, no! I left Chicago to get away from the shooting. CHARLIE

It Seems to Heywood Broun

A YOUNG Southerner in the current American Mercury displays rather more than the usual frankness about the Negro question in an article called A White Man in the South. The point he develops is hardly startling, and yet few of his fellows are willing to make the same confession. G. Peyton Wertenbaker says in effect that the familiar Southern talk about this or that being for the best interest of both races is sheer bunk. The attitude of the embattled Nordic is conditioned solely by what he feels to be his own self-interest.

I believe very firmly that the self-interest of which the young man speaks is essentially short-sighted. It seems to me that the Southern white has suffered almost as much as the Negro from the policy of segregation. Still, it may be an excellent indication of better days to come when pretense can be abolished by white debaters and the whole problem treated realistically. But even the somewhat disarming frankness of Mr. Wertenbaker cannot hide the fact that he, too, labors under the weight of stencils. The best minds of the South have been corrupted by the fact that it is the custom of the country to send logic and clear thinking out of the room as soon as the word "Negro" is mentioned. Surely no one can fairly assert that the South has approached this particular subject in a scientific spirit. Science demands of its disciples that they shall familiarize themselves to the highest possible extent with the material under discussion. The South on the other hand has set up a paradox. The proud Nordic begins by saying, "Down here we know the Negro." But almost immediately he adds that, of course, he would never think of having any social contacts with him. No man is a hero to his valet, and in return no master ever knows his servant as a complete human being. The Southerner who studiously refrains from ever going into a Negro home except for charitable or immoral purposes has no right to claim intimate knowledge of a race which he has rendered outcast. Surely self-consciousness is not swept away by handing over a Christmas turkey and, to paraphrase a familiar anecdote, sexual intercourse does not constitute an introduction. If the South really wants to know the Negro it should delegate some white man to be blasted for the sins of the people and to live, if possible, upon terms of complete equality with a colored family.

The particular fallacy which Mr. Wertenbaker accepts without any first-hand investigation is the familiar one that it is really too bad to give a liberal education to any Negro because the added knowledge will only serve to increase his tragic sense of frustration. This is a very familiar assertion, and the white men of the South find it comforting. It helps to ease the Caucasian conscience over the fact that the South is still niggardly in the matter of appropriations for Negro education. It is fair to say that in recent years there has been a vast improvement in this respect, but even now the emphasis is placed almost entirely upon schools which fit the student for some trade.

"An educated Negro," writes Mr. Wertenbaker, "must live in a strange and unhappy world of introspection. The color-complex must overshadow and distort all his attempts to give himself completely to the problems which ordinarily occupy a man's mind. Education is the means of preparing men for our complicated civilized life. What is the point of educating a man who is, from the beginning, denied any share in that life?"

But a somewhat similar argument could be used against the higher education for anyone at all. Knowledge does increase sensitivity, and the educated man, white or black, is more keenly conscious of the shams and injustices which walk abroad in the world. But there is compensation for both Negro and Nordic. The college professor who is snooted or patronized by some rich Babbitry alumnus has sufficient realization of his own superiority to laugh in his sleeve at the stupid fellow. The antics of a Heflin may anger the uneducated Negro; they merely serve to amuse the black who can look down at the Senator from an eminence.

It is not rash to assume that Mr. Wertenbaker has never been the close friend of any educated Negro. He could not otherwise so readily accept the picture of the black scholar suspended drearily between earth and heaven. Naturally each man testifies from his own experience, and upon examination of all my acquaintances I select without question one who lives more fully and has more fun than any other that I know. He is a member of Phi Beta Kappa, a graduate of Columbia Law School, a superb musician, and a Negro. I mean Paul Robeson. The Mercury's Southern observer does not seem to realize that it is possible for an educated Negro to attain a state where he looks with a somewhat amused contempt at the ruddier manifestations of race prejudice. Many times I have heard Robeson tell with great hilarity of some slight which he had encountered on a train or in a hotel. I don't mean that the incident may not have been annoying or even painful at the time it happened, but the man had sufficient poise and background finally to drain off his emotion by putting the whole thing into a funny story.

After all, a Negro who has had the privilege of outdistancing his white rivals in the classroom and of shaking the very teeth of Nordic halfbacks upon the gridiron cannot possibly be humiliated by having Caucasian supremacy dangled in front of him. No Negro is truly a tragic figure merely because some white man informs him of inferiority. He becomes tragic only if he believes it. But the skeptics are hourly increasing. It is a curiously simple game which the Southern white has played upon the Negro. By main force he holds the black man's head close to the earth and then he says: "See; you are a member of an inferior race, and I can prove it to you by pointing out that you insist upon holding your nose in the dust."

But if G. Peyton Wertenbaker thinks that there is anything dismal or tragic in being a Negro intellectual I think he should plead for a Harlem invitation. He will find that the colored college graduate has learned, along with other things, the secret of true gaiety. When Dr. Du Bois dances any spectator can readily observe that the higher education is not a handcuff to the Negro.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Law—and Law Enforcement

By VICTOR S. YARROS

NOT a few liberals think, and say bluntly, that the whole investigation of law enforcement and law observance by a special national commission is a Babbittian-Pecksniffian enterprise bound to end in smoke, or, rather, in a few platitudinous and perfunctory exhortations to which no attention will be paid by any considerable group. This view is plausible, but not necessarily sound. Much will depend on the attitude and methods of the commission, or of those of its members who have moral courage, breadth, insight, and appreciation of the relation existing between lawmaking and the great forces that shape the life of states and civilizations. There are some able, cultivated, and thoughtful persons on the commission. If they succeed in formulating its problems correctly and in freeing the collective mind of the commission of all cant and make-believe, they should accomplish much good.

It is true that Mr. Hoover has asked the commission to inquire into the enforcement and observance of all the laws. Such a task, of course, is impossible and would be futile were it possible. It is true that Mr. Wickersham, the chairman of the commission, has been making superficial and confusing remarks concerning the scope of the investigation and the results to be aimed at, but these discouraging circumstances need not prove fatal.

The first question to ask is this: Whence the striking and notorious differences in the general treatment of laws, organic and statutory? Plainly, the assertions that "law is law," and that all laws have the same sanctions behind them, are arbitrary, gratuitous, and contrary to the clear testimony of history and experience. Laws fall naturally into categories, and it is necessary, at the outset, to distinguish and differentiate the categories.

There are, for example, the laws forbidding murder, arson, burglary, theft, forgery, and like acts. Few sane persons violate these laws deliberately. We say that the murder rate in this country is too high, or we assert, with Chief Justice Taft, that our administration of criminal justice is "a disgrace to our civilization," and there may be truth in such affirmations. But has any intelligent person ever said that the murder rate was a serious menace to the American government, or to the institution of property, the family, or capitalism?

On the other hand, millions of persons daily and gaily violate the Volstead prohibition law; millions of persons violate systematically, and without the slightest strain on conscience, the so-called general property-tax law still in effect in most of our States; tens of thousands smuggle in contempt of the ancient and dishonorable customs laws; millions of white persons in the Sunny South trample upon the Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments of the Federal Constitution and ruthlessly disfranchise millions of black citizens of the United States. Again, millions of Americans pay little heed to anti-gambling and anti-betting laws. They play poker and bridge for money, and do not feel that they are bad and undesirable citizens by reason of that fact. Obviously, the laws just mentioned belong somehow in a category different from the group enumerated earlier.

Between the two categories named there is at least one other, instances of which may be found in the income-tax laws, national and State, or the banking laws, or the laws controlling and regulating railroads and other public utilities.

Now, to comprehend the categories and the reasons why they arise and persist, the Hoover commission would do well to refresh its memory by consulting Blackstone, Sir Henry Maine, Professor Dicey, James C. Carter, Dr. Hadley, and other writers who have written philosophically on the subject of lawmaking and the relation of that process to what we call public opinion. It might read up some chapters in standard law books on the development of the Law Merchant. Such studies, even if not thorough, would shed considerable light on the supposed-to-be burning question of law observance and law enforcement. They would direct attention to certain basic and essential principles which no legislative or executive authority can afford to disregard.

There is another suggestion which I would humbly submit to the commission. Let it ask itself, in considering this or that law which admittedly meets with troublesome resistance, whether or not, if it were referred to the electorate de novo, it would be likely to receive the approval of a decisive majority. This test of a mental referendum is not infallible, to be sure, but it would be very helpful and suggestive. How many persons, for example, would vote for the repeal of the major features of the Criminal Code; how many for the repeal of the Volstead law; how many for the repeal of protection; and how many for the repeal or liberalization of the anti-gambling and anti-betting laws? The results of such referendums would be arrestingly and significantly different, and assuredly the differences would not be accidental! Some years ago that able and thoroughly judicious London journal, the New Statesman, in discussing the prohibition agitation in Great Britain, said that it would not oppose a national prohibition law if 85 per cent of the voters should, at a referendum election, register their approval of such a law. The suggested percentage may seem arbitrary, but it is at bottom reasonable and philosophical. Where the moral issue in or behind a proposed law is not clear, democracies should beware of imposing the will of an insufficient, unimpressive majority upon a strong, solid, respectable minority.

I would venture to make a third suggestion to the Hoover commission. It cannot examine and cross-examine millions of average citizens, but it can select a few hundred prominent, representative, and influential citizens—citizens who preach law observance on every occasion—and put certain questions to them. The answers would be illuminating.

For instance, why not invite Messrs. Taft, Coolidge, and Hoover to appear before the commission and state why they have done nothing, while in the White House, to enforce the Negro suffrage provisions of the Constitution? What President has sent a special message earnestly recommending reduction of the representation of the South in Congress? If no such message has ever been sent, why has a part of the sacrosanct Constitution been treated as a dead letter? And what has the President or either of the living ex-Presidents to say about the example they set to the nation by their indifference and hostility to that part of the Constitution? Again, let the commission put on the witness stand some fifty or sixty churchgoing and benevolent millionaires and ask them why they have evaded and violated the general property-tax laws. These laws, we know, are antiquated, confiscatory in thousands of cases, and badly in need of modernization, but, if "law is law," what right has any citizen to pick and choose, to decide what laws he will obey and what he will forget and ignore? Yet again, let the commission ask national and State legislators why reapportionment provisions have been nullified for decades, why whole sections and districts have been partially disfranchised.

The answers in all the hypothetical cases mentioned for purposes of illustration are known in advance. No sincere thinker will pretend otherwise. We may summarize the answers as follows: If a government wants its laws observed and effectively enforced, it must see to it that they are enforceable to begin with—that is, consonant with dominant public opinion. Few laws command literally universal assent; but any law that offends the intelligence and the sentiments of any considerable portion of the average population is foredoomed to fail. The laws that are and long have been evaded and broken are laws of certain types—laws that millions of respectable and otherwise docile and conservative persons deem to be unbearably tyrannical, or silly and totally unnecessary, or the product of bigotry and ignorant fanaticism.

No student of the political and social sciences will question the cogency and validity of these answers. In the words of H. G. Wells, the Anglo-Saxon peoples have their own ways of enacting laws and of nullifying them. The notion that free and intelligent men have ever worshiped law and obeyed all the commands and injunctions of legislatures lacks even the semblance of support in history or in contemporaneous experience. Is it desirable to undertake a campaign in favor of complete unquestioning obedience to and respect for law as such? No thoughtful person will answer in the affirmative. It is too late in the day to claim divine origin and divine sanction for law. Where the law is not intrinsically reasonable and respectable, it is idle to urge respect for it. Laws put over by accidental majorities at the behest of organized and aggressive minorities, or even bare majorities, will always cause mischief and friction. Let me suggest that the Hoover commission will do more for order and good government by advocating the repeal of obsolete laws, unenforceable laws, laws repugnant to the mental habits and ideas of millions of reputable persons than by favoring severity in punishment or reiterating the fallacy that the way to get rid of a bad law is to enforce it strictly.

Further, the commission has a fine opportunity to recur to and emphasize certain fundamental principles and propositions. Let me mention some of them:

In the words of John Morley, government should not ask more of human nature than it is capable of giving.

Governments cannot sell privileges or play favorites, and escape corruption.

There still is, and there always will be, a distinction between malum per se and malum prohibitum, and there is good reason for the distinction.

Majorities have no divine right to coerce and rule minorities, and the power of majorities must always be exercised with discretion and moderation.

The tastes and habits of millions cannot be suddenly elevated by legislative fiat, and where tastes are vulgar and low, they should be gradually, tactfully, gently improved. Roughly and unceremoniously to deprive millions of the amusements and diversions they prefer and enjoy is not to better the moral-aesthetic situation, but to invite extra-legal and illegal shifts and devices on their part.

Control and regulation may yield beneficial results where prohibitory laws defeat their avowed purpose.

The Hoover commission, then, can render notable service to the cause of rational order and civil liberty by re-emphasizing the foregoing and similar truths, and by insisting that unenforceable laws should be repealed by common consent, not persisted in under the hollow notion that "law is law" and that there is some moral duty to obey every law that happens to linger on or to reach the statute-books.

Revolt in Hollywood

By SOMERSET LOGAN

Hollywood, June 23

EQUITY will prevail in Hollywood. The embattled thespians of this city, members of the Actors' Equity Association, are girding up their loins for combat with the motion-picture producers and their wealthy backers. The producers have doggedly refused either to negotiate with the actors, or to recognize their union in any way. If the present uncompromising attitude is maintained, there is only one effective weapon available for the actors—the strike.

During the first week of June of this year, Frank Gilmore, president of the Actors' Equity, notified all members of the association residing in Los Angeles that on June 5 and thereafter only the new Equity basic agreement was to be accepted by Equity members from producers of talking or sound pictures—which virtually meant all pictures. Contracts signed before that time were to be scrupulously observed, but upon their expiration nothing but the Equity agreement was to be signed.

Mr. Gilmore and the Equity Council considered this action mandatory on their part, since six months ago, in response to a questionnaire sent to all Los Angeles members of Equity, 1,087 votes were cast in favor of all-Equity casts for talking pictures, and only 98 against. Therefore, after a close study of the local situation, Mr. Gilmore, who is now in Hollywood leading the fight, fired the first gun.

The struggle promises to be an interesting one, for more than 70 per cent of the people in talking pictures are members of the Actors' Equity, many of them commanding the highest salaries. Several actors who ignored the edict of their organization and signed non-Equity contracts on or after June 5 have been promptly suspended from their union.

The producers are receiving the powerful assistance of intrenched privilege, including the local commercial organizations and the newspapers. Behind the actors are the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles and the American Federation of Labor. J. W. Bussel, secretary of the Central Labor Council, to which Equity is now allied, has pledged the unqualified support of the federated unions—the strongly organized camera-men, the operators, the electricians and carpenters, and allied crafts. President Green of the American Federation of Labor, in a telegram to Mr. Gilmore, has promised his heartiest support.

The courageous move of the Actors' Equity is the result of the picture actor's determination to have a union of his own, capable of correcting obvious abuses and instituting much-needed reforms. With the advent of the talking picture came the necessity of employing many legitimate theater actors with trained speaking voices. The local forces of Equity were increased, and a crisis became inevitable.

The abuses and maltreatment which the picture actors —particularly the small-part players—have suffered can scarcely be overstated. Actors are sometimes forced to accept contracts offering a lump sum for their part in a picture. In these contracts there is no stipulation as to the length of the working day, or the length of the entire engagement. An actor, upon engagement, must take the casting-director's word. Actors are quite frequently paid nothing for rehearsals. There are instances of players being required to work from sixty to eighty hours a week. When on location, any hours, from eight to twenty, have constituted a day—sometimes with an additional bonus, sometimes not. The entire working schedule is hopelessly vague and inequitable to the actor. The new Equity contract would correct such flagrant abuses.

Of course, the individual star can insist upon his own terms—and his price, but the character actor and the small-part player—and that includes the overwhelming majority of players—are frequently victimized. If they speak their mind, they are seldom reemployed at the same studio. With the recent amalgamation of so many of the picture companies, and the antagonism of the producers' association, this is no slight matter.

Actors' salaries in motion pictures may appear exorbitant to the outsider. But for every fabulous amount pocketed by some star of the first magnitude, there are a hundred modest salaries meted out to the small-part player. Moreover, the motion-picture actor, like so many of his legitimate theater confreres, is seldom sure of continuous employment. There are many weeks in each year when the actor is waiting about or looking for another transient engagement.

The producers are resorting to every conceivable device to break the spirit of the actors. As soon as Equity's ultimatum was received, one player after another was called to a studio—where he had never worked before—and was offered a tempting non-Equity contract. If he refused, he was told it was regrettable, and such a good part too! In one instance, a studio stock company was suddenly organized, offering long-term non-Equity contracts. Casting-directors are looking over files of players which have not been touched for a year. Lists of actors, including a few Equity people who signed the standard non-Equity studio contracts after the designated time, have been published in all the local press.

Every few days, the local papers, completely ignoring the essential decency of Equity's demands, and refusing to print any pro-Equity statements, publish reputed interviews with this or that prominent actor or actress, condemning the stand of Equity and highly commending the producers for their habitual sweetness and light. Both the Times, with its notorious anti-union proclivities, and the Examiner, with its owner a picture producer in his own right, have had lengthy editorials against Equity. In order to offset this propaganda, the local Equity Association is publishing, semi-weekly, the Actors' Equity News.

The tone and general attitude of the little paper are well exemplified in the following excerpt. The Times, in a recent issue, said: "Instead of remaining an association of artists, it (Equity) placed itself in line and agreement with stage-hands, ditch-diggers, janitors, iron-molders, and such." To which the Actors' Equity News responded:

> WHY NOT? Walter Damrosch, Victor Herbert, and others found such alignment no bar to their art nor their dignity. WHY SHOULD YOU? And, after all, what's the matter with a ditch-digger . . . or a janitor, or a stage hand? A ditch-digger may not always be a ditch-digger. He may become a producer, or even a director. Just as much chance as shirt salesmen, clothes peddlers, waiters, or saloon-song pluggers.* That you once followed a lowly trade is no disgrace. Rather the reverse.
>
> Oh, Times, you got off on the wrong foot, for—— There was a Rail-splitter. . . . And once there was a Carpenter.

* * * * *

On June 17 the Actors' Equity Association called a general meeting of its members at the Writers' Club in Hollywood. More than 1,200 actors thronged the hall. George Arliss was in the chair, and Frank Gilmore addressed the gathering. There has never been such a display of genuine enthusiasm in Hollywood. Both speakers were given an ovation. The entire assembly stood up and cheered lustily for several minutes.

Mr. Gilmore read a resolution passed by the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles, pledging unstinted support. He then reviewed the present situation in the studios, emphasizing the necessity for Equity shop. He described the few members who had issued statements in the daily press against the organization as "selfish egotists, indifferent to the welfare of their fellow-players." When the players' names were mentioned they were greeted with a storm of boos and hisses. In concluding, Mr. Gilmore said:

> This uprising of the motion-picture actors is no passionate gesture of the moment. It is the result of eight years of striving to get the producers to meet us in a friendly conference, and because of their indifference to our efforts this move was the only possible thing to do, if we intend to remedy the flagrant injustices which are now so common. . . . We must win because our cause is just, and because in the offing there lies the sympathy and the association, if we need it, of the great American Federation of Labor.

The meeting adjourned with the actors singing the song first used in the theatrical strike of 1919, "All for one, and one for all." Other meetings are scheduled. The local office is a hive of activity. A strike? Perhaps. But with a resurgence of the indomitable spirit which characterized the struggle of 1919 and 1924, Equity is bound to prevail in Hollywood.

---

* A gentle reminder of the humble antecedents of a number of our directors and producers.

Backhill Culture

By CHARLES MORROW WILSON

CULTURE is not altogether a matter of geographical locality. The backhills have their intellectual life. They hold sensitive spirits and brilliant and appreciative minds. They hold dynamic philosophies, some of them still in infant stages, others hoary with age. The backhills have their literature; a literature of speech, for the most part vague and rambling, but a literature with the profound simplicity of uphill living.

A hillman's speech is usually one of isolated colloquialisms and hazy contradictions. His stories are frequently lacking both in beginnings and endings. But if you aren't interested you are at perfect liberty to slide over to the other side of the store steps and set in on another one. Hillbillies are dynamic story-tellers and story-builders. Convince one that you are not a federal-enforcement officer, a State game warden, a professional timber buyer, or a tourist from Kansas, and the chances are that he can tell you more stories in a forenoon than you can get from a year's subscription to the Saturday Evening Post. Stories happen in the backhills. There are old-time jubilations, barn-warmings, moonshining, stabbings, and gunplay. I know of a community in Taney County, Missouri, which claims the distinction of not having had a social gathering without bloodshed in seventeen years. There are stories of romantic rascals, horse thieves, cattle rustlers, lost valleys, guerrilla wars, dark-of-the-moon lynchings where fathers unknowingly have swung up their own sons. There are yarns about cave peoples, about Spanish gold, stories of pioneering, and of Reconstruction roughness; proverbs of wealth, weather, and fertility, explanations of being and becoming, of death and war and birth, and of eternity. There are yarns without limit either of length or of number, told by a people who have long been accustomed to indulgence in a leisurely extravagance of time.

Traditions in the back-country are as numerous as the turning lanes and flood gullies: That a soldier was shot down by the bushwhackers, that Uncle Ike Sellers buried gold in tin cans underneath his bean poles, that Dickey Dye was accustomed to slaughter twelve pigs annually for the nurture of each of his twelve offsprings, that one of the Kilgew boys saw a beautiful lady all in white standing alongside the rail fence by Hawson's hog pasture the night after the Pentecostal meetin'—these are typical of backhill traditions.

As a general thing backwoods people are not a reading folk. Because of the scant literacy, the isolation and poverty, books and magazines are scarce. But there are surprising exceptions. Take lodging for the night in a high hillside cabin and you may run across a fine old volume of Milton or Browning or Thoreau or Shakespeare, or you may find an old codger who sits about oozing forth dissertations upon the dictums of Omar. One time in a high-brush district of Carroll County, Arkansas, I ran across an old-time Victorian reading society composed of a dozen or so sockless yahooes who were reading aloud "Paradise Regained"!

But such instances are by way of exception. An occasional debate, a pie supper, a meetin' down at the schoolhouse, if there happens to be a schoolhouse, exposure to up-country fiddlers who play from shadowy recollection and highly concentrated stimulant, or possibly a "musical" conducted by a wandering singing-master who will for four bits and a night's lodging render ditties of praise and jubilation, these are approximately the only pursuits of aesthetics available in the backhills.

The up-country villages offer no relief. As a rule these are poor and docile and far-scattered; stragglings of paintless gray shops holding conglomerations of shelf groceries, harness leather, bolt drygoods, and powerful pills. The storekeeper sits with folded arms and sagging enthusiasm. He waits and waits. Presently he strolls out front and watches the clouds or goes into protracted reverie about when life was young down on Drake's Creek and clear corn liquor cost but a dollar a gallon. Then by the time he has adequately damned and god-damned taxes, road improvements, rural schools, and government, exchanged ribald salutations with some lively ladies from down around Eagle Knob, and sold a couple of pounds of Arbuckle's coffee and a pair of socks the day is done, and he is free to amble home, eat supper, blow out the lamp, and go to bed. As for the town's taverns and dens of refreshments, they are generally more or less filled with meandering drummers or circuit-riding lawyers or enforcement officers, any one of whom would ever so much rather be back where the crop of corner coppers and God-fearing Methodists is more flourishing.

Protestantism is fast dying in the backhills. Here in northwest Arkansas, for example, there are stretches of up-country twenty miles square which have neither a church nor a parson. Even more striking instances of the scarcity of God-houses may be pointed out in mountain sections of Missouri, Tennessee, or Kentucky. A recent church census conducted in one of the hill counties of southwestern Missouri showed that fewer than 10 per cent of the population professed themselves "Christian." As poverty comes to be more pressing, Protestantism becomes scarcer and scarcer. During a good season an up-country peasant's cash income will probably not average more than fifty dollars a year. In drought years he will take in virtually no cash at all. And if he has neither dollars nor any likely prospect of dollars he obviously cannot jar down with a bountiful Sunday's offering.

But preachers must be paid. An ambitious and progressive Methodist parson cannot be expected to stick indefinitely at Pettigrew, Arkansas, with a salary of twenty-one dollars a month and an annual allotment of four pigs, winter's firewood, and a wagon-load of corn. Accordingly backhill preachers are rapidly moving down to more promising pickings. For there are the valley towns with sewerage and police patrol, and the cities with their blocks full of souls in need of salvation and moving pictures with vaudeville.

True not all the Holy Rollers, Primitive Baptists, and Aboriginal Methodists have filtered down into the municipalities. In the outskirts of some of the backhill villages one can still find their diminutive congregations, but these very exceptions make the preservation of Protestantism all the more difficult. Denominationalism is iron-bound and the clashings of sects is both bitter and vicious. Thumb-sized slugs of lead have been known to enter into these pious discourses.

The hill-country commoner is far from being gullible. When it comes to four-square Gospels including orations on universal education, benevolent democracies, and better bulls and babies, he is likely to be slow to nibble and slower to swallow. Occasional roving exhorters come and go, and now and then a countryside will hold a late summer revival or a brush-arbor meetin'. But these outdoor protractions are essentially occasions for emotional overflow. There are generally more reversions to Bacchus than fearful prostrations before stern-featured Jehovah. In fact it would appear that in the run of these late August revivals there are more souls made than saved.

So, with the increasing scarcity of Protestantism the hillbilly may be able no longer to bolster his ego with periodic holyings. And as a result he takes on other deities, of whose potency he is daily conscious. Thus there have come into being another order of backhill gods—the trinity of soil, weather, and growth. These are the deities of effect. Joshua may or may not have made the sun stand still. Jonah may or may not have been swallowed by the whale. But this the hillman knows with powerful certainty that it falls wholly to this super-trinity of soil, weather, and growth to direct whether or not his corn turns out fifty bushels to the acre or only a hatful of non-shuckable nubbins; whether or not his fruit trees bear; whether or not his calves and pigs wax fat on open pasture, and ultimately whether or not he and his woman and his young'uns will eat heartily of likely victuals or scrimp through the winter on corn-pone and branch water.

Growth he can see and feed upon; soil and weather have immediate appeal to the range of his senses. He can recognize soil as a thing of beauty. Its color and texture predict coming harvests. Soil gives life and in turn takes life away. It provides his living. It is his first polaris. When he is hungry he takes food from it. When he is tired he finds it waiting and caressing.

But this trinity of soil, weather, and growth cannot be worshiped by gyrating or bawling forth hymns. Instead the hillman evolves a philosophy of harmony and submission. A sort of hazy pantheism it comes to be, free of text and teachers; a leisurely adoration of life as such, life the essential product of wind, rain, and sunshine, operating upon a given soil at a given season. It is a philosophy of animalism blended with one of leisurely compromise; it is an all-inclusive philosophy—worship, morality, group behavior, and credences all so pressingly interdependent as to demand saying at a single breath. The essential qualities of ba khill life demand that the backhill denizen acquire a phil sophy of self-sufficiency. But this philosophy does not have to be striven after. It comes, just as inevitably as the pawpaws come.

This merging of man with being, this submerging of self into life, has a powerful influence upon backhill morality. It has given rise to a unique system of ethical estimates. On the one hand there is the ethics of the Golden Rule. Such a morality urges that one shall feed the hungry, give water to the thirsty, and comfort to the suffering—only because it is within one's inward being to so give. Backhill ethics is essentially a morality of neighborliness. But it applies the Golden Rule only in part. It is a morality of compromise, a merging of altruism and utilitarianism.

Suppose that Bill Shrum up on Cato Creek has a sick woman on his hands. He is all wore down. For five nights he has had no sleep to speak about—only occasional cat naps. Moreover there are his five young'uns hanging around to be looked after. The herb doctor figures maybe it's typhoid but he can't do anything about it until he has taken time to procrastinate. What are the people of Cato District going to do about it? The chances are that they will, without hesitation or speculation, do the neighborly thing. They will contribute food, liquor, and company; they will take over the young'uns, tidy the house, change the bed-covers, and in general do their combined best to cure and comfort. Dynamic altruism? In part, apparently.

But there is its mission of utility. If Bill's woman has typhoid the disease may during the course of the summer spread to half the adjacent citizenry. Hill country drains rapidly. There is no sewage disposal. Usually the people take their drinking water from shallow wells or surface springs. Furthermore if the sick woman dies, the community will likely have to take over and parcel out the young ones. Thus it becomes a matter of the common good that Bill's woman recover with the greatest possible expediency.

Furthermore the theory of exchange is a motivating factor. There are no medical facilities, no established systems of credit, doctors are scarce, and transportation expensive and uncertain. Thus neighborliness comes to be mutually valuable. Next month the Tannehills may take sick. The same applies to slighter ills. If the Hatfield chickens develop roop or Tola Summerlin's hogs take the cholera the mishap is likely to become general. There are no stock laws in the back-stretches, all live stocks roam in Parnassian freedom of fences and so a disease will very probably spread and spread rapidly. If somebody leaves the gap to Lige Conner's field open and the stock break in and destroy his crops, that may result in another family for the community to feed.

Backhill morality appears to take little account of the excellencies of abstaining. To a hillbilly virtue appears heroic but futile. Sexual intercourse he regards as a turn in vital experience, and attaches to it but slight ethical import. To be sure the backhills still have their ample share of personal viciousness. Stabbings, murders, and feuds continue to result from games of horseshoes or mumble-the-peg, arguments over land or coon dogs, adultery or horse-trading. One reason is no more likely than another. Much of it appears to be pure animal meanness, the sort of thing which a behaviorist would be likely to attribute to poor feeding, exposure, cramping confinement, and depressed living conditions.

The ethical outlook of a people is necessarily influenced by their mechanics of living. Take the matter of communication, for example. Backhill stretches are not threaded over with power lines, telephone and telegraph services, railroads and paved highways. News is scarce and slow of coming. I have talked with hill people who never heard of the World War, and just the other day I brought a fine old free silverer to the point of tears when I told him that William Jennings Bryan was dead.

Absence of ready communication cuts off any number of moral urges. The up-country commoner hears nothing about relief for the famine-stricken Chinese, the support of superannuated ministers, or the encroachment of Dutch-Shell. He hears nothing about them, he knows nothing about them, and accordingly they play no part in shaping his behavior, moral or otherwise. Politically speaking, the run of backhillsmen are individualists. To them law and governments and constitutions and professional politics are vague as river mists in autumn. Law rarely ever suffers systematic enforcement in the backhills. You may find half a dozen townships in a row and not one of them with an officer or an official of any kind. There are, to be sure, intermittent raiding parties against the moonshiners, but the prohibitionists frequently prove to be the hardest-looking and least-ethical inhabitants of the uplands. Sheriffs are generally easy-going hangers-on at the county-seat town. In almost any back-country community you will hear accounts of stabbings or murders, of rapines and of mysterious disappearances.

"What legal action was taken?"

They look you over in doll-eyed amazement.

"Mister, this ain't in town."

There are other more casual outcroppings of backhill culture; backhill music, for example, an institution holding sway in its place of origin, a music as free of notes and clefts as a razorback hog is of registered ancestry. Approximately every backhill community has its favorite fiddler and approximately every fiddler will sooner or later favor you with his own compositions. The other night I was in Monkey Run, Madison County, Arkansas. Monkey Run is a typical hamlet of the higher-brush country. To say that it has fifty people would be flattering. But Monkey Run, Arkansas, has at least three active composers. The time was Saturday night, the occasion was a house-warmin' over at McCracken's. Dave Dingler was fiddling. Dave opened the evening by rendering virtually every standby on the musical menu of the countryside, which brought down mighty rough usage on the new plank floor. Then he began to favor with an array of original compositions—all out of his own head, including the titles.

"Hawk's Got the Chicken an' Gone," "Hawgs in the Cawn Patch," "Kickin' Up Dust," "One-legged Man What Sprained His Ankle," all of them rather delightful skits. Then Uncle Johnny Mulholland played some of his inventions and one of the Menges boys was on hand to demonstrate his ability at making sweet sounds. The audience displayed no wonder. Most backhill fiddlers do make up a good part of their tunes; playing them from memory as long as they can recollect them, which is likely quite a spell—the trouble being that each rendition may require befitting alterations until the original comes to be lost altogether. Most back-country musicians are musically illiterate. Show one a quarter note alongside an exclamation point and the chances are that he cannot tell which is which. But there are surprising similarities in the themes of old fiddlers, hints of the classic masters, and sweeps of fine romanticism.

There are songs of the hills, sentimental and lyric ditties and bastard ballads, era songs, Baldknobber songs, rustler songs, and moonshiner songs; place songs, sea chanteys brought to land. And by way of twin grace is backhill dancing, a folk institution, rhythmic and joyous; dances of light-footedness and ease, dances free of sobbing saxophones and perspiring brass. And although hill people are likely to be aged beyond their years, stooped by hard labor and poor diet, burned and roughened by exposure to rough weather and worrisome ills and poverty, young and old can still dance with spontaneity and delight.

There are other outcroppings in the form of countryside etiquette and folk ways, home-raisings, log-rollings, and half-ritualistic hunting and fishing expeditions, institutions which have, in other portions of our Republican empire, become lost in the mist of passing years. But backhill culture is self-regenerative and self-sustaining. It is a working philosophy of self-sufficiency. As an institution it is probably about as old as the hills and apparently it is to about the same degree subject to outside alteration.

In the Driftway

HENRY FORD is not one of the Drifter's major prophets, but his recent comment on age is wise enough to bear much repeating. After saying that he preferred workers between thirty-five and sixty years of age because of their greater stability and experience, and that he would not exclude those beyond sixty who could still do their work, he made this comment: "It is usual to associate age with years only because so many men and women somewhere along in what is called middle age stop trying. They let themselves be old."

* * * * *

THAT coincides precisely with one of the Drifter's pet beliefs—and therefore must be right. Two of life's greatest bogies are the clock and the calendar. The Drifter is not launching a campaign for their abolition. Neither could be extirpated from modern life, and both have certain legitimate uses. But they are overworked. The wise men who address graduating classes often urge their hearers not to watch the clock. It is quite as important not to watch the calendar. Probably it would be a great benefit to our children if we did not observe their birthdays. Certainly after the twentieth year we should cease to tell others our age and should as far as possible forget it ourselves. There is too much indiscriminate and unnecessary asking and recording of age. Such demands should generally be met either with refusal or, when that is impossible, with a fictitious statement in regard to what is nobody's legitimate concern. As it is, half of life is spent in being told we are too young for this and that, the rest in being assured we are too old for it. And what's worse, we get in the habit of talking the same sort of balderdash to ourselves.

* * * * *

THE Drifter can still recall as one of his most melancholy recollections an afternoon at the mature age of fourteen when he sat several hours in bitter regret and dejection meditating on his vanished youth and wasted opportunities. Girls of fourteen are told—or used to be—that they are too old to romp. Men tell themselves at twenty-five that they are too old for sprinting because the records for short-distance running have been made by striplings of nineteen or twenty. At thirty these same persons tell themselves they are too old for football, and at thirty-five too old for baseball. A little later, guided by conventional belief rather than personal experience, they decide they are too old to learn a foreign language or to make new friends. Thus most of us go on through life putting certain things behind at various periods not because we are incapable of them, but merely because we think we must be.

* * * * *

FORTUNATELY women are now pooh-poohing many of the old conventions about age. No woman of this day thinks she is shelved as an old maid simply because she is not married by the time she is thirty, nor does a matron of fifty believe the time has come to retire to a rocking-chair and knitting. Women in their forties used to say they were "too old to dance." Now our bobbed-haired dancing grandmothers are too common to be a novelty. Fortunately we have practically no age limit on the dance floor any longer. Your conscience and the limberness of your knees is your guide. It's a sane rule. On with the dance!

* * * * *

THE Drifter doesn't know why anybody should want to live forever, but as a feat the thing doesn't seem impossible. George Bernard Shaw's case for it in "Back to Methuselah" is not wholly fantastic. Considering what medicine has done and is still likely to do toward patching up and keeping going the human body, everlasting life may be more than a consolation of religion. We die now because we think we ought to. After the conventional number of years we regard ourselves as old. Presently—with a proper sense of what is expected of us—we begin to fail, and finally we fade from the scene. In various ways the span of life has been extended in modern times. Bit by bit it can be still further lengthened, and in no way more effectively, perhaps, than through forgetting as far as possible what we are accustomed to call our age; through refusing to have the course of life preordained for us by an artifice like the calendar.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

"Undressing America"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On the roof of my house I have a small platform with sides. I suggest this device to lovers of sunlight like Stuart Chase and I attach the following list of advantages: (a) The two-foot solid railing cuts off the view and complaints of neighboring subconscious wish-fulfillers, (b) it is not expensive and the children like it for other purposes, (c) it is convenient—a person can dress in his own room and take a blanket and pillow with him to the observatory, (d) the defense can be offered that it is all equipment for amateur astronomy, (e) in the evening the stars, moon, and planets yield feelings of escape from our social heritage, feelings that are in reality the same awareness of man's insignificance experienced by day-time astronomers.

Fairhope, Alabama, June 30 WILLARD H. EDWARDS

"Wolf Solent"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I enter a brief minority report against Joseph Wood Krutch's review of "Wolf Solent"? It is a distinguished review, as usual; and though it leaves me dissatisfied, I find it hard to point out where Mr. Krutch seems to me mistaken or unjust. Very probably he is neither; and it is only because of a difference in temperament that I see the book more rosily, and find in it profound delights that would appear insubstantial to a scientific mind. Wolf is a man made up of nerves, and doomed to a hundred thousand wounds; he is inevitably an introvert, fated to have no victories except those that philosophy can bring; we must not expect him to be a "hero," or to carry the story of his wandering tentatives to an epic conclusion. He is inconsequential, without definiteness of purpose or direction; the whole purpose of the book, as I thought, was to portray this poetic indeterminateness of mind that achieves nothing and feels everything. To say that Wolf arrives nowhere is not to say that the book is aimless or ineffectual; on the contrary, it is just because the book attempts so difficult a theme as human failure, and just because it gathers so much incidental wisdom and beauty on its leisurely way, that it seems to some of us a unique achievement in subject, in temper, and in style. I read every word of it with great happiness: here was literature, the expression of a profound and matured philosophy of life, in prose that verged at every moment on the finest poetry; as a friend said to me, "John Keats has come back to life, and is writing prose." We have so little style in contemporary American literature that when a man comes who carves his sentences like statuary, colors them like paintings, and tunes them like music, I am grateful. "Wolf Solent" has faults; but I am convinced that the future will rate it as one of the very greatest novels of our time.

Great Neck, New York, June 26 WILL DURANT

The Church in Mexico

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Since you are not, so far as I am aware, a lawyer, you may possibly be pardoned for not sharing an understanding of the "niceties" of the Mexican religious "squabble." But there are certain other niceties of accuracy and courtesy which one is accustomed to expect from The Nation. I refer to your issue of July 3.

It is inaccurate to say that Juarez passed his confiscating laws "toward the end of the nineteenth century"—the Reform Laws date from 1857; that the Holy Alliance sent Maximilian to Mexico—this was done by Austria and Napoleon III, not Russia, Austria, and Prussia; that Maximilian was shot for trying to be a good Catholic and a just and liberal prince—he was shot by Juarez; and so on. But these are minutiae.

You also say: "In 1926 the Apostolic Delegate, Archbishop Filippi, crowned Christ King of Mexico on the hill of Cubilete in the state of Guanajuato. He was expelled by the Obregon Government for violating the constitution." Mgr. Filippi was expelled in 1923. He did not do any crowning at Cubilete; he laid the cornerstone of the monument. He did not violate the constitution, as the Governor of Guanajuato admitted, for his act was performed on private land and it was not an act of worship. His expulsion was also illegal, even according to Article 33.

New York, July 1 WILFRID PARSONS, S. J., Editor of America

Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The article, Hungary's Frontier, by Emery Deri, in your issue of June 5, is below The Nation's standard of fairness. Mr. Deri very conveniently forgets the recent speeches of Premier Bethlen and the Hungarian attitude in regard to the Kellogg Pact. He forgets that the Hungarian children are taught "Nem, nem, soha" as their creed, and "No, No, Never" evidently does not express their attitude on the whole question of the present state of Hungary. Mr. Deri claims that the Trianon Treaty is "the most unjust and unfortunate among all the treaties concluding the World War," and "all this was done under the pretext of creating national states in the place of the 1,000-year-old Hungary with its many nationalities." But the author forgets that ill-treatment of minorities has been the cause of Hungary's downfall. The whole Austro-Hungarian Empire was held together by pressure from without rather than by internal cohesion. It was a feudal survival of medieval monarchical and political institutions. This "museum of political curiosities" was held together by the cohesive force of the Germanic and Magyar populations from within. The war policy of repression and terrorization resulted in the desire of the oppressed Slovaks and other nationalities to shake off the Magyar yoke. Mr. Deri knows probably that they did not hesitate for a moment to do so. One would assume that the break-up of the old Hungary would teach the Hungarians to treat the minorities in a better way. But it seems that the Hungarians, like the Bourbons, have learned nothing and forgotten nothing.

The situation of minorities in present-day Hungary is just as bad as it was in the pre-war days. There are, even according to Hungarian statistics, some 142,000 Slovaks in present-day Hungary, but they do not have a single Slovak school. There are a few schools in which a few hours weekly are devoted to Slovak reading and writing, but there is not a single school in which the language of instruction is Slovak. No Slovak newspaper is allowed to appear. No Slovak society is permitted to exist. However, instead of giving the minorities their due the Hungarians are more occupied in writing, in the words of Mr. Deri, that "the position of Hungarians under foreign rule is tragic. The racial and cultural oppression introduced by the Czechs and Rumanians is without precedent in the history of the world." The national minorities in Czecho-Slovakia on the other hand have equal civil and political rights. Members of the national minorities have free entry into the public service under the conditions generally obtaining, free entry to all posts, and right to the free exercise of all trades and professions. As regards the language question, the minorities use their languages freely both in private and in business, as provided for in the Protection of Minorities. Their relations with the public offices are regulated by the Language Law and by the complementary order to that law in such a manner that all members of a minority, in a district which contains at least 20 per cent of its population of that minority, may use their own language not only in the courts of justice but in all public offices. In districts in which the proportion does not reach 20 per cent the Ameliorations to the Language Decrees insure that no disadvantage shall accrue to a person for ignorance of the official language. The statistics of the number of schools in the school year 1925 show that out of 14,017 national schools 9,226 were Czecho-Slovak, 459 Ruthenian, 3,339 German, 814 Hungarian, 85 Polish, etc. Of 101,859 children of Hungarian speech 91,032 could go to Hungarian schools and 5,275 to mixed.

Newark, New Jersey, June 5 Joseph S. Roucek

Correction

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: James Rorty, in a letter published in your paper June 12, corrects himself as to his first list of poetry magazines in America, but still seems unable to correct accurately. I have heard of Harriet Monroe's magazine Poetry, and Harold Vinal's magazine Voices, but Harold Monroe's magazine Voices is quite unknown to me. Voices is edited by Harold Vinal, and is one of the oldest poetry magazines.

Another thing: Driftwood from the North Hills is not essentially a poetry magazine since it contains a good deal of prose. It is a magazine for Vermont by Vermonters with a sprinkling of writers from New Hampshire and Maine.

New York, June 8 Vrest Orton

Friends of Gandhi

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Anyone interested in Gandhi may have the use of Indian newspapers and magazines free of any expense or obligation by getting in touch with the undersigned.

New York, June 13 Paul D. Elliott,
P. O. Box 26, New York City

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570K.
July 15—Mr. Mussey
July 22—Mr. Blanshard

Contributors to This Issue

Victor S. Yarros is on the staff of the Chicago Daily News.

Somerset Logan has been an actor, writer, and director on the West coast for many years.

Charles Morrow Wilson is assistant editor of All's Well, published in Fayetteville, Arkansas, by Charles J. Finger.

Irwin Edman is assistant professor of philosophy at Columbia University.

Clifton P. Fadiman is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

Eliseo Vivas was formerly in the department of philosophy at the University of Wisconsin.

James B. Wharton is the author of "Squad."

Kate Holladay Claghorn is on the staff of the New York School of Social Work and author of "The Immigrant's Day in Court."

William Gruen is in the department of philosophy at the College of the City of New York.

Thomas Caldecot Chubb is on the staff of the New York Times and is a frequent contributor to various magazines.

William MacDonald is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

Carleton Beals, who contributed a series of articles —With Sandino in Nicaragua—to The Nation, has just left Spain.

Books

Lines from an Ungallant Lover

By IRWIN EDMAN

You know, and knowing, dear, it stings
That I can think of other things;
You will not have a lover who
Is not obsessed by you, by you!
Whose cool continuance makes plain
He is no quite bemuséd swain.

Oh, I could lightly improvise
And cloud you with enraptured lies,
But still, though dazzled by your being,
My eyes do other kinds of seeing.

Then take me as I am, or grieve
That that is all there is to leave.
But think not, loving you, I could
Address you as my central good,
Or tell you (even though your name
Is music and remembered flame)
That your small star could ever be
The sun in my astronomy.

Or should I lie? And would you cherish
What then were left of me to perish?

A Creator of Myths

The Prince or Somebody. By Louis Golding. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THUS far in his American literary career Mr. Golding has paid the price of his refusal to simplify himself. He has not received one tithe the recognition to which his brilliant talents entitle him—and largely because he has not taught his public what to expect of him. He is not "good for" anything, in the sense that Mr. Walpole is "good for" serene and elegant pictures of the English upper classes or Mr. Huxley for an annual dose of ironic futilism. Mr. Golding must be the despair of his publisher, for he obstinately declines to be placed. His quiver is full of arrows: he has written some of the most sensitive and vigorous travel sketches in recent years; he was capable in "Day of Atonement" of sounding a genuine note of deep racial tragedy; in "The Miracle Boy" mysticism and grotesquerie are beautifully and originally blended; "Store of Ladies" was a smart piece of comic writing that leads one to believe Mr. Golding quite capable of putting Frederick Lonsdale in the shade, should he choose to devote himself to the stage; and now comes "The Prince or Somebody" which, while it could have been written by no one except Louis Golding, could, nevertheless, never have been even vaguely predicated from his previous books.

With all this sparkling versatility, there is nothing about him of the playboy, the gifted amateur. He is one of the most serious and responsible of living English novelists, a fact which has been obscured by the circumstance that he rarely touches on themes in the public eye, themes which are "significant" in the H. G. Wells manner, which can be reduced to some rememberable formula, some two lines of gibberish for the inane mouths of diners-out and ladies' clubbers. He is, in a minor way, a creator of myths; each of his tales has something in it of the legendary. It is touched with a fantasy, a strangeness which produces an indescribable and (queerly enough, in our day) a palatable romanticism. He is one of the few important writers of fiction who does not see modern life in terms of movements, tendencies, social crystallizations, problems, but in terms of extraordinary people and extraordinary happenings. Does this sound too simple and obvious a statement? Look about you; consider some of our most prominent writers—Huxley, Bromfield, Rolvaag. Distinguished as they are, there is one factor common to all of them which circumscribes their work: they all start from, or are obsessed by, a "theme," whether it be the decay of the intellectual class in England, the dominance of women in America, or the problem of the adaptation to pioneering conditions of the Scandinavian peasant. No matter how intelligently and humanly and concretely the theme is developed, one always feels it is a check-rein upon the writer's imagination. He is a slave to a viewpoint.

Mr. Golding has no viewpoint, no specialty, unless it be colorful and startling people. His novels are, in the best sense of the word, non-intellectual. This does not mean that they are shallow but that their motive power is furnished by the exploration of a personality rather than by the presentment of an idea. The personality may be so strangely situated and composed (as Rurikoff is in "The Prince or Somebody") that he sets in motion a train of circumstances of great emotional implication. Mr. Golding is a master of colorful farce, of grotesque incident; but his tales always travel beyond the farce and the grotesquerie.

I have said very little about the specific virtues of "The Prince or Somebody." That is partly because, as has already been remarked, one cannot sum up a novel by Louis Golding; and partly because I am more interested in getting people to read him generally than I am in trying to analyze any particular book of his. It would mean very little if I were to tell you that "The Prince or Somebody" is concerned with a darkly handsome Muscovite prince (he might also have been the son of an Italian-Swiss waiter from Soho) who loves his wife so much that he takes pot-shots at her on all possible occasions; and with the equally eccentric and even more beautiful Merryl whose love for her Prince is by no means diminished by these Mexican tactics. The mere story of "The Prince or Somebody" (perhaps just a trifle long-drawn-out) sounds like a mad extravaganza. Actually it is a brilliant piece of comedy of permanent value. The Rurikoffs are prevented from being merely gorgeous caricatures by being seen through the sympathetic, if basically conventional temperament of Ben Wain, a nice young Englishman. They are given another dimension, as it were; their escapades and tribulations are given a certain depth because Ben Wain can never, at any moment, quite make up his mind whether he is witnessing a comedy or a tragedy. Neither can the reader; and there lies the peculiar fascination of this most original book. For, by some magic, we are gently led away from our first testy conviction that Merryl and Fyodor are simply eccentric idiots, to a persuasion that they are that—and far more; that they are, in fact, mysteries—mysteries which happen to express themselves in apparent farce comedy rather than in ritual and miracle.

All of which is a remarkably confused appreciation of Mr. Golding's best book to date. It will have accomplished its task if it has succeeded in pointing out that he is doing something which no other British or American novelist is doing; that his work has an independent and incalculable quality, a flavor underived and untransmittable.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Rabelais

Rabelais. By Anatole France. Translated and with an Introduction by Ernest Boyd. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

THE reaction which started sometime ago against Anatole France may have gone too far, but it is not altogether unjustified. The writer of "Penguin Island" could often be as superficial and innocuous as a meretricious peddler of popular inanities. The present book will convince any one who still doubts this truth. France calls it elementary scribbling, and though one does not want to agree with him, since his name commands respect, one is forced to. It would be difficult for any one who has crossed the threshold into Rabelais's world to write as superficially and ineffectually as he has done. There are, it is true, extenuating circumstances: France wrote the book originally as a series of lectures, expecting to deliver them to a highly fashionable audience in Buenos Aires. But a real thinker, no matter how superficial he wishes to be, should at least let out a ring, even if a muffled one, of his true temper. No echoes of that ring are overheard in this volume.

It is a pity, since here was an opportunity for France to show what kind of adventure he was capable of in the mansion of one of the greatest of the masters. The adventure he encountered was an altogether commonplace one: he brought to it his wide reading and his clever pen; but he left all else behind. And it is a further pity because with the exception of a short passage in one of Ellis's volumes of "Impressions and Comments" little else has been written, as far as the writer knows, to fix Rabelais's importance and estimate his significance. Historical studies there are in abundance, and no end of philological research—the sort of work which goes under the name of scholarship but which merely indicates dearth of critical imagination. There are also apologetic appreciations of what is deemed a wisdom regrettably scattered through inexcusable coarseness. But a criticism which would extricate out of his pleasantries the meaning of his activity—where is it to be found?

The satirist is a bundle of contradictions. He acknowledges reverence to the ideal, yet has a profound sense of its futility. Piety he possesses, but also irreverence. If he had no piety toward the ideal he would not laugh at the bungling way in which men seek to approach it. If he were devoid of irreverence, he would seek it single-mindedly, like Spinoza or Plato, nor could reality turn him from its contemplation in order to attend to the meanness and sham of the world. So that if his laughter contains an element of hostility and no small measure of forced indifference and scorn, it also contains pity and love. From this psychological knot of contradictions the satirist seeks relief. And the relief or catharsis which he seeks more or less consciously is achieved by breaking up the world's values through the prism of his criticism, and by stifling his natural piety, thus achieving a purer kind of freedom than the religious man ever attains. The pious man's reverential attitude comes naturally; it is the almost instinctive essence of prayer. The attitude of the satirist does not. It is the result of a painful attempt to look at the sham and bungling in human aspirations. He has not only seen the actual worth of ideals but has somehow managed to get himself beyond their claim.

In Rabelais the spirit of the satirist finds outlet in its purest form; so purely indeed, that it has been confused too often with buffoonery and mere coarseness. Whatever piety was in the man was rigorously suppressed, to find inverted release in coarse mockery—a form of catharsis to which the satirist has recourse. Cervantes was a disinherited satirist; he saw the world through eyes which contemplated at the same time a dream of personal success of which he was certain he had been cheated while less worthy men than himself had achieved it. Swift was a distempered moralist. But Rabelais "belonged"; he had it in his power to enjoy and possess the world he mocked; nor did he lose his temper because men are either hypocritical scoundrels or helpless sheep. His final judgment, indeed, is that they are neither, but just unroariously funny. His judgment of the world thus acquired added value. He was loyal to the ideal, but he also had to be loyal to his stern vision of reality. Hence he could only laugh, if he was to remain faithful to both. For him to have yielded to his pious strain would have been fatal; it would have meant the loss of the freedom which he had gained at the price of stern self-discipline.

ELISEO VIVAS

War from the Front

A Fatalist at War. By Rudolf Binding. Translated from the German by Ian F. D. Morrow. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

Private Suhren. The Story of a German Rifleman. By Georg von der Vring. Translated by Fred Hall. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Undertones of War. By Edmund Blunden. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

Als Mariner im Krieg. Von Joachim Ringelnatz. Berlin: Ernst Rowohlt Verlag. M. 8.50.

WAR is a great emotional experience with a vivid dramatic content. And so, as is the case with love, it is often used by those who have chanced to experience it as an inspiration for a work of art. Yet, of itself, war, like love, cannot be recreated into a work of art without the leaven of artistry. That is my explanation of why "Private Suhren," a translation from the German; "Undertones of War," by an Englishman; and "Als Mariner im Krieg," published in German, fail to make any great appeal to me. "Private Suhren," a story of a private German soldier and his squad, contains an engaging whimsicality. It is so wholly subjective, however, that it has slight value as a war book, and its subjectivity is so trivial as to give it scant value as a general, or psychologic, novel. "Undertones of War" is presented in sketches which, toward the end of the volume, become verse. The sketches are typical of the English attitude of superficial casualness toward the war. That may be a way to undergo the ordeal of war, but not to create literature. If war is a great emotional experience—which I have never yet heard successfully denied—then why not treat it as just that; else not at all. In war, of all things, let a spade be a spade. Too much restraint is not to my liking. Mr. Blunden's verse strikes me as bad. It does not belong in my category of true poetry. My original thesis was inspired by "Als Mariner im Krieg." It is the wandering tale of a German writer who becomes a sailor and naval officer during the war.

"A Fatalist at War," however, is something else. It is the diary of a keen observer, a sensitive and intelligent individualist. As a war diary, with a stalwart thread of philosophy carried throughout, it impresses me as a superb book. It is the kind of note-book out of which a "Case of Sergeant Grischa" might be written. It contains a similar sweep in point of view, in sympathy and fatalism.

The author, Rudolf Binding, according to the jacket of the volume, was born at Basel, Switzerland, in 1867. Thus, when the war was declared, he was an adult, not only in years, but, as is obvious from his diary, an adult in intelligence. His notes commence with the autumn of 1914 and continue until after the armistice. The author began the war as commander of a squadron of cavalry and ended, apparently, as remount officer for a German combat division. From his position as a mature, intelligent individualist behind the front—yet not too far behind—he watched and studied and thought about the war. The results he put down, very simply, carefully, and with literary ability, producing a study—almost a history—of the war from the point of view of the Central Empires.

Although never a defeatist, Herr Binding shows that he had few illusions about the war. Until nearly the end he was eager for and hopeful of victory, yet fully aware of the consequences of war and skeptical of war as a means to an end. As the war progressed and retrogressed he saw clearly the damage it was causing all combatants, and, toward the end, foresaw Germany's defeat. He picked out the weaknesses and errors of his country and his countrymen. Deftly he tells of these troubles: lack of organization and materials; failure of those at home to support the men at the front; the petty greed of officers—and chaplains!—for decorations; the weakness at the top, in the Supreme War Lord and among the members of his family. Many of those qualities which are brought out so finely by Arnold Zweig in "The Case of Sergeant Grischa" are here mentioned in daily notes.

The diary defies classification. It is almost as likely, it seems to me, to appeal to the militarist as to the pacifist. In that, largely, lies what I feel justified in calling its greatness, or better, perhaps, its tone of greatness. The intelligence and individualism of the author make for greatness of spirit. A patriot, and apparently favored by birth, he criticizes his country and his own class when he feels its members to be wrong, yet never leans over on the other side toward a sloppy, sentimental, sociologic sympathy with the common soldier. He seems to see the strength and weakness of all.

The diary contains numerous notes contradictory to the general view of Germany during the war which was held by those beyond the German borders. Chief among these is a sense of liberality which Herr Binding reveals. For example, often he speaks of putting certain criticism of his superiors in his correspondence in the hope that the letters would be intercepted and thus the criticism come to the attention of those concerned. Did officers of the Allied armies dare do that?

Herr Binding's remedy for war, presented satirically, yet with a vein of seriousness, on page 217, under date of April 4, 1918, apropos of a certain area on the Somme which had been fought over again and again, seems worthy of quotation: "This area ought to remain as it is. No road, no well, no settlement ought to be made there, and every ruler, leading statesman, or president of a republic ought to be brought to see it instead of swearing an oath on the constitution, henceforth and forever. Then there would be no more wars."

The only error of judgment found by me among the notes is the following: On May 3, 1918, Herr Binding reproaches the French for their extensive use of supposedly authentic photographs depicting certain German atrocities. He declares that neither Germany, England, nor the Scandinavian countries would lower themselves to this form of fighting. I must take exception to Herr Binding on this point. During my own war experience, while serving as a battalion intelligence officer with a combat division of the American army, it was my duty to collect and send back any papers of military importance found on the bodies of dead Germans. Among these were a series of luridly colored picture post cards showing German prisoners feeding blast furnaces or open hearths. French soldiers, as guards, were whipping on the naked Germans to their task. These cards, of course, were propaganda put out by the Germans to prevent desertion to the French. They seem to me in precisely the same category as the photographs mentioned by Herr Binding.

"A Fatalist at War" I class with Barbellion's "Journal of a Disappointed Man."

JAMES B. WHARTON

Births and Deaths in Western Europe

The Balance of Births and Deaths. Volume I: Western and Northern Europe. By Robert R. Kuczynski. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IS population increasing too rapidly? Are there too many human beings in the world? Many people think so, and decide that something must be done about it. As a result, proposals of far-reaching and imperfectly understood social consequences: restriction of immigration, colonization—with the attendant warfare to retain colonies and guardianship of the "inferior" races within them—and birth control. What are the facts back of this assumption? Few take the trouble to inquire carefully. This would involve a study of vital statistics, and statistics of any description are considered both dull and incomprehensible.

Here is a book, however, which gives us facts about population changes through a presentation of statistical material so clear, so simple, and so interesting that any reader, learned or unlearned, can understand and enjoy it. The present volume is the first of a series, and deals only with Northern and Western Europe. According to this study the population of this part of Europe has, as a matter of fact, been steadily increasing in numbers since the middle of the nineteenth century, notwithstanding a birth-rate steadily declining since the beginning of the twentieth century. A declining death-rate has so far kept pace with the declining birth-rate and in 1926 the number of births exceeded the number of deaths by 48 per cent.

But that is not the whole story. The birth-rate is calculated on the basis of the entire population, men, women, and children, the young and the old. But who actually bear the children counted in the birth-rate? The women of child-bearing age. It is their rate of production, then, that is the true measure of natural increase. To maintain the level of population, one generation of parents must replace itself by an equal number of offspring who will live as long as the parents did. Or, since the women of child-bearing age are the actual producers of children, the group of child-bearing women of one generation must replace itself by an equal-sized group of women in the next generation. Computing the fertility rate of 1926, Dr. Kuczynski finds that for the group of child-bearing women of that year the number of girls born to each woman was 1.12—a slight surplus over the replacement number. But some of these newly born girls will die before they reach the ages that will replace the maternal group. Making the necessary computations for expectation of life of the newly born at the mortality rate of 1926, Dr. Kuczynski finds that while 100 mothers gave birth to 112 girl babies, only 93 of these babies would survive to replace the mothers. Should the fertility and mortality of 1926 continue unchanged, the population of Northern and Western Europe is bound to die out. Only an increase in fertility or a decrease in mortality can change this trend. Dr. Kuczynski points out that little further reduction in mortality up to the end of the child-bearing age can be expected, so much has already been accomplished. The only remaining possibility is an increase in the fertility rate.

Dr. Kuczysnki resolutely refrains from telling us what we ought to do about this state of things. In this study he simply gives us the facts upon which we can frame any policy that appeals to us. Those who are laboring to provide for an excessive population, or are trying to reduce its numbers, may be encouraged to slacken their efforts in the confidence that nature (human or otherwise) is already taking care of the matter; those who deplore the shrinkage, can proceed vigorously with propaganda for the large family.

A second volume dealing with Southern and Eastern Europe, and with Africa and Asia, is scheduled to appear, and a study of North and South America will follow. We shall look with interest for these studies, to see how far the results differ in different parts of the world.

KATE HOLLADAY CLAGHORN

A Sentimental Sage

The Mansions of Philosophy. By Will Durant. Simon and Schuster. $5.

OUR modern Diogenes Laertius has forsaken anecdotal biography and turned a cordial and very sentimental sage. Like his ancient prototype, Durant has a shrewd sense of news values in philosophy which, while restricting his thought to superficial and less comprehensive regions, informs his essays with a lively enthusiasm and strong contrasts. His latest book is not without some trenchant criticism. A light humor relieves the frequent retrospective excursions over the field of philosophical literature and the book is given some unity by its recurrent thesis—if we must attribute a thesis to so genial a volume—that "philosophy is total perspective."

There is nothing either original or profound in this book. It is distinguished by Dr. Durant's epigrams and the art he has exploited so well of combining philosophical chaff with an appearance of depth and wisdom. In his two dialogues on history and religion Durant is a compiler and is at his best. He writes with such evident sincerity and zeal that one hesitates before the unkind but easy task of exposing his graceful sciolism. If he could be more modest in his pretensions one could accept and admire his work as an example of exceedingly witty and skilful journalism. But his naive and arrogant criticism of modern philosophy provokes closer reading which reveals his book largely as clever gesture and bombast.

Dr. Durant asserts that modern philosophers have forgotten Life. They "have been the slaves of mathematicians and physicists" and where they were not trivial they were unintelligible. In the obscurity of this philosophical wilderness our author's voice announces a gospel of clarity. And an astonished world wonders why philosophers have not learned to use Durant's lucid language and to write with such engaging glibness about "the directive unity, the creative resourcefulness, and the magnificent spontaneity of life." We learn that we can be free and enjoy the breezy caprice of life, for Durant has dispelled the oppressive fogs of determinism. Who would still adhere to that sinister doctrine after being told that "there was something cowardly in mechanism, with its shifting of guilt to heredity and society"?

Durant is a harsh critic of science as well as philosophy. "Biology is at a standstill. . . ." Life eludes that biology which seeks experimentally to discover the principles of genetics and organic reactions; biology must, in fact, break the shackles of instruments and its recent quantitative technique and when it "is freed of the dead hand of the mechanistic method it will come out of the laboratory into the world. . . ."

Here is a thinker who is quick, genial, and literary. Let no pedant spoil the blithe simplicity of his thought by suggesting that life is "creative" only in so far as it is determined; that mechanism is the essential feature of all control and purposeful, deliberate action; that if life and mind were not preponderantly mechanical, education and adaptation would be impossible. Let those who fear life retire into the "ivory tower of esoteric tomes." The free spirits can walk with Durant through the airy halls of his Mansions made pleasant by the spicy aroma of a philosophy of cosmetics and short skirts. Besides reading some excellent dialogues on history and religion

Yes—Bitter . . .

"The only live consciously rebel sheet in this pot-bellied land of ours," writes ■ reader of the

NEW MASSES

A magazine of social literature. A magazine for rebels. Literature born of the soil, the sweat and the grime of America. Written by miners, sailors, teamsters, textile workers, electricians, farmers and students. In the July issue

Floyd Dell Resigns

from this magazine because it "seems chiefly to represent ■ neurotic literary and pictorial aestheticism," and signs himself "Yours for the Revolution."

Michael Gold Replies

"Floyd Dell is just another victim of American prosperity. He made a lot of money in Sex. . . . Let him gracefully retire. . . . Let him wear ■ dress suit and fraternize around the tea tables with the literary racketeers. The dead should bury their dead. But the dead should not sign their letters 'Yours for the Revolution'."

And the press of New York and the literary racketeers boil over. Heywood Broun rushes to the rescue of dress-suit authors. Wrong as usual.

In the July issue: Bill Dunne on "Gastonia" ▪ Mary Heaton Vorse on "Elizabethton" • Erwin Piscator, German director on "The Social Theatre" • Drawings by Louis Lozowick, Wm. Gropper, Adolph Dehn, Gan Kolski and others. Stories • Poems ▪ Book Reviews.

In Recent Issues: Upton Sinclair, John Dos Passos, Martin Russak, Scott Nearing, Herman Spector, Robt. Wolf, Joseph Kalar, Ernest Booth, Joseph Freeman . . . many others.

THE NEW MASSES

is provoking, stimulating, bitter; it has guts and humor. It is the kind of magazine that provokes ■ lumber-worker to write: "I'm yours to ■ cinder. We can always get the Dial, New Republic and the N——— when we hunger for the clean white pants of respectability."

15 CENTS ON ALL NEWSSTANDS

$1.50 A YEAR

NEW MASSES—39 Union Square—NEW YORK, N. Y.

Enclosed $_____ for the June issue_____ and the rest of a year_____

Name _____

Address _____

they can view at a distance a few ideas on politics and aesthetics and face the "vital issues" of Love and the Modern Woman. They will find it all very racy, entertaining, and newsy.

WILLIAM GRUEN

Concerning Narrative Verse

The Fate of the Jury. By Edgar Lee Masters. D. Appleton and Company. $2.50.

Pheidias. By John Galen Howard. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

AFTER a period during which a long poem was anathema to any publisher, we have recently, here in America, come upon a millennium for writers of stories in verse. Although Frost, Lindsay, Masters, and even Robinson had, for some years before this epoch, been writing narratives in verse, it was not until the advent of "Tristram" that publishers were convinced of their sales value. Jeffers, in his restricted and more complicated manner, was at the same time compelling attention toward dramatic narrative in poetry, and Stephen Vincent Benét and the Book-of-the-Month Club brought the whole matter to focus. The vogue grew, and every poet, foregoing lyric, turned his attention toward story-telling.

Since blank verse was seemingly the simplest medium, it became the accepted technique, with the result that a great deal of very bad blank verse is today on the market. There is, it seems, a discrepancy between this verse form and the kind of tale which must be told by the modern narrator. The discrepancy began with Browning. Blank verse, relaxed and unrhetorical, ceased after the nineteenth century to be blank verse at all, and became merely iambic pentameter. Modern verse writers using realistic plots, commonplace language, involved and subtle motivations, intellectual rather than emotional interpretations of life, cannot write blank verse with any excellency. Indeed, since the Elizabethan period of rhetorical and romantic drama and that period of deep religious conviction which led inevitably to Milton and to his epic, the sublimity of style and the perfect pitch of blank verse has gradually been forgotten. Although other great poets have made use of the form, it has never been quite so akin to the subject matter as it was in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Today the modern feeling is for a rhetoric such as Hart Crane's, a flare on the mountain peaks after a long climb through verbal underbrush, and gropingly through conquered darkness. It is not for the sustained and sublime oratorio of a Milton.

The turn toward story in verse is, indeed, not a turn toward verse at all. It is merely the universal and popular inclination toward a good tale, toward action in any form, not even widely divorced from the interest in the detective story. The alert publishers began exploiting the market thus created. Long narrative poems appeared on every side. And Edgar Lee Masters who had enjoyed fame when "Spoon River" fed his Main Street-hungry readers, and whose "Domesday Book" had appeared just a bit too early for the renaissance of narrative, wrote and published "The Fate of the Jury."

This volume carries on the Masters tradition of a writer more lawyer, psychologist, and story-teller than poet. A disciple of Browning, Masters has been using the dramatic monologue, and "Domesday Book" was patterned on "The Ring and the Book." In "The Fate of the Jury" we have the story continued. Each of the jurors listening to and judging the interwoven details concerning Elenor Murry's death, agrees to divulge his own spiritual history. The story of Merival, the coroner, takes up most space. His is the inquiring mind. To him in death-bed conversation or in posthumous letters come the histories of all the jurors in the case. Meantime his own story (a story pointedly like William Ellery Leonard's "Two Lives") is unfolding. He marries a woman who he knows will be the victim of inherited insanity. He marries her because of his belief (which is Masters's own theme announced by Lucinda Matlock in "Spoon River") that love and the acceptance of love and life, whatever be the dangers, are better than inaction—a philosophy not at all dissimilar to Browning's, although it is here given more modern and more morbid illustration.

"The Fate of the Jury" is interesting reading, an intricate weaving of tale into tale, an account of lesbianism, masochism, and duplicity such as Jeffers himself might, very differently, have used. The blank verse is the best Masters has ever written, and he has denied himself the long passages of personal philosophy which weighted his earlier stories. His touch, which has always been too heavy, is lighter in this poem, and "The Fate of the Jury" is, therefore, a better narrative than "Domesday Book." Whether or not it is a better poem would be more difficult to decide.

"Pheidias," the story of the great sculptor's life, of his training as a Greek, of his early and natural love for an intelligent woman, of his labor at Delphi and Olympia, and of his conviction on grounds of heresy, is based on authentic and careful research and is fairly well told. Greek education, Greek love, Greek art, however, have been material time and again, for much more beautiful prose than this is poetry. Mr. Howard adds nothing to the dramatic value of his account; his rhythms are undistinguished. The honey-sweet glow of pastoral Greek life is much better conveyed in H. D.'s short lyrics. His story might be more moving if the protagonist were not so certain of fame. But Mr. Howard could not alter facts, and he was not capable of building character convincing in its passions and its weaknesses. Pheidias is a book to be read by those who enjoy fictional biography, not by those seeking perfection of verse-form, or re-created wonder.

EDA LOU WALTON

History Briefs

1918-1928. A Short History of the World. By C. Delisle Burns. Payson & Clarke. $3.50.

Mr. Burns's book has several features which give it distinction among the rapidly growing number of brief manuals of its kind. Instead of looking at the decade since the armistice as a species of indivisible whole and treating its events in a more or less strict chronological order, Mr. Burns first distinguishes a period of transition from war to peace, then examines "the new system at work," and concludes with a survey of new issues, principally in Islam, Africa, and Asia. The subject-matter of the transition period is, of course, mainly political, but the nature of the second period gives Mr. Burns an opportunity to work into the narrative an unusual amount of well-selected economic information. The relegation of the war-debt settlements to a meager summary in a small-type note at the end of a chapter, on the other hand, seems an anomaly. The survey of new issues emphasizes the fact that, for Asia at least, the future will be concerned not merely, and perhaps not largely, with political or other relations between the East and the West, but rather with the rapid absorption by the East of such elements of European civilization as it can adapt to its own needs while retaining its cultural individuality. Space does not allow Mr. Burns to linger long anywhere, and it is apparently a part of his historical method to mix a good deal of comment and reflection with his narrative, but what he says is sensible and his attitude impartial, and the hopeful tone with which he ends ought to encourage those who believe that democracy and the common man will somehow extricate themselves from the present welter and come fully into their own. The usefulness of the book is materially enhanced by a chronological table of events, a short list of skeleton biographies, and some sketch maps.

A History of European Diplomacy, 1451-1789. By R. B. Mowat. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

Professor Mowat has already published three volumes on the history of European diplomacy from 1789 to the present time, and he now completes his task with a survey of the more difficult and less well-known period from the middle of the fifteenth century, when diplomacy, in the modern sense, may be said to begin, to the close of the old regime. For those who want a readable and orderly narrative, closely packed with well-chosen facts, the book should prove eminently acceptable. Unfortunately for such as prefer to have history presented to them without theoretical accompaniments, Professor Mowat appears to be so confirmed a champion of peace as to be able, at times, to discern peace pretty far in the offing. Not all of those who use his book will be likely to agree with him that diplomacy "began as a means by which each sovereign aimed at preventing aggression from his neighbors," or that it became "ultimately, on the whole, from about the middle of the seventeenth cenntury, and without putting off its national attachments, an international agency for avoiding wars, or for localizing or concluding them after they had begun." Occasionally, too, Professor Mowat seems to contradict himself in his generalizations, as when he remarks (page 225), apropos of Walpole's war of 1740, that the public, "subject to intense excitement at times of crisis . . . frequently compels the responsible ruler or minister to take steps to which his better judgment is consistently opposed," and yet presently declares (page 248) that "in those far-off eighteenth-century days public opinion had not much influence upon the making of wars, although when aroused by victory or defeat it could vitally influence the question of continuing or ending a war." Happily for the reader, such generalizations are not many, and the narrative of facts is always at hand as a corrective.

An Hour of American History. From Columbus to Coolidge. By Samuel Eliot Morison. J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.

Anyone who is really concerned about the future of American culture may well pause before a "one-hour" series of books intended to meet "the insistent demand for a brief, authoritative survey of each of the outstanding fields of art, science, and social endeavor." If history, psychology, art, drama, health, poetry, motion pictures, music, and fiction (to mention only the titles announced or in prospect) are to be reduced to the dimensions of little manuals each of which can be read in hardly more time than union rules allow for luncheon, the volume of intellectual small change that passes for knowledge seems likely to be greatly increased. It must be said for Professor Morison that, given the limitations that have been imposed, he has discharged his task extremely well as far as selection of data is concerned. The pace is as breathless as that of a three-weeks' personally conducted tour of the capitals and show-spots of Europe, but what is exhibited is important, the chronological proportions are good, and some sound criticism and useful interpretation are mixed with the narrative. It is to be regretted that Professor Morison, who can, and in this instance often does, write exceptionally well, should allow himself at times to descend to slapdash and stud his pages with inelegancies which are out of place even in popular writing. The sharp contrast in literary quality which his pages show is a blemish upon what is otherwise a remarkably successful piece of summarization.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Starting this Saturday, July 13

SEE

—the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand which started a war which cost $228,000,000,000.
—the tremendous German "March to Paris."
—the sinking of the Lusitania.
—millions die in the campaigns of the Marne and Argonne.
—how Von Hindenberg captured 50,000 Russians in one day.
—both sides of the great battle in the snow of the Vosges Mts.
—how 5,622 British ships were sunk.
—140 days of hell at Verdun where 600,000 men were killed and 40,000,000 shells were fired in one battle.

"FIGHTING FOR THE FATHERLAND" is a blasting argument against War

—and on the same program—
JOHN BARRYMORE in R. L. Stevenson's
DR. JEKYLL and MR. HYDE

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th St. [Just W. of 5th Ave.] Spring {5090 5095
Continuous Daily, 1 P. M. to midnite.
Last 2 days—Thurs. & Fri., July 11-12—"RED OLYMPIAD" and CHARLES CHAPLIN in "THE CIRCUS."
Direction: SYMON GOULD

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

"Still amuses with a kind of careless gaiety which no other revue has managed to capture."—Joseph Wood Krutch."
THE 1929 Grand Street Follies
with Albert Carroll and Paula Trueman
BOOTH THEA. W. 45 ST.—Eves. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Please use following blank for notification of change of address during the summer. Do give us two weeks notice in advance of the date with which the change is to take effect.

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York
You have been sending the magazine to

Name .....
Address .....
Beginning ..... until .....
please send the magazine to
New Address .....
.....

International Relations Section

*Modern Spain

IV. Official Corruption

By CARLETON BEALS

Madrid, June 24

EX-PREMIER SÁNCHEZ GUERRA, in his harangue to the soldiers in the barracks of Valencia the night before the proposed uprising of the artillery corps last January, declared that every one of the twenty-one Cabinet Ministers prior to those of the present regime, without exception, had died poor. The only member of the Dictatorship who has died, the Duke of Tetuán, went into office a pauper but died a millionaire.

The name of the Duke of Tetuán is a byword for the personal favoritism which has enriched the hangers-on of the present regime in Spain, through a type of concession styled by the public as "Filipinas" in bitter memory of the graft-ridden colonial administration of the Philippine Islands. Part of the fortune of the Duke of Tetuán was acquired through a concession permitting the exploitation of the Falls of Alberche for light and power. On June 25, 1926, according to the official Gaceta, perpetual rights were conceded over portions of the Alberche River to the Iberic Metallurgical Electric Company. The state gave outright to the new concern 50 per cent of the proposed cost of construction; 5 per cent more for overhead; and of the remaining 45 per cent, put up 40 per cent for twenty years at 3 per cent interest. Yet the Government has no control over the company. In other words, the company organized by the then Minister of War, the Duke of Tetuán, was obliged to provide only 5 per cent of the whole cost of the enterprise. The board of directors was formed by the Duke and a close friend, José Soto Reguera, and other favorites. On December 11, 1926, the concession was transferred by royal decree to the Company of the Falls of Alberche, presided over by Reguera, and was promptly sold to a Swiss concern.

The critics of the regime point to many other ruined aristocrats who have been given concessions or monopolies intrinsically of enormous value, yet the investment cost of which has been borne almost entirely by the Government.

Some concessions border on the ludicrous. For instance, the monopoly of de-ratting—that is, of killing rats and disinfecting all Spain and all boats in her harbors—was given to Martínez Baldrich, son of the Minister of the Interior. In other words, if an establishment discovers rats on the premises, it must permit the son of the Minister of the Interior to do the killing at the price he ordains; or if sickness in a home has led to need for fumigation, the son of the Minister of the Interior will see that the premises are made livable again, at the price he ordains. The customary process is for the sanitary authorities to appear in an establishment and levy a stiff fine. On their heels come the agents of the monopoly, offering their services at so much a square meter.

More serious are monopolies which strike at the vital development of the nation. The Decree of July 5, 1924, granted exclusive right to transport freight and passengers by mechanical means over all the public highways of Spain, an undertaking in which the Minister of Labor, Eduardo Aunós, was personally interested. Critics of the regime charge that this deal involved the transfer of a million pesetas. If this decree had remained in force the people of Spain, in order to avoid being mulcted, would have had to revert entirely to the use of burros. Such a storm was raised that it was revoked; and on July 28, 1928, special concessions for twenty-five years were given to Carlos Benjumea, brother of the Minister of Fomento, Count Guadalhorce, for autobus and transportation lines between Madrid and Valencia, Madrid and Irún, Oviedo and Guijón, with annual subsidies of 2,000,000, 3,000,000 and 250,000 pesetas, respectively.

The regime declares that it has seriously set to work to solve the agrarian problem. But the area involved does not exceed 30,000 hectares; aid is given to less than 3,000 colonos, who are privileged to buy land at exorbitant rates on long-time payments. In Lerdo, for instance, the land for this purpose was acquired at an elevated price from the friends of the same Minister of Labor, Eduardo Aunós. (It should be noted that there are two civilians in the government of Primo de Rivera, one of them being Aunós. In the last elections, prior to the Dictatorship, Aunós had the singular honor of being thrown out of the Chamber for fraud in securing his seat.)

Serious, too, was the granting in February of this year of a monopoly over all air transportation, with a subsidy of four pesetas per kilometer, to the Casa Loring, the president of which is General Sanjurjo, Minister of War. The rival bid, which was not accepted, involved a subsidy of only 1.60 pesetas.

One of the proud boasts of the Dictator is road-building. Yet this work was, for a time, practically paralyzed for lack of cement. The Minister of Fomento, Guadalhorce, was owner of a cement factory. Hence heavy duties were put on importation, other factories were shut out of government contracts, and the founding of new factories was forbidden. The situation became so notorious that the duties were finally lightened, and the Minister formed a consortium of other cement producers to share in the spoils. But the right to authorize new factories still remains arbitrarily in his hands.

Other important concessions for the development of light and power contain similar clauses allowing the state to hold the sack for private interests. One on the Ebro River benefits the Confederación Sindical Hidrográfica del Ebro (Royal Order, March 5, 1926), already notorious for the graft involved. The falls of the Carrión River were turned over to the Unión Española de Explosivos (Law Decree, June 26, 1926); the falls of the Duero River to the Sociedad Hispano-Portugesa de Transportes Electricos (presided over by Horacio Echaverrieta, the Bilboa millionaire who arranged the 4,000,000 peseta ransom of the Spanish prisoners taken by Abd-el-Krim in 1921). This concession, potentially capable of supplying nearly all Spain with light and power, has passed into the control of the General Electric Company. The Pántano de la Toba (Decree, April 3, 1927) was granted to the Eléctrica de Castilla, in which the Urquijo bank and Ruíz Senén, apoderado for the Jesuits, are interested. The Canal of Heranes, the Pántano of Palmares

* This is the fourth and last of a series of articles on Spain by Carleton Beals.

(Decree, April 5, 1927), and numerous others might be mentioned.

Spain has long had a tobacco monopoly, importation and sale being farmed out to a private company. Nowhere in the world is the price for unsmokable tobacco so high as in Spain. A new monopoly was created in August, 1927, for the benefit of Juan March, another favorite, for the sum of 1,333,000 pesetas, without calling for bids. Critics say that this concession was worth at least 3,000,000 pesetas.

Primo de Rivera copied the earlier tobacco monopoly in his new petroleum monopoly. Gasoline and lubricants as a result are more costly and of inferior quality. Captain Roma, on his South American flight, complained of the poor quality of his fuel. Spanish war vessels and aeroplanes are now obliged to import gasoline, for the product refined in the country is quite unserviceable. The new petroleum monopoly has benefited, among others, a group of Spanish banks, Juan Domine, personal representative of the Dictator, Juan March, Ruíz Senén, representing the Jesuits, and Calvo Sotelo, Minister of Finance. The personnel of the monopoly is crowded with army officers and favorites of the Dictator, all of whom draw fat salaries. The past two managers of the monopoly, Ernesto Anastasio and Carlos Resines, resigned rather than submit to the questionable machinations of Domine and the Minister of Finance.

The creation of the petroleum monopoly was high-handed. The Dictator arbitrarily appraised the properties of the companies and took them over. The Spanish companies were obliged to submit without cavil, but the foreign companies protested and are still protesting. As a result Primo has created a series of international difficulties and has burdened the Exchequer with enormous sums still to be paid. The American and English companies largely controlling the world market have boycotted Spain. The country, thus far, irony of ironies, has been largely depending upon Russian oil, but with the new international oil agreement this source may also fail. The Dictator has been scrambling around in the Venezuelan and other fields, trying to secure a supply which cannot be cut off by going into the production end. He boasts of having liberated Spain from the foreign petroleum trusts; but the Spanish people fail to see how they have benefited. An amusing epilogue occurred in this connection. The Spanish gunboat Blas de Lezo went to China to cooperate with the Powers. Subsequently it was unable for a long time to return to Spain, because the American and English companies which had been ousted from Spain refused to provide the necessary oil and lubricants.

Another sinecure is the state cotton commission with an annual budget of 3,700,000 pesetas. The entire cotton crop of Spain is probably not worth more than 40,000 pesetas a year.

The Dictatorship has meant fine pickings for the maritime industry. On December 18, 1923, the Gaceta set forth new subventions for various shipping lines, showing a deficit alleged to have been caused by carrying government supplies at reduced rates. These subventions had been twice rejected by Parliament prior to the Dictatorship. But on the accession of Primo de Rivera, the companies presented a petition for reimbursement in the form of a yearly subsidy of 20,000,000 pesetas. The Dictator instead handed them out 75,000,000 pesetas.

Shortly after the Dictator came into power, he appointed a commission to study the railways and reorganize them. As a result, a decree of July 2, 1924, authorized the construction of the connecting line from Ontaneda to Calatayud. In September the concession with a subvention was granted to Guillermo Solms, who on October 9 organized the Santander Mediterranean Company with a capital of 87,500,000 pesetas, i.e., 175,000 shares at 500 pesetas; 105,000 common shares, and 70,000 (35,000,000 pesetas) promotion shares. It is claimed that these promotion shares were handed out in the Royal Palace, and that Infante Don Fernando nonchalantly tossed a packet of them to a famous cabaret dancer.

For the construction of a direct line to Burgos, three bids were offered; but instead of accepting the lowest, the Government, over the protest of the railway commission, gave a portion of the construction work to each bidder at the highest rate, the beneficiary of the deal supposedly being the Infante Don Fernando of Bavaria. In the bids for the line connecting Cuenca and Utiel, again the highest bid was accepted because the Minister of Finance was personally interested. Similar scandals occurred in connection with the Soria-Castejón construction; and noteworthy steals have been consummated in the appraisal of private railways looking toward their absorption by the Dictatorship.

I might go on to detail the graft and favoritism in connection with the new Banco de Crédito Local de España, largely benefiting the gold-dust twins, Dominé and March, and the brother of the Minister of Finance, Calvo Sotelo; the erection of the Palace of the Press, benefiting Echevarrieta and the kept journalists of the regime; the coal mines of Berga; the national torpedo factory, benefiting Echevarrieta; the expositions of Seville and Barcelona and the fomenting of tourist-ism, enabling the sons of the Dictator and the Minister of Interior, Martínez Anido, to waste millions; the conversion of the national debt, resulting in a treasury loss of 300,000,000 pesetas to the benefit of forewarned favorites.

According to official figures broadcast to the public, the Spanish budget has balanced nicely ever since the Dictator took charge. Very simple. All excess is labeled "Extraordinary expenditures" and is never talked about. Hence the Spanish debt has increased from 14,901,106,000 pesetas in 1922, the year before the Dictator took charge, to 19,798,000,000 pesetas at the present time—an increase of approximately five billion pesetas. The Dictatorship is slipping down hill financially at the rate of nearly a billion pesetas a year. This deficit promises to increase even more rapidly.

The monopoly which has made the public most furious has been that to an American telephone company. The original telephone concessions in Spain, the most important of which were in Barcelona, Madrid, and Bilboa, had been granted for thirty-five years. At the end of this period the lines were to pass into the hands of the local government without cost. The thirty-five years were already up in Bilboa, but as the central government was already negotiating with the American company, there ensued a struggle as to whether the local Diputación or Primo should control the lines. A temporary compromise was reached. The American company (Compañia Telefónica Nacional), because the local concerns were soon to pass out of existence, bought up their stock at a song. In Barcelona the companies were owned by the Mancomunidad, the autonomous Catalán federation destroyed by Primo de Rivera. With this destruction the lines passed to the center and were turned over to the American company for a sum roughly equal to six months' profit. The rest of the government interest in various companies, including that of Madrid, was paid for with stock in the new American company. Le Temps in a series of articles in November, 1924, pointed out that the American combine had received properties valued at 90,000,000 pesetas for approximately 40,000,000; and that in the deal there was a slicing of an unaccounted 25,000,000 pesetas.

The monopoly provides for no control over rates by the Government and the payment of no taxes and no import duties on products brought in. On the other hand, the Government may buy back the company within twenty years for the price invested plus 15 per cent. (In Madrid, the old company would have belonged to the state gratis within a few years.) Each year thereafter the premium percentage decreases 1 per cent. Thus, at the end of thirty-five years, the Government may buy back the company for a sum equivalent to that invested, but 80 per cent of the amount must be paid in gold; and the Government must accept without quibble the valuation as set forth on the company books!

The new C. T. N. (merely a holding company for the powerful American concern) immediately junked the old lines, from tacks to buildings, and installed entirely new equipment throughout all Spain. This equipment has been exclusively supplied by another subsidiary, the Standard Electric Company. From the terms of the concession it is obvious that it is to the interest of the C. T. N. to pay as high a price as possible to the Standard, to water its assets in every conceivable manner. But even if the Government ultimately buys back the C. T. N. it will remain at the mercy of the Standard, which supplies patent automatic telephones and other standard material of American make, and which will be able to charge the prices it sees fit, unless the Government, for its part, again junks the entire system.

Undoubtedly the service in Spain has been improved 1,000 per cent, but at rates which have precipitated conflicts from one end of the country to the other. The Government, by the terms of the monopoly, can do nothing concerning the new rates. In Santander the people declared a boycott of the C. T. N., the Bishop being the first to cut out his telephone. In Bilboa the company established interurban rates for outlying sections of the city. The Mercantile Center, Chamber of Commerce, and all civic organizations formed a protest committee. The Governor ordered the committee to dissolve immediately or go to jail. Strikes against high rates also occurred in Jeréz de la Frontera (Primo's birthplace) and Saragosa (where there are still no telephones). In Burgos, as in Bilboa, the strike committee was arbitrarily dissolved.

At the time of the merger Primo's son was kept on the C. T. N. pay-roll at a salary of 25,000 pesetas. He is now on the pay-roll of the Standard. The "Diplomatic Chief" of the C. T. N. is Señor Garcia Leoniz, a nephew of Primo de Rivera.

Nepotism under the Dictatorship has been rife. But if anything has aroused the ire of the Spanish public, it has been the forced public subscription of 4,500,000 pesetas to build Primo a home. Public employees were arbitrarily obliged to give a day's pay. Business men were instructed to pay amounts arbitrarily fixed by the committee.

3 Months Abroad $390

POCONO PEOPLES COLLEGE

ANNOUNCES

1 The second regular European Study Session Aug. 31-Nov. 30, 1929 in co-operation with Peoples Colleges, educational organizations and internationally prominent educators in England, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, The Netherlands, France and Russia.

ELIGIBILITY: Young men and women who can supply evidence as to their acceptability in homes and Peoples Colleges abroad.

EXPENSE: Round trip New York back to New York, including tuition—$390.

Ten days in Russia $90 extra.

2 Seven months' travel course with special training abroad in physical education, adult education or economics—inclusive costs round trip—$675.

For information address:

Pocono Study Tour

THE OPEN ROAD, Inc.

20 West 43rd Street New York

The Dismal Science Made Delightful

The USEFUL ART OF ECONOMICS

by George Soule

"I HAVE yet to read better written, more cogently stated and clearer non-technical statements of the well-known facts on the protective tariff, the chief problems of foreign trade (including reparations and the inter-allied debts), the means of stabilizing business and the present status of the American farmer than are to be found in this volume."—ROBERT A. BRADY in the New York Herald Tribune.

At bookstores $2.00

The Macmillan Company New York

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 24, 1929 No. 3342

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 77
EDITORIALS:
Russia and China at Odds 80
Science and Certitude 81
Sad Story 81
The Little Review 82
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 83
PROSPERITY. By Zechariah Chafee, Jr 84
THE GOVERNMENT "INVESTIGATES": THE STORY OF THE WIRKKULA KILLING. By Abraham I. Harris 86
'TIS OF THEM. By William Seagle 88
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 90
CORRESPONDENCE 90
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 91
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Ophidia. By Gwendolen Haste 92
A Billion Wild Horses. By Henry Raymond Mussey 92
Grain of Truth. By Zona Gale 93
Rhodes as Historian. By Worthington C. Ford 94
The Mind of a Criminal. By Miriam Allen de Ford 94
A Plea for the Mind. By C. Hartley Grattan 95
Potentialities. By J. Dana Tasker 96
India's Wealth and England's Wars. By Vithaldas K. Bhuta 97
Fiction Briefs 97
Drama: Vaudeville Must Be Saved. By Alexander Bakshy 98
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
White Man's Justice 102

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE LAST LINGERING DOUBT about the character of the farm-relief program must certainly have vanished during the week just past. The board is organized, with eight out of nine members appointed, all of them except Mr. Legge on the recommendation of cooperative groups and farmers, and with all critical guns spiked by publication of the names of the indorsers. The board will have a personnel of more than a hundred men, and the number will be gradually increased. If there has been any doubt about what it is going to do, it surely will endure no longer, for a dispatch to the New York Times recently informed a waiting country that President Hoover "gave his views on the necessity of the board proceeding in such a way as to inspire confidence." That is precisely the action our agriculture needs, and it seems strange nobody thought of it before. Mr. Legge at the same time declared that he had never undertaken a job with more hope of being helpful, and that the government's action had already had the psychological effect of encouraging agriculture. "What we farmers must learn," he observed, according to an Associated Press dispatch, "is to do collective thinking to solve our problems." Mr. Legge had no theories for the rehabilitation of agriculture, we are told, but, he said: "We all shall start together from scratch and think collectively." That's right! No theories (which is, being interpreted, ideas), but a little psychology and a good deal of collective thinking, and all will be well with American agriculture. Friends of the Administration are advising the farmers not to expect too much at first, and to give the plan a fair trial. The first half of this advice, at least, is easy to take.

SECRETARY STIMSON ought to feel honored at the attack launched on the Department of State for granting a passport to Dorothy Detzer, executive secretary of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. Miss Detzer refused to take the oath of allegiance if by the word "defend" was implied the bearing of arms or the support of war. After balking at first, the officials finally allowed her to take the oath in the form permitted to Roger N. Baldwin in 1926, with the word "defend" omitted. This is an unsatisfactory solution, but one which does credit, none the less, to the intelligence of the State Department. That department, in thus taking liberal ground with reference to pacifist citizens, enrages the professional patriots, who, as indicated by an agonized cry from H. Ralph Burton, attorney for various "vigilant," "intelligent," and otherwise "patriotic" organizations, were hoping to see the lamentable doctrine laid down by the Supreme Court in the Schwimmer case with reference to alien pacifists extended also to the native variety—"no fight, no citizen." Congratulations to the Department of State.

OUR RECENT PREDICTION that the Boulder Dam act would be an empty triumph for the advocates of public ownership seems about to be fulfilled by Secretary Wilbur. Six of the seven States required to sign the Colorado River compact have reached agreement and President Hoover has proclaimed the scheme as in effect, but the erection of publicly owned power plants seems to be as far away as ever. According to the act, which passed Congress after it had been emasculated by pressure from the power lobby, the whole question of private or public ownership of the power plants at Boulder Dam was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, an abdication of authority by Congress which in the circumstances was astounding. Secretary Wilbur may ask for bids for the use of the water at Boulder Dam, for the power produced by a government plant there, or for the power when transmitted to various points by government lines. Reports from Washington indicate that the "Wilbur plan" is to sell the water directly to private interests and let them produce the power. Thus the taxpayers will finance the construction of the dam and private enterprise will get its most profitable product. The power interests get their reward in a policy which favors private enterprise, and the consumers lose the valuable yardstick which a publicly owned power plant would have provided for measuring the justice of electric rates charged by private companies. Now it can be told what Candidate Hoover meant when he said at Madison Square Garden last October: "No government administration can rightly take chances with taxpayers' money."

THE THOUGHT of one big power trust in the United States does not worry Henry Ford, if we can believe an interview which he gave recently to the Electrical World.

> People talk about a power trust [he said]. I only wish that there actually were a power trust, a central directing organization for the development and use of every power source in the country, tied into one national power system for the service of the whole country. . . . It has got to come as the one necessary and economic method of power production. Our national power system will become a unit just as our postal system is.

Probably so, but who is going to control such a trust? And what "central directing organization" is capable of giving service to consumers according to their need, as the postal system is, except the government of the United States? If our postal system had followed the lines of development of the power industry and had become a collection of private monopolies, we would still be paying in postage stamps the interest on the overcapitalization of some Michigan-Wisconsin-Ohio Postal Holding Corporation or the handsome fees of some bold promoters of a national postal merger. And we would have no rural free delivery because that "wouldn't pay" under private ownership. We are as anxious as Henry Ford is for consolidation and efficiency in the power industry, but the whole lesson of consolidations under present methods of ownership and control is that consumers do not get their due share of the gains of amalgamation and that billions of dollars in overvaluation can be saddled upon future generations without the possibility of repudiation. Attorney-General Hamilton Ward of New York has announced that the half-billion-dollar Morgan merger described in The Nation of July 3 is above the law as far as present regulating agencies are concerned. If Henry Ford doesn't worry about that it is because he lives in Detroit.

> It is natural and I think perfectly proper for foreign people to bring to our attention what they conceive to be the probable effect of our proposed legislation relative to the tariff. . . . But, in my opinion, the real kick against the House tariff bill is with our own people and not with the people abroad. . . . I do not think that in all the history of tariff legislation there has been such an utter disregard of the pledges of a party as are incorporated in the House tariff bill.

STRONG AND SENSIBLE WORDS these of Senator Borah. Will Rogers remarks that "forty-five nations, including the United States, have objected to the new tariff, but not Reed Smoot." The impressive volume of foreign protest, however, has caused even Senator Smoot to give it irritated attention. In giving out a digest of such protests, the chairman of the Finance Committee stated that they came from only twenty-five countries instead of thirty-eight, as stated in the press, and that many of these were not actual government protests, but private objections forwarded by governments. No matter. The point is all the same. If we won't buy, we can't sell, and these logical if unreasonable foreigners just can't see what the United States as a creditor nation thinks it is doing. The American delegates to the International Chamber of Commerce vainly try to explain to their fellow-industrialists, and it is only with difficulty that the subject is kept off the floor of that gathering. As one of the Europeans said: "So far as we can see, the Americans are going to try simply to put us out of business." It is too nearly true, and economically it is plain lunacy. But the strength of the opposing forces steadily grows, and the situation is by no means hopeless.

A THOUSAND YEARS AGO next summer the Icelandic Parliament met for the first time! In June, 1930, the millennium of the Althing will be celebrated in Iceland by representatives of governments throughout the world. For in the steam and power age in which we live a thousand years is a long time, a period to command reverence and respect, and a governing body that has lasted that long must strike wonder in the hearts of all Occidental peoples. The millennial celebration will take place on the spot where the original Althing was organized—Thingvellir, thirty odd miles from the city of Reykjavik. There, among mountain fastnesses made famous by ancient sagas, the twentieth-century Icelandic "Skalds" will pay tribute to their country. On April 15, last, Representative Burtness of North Dakota proposed a bill by which the United States might accept Iceland's invitation to send delegates to the anniversary celebration, and also might present a statue of Leif Ericson to the Icelanders. The resolution was passed and $50,000 appropriated for the statue, but all reference to Leif Ericson as the discoverer of America was stricken out! This, notwithstanding the fact that the Icelandic sagas record the opening chapters of American history, in the attempted settlements of Vinland; and to an Icelandic mother, Gudrid, it is related, was born the first white child to begin life on the American mainland. But our Congressmen do not credit these ancient beginnings. They once learned the time-honored rhyme, "In fourteen hundred ninety-two Columber sailed the ocean blue," and they are not going to forget it.

UNDOUBTEDLY THERE ARE extenuating reasons, known and unknown, why Ramsay MacDonald and his Labor Government thought it best to deny the right of asylum to Leon Trotzky. The Labor Government has not a majority in Parliament. Such a gesture of tolerance would not be worth the risk of having the MacDonald regime thrown out of office before it had a chance to carry out its program. The question is whether the admission of Trotzky—whose activities in England would be as public as Westminster Abbey—would arouse opposition serious enough to force the Labor Government out. Apparently Mr. MacDonald and his Cabinet think so. But they have no right to complain if some of their supporters—and the opinion of the future—do not agree with them. The traditional principles of Anglo-Saxon liberty clearly demanded the admission of Trotzky to England, and it is especially regrettable that the Labor Party felt itself obliged to take the course which it has followed. The episode arouses the disquieting suspicion that every violation of liberty, if examined closely, might show the marks—which time so inconsiderately dims—of "extenuating cirmcumstances."

ONE OF THE OBSTACLES to the settlement of German reparations at the recent conference in Paris which led to the Young plan was Belgium's claim for compensation for the debasement of its currency by Germany during the World War. During the German occupation paper marks, which eventually became worthless, were forced upon the country. Germany agreed to pay damages for this injury, but was so far from Belgium in regard to the amount that in order to save the conference from the rocks the Belgians and Germans were induced to settle the question by themselves apart from reparations. With the removal of international support the Belgian claims became more moderate, and delegates from the two countries have just signed an agreement according to which, after ratification by the parliaments of the respective countries, Germany will pay Belgium thirty-seven annuities amounting to some 600,000,000 gold marks (about $144,000,000). The agreement insures Belgium's acceptance of the Young plan, and thus brings that arrangement a step nearer to fulfilment.

LIBERTY, ALAS, seems to have become license in Massachusetts during the days just past. The thirteen copies of Voltaire's "Candide" seized by vigilant customs officers in Boston during May have been released, the Customs Bureau in Washington having decided that the text was not obscene within the meaning of the law. Perhaps we are unjust, however, in suggesting that the vigilance of the moral watchdogs of the Treasury is relaxed; for we note that it is only this particular edition which is given a certificate of purity, and that future importations will be judged on their merits—or demerits. Even if the Treasury be held blameless, however, surely the same cannot be said for the Post Office and the Massachusetts authorities. In the April-June issue of the Lantern we note seven long passages from the Old Testament which the most lax of censors could scarcely pass even if he were sound asleep; yet we have not heard that this issue has been barred from the mails. Now we are not over-ballasted with morals, yet such as we have we like to see protected, and we protest that if Mr. Brown's censors propose to let this sort of thing go on unchecked, we are going to find ourselves in the gutter or the brothel before long. We humbly appeal for protection to a wise and good government.

THE ROOSEVELT HIGH SCHOOL in Los Angeles—a public institution—has refused a diploma of graduation to Max Rosenstein because he is a member of the Young Workers' League—a Communist organization. A high-school diploma, runs the strange logic from Los Angeles, is a certificate of good citizenship. No Communist can be a good citizen. Therefore no Communist can be graduated from the high school of Los Angeles. For the third time in two years, a diploma has been refused to a member of the Young Workers' League on the basis of what Frank A. Bouelle, City Superintendent, discreetly calls an "unrecorded understanding" among the members of the Los Angeles Board of Education. This august body feels that the schools must protect the country from the red menace when the government fails to do so, and as the watchdog of patriotism it takes its duties seriously. During the past winter several boys and girls were arrested for distributing leaflets in the Roosevelt High School—which is situated in the radical district of Los Angeles. When the papers were found to be harmless even in the eyes of the embattled authorities, the students were fined for distributing leaflets without a license. A new school board is coming into office and Superintendent Bouelle has agreed to have the new board review the case, but since the incoming members are believed to regard the issue in the same way as their predecessors, the assurance means little.

NO FOURTH OF JULY oration about our national excellences could produce half so warm a glow of pride in us as the summary of twenty-five years of progress in fighting child labor recently issued by the National Child Labor Committee. In 1904, when the committee began its work, only seventeen States were even attempting to keep children under fourteen out of the factories, and only five States prohibited night work for children under sixteen. Today every State in the Union has some kind of fourteen-year age limit, and in thirty-nine States children under fourteen cannot work in factories under any circumstances. But there is still much to be done before all American children are protected. States like North Carolina and Georgia have loopholes in the law which allow mill owners to work young children very long hours by day or night. North Carolina allows children of fourteen to work in the mills sixty hours a week if they have completed the fourth grade in school, and Georgia allows them to work eleven hours a day, while workers of sixteen in Georgia mills may be employed for a twelve-hour night. Most of the survivals of child labor in the United States exist in those parts of the population that are unusually poor, notably among farmers and mill workers. Child labor has decreased since 1904 not only because of the development of a social conscience concerning the rights of children, but because of high wages. Probably the fathers and mothers of China care as much for their children as do American fathers and mothers, but child labor is ten times as common in China as here because we are rich and the Chinese are poor. Score one for American materialism!

PROSPERITY keeps bringing fresh perils. Henry Ford the other day signed a check for two cents, the first personal check, we are veraciously informed, that he has signed in five years. The vigilant commentators note that his income during the four seconds he spent in signing it was $6.32; so he seems to have spent time worth $6.32 in paying a debt of two cents. Nothing could better indicate the superficiality of the daily press, to which we have repeatedly called attention, than the perfunctory notice it gave to this apparently trifling incident, which, as the thoughtful observer will at once see, in fact portends the early overthrow of our whole present scheme of doing business. If prosperity is to become generally diffused and is also to become bigger and better, as it must do under Mr. Hoover, then we shall all soon be making so much that we can't take time to sign checks without actually losing money in the process, and the business machine will stop dead. We have already personally noted an increasing difficulty in signing the modest checks we are accustomed to draw, and we confidently predict that within the next ten years headlines like the following will be common: "Rockefeller Jailed for Debt. Has Quick Assets of a Billion, but Can't Afford to Sign Check for Debt of $4.37." Or this: "Pennsylvania Railroad Fails. Treasurer Can't Take Time to Pay Bills." Or perhaps: "United States Defaults on Fourth Liberty Loan. Secretary Mellon Says He Can't Bother to Sign Six-Billion Check."

Russia and China at Odds

WAR threatens the Far East again because Chang Ching-hui, Chinese governor of the Harbin district of Manchuria, has seized the Chinese Eastern Railway, deposed its Russian officials, and deported several hundred Russians from Manchuria. Moscow has yielded to demonstrations of patriotic anger by its citizens and on July 13 sent an ultimatum to Nanking, declaring that if the Chinese Government did not, within three days, agree to a conference for determining control of the Chinese Eastern the Russian Government would resort "to other means of defense of the legal rights of the Soviet Union." At this writing Chinese and Russian troops are mobilizing on the Siberian border, but both governments are making gestures of conciliation.

The present crisis in Manchuria cannot be judged by ordinary standards of morals and international law because morals and law are purely academic terms when applied to Manchuria. The Chinese Eastern Railway was founded in intrigue and has been maintained as a weapon of imperialist penetration. The Soviet Government acknowledged the claim of China to the railway when it promised in 1919 to return it "to the Chinese people without demanding compensation of any kind," but the Russians forgot some of their generosity when they contemplated the practical results of losing the Chinese Eastern while Japan continued in Manchuria. Now their concern is not so much with the complete control of the railway as with the right to use it without interruption on equitable terms.

Beginning as a Czarist project on Chinese territory, the Chinese Eastern was divided after the Russo-Japanese War. The southern part was given to Japan for the South Manchurian Railway and the northern part, which was exclusively Russian until the Soviet revolution, was put under joint Sino-Russian control by the treaty of Peking of 1924. The lines now in dispute run 900 miles across Manchuria from Manchuli to Vladivostok, with a southward spur from Harbin to Changchun. Technically the railway belongs to a Sino-Russian corporation; actually its title is so buried in claims and cross-claims of sovereignty that possession is ten-tenths of the law. Incidentally the road cleared $8,000,000 in profit last year, which fact helps to explain the Chinese eagerness to acquire it. What makes the present crisis so significant is that the outcome of the Chinese seizure of the railway may create a notable precedent. If China can seize a Russian railway with impunity, what will she do with Japan and the South Manchurian Railway? Japan would observe the Russian discomfiture in Manchuria with great delight if she were not haunted by the fear that it is a prelude to her own expulsion.

Ostensibly the present seizure of the Chinese Eastern was ordered by the local Chinese authorities in Manchuria without the knowledge of Nanking as part of a campaign against Communist aggression, but the claim of purely local responsibility seems doubtful in view of the fact that Chiang Kai-shek, Chang Hsueh-liang of Manchuria, and C. T. Wang, China's Foreign Minister, held an official conference in Peking just before the Manchurian coup. As far as the treaty of 1924 goes, both sides have violated it. Russia has broken its pledge not to permit the activities of any organization "whose aim is to struggle by acts of violence against the government of either contracting party." On the other hand, while the Chinese Eastern Railway has much political significance, the Chinese in 1924 agreed to unite with the Russians in administering it as a purely commercial enterprise. Now they have seized it by force and expelled the Russian employees. Any government is certainly bound to protest vigorously against such treatment of its citizens in violation of treaty rights.

This whole affair of the Chinese Eastern is ominous because of its deeper implications. There is no unqualified right and wrong on either side. Russia is placed in the embarrassing situation of struggling on Chinese soil for a commercial enterprise that was imposed upon China by force, and the Western press has rushed to the conclusion that her objection to Chinese aggression is prima facie evidence of imperialist designs. But a fairly convincing justification of the Soviet Chinese policy can be developed by regarding it as defensive against Japan and the Western Powers.

If Russia loses the Chinese Eastern she may be forced to divert her trans-Siberian traffic to the circuitous route of the Amur River line, which is 570 miles longer than the route through Manchuria. Also she may lose many commercial advantages that spring from control of railroads in so rich a country. Added to these considerations on the Russian side is the most important one, that with the Chinese troops in Manchuria are large bodies of White Russian mercenaries who would like to use Manchuria as a base for counter-revolution in Siberia. One Associated Press dispatch from Harbin has even reported that the Chinese intend to return the former Czarist manager, Ostroumove, to the control of the railway. Russia cannot contemplate such developments without much perturbation, especially since the Chinese policy in Manchuria has been warlike for several months. Diplomatic relations between the two governments have been close to suspension since the Chinese raided the Soviet Consulate in Harbin on May 27 and arrested forty persons for spreading Communist propaganda.

The most hopeful factor for peace in the Manchurian crisis is the attitude of the Soviet Government. While angry citizens stoned the Chinese Consulate in Vladivostok, the official Moscow press has deliberately played down the affronts to Russians in Manchuria because the Government does not wish to divert the national energy to a war for Russian property abroad. The Soviet leaders expressed their willingness to sell out their interests in the Chinese Eastern to China in the Mukden treaty of 1924. The Russian ultimatum to China asks three things which in themselves are reasonable, that an immediate conference should be called to discuss difficulties, that Chinese authorities should cancel all arbitrary orders concerning the Chinese Eastern, and that arrested Russian citizens should be released. Let us hope that the Nationalists will not feel that they are losing face by accepting these proposals as a possible way toward a settlement.

Science and Certitude

A FEW months ago we commented in a slightly skeptical fashion on the popular enthusiasm aroused by Einstein's "Field Theory." Expressing some layman's doubts concerning the universal validity of purely mathematical inferences, we noted the fact that Einstein had apparently reached his conclusions with the aid of nothing except a pencil and paper, and we likened such a dependence upon "pure reason" to that scholasticism which the empiric methods of science are supposed to have displaced. Several teachers of physics wrote in to protest against this dangerously heretical kind of skepticism, but a few days after the editorial was written the New York Times quoted an opinion of Lane Poor, professor of celestial mechanics at Columbia University, to the effect that the Einstein theory was the conclusion of a mathematical game of no demonstrated significance outside the realm of mathematics. It so happens, moreover, that the progress of science—though frequently crabwise—is in these days so rapid that we were not compelled to wait long for another illustration of the danger of confusing inference with fact.

Any casual reader of the scientific chitchat in a popular magazine will tell you that the nebulae, which are unimaginable distances away from the earth, are moving at equally unimaginable speeds. If asked how this remote fact is ascertained, he will reply that "the spectroscope tells us," and when pressed concerning further details of the language which the spectroscope speaks he may possibly know that when it is turned toward the nebula certain of its lines are slightly shifted from the position which they normally occupy. Since this phenomenon could be produced by a rapid movement of the light source toward or away from the instrument, the amount of displacement is taken as the measure of the speed of the body toward which it is turned. And if it be objected that such measurements are, after all, pure inference, your informant will counter with the assertion that they are, on the contrary, solid and indisputable fact.

Now we would never have undertaken to dispute with him. We have doubtless been guilty of references to the speed of nebulae quite as glib as those made by anyone else, and we have trusted the spectroscope as we trust our speedometer. But scientists at the Wilson Observatory have just been measuring the speed of three hitherto unclocked nebulae and report that they are traveling at the respective speeds of 3,100, 4,600, and 4,900 miles a second away from the earth. In addition, however, the astronomers have noted another curious fact, which is that the further a nebula is away from the earth the faster it seems to be moving, and this has at last aroused a certain suspicion. Dr. Walter S. Adams, director of the observatory, has the temerity to suggest that after all these confidently measured speeds may be purely illusory, and Dr. Harlow Shapley, Harvard astronomer, adds that "the measured velocity is probably not a measure of actual motion but more likely a measure of crumpling space." Furthermore, Professor Eddington comments as follows:

> [the] spectral lines are displaced toward the red. Ordinarily we interpret such a red displacement as signifying receding velocity in the line of sight. On ordinary grounds it would be hard to explain the striking fact that these spirals seem to move away from us at such stupendous speeds. Why should they shun us like the plague? But the phenomenon is intelligible if what has really been observed is the slowing down of vibrations consequent on the light from these objects having traveled a part of the way around the cosmos.

Now all this is doubtless to be hailed as a triumph for Einstein, but it is surely not likely to inspire in the thoughtful observer any very great confidence in the certitude of scientific inference whether it be of the pre- or the post-Einsteinian variety. For a number of years the speeds deduced from the spectroscope have been recorded, not as inferred possibilities but as actual facts. The astronomer has periodically emerged with impressive strings of figures and very tall tales which the simple multitude has contemplated with many appreciative "Oh's" and "Ah's". How stupendous is the universe, but how much more impressive than even that is the fact that puny man can sit in his observatory and measure the incredible speed of bodies incredibly far away! Only if Adams and Shapley are right he has been doing nothing of the sort. He has measured the microscopic displacement of the lines of his spectroscope with what is doubtless a commendable accuracy, but his leap across the immensities of space has taken him exactly nowhere. He has made certain inferences from the simple observation made upon a spectrum spread out before his eyes; now he will presumably make other inferences from the same data. But both remain merely inferential and not at all "scientific," as the meaning of that word is taken by the credulous layman who assumes that science deals only with solid facts. Both are interesting, possible, and ingenious; neither is part of any body of actual knowledge.

Sad Story

WHAT do American educators think about? Are they as a class alert, courageous, intelligent, civilized? Are they cautious and subservient to the current—even to the local—mores? Do they accept meekly the restrictions put upon them by boards of trustees who, in small towns and in many cities not so small, presume to tell their employees what they shall wear, what they shall believe, and how they shall conduct themselves not only within the limits of the classroom but outside it? No dancing, say the school boards; no smoking, no drinking, no evolution, no free-thinking, no short dresses, no married teachers. What do the teachers reply?

Some of these questions have been answered in extenso by a questionnaire sent to nearly 3,000 American educators by Professor Manly H. Harper of Teachers College, Columbia University. Professor Harper's data were collected more than five years ago, but there is no indication that his findings would be any different today. He sent his list of seventy-one propositions to educators in all parts of the United States; 52 per cent of the answers came from the Middle and Far Western States; 25 per cent from the South; from New England came 8 per cent; and the balance from the Middle Atlantic section. Sixty per cent of the educators were elementary teachers; 24 per cent were teaching in high schools. Only 2 per cent taught in colleges. It will be seen, of course, that this is a fair division of professional equipment and training. It would be manifestly unjust to question college teachers only, or New York teachers only, or merely the mistresses of one-room local schools. Lest it be thought that Professor Harper packed his court against radicalism by taking too many subjects from the conservative South, it may be remarked that he found practically no difference in the conservatism of the answers that could be attributed to sex, religion, political party affiliation, or geographical distribution. A slight increase in conservatism was noted with increasing age.

What, then, do these guardians of our youth believe? Professor Harper discovered the rather astonishing fact that 77 per cent of them agreed that "One should never allow his own experience and reason to lead him in ways that he knows are contrary to the teaching of the Bible." And 80 per cent believe that "No school, college, or university should teach anything that is found to cause its students to doubt or question the Bible as containing the word of God."

With religion thus made safe for our young democracy, and evolution necessarily disposed of as heresy, Professor Harper turned to the dissemination of dangerous doctrine. "Persons believing in socialism should not be allowed certificates to teach in the public schools," he suggested. Hearty concurrence was given this sentiment by 48 per cent. "Our laws should prohibit giving, even to adults, information concerning birth control through public meetings or through the mail." Forty-four per cent agreed. "For the improvement of patriotism our laws should forbid much of the radical criticism that we often hear and read concerning the injustice of our country and government." Fifty-one per cent concurred.

The following propositions were answered affirmatively as the percentages indicate:

> If any facts should be found favorable to socialism they should be omitted from histories written for high-school use. 37 per cent.
>
> On the whole, in this country, the reward given manual laborers, as compared with the share taken by their employers, has been in just proportion to the services they have rendered. 43 per cent.
>
> If every nation were as wise and just as the United States there would be no more danger of great wars. 56 per cent.
>
> Histories written for elementary or high-school use should omit any facts likely to cause students radically to question or doubt the justice of our social order and government. 54 per cent.
>
> Every boy and girl in American schools should be taught to give unquestioned and unlimited respect and support to the American flag, for whatever cause it may be unfurled. 81 per cent.

These answers, while only a portion of the whole, give a good idea of the scope and results of the questionnaire. And one is sadly constrained to admit that the educators come out badly. By their own confessions they are in the main inconsistent, muddle-headed, willing to ignore facts, ignorant of the progress of history and science, and completely subservient to constituted authority. They are not willing or able to think for themselves. If it be said that thus they resemble the majority of their fellow-citizens, one can only reply that they are in positions of superiority, they are intrusted with the task of making better citizens out of our children than we have been. How will they do it?

The Little Review

IN 1914 Margaret Anderson founded the Little Review and with the collaboration of Jane Heap succeeded in making it the most interesting of the innumerable amateur magazines devoted to revolutionary art. Now the two editors bring their enterprise to a close with a substantial Final Number devoted largely to the answers which their contributors have vouchsafed to a questionnaire.

It must be confessed that these responses are not in themselves very impressive. When faced with such questions as "What do you look forward to?" and "What is your world view?" even the graver sort of person seems inevitably to feel an obligation to be entertaining, and most of the Review's contributors who are not intentionally silly succeed only in being solemnly absurd. But the table of contents constitutes a directory of the experimental writers who, during the past fifteen years, have fought their way into some sort of position: Richard Aldington, Sherwood Anderson, Maxwell Bodenheim, Jean Cocteau, T. S. Eliot, André Gide, "H. D.," Ben Hecht, Ernest Hemingway, Aldous Huxley, James Joyce, Wyndham Lewis, Ezra Pound, Evelyn Scott, and Edith Sitwell have all ceased to need the aid of a magazine devoted to the cause of unsalable writing. Others—like Marianne Moore, Gertrude Stein, and William Carlos Williams—may still find comparatively few professional magazines eager to receive their work, but they have all made their names familiar to students.

The editors of the Little Review take their farewells in ruefully humorous terms. Miss Heap complains that though the Review has given space to twenty-three new systems of art ("all now dead"), it has not printed anything nearer a masterpiece than Joyce's "Ulysses," and Miss Anderson speaks in an even more downright fashion. "As this number will show, even the artist doesn't know what he is talking about. And I can no longer go on publishing a magazine in which no one really knows what he is talking about." Perhaps one of the faults of the Little Review was a tendency to consider a new theory of art too nearly equivalent to a new work of art. Perhaps it was inclined to insist that its contributors ought to know what they were talking about when these contributors could have been more profitably employed in finding out what they could write. But if it has enabled a long list of them to come through, it has certainly succeeded in performing its function.

After all, a revolutionary magazine achieves its greatest triumph when it loses an author. If Scribner's and the Atlantic now print Hemingway, the fact gives to Miss Anderson and Miss Heap an opportunity to enjoy the greatest pleasure a prophet can have—which is, of course, the pleasure of saying "I told you so." When a revolutionist in literature or in government is successful he stops revolving, and the greatest success which a magazine devoted to the neglected writer can have is to find him no longer neglected. The editors of this particular organ of protest may quite possibly be so fond of fighting that they hesitate to admit a victory. But if they were reasonable—and doubtless they would resent the supposition—they would realize that they have accomplished about all that the editors of a magazine of the sort which they founded can accomplish.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

BERNARD SHAW and the Freudians seem to be in pretty close agreement upon the theory that hate is much more common than love in those bound together by ties of blood. I am not willing to go so far. In spite of Œdipus I doubt if the average son actually wants his father out of the way in any practical sense. The tragedy of parenthood is not ill-will but lack of common interests. It is indeed a wise father who knows his own child. And unfortunately not much can be done about it. The efforts of a middle-aged man to make a pal of his boy are generally pitiful. Almost the best thing that can be done is to recognize the existence of a gulf between the generations.

Each year in every college the bitter farce is played of old grads coming back in search of their lost youth. And they are better off if in that institution of learning they possess neither kith nor kin who can observe their antics. To be specific, there is no poorer poker game than that in which some visiting parent attempts to sit down with the boys to show them how it's done. The old gentleman is usually very rusty about the rules. He slows up the deal and hugely embarrasses his heir by the display of gross ineptitude. And aside from the play itself the jokes and quips flow slowly. No normal boy of eighteen or thereabouts is apt to fall into easy and loose phrases in front of his father, and when the older man attempts to break the ice by relating a few limericks of the baser sort the effect is always ghastly. I am not a prude and yet I must admit that it embarrasses me hideously to sit by while any ancestor of mine from grandmother down undertakes to tell a torrid story. All the old gentlemen or ladies I ever knew muddled the tale, and never did they produce a single one which I had not heard before. Invariably I had the same sinking feeling which assails me when a clergyman seeks to unbend and become rowdy for the laity.

It is not true that a father is a boy's best friend. That can't be. There is no way by which constraint may be wholly banished. And any overt act toward tearing down the barriers but renders them more spiky. And yet a man and his boy need not forever travel like parallel lines doomed never to meet this side of infinity. It is not impossible for them to veer a little toward each other. A father is a fool if he tries to sell himself to his children upon his virtues alone. Nobody has a sufficient number. He ought to let his faults lie as they are. What is the use of faking? No valuable friendship was ever built upon such a foundation.

The unfortunate father beset by a difficult situation tries to play the game in two divergent ways. When the man child is still small and formative, every effort is made to convince him that his father is among the gods. The boy of nine or ten who undertakes to criticize his father is rebuked for impertinence and sent to bed without his supper. In order to preserve a senseless authority a sham figure is built up to hold the place at the head of the table.

But by the time the boy has reached sixteen or thereabouts the father finds that it is cold comfort being a god in the sight of any fellow-mortal. He wants to take the boy with him to the country club for a round of golf or maybe ask him along as a theater companion. But in these places there are cronies who know the older man for what he is. They are likely to take delight in mentioning some of his slighter transgressions. The lad will learn that the old gentleman upon occasion has been known to take a drop too much. He can see with his own eyes that his sire's putting is nothing much to brag about. And if all these facts are revealed to him with suddenness there may be a shock not easily overcome.

And so it seems to me that a father's best chance to be in any way his youngster's chum must be seized upon from the very beginning. If the young child is allowed to realize at the start that his parent is not so much he may in later life be pleased and surprised at happening upon hidden virtues. Many a man has gone to great pains to attend some church in which he had no faith simply because he felt that it would be good for the children. When did hypocrisy ever constitute a good soil for seedlings? And there was another misguided fellow within my circle of friends who made a point of dressing for dinner every night in order to impress the little ones. Seemingly he lacked the imagination to realize what would happen the first time the boy ever saw him in his golf suit.

It is a pity that fathers must be older than their children. There would be far less strain and reverence if a son could be, let's say, no more than five or six years younger. Parental dignity should not go very much beyond the little gulf which lies between a senior and a freshman.

A son is handicapped in ever knowing well the man who bears his name because the father has lived so large a portion of his life before the little fellow comes to existence. And for the first few years there is no conceivable chance of reasonable companionship. You can't make a friend of a baby—not if you are a man at all fastidious. The infant has no background, no proper conversation, and his habits and morals are deplorable. And certainly nobody has yet solved the problem of how a grown-up should talk to a five-year-older. Quite properly we frown on those who seek to meet on common ground by doing baby talk with children. Nevertheless I think it is a mistake to discuss the League of Nations or commercialized vice with anybody less than seven. I have been shocked at such times as I met grave and learned youngsters who were treated from the beginning as equals.

There can be a late flowering of friendship between a father and his son. At seventy an old gentleman no longer fears that his natural self may be a bad influence upon a boy of forty. In this twilight time the head of the house may unbend a little and shatter no illusions. He will speak of his own past indiscretions. It need no longer be a secret that at times there were parties with many cocktails. Yet not even now is the contact wholly free. At this stage of friendship the balance has swung the other way. It is now the boy who feels that he must watch his step in the matter of revelation. "That," he says to himself, "is not exactly the sort of story I ought to tell my father. It might shock the old gentleman."

HEYWOOD BROUN

Prosperity*

By ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR.

THE United States ought to be happy. We have long desired to be the richest nation on earth, and now we are. Like the Village Blacksmith, we can look the whole world in the face, for we owe not any man. Instead, most of the others owe us. We have most of the gold, most of the automobiles, most of the telephones; we buy most of the great pictures even if we do not paint them. We have so much on earth, that we can look forward to very little more in heaven except space enough to park two cars for every family, and a stock market and a tariff which will always be going up. The time seems rapidly approaching when everyone will make so much money in Wall Street that we can all retire and live on our dividends.

And yet we are not particularly happy. Our fellow-countrymen, as described by Edith Wharton, Sinclair Lewis, and Eugene O'Neill, exhibit very disagreeable states of dissatisfaction, and even such a genial story-teller as Ring Lardner presents few characters who have a life that seems worth living. It is not enough to make all the poor rich if they are to be like George F. Babbitt or the inmates of Mr. Lardner's "Love Nest." Should we dismiss all this discontent as fiction, the sober facts painstakingly surveyed by the authors of "Middletown" are equally unalluring. Well, it may be that man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward even in this best of all possible countries, which retains custom-house officials to prevent its optimism from being jolted by Voltaire's "Candide." Whatever the fate of individuals, statistics remain prepossessing. Mr. Coolidge on the battlefield of Fredericksburg rejoices that the Civil War turned out as it did because our foreign-trade figures have become so large.

It is high time to be done with complacency. It has brought us, shrewd as we are in our own occupations, to a national life without planning and without meditation as to results. Coal has long been a sick industry, but the able recommendations of the President's Coal Commission of 1921 have not been followed by one law or one change. Petroleum, perhaps the most magnificent gift that any country ever received, bids fair to be exhausted within a century after the opening of the first oil-well, leaving us without fuel for our automobiles and, what is worse, without lubrication for our machinery. Electric power, with all its possibilities of freedom from toil, has been rapidly acquired by a few great groups, each of which challenges the public to find under a bewildering series of corporate shells the elusive pea of actual cash investment. The consumers of power see the Supreme Court taking away the benefits once expected from rate regulation under private ownership, while the power interests fight the alternative of public ownership by secretly buying up the two main sources of public opinion, the teachers and the press.

It is not enough to have prosperity. The vital question is: What are we going to do with it? Shall we let it dribble away as England did hers in the nineteenth century, so that little remains to show for all her past riches? Or shall we employ it in planning and making secure a better world? This prosperity is only in part of our own making. Others have labored and we have entered into their labors. And it comes too from our favorable geographical situation, our abundant minerals and free fertile land, and the disastrous condition of Europe since the war. We are the trustees of this wealth for the future. We can use it to accomplish purposes which would otherwise be impossible, and for which there may be no opportunity in less fortunate generations to come. A nation which has shown such marvelous resourcefulness in mastering things should not be baffled by the problems of human relations.

All planning requires giving up. And so I venture to suggest to you three sacrifices which we might make in this time of our prosperity.

First, that we devote money and thought without delay or interruption to the permanent conquest of unemployment. It is the most serious defect of our existing economic system, that men should want to work and not be able to do so. Yet we never bother about it until a depression sets in and then we are helpless. What are we doing now in prosperity to guard against unemployment when bad times return? It has begun already from new and disquieting causes. The very inventions which we hail as progress have thrown men out of jobs on an unprecedented scale. Can we trust, for instance, to impersonal economic laws to take care of the thousands of motion-picture musicians who have been displaced by the talkies? Are we planning enough about a related question, the superannuation of workers? We are all enthusiastic about medical discoveries which have prolonged the duration of human life. We forget that this means more old people in the country at the very time when it is increasingly difficult for a man past forty to get or even hold a job, and when the growing independence of the young makes them more reluctant to undertake the care and support of the older generation in their homes.

Second, we might set ourselves to make the physical aspects of this country more satisfying. We could use public funds much more liberally to preserve and plant forests, which yield too slow a return to attract sufficient private investment. What we have already accomplished in parks and roadways reveals the vast possibilities of common enterprise. It is not enough, however, to get better road-beds and worse road-sides. We only drive faster and farther to see less that is worth while. Nobody who has motored from Princeton to New York City can bear to visualize what the territory around all our great cities will be like fifty years hence, unless every lot owner is willing to forego some of his freedom of control over his own property. Urban ugliness is not an inevitable consequence of modern industry. Zurich, the largest city of Switzerland and a great manufacturing center, is nevertheless a beautiful place. Fall River, with its glorious view over Mount Hope Bay and the salt rivers to the westward, could be as lovely as Zurich. The trouble simply is that nobody has cared enough. Our cities are still built too much with the architectural anarchy which used to prevail on college campuses. If we let individualism continue to run riot, daily journeys from homes to offices and factories will become increasingly longer and more tedious. Already architects, traffic engineers, and regional planners are keenly aware that unnecessary concentration of population is rendering the price of civilization too high for either efficiency or enjoyment. Are we willing to put their ideas into force? We rejoice in the unspoiled places of Europe because the men of past centuries sacrificed and planned together as they built. It is in our power to create the same happiness in this country for our descendants. That means abandoning individual preferences. It means sweeping changes of great urban areas by voluntary agreement and if necessary by law. It means putting an appreciable share of our prosperity into taxation. We shall have to give till it hurts, even though we are now in no mood for sacrifice.

* A Commencement address delivered at Brown University, June, 1929.

Finally, we might sacrifice our national isolation and our armaments. The 11th of November, 1918, should have been a turning-point in the life of the world. Everyone of us can remember, as though it were yesterday, his emotions on that morning. At last it was over, and we would do all in our power that it should never happen again. Who would have foreseen on that day that ten years later we should be celebrating the anniversary of the armistice with a speech headlined in the New York Times: President Calls for More Cruisers? Who would have expected then that the Supreme Court of the United States would refuse naturalization to a woman over fifty years old because she would refuse to bear arms in another war? It must be a solid satisfaction to the great electorate to know that under this doctrine in the Schwimmer case American citizenship would have been denied to the Quaker ancestors of Mr. Hoover. This woman, to whom the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount meant something real, was excluded by judges who profess themselves Christians, while the minority who would have protected her freedom to believe and assert those precepts included an agnostic and a Jew. This decision came a few months after a solemn agreement originated and signed by the United States—yes, and ratified by the Senate—by which all the principal nations "condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another"; and they "agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, shall never be sought except by pacific means." Could there be a more significant proof of our want of faith in the Kellogg Pact than this decision of our highest court that active participation in war is an indispensable duty of every American citizen?

We are told that all these cruisers, submarines, gas bombs, and war planes are only prudent insurance. Of all analogies, this is the most fallacious. Fires are not caused by insurance—at least not by the kind decent people take out; but armaments do cause war. It is all very well to say that they are only for defense. It is as impossible for us to devise an army and navy which will protect us against other countries and yet be unable to attack them as it was for the Irishman to obtain a gun which would shoot just high enough to miss his dog and just low enough to miss his cow.

Sir Edward Grey, who knew more than most men about the causes of the World War, says:

> Each government, while resenting any suggestion that its own measures are anything more than a precaution for defense, regards similar measures of another government as preparation for attack. The moral is obvious: it is that great armaments lead inevitably to war. . . . The increase of armaments, that is intended in each nation to produce consciousness of strength and a sense of security, does not produce these effects. On the contrary, it produces a consciousness of the strength of other nations and a sense of fear.

Yet, once again as before 1914, the armament race goes merrily on. Stop saying "In time of peace prepare for war." What you prepare for you will get. Prepare for peace.

Since Mr. Hughes's achievement at Washington in 1921, the conferences have been dismal failures because they did not really aim at disarmament but only at partial limitation, and no nation was ready to give up anything which it might conceivably need. The nations have renounced war, and yet they quarrel over how many weapons of war shall be kept, and disagree over finding some yardstick to measure the tonnage and gun-power of cruisers.

Enough of compromise. The way to disarm is to disarm. Our own history provides a fruitful precedent. In 1816, at the close of a bitter war, John Quincy Adams proposed to the British government a mutual reduction of all naval armaments upon the Great Lakes.

> The degree to which they shall be reduced [he wrote] is left at the option of Great Britain. The greater the reduction, the more acceptable it will be to the President of the United States; and most acceptable of all, should it be agreed to maintain on either side . . . no other force than such as may be necessary for the collection of the revenue.

Real disarmament followed. Not a warship, not a fort, on our Northern border. We threw away our so-called insurance, and we live without fear. Let us make every frontier with every nation like the Canadian frontier.

The United States might go even farther. We might announce, not merely that we will disarm when others will, but that we shall do so immediately whether others do or not. The Labor Government in England is ready to follow our example, France has Briand, Germany is already part way toward total disarmament, Russia has actually proposed it. We have less to lose than any other nation by this course, because our great economic power will remain. Through that and through the remission of war debts to those who will join us, we can strengthen the force of public opinion in every country to produce a world-wide destruction of the means of war.

Let me make myself clear. I propose that we shall at once reduce our navy to a coast patrol and our army to an internal police force, turn our valuable military engineers into civilian officials, and close every poison-gas plant. If any backward countries or pirate-infested waters require policing, let it be done by international police. If our President wishes to go on another peace mission to South America, give him a magnificent yacht instead of a battleship. Tell the world that henceforth we shall act as if the Kellogg Treaty means exactly what it says.

The Government "Investigates"

The Story of the Wirkkula Killing

By ABRAHAM I. HARRIS

OF all the shootings by customs patrolmen engaged in preventing liquor smuggling from Canada, the slaying of Henry Wirkkula near International Falls, Minnesota, has unquestionably caused the greatest embarrassment to the government. The Treasury Department had hitherto been callous, at least outwardly, to criticism in such matters, but the protests growing out of the International Falls incident had an immediate effect. The Department found it necessary to instruct border patrolmen to exercise greater caution in the use of firearms, and it also ordered the withdrawal of the sawed-off shotguns with which such officers along the greater part of the Canadian border were armed.

The arming of patrolmen with these so-called riot guns is a piece of downright stupidity. They are the trench guns with which the American troops were armed during the World War, and against which the German government protested on the ground of their inhumanity. Each of the twelve-gauge shells used contains nine bullets, which begin to spread on leaving the barrel of the gun. Tests of the gun used in the Wirkkula killing showed that at a distance of from twenty to twenty-five feet the spread of the bullets was eight inches; at thirty-five feet, twelve inches; at forty to forty-five feet, from sixteen to twenty inches; and at seventy feet, thirty inches. Department officials state that agents are instructed to use these guns to disable fleeing automobiles by puncturing the tires or the gasoline tank. Because of the spread of the bullets, however, guns of this type obviously cannot be used to bring down a fleeing automobile without great risk of killing the occupants of the car; and no one has yet suggested that even a prohibition-law violator, not to say a person simply suspected of violation, should be shot down and killed in order to prevent his escape.

The stupidity of the Treasury Department in arming patrolmen in this way, however, is eclipsed by its downright dishonesty in investigating the Wirkkula shooting and exonerating Emmet White, the officer involved. In reporting this case for my newspaper, I witnessed this "investigation" at first hand.

The facts of the killing itself are not too complicated: Mr. Wirkkula, a confectioner of Big Falls, Minnesota, a small town some twenty-five miles south of the border, was returning to his home on the night of June 8 from International Falls, where he and his family had been visiting with relatives. His wife was with him in the front seat, while his two little daughters lay asleep in the rear seat of the car, a 1926 Packard touring car. They left International Falls at ten o'clock, driving very slowly, and after traveling some twenty-six miles in an hour and twenty minutes were suddenly hailed by a customs patrolman's sign ordering them to stop. Mrs. Wirkkula believes that her husband saw the sign, as she herself did. A light had been flashed on the sign by the patrolman holding it. On this point there is no dispute. The car, according to the patrolman who held the sign, was going only from ten to twelve miles an hour. It did not come to a stop. Whether the driver intended to stop or not is not known, but he had no motive in not stopping, since a thorough subsequent search of the car disclosed that it contained neither liquor nor any evidences of liquor.

E. A. Servine, the patrolman who displayed the sign, testified at the coroner's inquest that the car "accelerated its speed" as it passed him. He shouted for the car to stop, he said, but only once. It is possible that Mr. Wirkkula did not hear the command, as he was hard of hearing. As the car passed the sign without coming to a stop, Servine stated, he shouted to White, just ahead of him, "Let them have it. Shoot the tires." Just how far ahead of Servine his partner was is not certain.

Mrs. Wirkkula testified at the hearing that the first shot was fired when the rear of the car was about on a line with the patrolman's sign. In that she probably was mistaken. Servine stated that White was about fifteen feet from the car when he fired the first shot, but insisted that it was fired on the ground. Five empty shells were picked up from the road by the sheriff. It is certain that at least three charges from the gun struck the car; whether more cannot be ascertained. The lowest of twenty-six bullet holes in the automobile is a foot and a half above the gasoline tank and a foot above the top of the automobile tire.

An examination of the bullet holes in the car established the fact conclusively that the driver was killed by the first shot. Two bullets entered his neck and another his back, piercing the big muscle of the heart. Any one of the wounds was sufficient to cause death, the coroner said. The car, with the dead driver at the wheel, continued on the road for a few hundred feet and ran into a ditch. Had the car been going even moderately fast it unquestionably would have overturned. It did not, fortunately for the woman and the two little children. The gear of the car was found in neutral, which may or may not be an indication that the driver was bringing it to a stop.

How far away was the patrolman when he fired directly into a car containing a man and his wife and two children, with not the slightest intimation as to the identity of the occupants? An examination of the car shows that the first charge from the gun struck just to the right of the rear window, two or three of the bullets just hitting the glass. The cluster of nine holes, accounting for all the bullets contained in a shell, had a spread of less than seven inches. The gun tests, made by a government man, showed a spread of eight inches at a distance of from twenty to twenty-five feet.

Emmet White, the patrolman who did the shooting, was an expert rifleman, but was inexperienced in the customs service, having joined the force only about a month previously. A manslaughter charge was placed against him by the State, but upon further investigation it was withdrawn and a murder charge was substituted. The State's attorney said that in all the instances known to him of shootings by officers of the law in such cases there was none in which the evidence pointed so strongly to an intent by the officer to do bodily injury.

The haste and excitement of the occasion should not be forgotten, and it should be remembered, as stated above, that White was inexperienced in customs patrol work. Even so, it would seem as though a man with several years of army experience, and known as an expert rifleman, should easily have been able to hit the tires or the gasoline tank and thus disable the car. So far as I could judge from the available evidence, it would seem likely that the first shot was fired directly into the car at the level of the driver's head, with the patrolman not more than twenty feet away, and perhaps as close as fifteen feet, as indicated by the spread of the bullets.

The published facts of the shooting, since branded by Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Seymour Lowman as "highly colored to say the least," aroused public opinion throughout the country, and in the face of that opinion the government "investigated." It did not try, however, to ascertain the facts of the shooting, but rather investigated the record of the slain man—and this despite the fact that the patrolmen admittedly did not know who was in the car.

The first "partial exoneration" came from Assistant Collector of Customs N. A. Linderberg, stationed at Duluth, under whose charge the customs patrolmen operated, in an interview with the newspapermen after he had received the report of the patrolmen: "It may have been that Patrolman White was carrying out his duty."

> Q. Are your men under instruction to use firearms only in self-defense? A. That is right. We instruct them to fire only in self-defense.
>
> Q. Do you call it self-defense when a motorist refuses to stop? A. The law gives our patrolmen authority to use force to make a vessel or an automobile stop if orders to stop are not complied with.
>
> Q. Then your men do shoot at other times than in self-defense? A. Well, the law does not define force. We give our men a pistol and a shotgun and tell them to use their best judgment.

I happened to go to International Falls on the same train with Henry A. Roberts, Treasury Department special agent at St. Paul, who was sent to investigate the shooting. He had been in the service for several years and knew his business. On the way up he talked rather freely to myself and a correspondent for a Chicago newspaper and his intentions were evidently of the very best. He stated that he was going to interview all persons concerned, especially the widow of Mr. Wirkkula, and get at the facts. He examined the car, and that was evidence enough. "The shooting was wholly unjustified and unwarranted," he said, in the presence of several persons.

Then he went to interview the patrolmen and other government men. That night he left for Duluth to consult Mr. Linderberg. He did not interview Mrs. Wirkkula, the most important witness. He had been with government men all day. In the evening he was the personification of an honest man defeated. He was uncomfortably evasive in his answers, and when he arrived at Duluth he found it necessary to deny having said that the shooting was wholly unjustified and unwarranted. But he did a service nevertheless. He tested the gun used by White, and I feel confident that the order of the Treasury Department withdrawing the use of sawed-off shotguns by patrolmen was based on his report and recommendations.

The day following Mr. Roberts's departure from International Falls, Oscar Dahly, the ranking customs officer for the Minnesota district, arrived from Duluth, for the purpose of obtaining sufficient facts to make a "routine report," as he said, to his department. He stated that he was not making a full investigation because Mr. Lowman, he understood, was going to send special investigators. He interviewed the two patrolmen and the sheriff, but not the widow. the only person outside the officers who could give competent testimony.

Although other customs men were under orders to say nothing, Mr. Dahly consented to an interview with the newspapermen. In this interview he exhibited a woeful ignorance of the weapons used by patrolmen—and this after he had assembled sufficient facts for his "routine report"; but he was delightfully frank, especially considering his statement: "I suppose that Washington does not want me to talk about this happening."

Mr. Dahly was told of the experiments conducted with the gun the day previously and of the spread of the bullets at various distances, and this conversation followed: "I really did not know that—I am surprised."

> Q. Who is responsible for the issuance of these guns to the customs patrolmen? A. I suppose the Department in Washington. I naturally assume that. They give the orders and we merely follow them.
>
> Q. Was Patrolman White familiar with the handling of sawed-off shotguns? A. He just told me at the county jail that he was not—had never used one before.

So far as I can learn, the report to the Treasury Department was based on one or all of the foregoing three "investigations" in which not a single government man took the trouble to interview Mrs. Wirkkula. On this basis Mr. Lowman issued his statement exonerating Patrolman White and declaring that he has a defense. Had the government admitted that a young and inexperienced customs officer lost his head and fired into an automobile containing a man, a woman, and two small children, killing the man, there perhaps might have been a measure of sympathy extended to the patrolman, and at least some respect for the Department. But instead, the Department exonerated the patrolman and announced that it will move to transfer his case from the State to the United States court, where in fact the chances of conviction are not so great.

But it investigated fully the dead man's record and found that at one time he had been convicted of a violation of the prohibition law. It will make the most of that fact and is already making the most of it, even though it has nothing to do with the case, since Wirkkula was not hauling liquor on the night he was slain and the patrolmen in any case did not know who he was. Such a defense is dishonest, but apparently the Department is determined to save its own face in defending its agent.

'Tis of Them

By WILLIAM SEAGLE

OUT in the more backward States the legislatures have long been regarded as so many art academies. Each legislator is arbiter elegantiarum and a true Maecenas ex officio. The native geniuses know no greater recognition than to be acclaimed by the supreme legislatures of their States. One of the most absorbing problems now exercising the legislators in their character of academicians is the selection and adoption of official State songs by act of law. The logic of the movement is inescapable. The nation has its "Star-Spangled Banner." Are not the several States sovereign and independent, too, save in those spheres specially granted and reserved to the federal government? Is the doctrine of States' rights but an empty and meaningless formula?

I

The history of the present agitation may be traced back properly to "Maryland, my Maryland." Born during the Civil War of the Baltimore riots of 1861, it swept into popular favor at once. Although never adopted by the Maryland Legislature, it became recognized indisputably as the Maryland State song. Before "Maryland, my Maryland" there had been various songs which had great currency in different States, but they had never been regarded as official anthems in the same way that State seals and State flags may be said to be official. The envy of "Maryland, my Maryland" which arose in other States in the course of the years was pathetic. Many had no events in their histories which could inspire the fervid emotions that create State songs, but a few quite early resolved to have such songs even if they should have to be as synthetic as gin under prohibition. At this stage, "Maryland, my Maryland" was inevitably the model. Oliver Wendell Holmes once said he regretted that a "Massachusetts, my Massachusetts" would not quite do.

But Iowa had a native son, Major H. M. Byers, who had no such scruples, and in 1911 he composed the "Song of Iowa" after "Maryland, my Maryland" and the legislature hastened to adopt it as the official State song of Iowa. One cannot but feel that the gallant Major adulterated the martial spirit of "Maryland, my Maryland" with a far softer sentiment:

> And she has maids whose laughing eyes,
> Iowa, O Iowa,
> To him who loves were Paradise,
> Iowa, O Iowa,
> O happiest fate that e'er was known,
> Such eyes to shine for one alone,
> To call such beauty all his own,
> Iowa, O Iowa,

Two years later, in 1913, the Florida Legislature after due deliberation adopted as the State song "Florida, my Florida," a composition written in 1894 by the Rev. Dr. C. V. Waugh, for many years professor of languages in the old Florida Agricultural College at Lake City. Of this song the Florida Legislature declared in the act of adoption: "The said song has both metrical and patriotic merit of the kind calculated to inspire love for home and native State." The Florida boom might have begun much sooner if the North had been better acquainted with this immortal song:

> Thy golden fruit the world outshines,
> Florida, my Florida,
> Thy gardens and thy phosphate mines,
> Florida, my Florida,
> Yield their rich store of good supply,
> To still the voice of hunger's cry—
> For thee we'll live, for thee we'll die,
> Florida, my Florida.
>
> The oppressor's rod can't rest on thee,
> Florida, my Florida,
> Thy sons and daughters free must be,
> Florida, my Florida,
> From North and South, from East and West,
> From freezing blasts they come to rest,
> And find in thee their earnest quest,
> Florida, my Florida.

II

But, after all, there are at most only eight States in the Union which have names that scan the same way as Maryland. A pessimist surveying at this time the resources of most of the States for the creation of State songs might have been depressed. The picture would be gloomy, indeed, if one considered alone the defalcation of the poets-laureate. They had been appointed in such States as Colorado, Nebraska, Kentucky, Vermont, Georgia, and North Carolina. One might expect that they would shrink from the job of praising a Democratic governor one term and a Republican the next, but that when it came to the composition of official State songs they would leap at the chance. But where, for instance, during all these years had been Professor J. T. C. Noe of Kentucky, or F. L. Stanton of Georgia, or Mrs. Nellie B. Miller of Colorado? Alas, they had shirked their jobs to a man and woman, and not a single one of the official State songs that we now possess is owing to their exertions.

But fortunately the very same year which saw the adoption of "Florida, my Florida" witnessed the acclaim of Paul Dresser's "On the Banks of the Wabash Far Away." It is too familiar to need quoting. It quickly became popular not only in Indiana, but all over the country, and the alert and enthusiastic Indiana Legislature hastened to make it the official State song by law. "On the Banks of the Wabash" may be said to have lent the necessary impetus to the craze for State songs which is now raging in full fury. The envy caused by "Maryland, my Maryland" was as nothing.

To a certain extent the legislatures had already taken the first steps. In the great majority of States they had adopted official State flowers, and here and there State birds. They had thus settled the appropriate aspects of the State landscapes to be featured in any State song. The situation therefore was not especially difficult, especially when one considers that so much can be accomplished by the inauguration of contests. As a result of official, semi-official, and quasi-official State song contests, all over the country the lyricists, including spinsters, housewives, teachers, veterans, and members of the bar, have begun to sweat and hundreds of State songs have been produced.

Up to the present time no less than fifteen State legislatures have adopted official State songs. It is difficult to choose favorite lines. Of the fifteen songs, five are from the Far West where the scenery is gorgeous. Its magnificence of mountain, gorge, and desert is nobly sung in "O Fair New Mexico," words and music by Elizabeth Garrett. Its chorus is practically irresistible:

O fair New Mexico,
We love, we love you so;
Our hearts with pride o'erflow
No matter where we go.

O fair New Mexico,
We love, we love you so,
The grandest State to know,
New Mexico.

But perhaps the sweetest and most ineffable of all the State songs belongs to Arizona. It is entitled "Arizona," with words by Margaret Rowe Clifford and music by Maurice Blumenthal:

Sing the song that's in your hearts,
Sing of the great Southwest,
Thank God for Arizona,
In splendid sunshine dressed,
For thy beauty and thy grandeur,
For thy regal robes so sheen,
We hail thee, Arizona,
Our goddess and our Queen.

As might be expected, the lyricists have given honorable mention to the State flowers. Thus all through the Colorado State song, "Where the Columbines Grow," words and music by A. J. Flynn, the composer has shrewdly featured the Colorado State flower. It is the climax of every verse:

The war-whoop reechoes no longer,
The Indian's only a name,
And the nymphs of the grove
In their loneliness rove,
But the Columbine blooms just the same.

But, alas, the 1927 legislative session in Nebraska proved that lyricists will, after all, have to proceed with caution in introducing the State flower. A bill was offered to adopt as a State song "Nebraska, my Native Land," composed by two Wayne residents. It contained references to the goldenrod, which is the official State flower in Nebraska. The debate was proceeding favorably when suddenly one of the Representatives rose to his feet: "Every time I see these words I get hay-fever," he cried desperately; "I'm opposed to this song for that reason. I have had enough of the goldenrod around my back yard, and I don't want to see the word, even, any more. If this is the native song, I'm going to the mountains." Fortunately, however, the great majority of State legislators are more tractable and patriotic.

The other State songs are "Arkansas," words and music by Mrs. Eva Ware Barnett, of Little Rock; "Our Delaware," words by George B. Hynson, music by Will M. S. Brown; "Georgia," words by Robert Loveman, music by Lollie Belle Wylie; "Illinois," words by C. H. Chamberlin, to the air "Baby Mine"; "My Old Kentucky Home," that great favorite, by Stephen Collins Foster; "The Old North State," words by Judge William Gaston, sung to an old German folk-song (incidentally it was adopted by the 1927 Legislature against the vigorous protest of all the leading musicians of North Carolina); "Oregon, my Oregon," words by J. A. Buchanan, music by Henry B. Miartagh; "My Homeland, Tennessee," words by Nell Grayson Taylor, music by Roy Lamont Smith; and "Utah, We Love Thee," words and music by Evans Stephens, written originally for the triumphant occasion of the admission of Utah to the Union. All these songs are in their own peculiar ways no less sublime than the ones already quoted. Ironically, "Maryland, my Maryland," the most authentic of the State songs, still is such only by common usage, and even more ironically "The Star-Spangled Banner," the national anthem, has never been adopted as such by act of Congress.

III

The legislatures which thus far have refused their imprimatur to State songs must not be taken in most cases to be unfavorable to such legislation per se. They simply find it difficult to make up their minds. It is obvious that the trouble in such States arises from an excess of talent. All the songs submitted to the legislatures appear so good that it seems unfair to single one out above the rest, and give it that authority which is lent by a legislative act. Particularly in Texas is the legislative selection of a State song one of the most agitated questions of the day. In 1925, Governor Neff made it the subject of a special message to the legislature. As a result of a $1,000 prize offered, no less than 286 songs were submitted, including one from Brazil and one from Italy. A legislative committee commissioned to pass on the lyrics has thus far been unable to make up its mind, and has been continued by the 1927 Legislature. But it has indicated that it considers the best songs thus far submitted to be "Texas, our Texas," by Gladys Jackson Wright and William J. Marsh of Fort Worth. At any rate, as the song is the running favorite, we must not fail to quote a few lines:

Texas, our Texas!
All hail the mighty State!
Texas, our Texas,
So wonderful, so great!

Largest and grandest,
Withstanding every test,
O Empire wide and glorious,
You stand supremely blest.

The worst feature of the situation regarding State songs is the levity with which legislators treat so serious a subject. Sometimes they force the sponsor of the bill to sing the song for them. Sometimes they permit the author and composer of the song to sing it in special audition. Again, the Clerk of the Senate or the House may be picked for the performance. Legislators, however, are generally conscientious and scrupulous men, and when they have a question under consideration, they strive to decide it upon its merits.

Since it is impossible really to decide whether a State song is good without also hearing it played, they have begun, since the systematic inauguration of State song contests, to find the piano indispensable to their deliberations. Thus far they have confined themselves to renting it as needed. But the time is apparently not far distant when that instrument will have become just as much a regular part of the legislative equipment as the gavel and the cuspidor.

In the Driftway

MENTION was made in this column a few weeks ago of one of the literary gems of Amos H. Barnett, who serves the Nation Press as treasurer and funny man and from time to time sends out circulars to clients, would-be clients, and have-been clients, designed to reduce sales resistance, stimulate consumer demand, or perform other tricks for which advertising exists. The Drifter had not intended to return to the subject because, although he was at pains to mention that the Nation Press was doing business at 57 New Chambers Street in the city and county of New York, nobody from that office called around with a black bag filled with gratitude for the advertisement. Besides, the Drifter understands that Arthur F. Requa and Albert E. Bockelman, president and assistant treasurer, respectively, of the Nation Press, were green with envy because Barney was mentioned in this plinth of piety and they were not. It is easy to understand how Requa was omitted, because at the time he was probably out of the office collecting bills or drumming up trade—he is good at both—but it is hard to explain how Al Bockelman was overlooked. For Al is not only assistant treasurer (in regard to which his duties are probably not onerous) but he is the foreman of the composing-room and stands six feet two in his shirt-sleeves. As he always is in his shirt-sleeves he is about as hard to miss in the scenery of the Nation Press as the Statue of Liberty in New York Harbor. Anyhow, if the Drifter lives long enough, he is going to mention both Requa and Al some day, and he may add a word about John McGilvray who, as foreman of the press-room and midwife at the birth of The Nation every week, enables teeming millions to read this column for the modest price of fifteen cents a copy or $5 a year (for book offers and other premiums consult the circulation department).

* * * * *

BUT to return to Barney, who has been left in a moth-eaten bathing suit clinging to a slippery rock in this Niagara of words, he has just issued a platform for farm relief as sensible as any which the Drifter has noted—whatever that may mean. Barney doesn't get much business from farmers, and so doesn't care any more about them than do the politicians in Washington, but in his long summer evenings he likes to speculate on the misfortunes of "the backbone of America" and suggests that you wire your Senator advocating the following program of relief:

1. Propagate more tomato worms and potato bugs, which will cut down the crop, which will raise the price.

2. Make the style in female figures plump instead of waspish; get your 25,000,000 hungry girls between 16 and 46 to catch up on what they've lost the last five years in pork chops, boiled potatoes, and apple pie.

3. Increase the length of hot-dogs to a minimum of ten inches, and make it compulsory for the buttered roll to extend an inch beyond the dog on either end, and make the man put some butter on the roll.

4. Increase the depth and diameter of store pie 100 per cent.

5. Popularize the slogan, "Reach for a peck of carrots instead of a cigarette."

6. Introduce "bale-of-spinach" week, during which every patriotic citizen will consume a bale or feed it to the children.

* * * * *

THE Drifter indorses all of this program except "bale-of-spinach" week. Like the modern child, he loathes spinach, and for the same reason—it's good for him. There is an old yarn about a retired sailor who had himself called at six o'clock every morning just for the pleasure of telling the messenger where he could go and rolling over for another two hours of sleep. Likewise when the modern child grows up, he will probably order spinach served at every meal in three ways—just for the fun of refusing them all.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

From the Gastonia Jail

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: This is typewritten from the Gaston County jail. I am allowed the use of a typewriter and the privilege of writing and receiving as many letters as I wish. "Hysteria and hate" have been ruling Gastonia ever since the National Textile Workers Union began organizational work to increase the extremely low wages and lessen the very long hours of the terribly exploited textile workers in the South. This hysteria and hate is confined, however, to Manville-Jenckes and their "Committee of One Hundred" thugs and gunmen, the Chamber of Commerce, peanut politicians and hangers-on, the manufacturers-controlled press, and some of the local police who are in the habit of getting drunk and amusing themselves running around shooting up people.

It is true that my life was in danger, that I came near being shot or lynched on the night of June 8, but it is only a half truth to say that the officers who had me handcuffed to a striker saved my life. There was no necessity to bring me through Gastonia on the way to Monroe. These officers know the ones that held me up (one of the hold-ups wore a dress suit). Why were not these gunmen arrested? Because as usual it is a one-sided "law and order," the bosses' law and order. However, this was not the first time my life has been threatened. I have received telephone calls in Gastonia to get out of town in twenty-four hours' time or suffer the consequences—notes likewise. There was a full-page advertisement in the Gastonia Gazette urging the citizenry to commit violent acts upon me. Paul Blanshard in one of his articles in The Nation truthfully wrote that I had to have an armed guard nights as I slept, but the vast majority of the citizens of Gastonia and Gaston community paid little attention to these cries. The lying newspapers of this region were and are now entirely on the side of the manufacturers, with the exception of the Raleigh News and Observer and the Greensboro News.

Gastonia, North Carolina FRED ERWIN BEAL

High Treason

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Permit me to call the attention of your readers to the amazing ill fate which has just befallen Halldor Kiljan Laxness in our City of the Angels. Mr. Laxness is a distinguished novelist of Iceland, the author of eight books, some of which have been translated into English. He came to live in the sunshine of Southern California about a year and a half ago. All went well until he sent an article to the Althydubladid (Paper of the People), published in Reykjavik, leading city of Iceland, dealing with Upton Sinclair and his recent publications, in which he said: "Mr. Sinclair's last book, 'Boston,' deals with the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti and the legal process leading to it. These two innocent workingmen were executed last year after continuous sufferings and torture for seven years, and this judicial misdeed has provoked the horror of all the civilized world."

That was too much for the immigration authorities to stand, when the article came to their attention. They haled Mr. Laxness to their offices here in the Federal building, first on May 31 and a second time about the middle of June, quizzing him for nearly an hour on each occasion. They told him that he had gone too far, that they wanted people here who were content with the government; they took his passport away from him, and said the matter would be reported to Washington and that he would probably be deported. He was released on his own recognizance, without bond. Mr. John Beardsley, an attorney in Los Angeles, now has this case in charge, as representative of the Southern California Branch of the American Civil Liberties Union, 1022 California Building, Los Angeles, California.

Pasadena, California, June 29 Upton Sinclair

Hats Off!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Professor Ales Hrdlicka, curator of the division of physical anthropology at the National Museum in Washington, in a recent forecast of the development of the human race for the next "few thousand years," declares that "the hair of the head will probably be further weakened." The prospect of increasing baldness is not cheering to either human self-respect or comfort. If there can be found any possible preventive of so unattractive a cranial denouement in human evolution, may we not investigate its claims without prejudice? Abandoning easy resort to ridicule and the fear of changing cherished habits, we might consider profitably, I believe, a possible connection between the advance of baldness and the wearing of hats out of doors at all times and seasons.

I have been trying, Mr. Editor, to judge the exhibits of hatless pioneering impartially, and as a result I find that a large proportion of the hatless pedestrians whom I pass in New York possess the finest heads of hair I have seen in this country. Thick, wavy, and healthy "thatches" they often are indeed, and a pleasure to look at, as well as calculated to arouse the envy of those whose thinning crowns are already fulfilling Professor Hrdlicka's dismal prophecy. If the comely ornament of the uncovered heads of our time be at least in part achieved by liberating them from closely fitting and burdensome "lids," and permitting instead free access to the open air and violet rays, then it looks even to reluctant judgment as though Mother Nature herself were approving.

New York, July 3 Eliot White

A Woman Worker Protests

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In a letter appearing in your issue of June 26, Mr. Robert J. Caldwell makes statements about the productivity per capita here and in Europe and says that employers have found it more profitable to pay high wages, thus developing the buying power of the people. If that is so, why are the employers cutting the wages all over the United States and laying off men to rehire them at lower rates, or hiring women and very young men who are cheaper? In my own experience I have been told to do heavy work which I did not consider fit for a woman when there were men around doing lighter work. At that men are paid more for doing the same kind of work. When I have protested at this heavy work I have been told that other women are doing it all the time, so why should I object.

Not only are low wages prevalent in the factories but in the stores as well. A girl or woman must be well dressed, courteous, and on her feet all day, not to speak of selling enough goods to keep her job, for the magnificent sum of fifteen dollars a week. In some of the cheaper stores it is twelve dollars. Fifteen dollars a week naturally means a low standard of living unless the salesgirl is living at home. Here, too, men get more than women for the same kind of work. Even with the factory wage running from seventeen to twenty-five dollars a week, when one needs dental work or optical work it means very rigid budgeting and actual going without other necessaries to plan these extra expenses. How these women who have children to support, manage, I do not know.

Detroit, Michigan, June 30 Marjorie Losano

The Nation* Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
July 22—Mr. Blanshard
July 29—Mr. Mussey

Contributors to This Issue

Zechariah Chafee, Jr., is professor at the Harvard Law School.

Abraham I. Harris is on the staff of the St. Paul Dispatch.

William Seagle has written many articles on the foibles of the State legislatures which have appeared in the American Mercury and Plain Talk.

Gwendolen Haste divided The Nation poetry prize in 1922.

Henry Raymond Mussey is managing editor of The Nation.

Zona Gale is the author of "Portage, Wisconsin" and other essays.

Worthington C. Ford is the editor of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

Miriam Allen de Ford wrote The War Against Evolution in The Nation of May 20, 1925.

C. Hartley Grattan is the author of "Bitter Bierce."

J. Dana Tasker writes reviews for various magazines and periodicals.

Vithaldas K. Bhuta is a resident of Bombay.

Alexander Bakshy, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

Books and Drama

Ophidia

By GWENDOLEN HASTE

Lifting dark beside the trail,
Blotched by the pale
Sunlight sifting down cedars;
Mark of beast—stir of bee—
But here no least foot of man has beaten track,
And the traveler shudders back
From the narrow needled floor.
This is a door into legend,
Tales of men caught among patterned horror,
Before caverns painted with sun,
With clubbed gun a slack weapon
Rasping a last breath
In swollen death.

Let the mild cedars roar
Over the cushioned floor
While the tales pour
Down the wind from that place of bright caverns,
Down paths known only to wild feet and the dead—
The dread touch of life that lies in the sunlight alone,
Warm on a stone.

A Billion Wild Horses

Men and Machines. By Stuart Chase. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

DRIVING a billion wild horses—it is this that Stuart Chase, in his exciting book, "Men and Machines," pictures us as doing. Men come first in his title and in his thought. What have machines done to and for them? What can they make machines do? Can they really control these hitherto untamed monsters? It is strange that so little actual investigation has thus far been given to such questions; for the whole future of the human race hangs on the answers. But for the most part machines have been studied hitherto by engineers who were chiefly interested in better machines, or by business men whose interest was profits and not welfare, or occasionally by economists who could not write English or any other language. Mr. Chase is different. With an indisposition to accept sweeping generalizations of any sort, a voracious appetite for significant concrete facts, and an ability to paint vivid pictures in words, he has written a book which the everyday man of intelligence will read with interest and pleasure, and from which he will learn more sound economics and sound sense than is to be derived from most of the portentous tomes on our library shelves.

Mr. Chase neither takes part in the machine panegyric of our contemporary rejoicers nor joins the threnody of the machine-haters. Instead, he tries, as far as our imperfect information allows, to show the actual measure of praise and blame that we may rightly attach to this new servant and master of ours. He concludes that the robots of industry—our factory slave machine-tenders—do not exceed 5 per cent of the total population, as compared with the twelve million slaves required to support Greece's five million freemen. If machinery has displaced the old handicraft skill, it has brought in a dozen new human powers for every one it has destroyed; it has given the middle-class woman boredom in place of her old skill, however, and that is sheer loss.

Mr. Chase, in the excellent company of John Stuart Mill, doubts whether machines have really saved labor. Modern industry, he says, is "whittling away manfully at production costs, which are often relatively small, and doing rather worse than nothing at distribution costs, which are relatively large." That is the fault, however, of our going economic scheme, not of the machine. Machinery has lately been throwing men out of work by the hundred thousand—"technological unemployment" is our charming name for the phenomenon. But once more we ought to blame, not the machine, but our own lack of enough intelligence to devise a sane economy.

The flood of goods that overwhelms us is composed not of the old staples but of new goods, and refinements of old ones. If we are not "housed more spaciously, fed more heartily, or clothed or shod more voluminously," "we certainly are housed more glitteringly, fed more variously, and clothed more diaphanously," while every house has its garage, radio, telephone and electric wires. Much of the new stuff is useless or worse, much of poor quality, but it is doubtful whether quality as a whole is declining. What we need—and here is one of Mr. Chase's many useful concrete suggestions—is to determine just which articles can be made better and cheaper, taking everything into account, by machine and which by hand. "With less clamoring salesmanship, slower fashion changes, why should we not have better clothes, boots, housing, recreation facilities, foodstuffs, printed matter—fabricated in whole or in part by machines whose technological limits have been respected, not outraged and betrayed by bungling profiteers?"

The artistic count against the machine is by no means wholly sustained. To be sure, in the early industrial era, things were pretty terrible artistically, but the past half century has seen a notable new vitality in almost all the arts. What says the critic to our best modern skyscrapers? Yet it remains true that we have done nothing to bring back to the common man the arts taken from him by the machine.

As for play, the machine has done it great damage. Who would not agree, in view of the way we like to spend our leisure time, in being done something to, rather than in doing something genuinely recreational? Yet even here our author is not quite hopeless of breaking through the commercialized amusements that now "decreate" us.

The charge that machinery is standardizing everything and everybody Mr. Chase subjects to keen examination, with interesting results. He maintains, and rightly, that the machine has been the greatest destroyer of standards in history. Old China was standardized to a degree of which modern America cannot dream. None the less, the machine has helped the profit-makers create temporary standards of consumption, often ugly ones, so that we all eat and dress and live alike—but tomorrow we shall all change our ways. It is not one dead level, but at worst, maybe, one live level. This whole question of standardization needs a deal more study, and this book suggests more than one interesting line of investigation.

Concerning most of the ordinary questions about machines, then, Mr. Chase's answers are much qualified. Like most observers of fact in such matters, he paints his pictures in a great variety of shades. Three great and unrelieved dangers, however, he does see in the machine—mechanized warfare, "technological tenuousness" (the growing danger arising out of mechanical specialization), and the drain on natural resources.

Mechanized warfare, he believes, is actually likely to wipe belligerent peoples off the earth, and he soberly raises the question whether the next great war will not be over in two hours, by which time airplanes loaded with unbelievably deadly gases

(which are already in our hands) will have wiped out the principal cities of the warring nations. It is a sobering question, but it has little effect on our admirals.

Second, Mr. Chase questions whether the increasing complexity and consequent interdependence of our machine civilization may not lead to a breakdown due to a stoppage somewhere at some time. He lists a score of paralytic trades, as he calls them, whose stoppage of work would bring life to a standstill. Some day a trifling earthquake, a strike, or a struggle between two business groups may really cut an industrial nerve, as England's general strike in 1926 came near doing, and then we shall die by the million.

Finally, there is the drain on our natural resources. It is an old theme, and notwithstanding our talk about the miracles of science, we still live in a fool's paradise. To take a single dramatic example, what of the stability of a material civilization based, as our automobile civilization is, on an oil supply to which the experts give a life of less than a generation? These three great dangers, then, Mr. Chase holds must be squarely faced and he is not without concrete suggestions for meeting them.

Summing it all up: "As I study the schedules, I incline to the belief that machinery has so far brought more misery than happiness into the world. It has, however, brought the fresh winds of change, and with them, vitality and invigoration. . . . If the triple menaces of war, technological tenuousness, and failure of natural resources can be forestalled, and some sort of conscious functional control inaugurated, perhaps in another generation the net balance may fall on the other side."

Slowly, in the face of fierce opposition from uncontrolled and short-sighted business interests which do not yet see beyond their own nose, we are making our way toward that conscious functional control; it is the alternative to perdition.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Grain of Truth

The Letters of Katherine Mansfield. Edited by J. Middleton Murry. Alfred A. Knopf. Two volumes. $7.50.

ONE reads well into the first volume of Katherine Mansfield's letters and is pleased with a mind that can play over life as a flame plays, lighting to color a smooth metal, bright or dull. One leaves the second volume aware that one has been played upon oneself by a fire.

To the eye of modernism such as Miss Mansfield's, a vast flatness is evident in the modernism-in-time attitudes. In juxtaposition to her willing regard, an indiscriminate skepticism becomes sheer sentimentality, becomes a mummer's mask, worn to hide the ineffectual—or to heighten confessedly faint gifts.

It is not that she is looking for the "good" in life. It is that she has a kind of well-bred willingness to see the possible intention, to include catastrophe as, say, a "rage of art," and in general to make allowances for life as might a week-end guest in a house not yet organized and running smoothly. She causes shrill and indignant outcries against fate to seem the bad table manners of the very young. Even the groans of the inadvertently wounded are taken in the attitude of hunters toward one of their number who comes a cropper—a regrettable occurrence but not one, by some reproachable essence, devilishly contrived. She has the artist's sense of the temporary value of the dissonance, though she herself may be the discord. She has had the artist's swift sense of bewilderment "as though one were caught in a cloud of rushing birds."

It is impossible therefore to comment on these letters as anything save as a record of Katherine Mansfield's attitude toward life, of her own particular thirty-four-year quest for truth, and her finding of truth in love, laughter, friends, and above all in the response to herself of every thing, animate and inanimate. The letters are the intimation of the fashion in which one organism integrated itself into life, by experiencing other particles, literally, as if it were they. This method, the letters bear tacit testimony, is probably the principal technique so far uncovered for heightening a particular awareness of the general movement of being. And it is a technique in which laughter bears a serious share.

This is not to say that Katherine Mansfield's letters are the letters of one who loves life on any terms. Rather, they are the letters of one who sees life moving, and whose preoccupation in the reaches of this process are so intense that she doesn't bother too much about anything else.

"And if someone rebels and says that life isn't good enough on those terms," she writes [I forget the terms], "one can only say It is." This ranges with William James's "I'll bet it's worth while," not as a facile acceptance, but as possibly shrewd divination which, as about oracles, we may as well weigh—perhaps as art's grain of truth. But "One must tell everything, everything," Katherine Mansfield writes. "It is after all the only treasure, the only heirloom we have to leave, our own little grain of truth." She has left her own. Ill, fevered, exhausted, exiled, facing death, she held her power to behold.

> I was looking at some leaves yesterday—idly looking, and suddenly I became conscious of them, of the amazing "freedom" with which they were "drawn"—of the life of each curve—but not as something outside oneself, but as part of one. . . . I feel as though one received . . . the leaves into one's physical being.

The core of the value of her legacy of letters is that she quickens the perception of everyone who reads. If ever life is momentarily stale, one has only to open her letters to sense this man in a green hat within one's own horizon, and that vast respectable woman with chins; or to feel clover and grass; or to be fat pillows, sunning themselves on a weathered box. With the specialist's power of discernment, she is somehow able to make of discernment a general power, a common faculty. Without ever writing a word about the vision of the artist becoming in time the vision of all, she merely quietly stimulates all who read her to share in that elusive vision.

Therefore she is but secondarily—as she might have wished—the writer's writer, the artist's writer. But she is not the less a supreme treasure house for those who try to write, to paint, to "create." For her gorgeous realism is nothing but raw material. Always her business is transmutation.

> When I write about ducks I swear that I am a white duck with a round eye, floating on a pond fringed with yellow blobs and taking an occasional dart at the other duck with the round eye which floats upside down beneath it. In fact the whole process of becoming the duck (what Lawrence would perhaps call this consummation with the duck or the apple) is so thrilling that I can hardly breathe, only to think about it. For though that is as far as most people get, it is really only the "prelude." There follows the moment when you are more duck, more apple, or more Natasha than any of these objects could ever possibly be, and so you create them anew.
>
> . . . that is why I believe in technique too. I do just because I don't see how art is going to make that divine spring into the bounding outline of things if it hasn't passed through the process of trying to become these things before re-creating them.

And to Virginia Woolf she writes: "Your Flower Bed [Kew Gardens] is very good. There's a still quivering changing light over it all, and a sense of those couples dissolving in bright air which fascinates me. . . ."

Somewhere in such words as these lies her secret, her grain of truth for the one who writes, reads, lives; her challenge to other organisms to become more aware.

Also, her honesty is like cold, bright air. A species of Christ to moderns is this one, who can be, on occasion so joyous, ironic, and sharp-edged, and who says, again and again in this form or in that: "And I long for goodness—to live by what is permanent in the soul."

Her end proved this need, at Fontainebleau, where she went seeking more than health alone. But she had always a laughing distaste of words too heavy-handed. She could write, "I feel I must keep in close touch with God," but she was more likely to say: "It is difficult to live from one's center of being in London."

Besides extending human consciousness, these two volumes afford a thousand pages of amusement. ZONA GALE

Rhodes as Historian

James Ford Rhodes: American Historian. By M. A. DeWolfe Howe. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

JAMES FORD RHODES won an enviable reputation as a writer of history by his first volumes. That reputation served to carry him through life, softening the criticism which his later volumes suggested of inadequate investigation and careless treatment of subject. He never claimed to be a philosophic historian, and he believed a philosophic history demanded qualities he did not possess and gave results quite other than his own. In explaining the methods used in writing his volumes he showed his limitations more clearly than his merits, and he never asserted an ambition to accomplish more than he had performed, or outline another method for improving what he had accomplished. Little difference of opinion exists on his work. Thorough in investigation, balanced in the proportion of topic, eminently fair in its judgment of men and incident, a style admirably adapted to its purpose—even that does not sum up the merits of his undertaking. Of special importance was the time of publication. It came when the bitterness between North and South had well-nigh exhausted itself and when both sides could welcome a calm, well-documented, and quite readable story of the War of Secession, stated with so apparent a desire to be unprejudiced as to seem like a new statement of an old story which had become tiresome from its involved, unreasonable hatreds and unexplained differences of opinion. Rhodes took a position that won recognition from all—even the most prejudiced. If faults have been found they have not affected the broad and generous treatment of the subject; if serious omissions have been pointed out, they are such as called for a knowledge or material he did not possess, and such as did not reduce the value of his accomplishment.

If that was his life work, what was the man? Mr. Howe, in letting Rhodes tell his own story, has shown great skill and his usual sensitive judgment in selecting the essentials. In place of describing a long succession of triumphs in eulogistic terms he has given the steps by which Rhodes deliberately planned to write, the exercise in style he imposed upon himself, his first advances, and his final success. For the iron merchant of Cleveland started with little that promised a career of letters. Hard discipline and long preparation developed his powers and gave him his occupation. He deserved the success which came to him in so full a measure, yet the days of a writer are not apt to be eventful. Naturally Mr. Howe looks to the social conditions surrounding Rhodes.

In leaving Cleveland and settling first in Cambridge and then in Boston, Rhodes showed his sense of relation. He came to be better known as a Boston than as an Ohio product. Singularly modest and of marked social qualities, he won a high position in a community somewhat fixed in its standards and not readily open to outside influences. He was not extreme in his politics and frankly acknowledged his lapses from party allegiance; he was free from the inherited opinions that have set New England apart; he was a wide and judicious reader, and talked well on what he read; he was an eager questioner and could flatter the questioned by admitting his own ignorance. All these qualities made for success, and he soon found a place in the most exclusive circles and dining clubs of Boston, which furnished him an atmosphere perfectly congenial to his wishes. At home and abroad he received appreciation and rewards to repletion. On the whole it was a remarkable career of unbroken advance, until ill health interfered and gave to his last years a color of pathos.

Quotation will not help to an understanding of the man; the life must be taken as a whole, and Mr. Howe has told the story in such a manner as to indicate the weaknesses as well as the strength. Rhodes's position as an historian is already assailed, and few in these days will face the reading of his series of volumes. Yet he accomplished a great task in a praiseworthy manner, and that accomplishment may well serve as an example to others.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

The Mind of a Criminal

Stealing Through Life. By Ernest Booth. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THE chief drawback to the work of the criminologist has been, up to date, the absence of articulate clinical material. The criminal has been viewed objectively, but seldom or never has revealed himself subjectively. Books have been written by convicts, true—many of them. But either they have been the work of political or industrial prisoners, who are not criminals in any true sense, or they have been concerned principally with the prison experiences of their writers. From Berkman's "Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist" (and before), to Robert Joyce Tasker's "Grimhaven," issued last year, that has been true. Even Jack Black, looking back over a finished criminal career, is only an apparent exception.

Now for the first time, in the words of a writer of native power, we have the actual workings of the mind of a criminal. Ernest Booth is a professional, if he is not a congenital, criminal. His trained profession or trade has been robbery; he has been bred to no other, and any other occupations in which he may momentarily have been engaged have been incidental. In "Stealing Through Life" he has given us the sober, almost casual, record of an extra-legal career. Some of this story has already appeared in magazine-article form; one of the episodes has even been tortured into the false outlines of a motion picture. But here is the whole tale, unvarnished and open. The result is a book which cannot be ignored by any serious student of the criminal mind, any more than it will be neglected by those simply curious about the psychology of a world so like and yet so unlike their own.

The day when ten-year-old Ernest, running away with Buddy, met his first arrest, was a crucial point in his career—more crucial than even he seems to suspect. It fixed the norm of his life: it divided the world into those who follow the dull code, and those who defy it. It broke down the instinctive terror of law-breaking whose very cowardice keeps most of us on strictly respectable paths. From that event his life flowed naturally to its expected culmination as a life-prisoner in a California penitentiary. What its future may be depends on many extraneous factors. But the essential facts of Ernest Booth's past and present—modified only by the accident of an acute intelligence and a born gift for strong and sturdy narrative—lie within the covers of this book; and together with them lie (allowing for the same modifications) the essential facts about every professional criminal.

What evasions and alterations of literal fact are in the book are very unimportant. The inner and important truths are straitly adhered to. Since its writing, Booth, like the other prison writers of California, has been forbidden by a ruling of the State Prison Board from publishing any more of his work. With some of these authors, as with Tasker, for example, this merely means a delay of a few years. With Booth it may be a far more serious impediment. Another completed work, and a third in the process of making, which follow on the events of "Stealing Through Life," are being withheld by this ruling. But whether Booth is ever able to round out his story or not, he has already, in this single volume, performed a notable service. The book, Booth himself says, constitutes "an effort to work out the fundamental causes which brought me to prison. . . . If the so-called 'crime-wave' is due to such criminals as I have met, . . . then to calm that wave . . . is but a matter of intelligent application of simple changes which, I believe, are all too obvious."

But this piece of a man's life has further value than as a mere case-book for criminologists. It reveals very plainly a new and genuine talent in American literature. That this talent has grown to fruition in a prison-cell is a mere accident; whatever the circumstances of Booth's career it must have come to light by this, his thirtieth year. There are passages in "Stealing Through Life" which challenge comparison with the best that has been done of recent years in English prose. The book has its lesser moments: but it is by his best that we judge a writer. And the not infrequent best of this young man—handicapped and truncated as he has been by the strange fortuity of his life-course—is something which even we who could find no better use for his energies than to turn them to anti-social activities and then lock him away from us, may well be proud to discover and acclaim.

MIRIAM ALLEN DE FORD

A Plea for the Mind

Belphegor. By Julien Benda. Translated by S. J. I. Lawson. Introduction by Irving Babbitt. Payson and Clarke. $2.

IT always seemed to me that the reviewers overemphasized the fact that Julien Benda's "The Treason of the Intellectuals" was lacking in pertinence so far as America was concerned. To be sure it was a book written about French conditions for Frenchmen, but a true apprehension of the fundamental thinking it contained should have made it relatively easy to apply M. Benda's ideas in this country, with disastrous results to some of our respected thinkers and writers. My objection to the book was not that it lacked pertinence to our situation, but that it offered, in the first place, no satisfactory solution of the problem of the disinterested "intellectual" who is immersed in a given social situation and must, unless he is utterly bloodless, take a "writing interest" in the practical affairs of the state. I do not mean that he should be hampered in his thinking by nationalistic concerns; indeed I heartily second M. Benda's attack on the perverse nationalism of some of our recent writers; but I do not see how any rational intellectual can hope to dissociate himself from such raging problems as those of war and peace (even though they are nationalistic in essence), for instance. I cite war and peace, for it is on an aspect of these problems that M. Benda reveals a shocking (nay, quite childish) bias and one that made me suspicious of his whole program for dissociating the intellectuals from so-called practical politics.

In "The Treason of the Intellectuals" M. Benda casts quite unworthy aspersions on those Frenchmen who have concerned themselves with the question of war guilt and considers himself justified in asserting the truth of the war-time mythology as to the origins of the World War. In other words, he has absorbed some of the very passionate mythology that is so deeply rooted in the nationalism which he is busy reproaching the intellectuals for espousing. He is apparently unable to recognize that it is a material contribution to his cause to have one of the most piously erected structures of the French nationalists (to confine the matter to his own country) destroyed. Only by demonstrating the utterly untrustworthy nature of the assertions of the nationalists on questions of ascertainable fact shall we be able to shake the belief of the general public in their grandiose emotional structures. It does not speak at all well for M. Benda's own disinterestedness that he is unable to grasp this quite obvious point.

"Belphegor," while the emphasis is quite different from that of "The Treason," is in some ways a complementary book. Its thesis is that there has been, for some time past, a distinct movement to emphasize the emotional elements in works of art to the exclusion of the intellectual. The philosophical background for this movement is found in Bergson. Its remoter roots run back to Rousseau and beyond. It has resulted in the progressive deterioration of the intellectual qualities of literature and the aggrandizement of the emotions. This thesis is supported by a wealth of argument and illustration and must be taken as a case demonstrated. "Belphegor" seems to me a much stronger book than "The Treason."

On its positive side, "Belphegor" is a plea for the reinstatement of the intellectual qualities of literature. M. Benda demands that we once more assert the disciplinary function of the mind; that we attempt not to reproduce in literature the immediate responses of the emotions to the external world but correlate our impressions and give them form and meaning through the use of the intellect. He demands that there be a return to a concern about the structural aspects of literature, with a view to making it possible to evaluate art in terms of aesthetic value, rather than of purely emotional significance. This program demands the cooperation not only of the artists but the critics as well. He finds that as the artists have aggrandized the emotional elements of their books, so have the critics become habituated to evaluating works in terms of emotions. This he finds to be disruptive of all intellectual life. In brief, he demands a reassertion of the primary importance of the intellect.

That this movement will find expression in contemporary American criticism is beyond doubt. It already has its voices, though I do not find that those who have voiced M. Benda's program are altogether admirable. They are characterized chiefly by a narrow particularity of information and comprehension. Battling for a minority point of view, they have tended to emphasize the esotericity of their program and the artists they have put forth as representative of what they desire to see come to pass are rather the last and feeblest representatives of extreme emotionalism than the precursors of the new literary fashion. Also, in their haste to reassert the importance of "structure," they have frequently forgotten content.

Personally, I am entirely sympathetic to the triumph of the intellect in art as elsewhere. The modern disparagement of the intellect does not seem to me to be firmly grounded. It is chiefly by disciplining the emotions and recognizing the conditioning non-intellectual influences, and asserting the claims of the intellect that we achieve any valuable insights. A wide reading of "Belphegor" should contribute to the reestablishment of the intellect in the place of primacy.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Potentialities

Poems. By Charles Norman. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.
The Heart's Journey. By Siegfried Sassoon. Harper and Brothers. $2.
Machinery. By MacKnight Black. Horace Liveright. $2.
Poems and the Spring of Joy. By Mary Webb. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.
The Hermit Thrush. By Kathleen Millay. Horace Liveright. $2.

AS representative selections from recent verse these volumes have definite limitations of importance. In the case of Mary Webb we know that her major efforts were devoted to her novels; as poets, it could be said that Messrs. Norman, Sassoon, and Black are interesting—but in their work there is evidence that each might be a more successful prose writer. It is difficult to think of these men becoming great poets, and it is surprisingly easy to imagine each one a potential novelist, writing with that instinct for accurate words which is called style.

Fine imagination, which is neither exactly nor necessarily a poetic point of view, is the distinguishing quality of Charles Norman's verse. Effectiveness, however, is sometimes sacrificed for brevity; and the poet often misses full expression by putting prose rhythms into verse forms. He continually uses (and then he speaks most naturally) prose-length lines:

> ploughing the sea the galleons swayed > burrowing, and the huge hulls > plunged from perilous heights.

With a single exception the collection lends itself nobly to our whim about potential novelists. That exception is Epitaphe pour la Reine. Here, strangely enough in French, is the unmistakable work of a poet.

In "The Heart's Journey" Siegfried Sassoon seldom writes without self-consciousness; the thought is frequently strained into meter, and there are only a few natural lines. Yet, certainly, the emotions seem genuine and the moods essentially poetic. In Sassoon the war is by no means a dim memory. Slight as are his treatments of it in this volume, there is still reason to believe that he might write a remarkable story of his four and a half years' service.

Corliss engines, turbines, and power-houses are, of course, novel subjects of verse. As symbols of the modern age, they are important materials of literature. Admitting that MacKnight Black understands machinery and sees in it a poetic power which the casual observer cannot grasp easily, it is fair to say that his book does not interpret civilization, even subtly; it merely analyzes symbols. And when Mr. Black employs such figures as "skyscrapers stand tethered," and "as where the measured sun hammers the cold earth, a piston beats immobile steel," there is proof that machinery is not yet a self-sufficient idea. It is possible to imagine that the rhythms of these poems are those of electricity, swirling and surging and beating; it is still more possible that machinery is a subject more suited to prose than to verse.

The poems and essays in Mary Webb's book are a record of personal experiences, out of which her novels have grown. Immediately, "we are caught into the primal beauty of earth, and life flows in upon us like an eager." As in "Precious Bane," her best-known work, a quiet, reasoned sense of beauty moves through this volume.

And by contrast, Kathleen Millay is definitely a poet; though in "The Hermit Thrush" a not very impressive one. Occasionally, however, she finds in a mood of wistful, sad beauty the lyric motive which rises to the heights of fine poetry.

J. DANA TASKER

By Charles Erskine Scott Wood

Author of Heavenly Discourse

A BOOK OF INDIAN TALES

The beauty of these Indian folk tales lies in their simplicity and directness.

No adjectives will be employed in advertising them.

$2.00 All Bookstores

THE VANGUARD PRESS

Employers:—

For intelligent employees advertise in The Nation. You reach fewer readers than through a large newspaper, but those you reach are worth while.

And your advertisement in The NATION is READ.

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance, to

The Nation Advertising Department
20 VESEY STREET, N. Y., or Phone FITZROY 9074

India's Wealth and England's Wars

Indian Finance. In the Days of the Company. By Pramathnatha Banerjea. The Macmillan Company. $5.

TEXTBOOKS on Indian finance and economics are few and far between; hence any attempts that are made by popular writers to throw light on these subjects ought to be welcomed by the country in general and by students of economics in particular. Dr. Banerjea has delved into the treasure-house of the records of the East India Company and produced a learned volume which reveals at least part of the terrible story of the drain of India's wealth during the reign of the company. The military expenditure was a bugbear in those days, more than a century back, just as it is a source of waste in the year of grace 1929. The book contains many details—and vivid ones, too—of the financial burden involved in fighting Britain's wars outside of India, and the agony of the company's directors in not being able to withstand the "loot" of India's resources for service of the Crown abroad. As for example, we find the directors complaining:

> Our revenues will not, with the requisite allowances for the other branches of public expenditure, suffice for the payment of the present military establishments, of which the King's troops, including their passage to and from India and the recruiting service, account for so extensive a part. Reduction, therefore, is here indispensable. Increase, payable from the funds of the company, is impossible; and this is a subject on which a clear and definite understanding is immediately necessary. . . . At the desire of His Majesty's Government, the . . . company have had to sustain the expenses of various expeditions to the French, Dutch, and Spanish possessions in India, and to. . . Egypt, all chiefly on National [British] account.

The authorities in England in a dispatch to the East India Company stated:

> We believe that a due regard to the welfare of the general community demands a large and liberal expenditure on works of the above description . . . such as the restoration and construction of works of irrigation, the formation of new lines of road and water communication, and the improvement of harbors.

Not only the East India Company, but the present British Indian Government, has generally failed, even after seventy years, to carry out this excellent policy, because of the depredations of the military octopus.

VITHALDAS K. BHUTA

Fiction Briefs

Tides. By Count Edouard von Keyserling. Translated from the German by Arthur J. Ashton. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

The novels of the late Count Edouard von Keyserling—not to be confused with his living, philosophic cousin—belong to that long line of fiction that extends from "A Sentimental Journey" to "Anna Karenina." Except that they reflect the lingering traces of one social order and the presage of a new one to come, they have nothing in common with either the proletarian or the introspective psychological styles of contemporary writing. They are in the best aristocratic manner and, although the times have changed, they lose nothing thereby in value or quality.

"Tides," like "Twilight" and "The Curse of the Tarniffs," is distinguished by a quiet elegance of execution that is far too

Do you know your

MIDDLETOWN

by Robert S. and H. M. Lynd

"Middletown has at least two independent claims to being considered the most important book published since the war. First, it is the first careful picture of American life, seen in detail yet in perspective and color. Second, it is the first serious attempt to study any civilized community with the combination of techniques known to anthropology, sociology, psychology and economics; that is, it presents at last the long awaited fusion of the social sciences."—GARDNER MURPHY, Journal of Adult Education.

$5.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue New York

LABOR AT THE HELM

England has elected labor representatives as the dominant political party.

The manner of government under Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is of pulsating interest to all students of democratic government.

The Manchester Guardian

WEEKLY

will give accurate reports, unbiased by party considerations, of all the doings of England's first elected Labor Government.

It will also keep an inspired watch on the newly revived efforts towards the establishment of peace and disarmament among the nations of the world.

The intellectually inclined in more than sixty countries depend on The Manchester Guardian Weekly to keep them furnished with reliable information on all important world happenings.

You should start taking The Manchester Guardian Weekly regularly now at the beginning of this thrilling period in the world's history.

MAIL THIS COUPON

The Manchester Guardian Weekly,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:—

Enclosed please find $3.00 for which send THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY to the below address.

Name _____

Address _____

graceful to be affected. It has the simplicity that comes from infinite care and restraint. Written originally in German by a baron from the Baltic provinces, it escapes, surprisingly enough, both Teutonic ponderousness and Slavic impetuosity. The sentiment that dominates is of regret, not of enhancement. Count von Keyserling was a realist. Whether he dealt with the lords of the manor, or with their serfs, or with their runaway wives as in "Tides," his point of view on actualities was never distorted by his tastes.

The setting in which "Tides" is placed has been shattered these fifteen years, and the plot is negligible, but the situations are apt to remain pertinent as long as human opposites attract each other and human temperaments clash and environment modifies human actions. Doralice and Hans seek a refuge for their love by the seaside, but love proves difficult between contrasting natures and the sea is treacherous. In grasping the varieties of interplay between character and conditions Count von Keyserling created several small masterpieces of which "Tides" is one. It is to be regretted that his work is not better known in America, especially when it is available in such responsible editions as this one from the Transatlantic Library.

As Far as Jane's Grandmother's. By Edith Olivier. The Viking Press. $2.50.

The darker subtleties of the professional psychologist are absent from this book. The domination of Jane Langdale by her Grandmother Basildon results in frustrations and repressions that are reflected in actions only. Although accurate the study is superficial. The decorous treatment of a subject that might well tempt other writers into deeper waters gives "As Far as Jane's Grandmother's" but the meager charm of a stately and narrow tradition.

This Poor Player. By Shirley Watkins. Macrae-Smith Company. $2.50.

To all but two of the many people who come within sound of his hypnotic tongue Alexander Birney is what he believes himself to be, a savior of mankind cast in the nineteenth-century mold of philosopher extraordinary. Even the simple, devoted Geyer and the cynical, effete Seixas see the truth but dimly: Geyer cherishes the promise that is never fulfilled; Seixas analyzes the mountebank from the genius, but neither comprehends the essential quality of such a mental vagrant. It is the magnitude of Birney's fine art of deception that gives his character its peculiar and tremendous dimensions. The distinction of the novel comes from the author's power to realize the extent, the force, and above all, the barren wake of such a characteristic. Apart from this element the book might well be dismissed as a tour de force of erudition, rhetoric, and abnormal psychology. As it is, 454 pages of such literal, unidiomatic prose give the impression of a carefully prepared exercise. "A Poor Player" escapes complete boredom because a paranoiac is always a curiosity, and because a charlatan, even a metaphysical one, has fascination.

Dark Weather. By Marguerite R. Baldwin. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

Neither the confusions of riches nor the restraints of learning ever touched the characters in "Dark Weather." They are the people whose shabby dwellings fringe the back streets and lanes of Styxtown—poor laborers and indolent farmers. With the exception of the dreamer, Jules, none has looked above his barnyard, let alone lifted his eyes unto the hills. Their lives are only once removed by their human forms from those of their live stock; they exist with equal irresponsibility and more, much more, promiscuity and gaiety. They are the poor whites of every town from coast to coast, once confined to buggy rides and now as much confined to flivver jaunts. Written in a somber, almost onomatopoetic style, singularly unsensuous, the novel nevertheless is streaked by the peculiar vibrations of June's reckless abandon, her pathetic defiance, her impassioned vernacular. Marguerite Baldwin confronts her material with conscious detachment, and creates her object by suggestion. The theme of the loves and death of the slavey in a small-town inn is not new, but treated with discernment and penetration, with knowledge and art, it places "Dark Weather" high in the regional literature of America.

Drama

Vaudeville Must Be Saved

THE past season in particular was filled with plaints about the unprecedented number of failures on Broadway resulting in dozens of dark houses and a whole army of unemployed actors. Yet in spite of the keen public interest in the fortunes of the theater the fact that there is only one straight vaudeville house on Broadway today—Keith's Palace Theater—does not seem to attract much attention. It is only on special occasions—such as the recent sale of the Hippodrome and the proposal to demolish this legend-wrapped playhouse, or the centennial celebration of vaudeville, held in 1926—that vaudeville is recalled in the press and in public discussion. A visitor from other lands, if he suddenly found himself in Times Square, would hardly suspect the existence in this country of that unique and ancient art.

The decline of vaudeville in New York revealed itself earlier in the closing down of such Broadway houses as Tony Pastor's, Hammerstein's, and the Colonial. Now comes the downfall of that greatest house of spectacles—the Hippodrome. The same tendency is at work in the capitals of Europe. In London, for instance, such famous houses as the Empire, the London Pavilion, the Tivoli, and the Oxford have become movie palaces (or at least have ceased to house vaudeville) within the last ten years. There are still several straight vaudeville houses left in the theatrical district—the Palladium, the Holborn Empire, the Alhambra, the Coliseum, the Hippodrome, and the Palace—not to mention the numerous neighborhood music halls, but just as in New York their number, particularly in the central section of town, does not increase.

The paradox is that in spite of its practical disappearance from the Times Square amusement district and in spite also of the critical condition in which this district finds itself today, vaudeville not only exists but apparently even prospers. Here are a few pertinent figures. The largest nation-wide vaudeville enterprise—the Radio-Keith-Orpheum Circuit—operates about 700 theaters served by 25,000 artists and having an average weekly attendance of some 12,000,000 people. In Greater New York the same interests control forty-eight theaters with an average weekly attendance of 560,000 or nearly a quarter of the 2,500,000 who patronize the theater—whether it be devoted to drama, vaudeville, or movies—within that territory.

It must be admitted that only five out of the 700 theaters, namely one each in New York, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Los Angeles, and San Francisco, serve their public with "straight" vaudeville. All the others divide their program between vaudeville and movies. But though originally the concession of half the program to the movies was undoubtedly a tribute to a rival power which was rapidly becoming more formidable, today it signifies no more than the desire to provide an entertainment of real variety. In fact until the appearance of the talking picture the gains were entirely on the side of vaudeville,

In the New Issue of

The MODERN QUARTERLY

EDITED BY V. F. CALVERTON & S. D. SCHMALHAUSEN

HENRI BARBUSSE
Addresses A FIGHTING MANIFESTO to the intellectuals of America.

E. BOYD BARRETT
Pertinently questions ARE RELIGIOUS PEOPLE SANE?

THIS JEW (A Symposium)
A. A. Roback and Dr. Beran W. Wolfe contribute two stimulating articles to this important new symposium.

TREASON OF THE INTELLECTUALS
Waldo Frank versus Samuel D. Schmalhausen in a stimulating controversy.

FREE OFFER
Your choice of any Modern Library book FREE with a yearly subscription.

The MODERN QUARTERLY, 1818 Ashburton Street, BALTIMORE, MD.
Enclosed find $2.00. Send me The MODERN QUARTERLY for one year and title No. .....of The Modern Library Free.
.....
.....
.....

AND 16 OTHER ARTICLES, STORIES & REVIEWS BY Robert Briffault, V. F. Calverton, Harold Salemson, Oakley Johnson, Joseph Vanzler, Arthur Calhoun and others.

DON'T MISS THIS ISSUE OF AMERICA'S MOST REVOLUTIONARY MAGAZINE.

50c at most magazine stands

N. Y. C. Dealers may obtain copies from J. M. Blanke, 110 W. 42nd St.

The Dismal Science Made Delightful

The USEFUL ART OF ECONOMICS

by George Soule

"I HAVE yet to read better written, more cogently stated and clearer non-technical statements of the well-known facts on the protective tariff, the chief problems of foreign trade (including reparations and the inter-allied debts), the means of stabilizing business and the present status of the American farmer than are to be found in this volume."—ROBERT A. BRADY in the New York Herald Tribune.

At bookstores $2.00

The Macmillan Company New York

DR. B. LIBER'S newest book

THE HEALERS

Price $2.00

A novel of 455 pages, cloth, description of all healing professions and quacks, with details about their shortcomings and criminal practice and a picture of the SOCIAL BACKGROUND OF DISEASE.

OPINIONS of readers, doctors and the press: Unusual, Honest, Courageous, Absorbing, Thrilling, A Revelation, Great Inspiration, Sociological Novel, Dangerous Book, Flaming Sincerity, One Revolutionary Physician, Great Physician Teacher, Imagination of Artist, Rare Human Being, Serving the humble generously.

SOME OF THE NEW OPINIONS: "I've come in contact with many schools of healing, but until I read your book had no way of being able to sum them up correctly from a working class point of view." (S. D., Nelson Creek, New Zealand.)

"Among the piles of worthless, sensational books served daily to the reading public by the big, profiteering publishing houses, your book comes as a gratifying relief. What a wealth of stimulating, thought-provoking ideas! What noble sentiments and sympathetic observations in each chapter! So many courageous, yet true opinions! You throw abundant light on an important subject which has been so shamelessly and cowardly neglected. Who has ever had courage enough to start a cleaning in the midst of all our healers? It is regrettable that your book will just be a faint whisper in the deafening noise of our gum-chewing civilization. Our modern mental food trusts, such as The Book of the Month Club, The Guild, etc., will never turn their eyes on such a book. How dare they help spread the real truth?" (A. R., New York.)

Send no money, but checks or money-orders to Rational Living, Box 2, Station M, New York City

Just Published

A New Book by the author of Your Money's Worth

MEN AND MACHINES

By STUART CHASE

What have machines done for you and to you? Where are the billion wild horses of industry carrying you headlong? Stuart Chase offers this answer, written with his usual wit and insight. "It is a fine, timely book. Go out and buy it," says The Outlook. Whether your contact with machines is limited to a wrist watch or includes everything from a gadget to Mr. Televox, the mechanical man, you will find this book a mental adventure. $2.50 which even invaded the movie houses and drove the pictures to a position of acknowledged inferiority.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY • New York

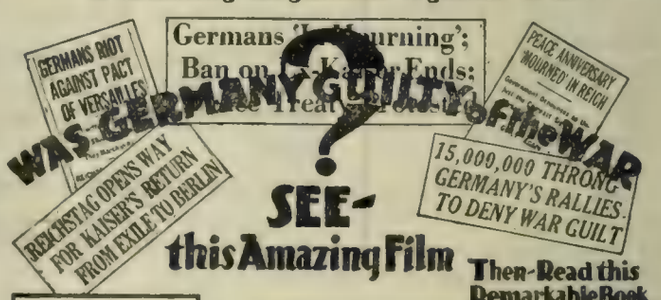
Why does vaudeville, to all appearances, prosper in the provincial and often very backward localities, while in the cities, which are the centers presumably of theatrical culture in every country, it fails to hold its own and is slowly but surely dying out? Why has vaudeville lost favor with the most exacting section of the metropolitan audience? Is it because, as a form of theatrical art, vaudeville is too crude? Or has it deteriorated from its once proud perfection? Or have metropolitan audiences acquired new and different tastes in theatrical entertainment?

The first suggestion is the most likely answer—and the most indefensible. "Vaudeville is essentially one of the lower forms of theatrical art which inevitably takes the back seat when faced with the competition of such superior forms as drama and musical comedy." What preposterous trash passes here for an aesthetic theory! The popular notion of art is that it is something very serious and very solemn, while entertainment means trivial and light-hearted distraction. It is true that what is known as music-hall, cabaret, variety, and vaudeville entertainment (the name vaudeville was introduced in this country by B. F. Keith some forty years ago in order that the "clean entertainment" supplied by his respectable houses might be distinguished from the popular but less respectable "variety") has one fundamental characteristic which differentiates it from all other forms of modern theater. It is frankly an entertainment. The stage is simply a platform, i. e., a raised place which serves no other purpose than to enable the performers to display their gifts before an audience. The modern drama tries to be on the side of the angels by preserving religiously the big and therefore "serious" form of a long play. But vaudeville needs no such devices to provide art that is vital and earnest, even if it is not always "serious." In its basic tradition it is much more the legitimate successor to the theater which was the superb ornament of ancient Greece, Renaissance Spain, Elizabethan England, India, and Japan than the so-called "legitimate" drama of this and the past century can ever claim to be.

That present-day vaudeville is not what it was cannot be denied. Because it has practically disappeared from the centers of culture, it is ruled by standards which are established not by the most sensitive and lively sections of the public, but rather by the less exacting standards of the provinces. It is possible that B. F. Keith and E. F. Albee deserve a certain amount of blame for the condition of vaudeville in America. Much as they, as well as other theater owners, have encouraged talent in vaudeville, their policy of "mass production," the very size of the organization they have developed, and the fact that they must cater to the interest and tastes of a large provincial audience could not fail to have the same demoralizing effect upon vaudeville as mass production has had in another field of popular entertainment—the movies.

There are still incomparable artists on the vaudeville stage, such as Sophie Tucker, Belle Baker, Bill Robinson, Owen McGiveney, Toto, Brothers Arnault, and a few others. But many of the best performers in vaudeville have gone to the musical-comedy stage—George Cohan, Fred Stone, Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Fannie Brice, Joe Cook, Will Rogers, W. C. Fields, Fred and Adele Astair, to mention a few. As a result, the average program even in the better class of vaudeville houses is often excruciatingly dull and talentless.

It is within the power of those who control vaudeville bookings to keep up its standards. The whole system must be reorganized on a basis which will enable its stars to remain in vaudeville, whatever may be the temptations of musical comedy, for compared with the youthful sprightliness, concentration, and marvelous precision of perfect vaudeville, musical comedy is like a lady far past her prime, inordinately made up, and garrulous to an extreme.



It scarcely needs proving in this country of high-powered salesmanship that public taste is subject to outside influences. But even without resort to artificial means the American public can be educated to appreciate vaudeville. In fact it already does. There were this winter two companies in New York which proved not only how glorious vaudeville can be but also how great a hold it can have on the public. I refer, of course, to the Chauve Souris and the Ruth Draper Company. There are few things more colorful than Balieff's human dolls, and no magic can achieve more than is achieved by Ruth Draper—noble, cattish, passionate, pathetic Ruth Draper.

Why not more companies like them? There are several dark theaters on Broadway. Good vaudeville can be made as successful there as any play or revue. But it must be good. It must be original and inventive; it must show real talent; and there must be unity and coherence in the performance as a whole. The scope here for original ideas and for a healthy creative rivalry is unlimited. ALEXANDER BAKSHY

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Now Playing—2nd Big Week!

A Blasting Argument Against War!

SEE—this Amazing Film Then—Read this Remarkable Book

A Panoramic Presentation of Germany's Part in the World War Compiled from the only Authentic Motion Pictures taken under the Supervision of the General Staff

"FIGHTING for the FATHERLAND"

SEE

—the assassination of Archduke Francis Ferdinand which started a war which cost $228,000,000,000.
—the tremendous German "March to Paris."
—millions die in the campaigns of the Marne and Argonne.
—how Von Hindenberg captured 50,000 Russians in one day.
—both sides of the great battle in the snow of the Vosges Mts.
—how 5,622 British ships were sunk.
—140 days of hell at Verdun where 600,000 men were killed and 40,000,000 shells were fired in one battle.

—and on the same program—
JOHN BARRYMORE in R. L. Stevenson's
DR. JEKYLL and MR. HYDE

Direction: SYMON GOULD

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th St. [Just W. of 5th Ave.] Spring {5090 5095
Continuous Daily, 1 P. M. to midnite.
COMING Sat. July 20th,—"Life of Beethoven"—enacted in the actual locales of the Master Composer's existence with a remarkable characterization by Fritz Kortner.

—GILBERT MILLER—
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

OPEN SHELF

BOOK BUYERS—Aphrodite—Pierre Louys—Illustrated ($10.00) now $3.00. What others sell we undersell—Get our price before you buy. Curious catalogues free. Visitors welcome. SARA FIELD, 17 East 14th St., N. Y.

LECTURES

the songlore society, [illegible] W. 11th St. at 8:30 every sunday evening presents daca, composer and chansonneur, in songlore lecture recitals. exit fee $1. tickets 63 washington sq. and 88 greenwich ave.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
Short course. Conversational methods. Experienced native teachers. Daily 9 to 9.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
75c an hour 1264 LEXINGTON AVE., Bet. 85th and 86th Sts, N. Y.

PSYCHOANALYST will instruct a limited number of private students in the fundamentals or more advanced phases of psychology. Reasonable fees. Call Algonquin 9802.

EXCHANGE LESSONS

YOUNG German wishes lessons in English, for which he will exchange German lessons. Wonderful opportunity to buy a Saxaphone, very little used, quadruple silverplate, bell gold plated. Reasonable. Box 2112, % The Nation.

GRAPHOLOGY

GRAPHOLOGIST—Business firms must keep track of assets and liabilities. So should you. Your character is your stock in trade. Increase your assets, decrease your liabilities. Character sketch one dollar. Send handwriting letter form. Miss Florence M. Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

MARITZA RUSSIAN PEASANT SHOP

I am offering you my love of color in beautiful hand-embroidered and crochet blouses, dresses, hats and coats. Maritza designs and makes to order artistic ensembles in all materials. Peasant handicrafts and samovars. Russian smocks and shirts for men. Original imports from many lands of native handicrafts. Visit my shop. Sale, 25% reduction. Open 12 to 10 P. M. MARITZA, 172 W. Fourth St. near Sixth Ave.

The MANSIONS of PHILOSOPHY

WHEN WILL DURANT first suggested The Mansions of Philosophy as the title for his new book, The Inner Sanctum applauded heartily, but wondered a bit whether most readers would appreciate the allegory of the phrase, or expect instead an architectural handbook. Other candidates were considered: The Lure of Philosophy, A Philosophy of Life, Philosophy In Action, Invitation to Philosophy. . But the first choice won out, and on the title page of the book went that glowing, profound quotation "In My Father's House Are Many Mansions."

As usual, the trepidations of The Inner Sanctum were groundless. The title is not only beautiful and faithful to the temper of the book, but many thousands of readers have found it magnificently clear and appealing. Again the subtlety and range of the reading public's preference have been under-rated, for The Mansions of Philosophy is a ranking best-seller all over America.

And here in truth are mansions . . . crowned with topless towers for scanning the totality of things. The sub-title promises much. "A Survey of Human Life and Destiny," but the promise is performed. Not in scattered sections, but in an integrated book of consummate scholarship, the timeless issues of man and metaphysics are bravely confronted, and quickened by contemporary application. The destiny of mankind, the freedom of the will, the outlook for religion, the meaning of history, the evolution of love, the essence of beauty, the quest of happiness—these are some of the subjects analyzed in one of the staunchest attempts ever made to provide in a single gateway volume a tour of the infinite. Ask your bookseller to show you this 703 page book. Turn at random to any page, and seek not in vain for wisdom winged with wit. Well has this new book by WILL DURANT been named The Mansions of Philosophy.

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers · 37 West 57th Street · New York

WANTED

ALERT men and women to represent The Nation in every community. Our circulation is on the up-curve and our commissions are as liberal as our editorial policy. If you would like to earn extra money by making friends for The Nation, write to Department 11, c/o The Nation.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Please use following blank for notification of change of address during the summer. Do give two weeks notice in advance of the date with which the change is to take effect.

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York

You have been sending the magazine to

Name .....

Address .....

Beginning ..... until .....

please send the magazine to

New Address .....

.....

Sailings to
SOVIET RUSSIA
Aug. 21—S. S. "Aquitania"
Sept. 18—S. S. "Berengaria"
Oct. 23—S. S. "Aquitania"

Register now for a tour full of fun—interest—novelty—unforgettable! Stop-overs at London—Kiel Canal—Helsingfors.

TOURS from $385

Ten full days in
LENINGRAD & MOSCOW
Write for Booklet D—a detailed itinerary

WORLD TOURISTS, INC.
175 5th Ave., New York. Tel. Algonquin 6656
Chicago office—308 W. Washington St., R. K. Zetland, Mgr.

International Relations Section

White Man's Justice

WE reprint from the London Times a résumé of a report on the quality of justice meted out to the native in South Africa. It is an interesting study of a relationship which exists wherever the white man, in the role of conqueror, but numerically inferior, comes in contact with the dark races.

Recently Dr. Edgar H. Brookes, professor of politics and public administration at the Transvaal University College, Pretoria, South Africa, associated with himself a number of legal practitioners and graduate students to investigate the question whether the native in Africa gets an adequate and fair measure of justice. It is often said that he does not—"Justice may be blind, but she is certainly not color-blind."

Dr. Brookes and his associates report that in the matter of procedure in court natives are generally bewildered and not infrequently "hustled" when they come up before a European magistrate. White prisoners are treated with consideration by the court officials, but the native is compelled to tell his story in the way required by the white officials, and not in his own way, and is generally harried. The report does not suggest a remedy, but experienced officials suggest the use of natives as petty magistrates in the locations, the provision of a "public defendant" as well as a public prosecutor in the cases which are serious enough to come before a white magistrate, and, above all, a radical reduction in the number of man-made petty crimes. It has been calculated that one out of every four natives in Johannesburg is brought up each year before the magistrate for breach of some petty law, generally the "crime" of being out without a pass.

Of the hostility of the police toward natives there is abundant evidence. The European police in South Africa are very largely of Dutch extraction, and they are apt to follow the methods of the less enlightened section of the Dutch-speaking population where natives are concerned. Worse, however, are the native policemen. As a rule, these are Zulus, unable to read or write, but inheriting many of the warlike, not to say bullying, traits which characterize that warrior nation. Even with prisoners of his own tribe the Zulu is rough; with those of other tribes he is often brutal.

When they come to a consideration of the verdicts and sentences in European and native criminal cases respectively the investigators bring out the inequality of justice. They seem to go out of their way to be fair. For purposes of comparison they have chosen all their cases from the criminal records of one province—the Transvaal—and for the years 1925 and 1926. In cases of rape the theory acted upon by jury and judge is that natives do not regard rape so seriously as Europeans, but this theory appears only to be valid when the complainant is a native girl. Thus a European, whose case is quoted, was found guilty of having raped a native girl of fifteen and was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labor. But a native convicted of assault with intent to commit rape upon a European girl of eleven was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment with hard labor and seven lashes. "Had you succeeded," said the judge in the latter case, "I would certainly have sentenced you to death."

Murder cases, however, with their inevitable sentence to death if the accused is found guilty, show the greatest disparities in verdict and sentence. It may be taken as an axiom that no jury will ever convict a white man of the murder of a native. Needless to say, all juries are composed of white men. They will always find some extenuating circumstance, such as that the victim had a weak heart or an enlarged spleen, or a tumor of the liver, or attempted to assault the white man. If the report had not confined itself to cases arising during 1925 and 1926 it could have adduced even more striking cases than it does, but even these are enough to show the disparities in judgment and sentence in "mixed" cases. A European charged with culpable homicide admitted that he had hit his native servant with a pickax and killed him. He was found not guilty by the jury and acquitted. Two native servants pleaded "Not guilty" to a charge of attempting to murder their European master by administering poison. They were found guilty and sentenced to three and a half years' imprisonment each. In another case a European was charged with culpable homicide of a native whom he had kicked in the back and who afterward died. Medical evidence ("not always the most satisfactory feature of such cases") showed that the native had suffered from a tumor of the liver and that the rupture of the tumor was the cause of death. The jury found the man guilty of common assault, with a recommendation to mercy. The sentence was one of two weeks' imprisonment without hard labor. A native charged with the murder of his master was found guilty, sentenced to death, and hanged.

The report, after pointing out that "it is quite clear to us that the jury system, though not as black as some well-intentioned critics have painted it, has proved a failure in mixed cases," proceeds to recommend that the jury system be abolished, and that the criminal court consist of a judge and two assessors (which even today can be demanded, instead of a jury, by a person accused of a serious crime), or, better, by a bench of three judges. The South African judiciary is held in high esteem by both whites and natives, and such a court would win the confidence of all sections of South Africa's many communities. Furthermore, the report recommends that an alternative penalty for murder should be found since, as things are today, "the question of what sentence is ultimately to be imposed on a murderer is taken out of purely judicial hands and political advisers may in rare cases influence the final decision."

As the result of its investigations the committee believes that the average juryman, which means the average white South African, faces his task with certain assumptions, which may be set forth as follows:

> In the first place, a white man will naturally use a considerable amount of force in dealing with a native with whom he has had a difference. Should the native die thereafter, it may be presumed that he has not died as the direct result of the assault unless there is irrefutable evidence to the contrary. Secondly, no white man should ever be hanged because he has killed a native. Hence, as hanging is the only possible sentence for murder, a jury ought not to find a white man guilty if he is charged with the murder of a native. Thirdly, if the verdict is such that the white man in such a case is sentenced to a short term of imprisonment, the jury has performed a laudable action and one calculated to meet amply the ends of justice. Finally, native evidence is frequently unreliable. Hence, in the case of direct conflict between native evidence and European evidence, the latter should prevail.

It is difficult to say what effect this moderately worded and carefully documented report will have in South Africa. The general feeling is that the charge of dispensing unequal justice has been proved. The publicity thus given to the fact will help; but so long as the feeling of race antagonism remains—a feeling based ultimately on the numerical superiority of the natives—the black man will not get the same treatment as the white in South African courts.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JULY 31, 1929 No. 3343

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 103
EDITORIALS:
Another Sacco-Vanzetti Case? 106
The Wickersham Letter 107
"O Upright Judge!" 108
Bremen, Ahoy! 108
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 109
MR. DAWES IN SANTO DOMINGO. By Roy Veatch 110
REPUBLICANS AND THE REST OF US. By Benjamin B. Kendrick, Sr. 112
THE LAST OF EDWARD CARPENTER. By S. K. Ratcliffe 114
SEX, IF ANY. By Edward Hope 115
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 116
CORRESPONDENCE 117
BOOKS:
Phenomena. By Mark Van Doren 119
A Great National Drama. By Clifton P. Fadiman 119
Mohammedan India. By C. F. Andrews 120
In the German Manner. By Joseph Wood Krutch 120
The Leader of the Wobblies. By Art Shields 121
Lobbies. By M. W. Royse 122
Civil War Memories. By Oswald Garrison Villard 122
A Catholic Poet. By James Rorty 123
The New Miasmal Mist. By Granville Hicks 123
Antiquated Legalism. By Jackson H. Ralston 124
Books in Brief 125
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Manchurian Crisis 126
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 127

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico: to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

SECRETARY STIMSON did the right thing at the right moment when he reminded Russia and China that they were under pledge as signatories of the Kellogg Pact to settle their dispute over the Chinese Eastern Railway by peaceful means. War over such a justiciable dispute is foolish in any case and it is doubly inexcusable just after the quarreling nations have signed an agreement to renounce armed force as a method of action. The uneasy suspense after the seizure of the Chinese Eastern by Manchurian authorities reveals how inadequate our present international machinery is for handling such a crisis. Russia, being outside of the League of Nations, cannot be expected to obey its mandates, and since the United States does not recognize the Soviet Government we can communicate with Russia officially only through a third party. Otherwise the United States would be the logical nation to arbitrate the present dispute, because we have almost no interests in Manchuria and our government played so important a role during the war in saving the Chinese Eastern from Japanese conquest. Fortunately the latest reports from Nanking indicate that the Nationalists will consent to refer the dispute to the League of Nations. Chiang Kai-shek's manifesto of July 21 bristled with combative phrases, while the statement of the Russian Commissar of Railroads, Jan Rudzutak, to the New York Times in Moscow, is the most hopeful declaration made by officials of either government:

> Unless and until the Chinese or the White Guards attack us, no single Russian soldier will set foot on Chinese territory. . . . Our signature of the Kellogg Pact was not just a diplomatic gesture. . . . No other country ever received such provocation as we have received from the Chinese. But we shall not fight unless our country is invaded.

THE TROUBLE with such a pledge is that it is almost impossible to observe when hostile armies are mobilized and facing each other. A wild rumor of aggression by one side may start a general attack—and this is particularly likely in Manchuria. The Chinese, however, have liberated the Soviet consular and railroad officials and allowed them to go home in safety, while Foreign Minister C. T. Wang insists that "it is absolutely incorrect to infer that we have nullified Russian interests in the railway." The Russians, after their first abrupt ultimatum, apparently decided that abruptness is bad diplomacy. The rather ludicrous fact about the whole Far Eastern situation is that while the Western Powers hate Soviet Russia they cannot sanction the rude displacement of the Russians and still cling to their own possessions in China. The Soviet Government has offended against China by Communist propaganda, but otherwise her policy has been more generous than that of other Powers. Japan has a whole army in Manchuria and a railroad of her own which was taken from China by force and is held by force; most of the Powers have extraterritorial rights; Great Britain and France have concessions and navies; and even the United States has troops on the Peking-Tientsin railway line. Since Russia has had no troops, concessions, or extraterritorial rights in China, the Chinese seizure of a jointly controlled commercial railway which was already policed by Chinese troops is suggestive of the Biblical phrase about straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel.

FRANCE HAS FINALLY AGREED to the arrangement for paying her war debt to the United States which was made between Secretary Mellon and Ambassador Bérenger in 1926. Under extreme pressure from the Poincaré Government the Chamber of Deputies voted for ratification without reservations, although only by the narrow margin of eight votes and not until a separate resolution had been adopted declaring that the annuities on the debt should be met exclusively from German reparations. As the Cabinet has further agreed to a special ways-and-means law to make this resolution effective, it is obvious that France gives plain notice that payments on her debt will stop if there is any hitch in the Young Plan. Even so we are a little sorry that France has ratified the Mellon-Bérenger agreement at this time. She was clearly justified in waiting for the international acceptance of the Young Plan, and if she had simply ignored the special post-war debt due on August 1 there was nothing which the United States could or would have done about it. But the pressure of gold is irresistible.

PUBLIC

France has been more independent in her attitude toward the American debt than any other nation, but her spirit was finally crushed by the fear of what might happen to her national credit if she stood out any longer against the demands of the richest country in the world.

AMERICANS CAN TAKE little satisfaction in France's capitulation. Practically no Frenchman feels that the debt is morally owing to the United States, and although the annuities will never be noticed in our finances, every instalment will be paid with a feeling of bitterness in France. We shall pay many times over in lost friendship for the tribute we have exacted, though even if paid in full over the whole sixty-two years it will cover only a part of the sum which is mathematically due us. In order to obtain ratification a great flood of sentimental oratory was let loose by the Poincaré Government, reminiscent of what America did for France in the war. Behind this, though, the real feeling of Frenchmen appeared, as in the address of Edouard Herriot, former prime minister. It was right, he said, that signatures be respected, but what about the signature of an American President to the Treaty of Versailles? And further: "A whole year elapsed between the time the United States entered the war as belligerents and the time they became combatants. During that year their gold was the only arm they provided in the common cause." Recalling that between 1914 and 1928 America had loaned more than $13,000,000,000 to Europe, Herriot concluded:

> That is the disturbing situation which calls for organization in Europe if we are to hold our own. I do not say that the intentions of the lenders are aggressive. It is just making phrases to say that the imperialism of gold has succeeded to the imperialism of the sword. But quite fairly one may say that the tumultuous use of the youthful force of the United States may, without wishing to be so, appear menacing.

THE DECISION OF JUDGE KNOX, of the United States District Court in New York City, denying the right of the Federal Trade Commission to see the books of the Electric Bond and Share Company, if it stands, will be a serious handicap to the commission in its effort to dig down to the bottom of the power business. Judge Knox held that the individual officers of the company must answer "pertinent and competent questions" propounded to them by the commission, but that the demand of that body for production of the books and records had not yet been proved reasonable. Unless and until the commission's powers are enlarged, as Judge Knox suggests may constitutionally be done by Congress, it has the power, he holds, to require the production of such books and documents only as have become evidentiary. The case is not an easy one, and the protection of private business against a fishing expedition is at least understandable, but we cannot help regretting the effect of the decision in the present case, where public interests are so much greater than private and the formulation of a wise policy demands the widest possible public knowledge of the facts of the power business. Private rights once more stand in the way of public well-being. Meanwhile we have just had an example of the effects of publicity. The Editor and Publisher devoted its leading article on July 13 to the announcement made by the International Paper and Power Company of its purpose to dispose of its newspaper holdings, thus bringing to an end what this organ of the newspaper world calls "one of the most audacious and ambitious commercial schemes ever evolved around the American press."

BROKERS' LOANS have reached a new peak of $5,813,000,000, some $20,000,000 more than the previous high point, attained on March 20, and the stock market is again on the rampage. Wall Street bankers are saying that the Federal Reserve Board's campaign to restrict stock-market borrowing has collapsed, in less than six months since its inception. It seems a long time since the days, away back in 1913, when the professors of economics were instructing their students, reasonably enough, that the passage of the Federal Reserve Act was going to keep the country's funds out of Wall Street and put them into productive enterprise. The board has been criticized fairly for timidity and tardiness in its manipulation of the rediscount rate, but it has an enormously complex task. It wants to help stabilize prices so far as it reasonably can; but it can't choke off the speculators without strangling productive business at the same time, and if it none the less raises the rate in the effort, then it may only draw in gold from other countries and embarrass business there. Most of us in this country, as in every other, work for a living, but a small number of the get-rich-quick fraternity find it easier and more profitable to get theirs out of the larger but less skilful number of the same community on the stock market, and those of us who work pay the overhead. As long as the game shows its present profits and men like gambling better than work, the Federal Reserve Board will have its hands full checking speculation.

BOOTLEGGING does not involve moral turpitude, according to a decision in the United States Circuit Court by Judges Learned Hand, Thomas Swan, and A. N. Hand. The ruling was made in the case of an Italian whose deportation was sought on the ground that he had been convicted of bootlegging and was therefore guilty of moral turpitude. (Moral turpitude, it will be remembered, was invoked in an attempt to keep out the Countess Cathcart some years ago because she was reported to have broken her marriage vow—a turpitude which, like pacifism, we allow only among our native-born citizens.) Thus prohibition has presented us with another paradox. Violation of the prohibition statutes was made a felony by Senator Jones's law. Yet bootlegging—the worst violation possible—is not turpitude.

> Probably many persons in the United States would so regard the sale and possession of liquor [the opinion states], but the question as to whether it is so regarded by the public conscience is nebulous at best. While we must not substitute our personal notions as the standard, it is impossible to decide at all without some standard, necessarily based on conjecture as to what the people generally feel.
>
> We cannot say that among our commonly accepted mores the sale and possession of liquor as yet occupies so grave a place, nor can we close our eyes to the fact that large numbers of persons, otherwise reputable, do not think so, rightly or wrongly.

These distinguished judges apparently feel no obligation to keep up with the Joneses.

SENATOR CARAWAY thinks that George W. Wickersham ought to withdraw from President Hoover's commission on law enforcement because of the letter to Governor Roosevelt on prohibition. But what does he say of Judge Kenneth Mackintosh of the Supreme Court of the State of Washington, another member of the commission? Judge Mackintosh wrote a memorable letter too, and although it was penned ten years ago the author, so far as we are aware, has never expressed regret or made amends for it. The letter was written just after the Armistice Day parade in Centralia, Washington, in 1919, in the course of which a group of the marchers attacked the hall of the Industrial Workers of the World. In consequence of a bitter quarrel between the lumber interests and the I. W. W., the hall had been raided and furniture and papers thrown in the street the year previous, so this time the men inside defended themselves with firearms, and four of the attacking party were mortally wounded. Wholesale arrests were made, and that night the lights in the city went out just long enough to allow a mob to enter the jail. The mob took out one of the prisoners, Wesley Everest, mutilating and then hanging him from the girders of a bridge. Two days later the following letter was written:

KENNETH MACKINTOSH, JUDGE

THE SUPREME COURT, STATE OF WASHINGTON
Olympia

November 13, 1919

George Dysart, Esq.,
Centralia, Washington

My Dear Dysart:

I want to express to you my appreciation of the high character of citizenship displayed by the people of Centralia in their agonizing calamity. We are all shocked by the manifestation of barbarity on the part of the outlaws, and are depressed by the loss of lives of brave men, but at the same time are proud of the calm control and loyalty to American ideals demonstrated by the returned soldiers and citizens. I am proud to be an inhabitant of a State which contains a city with the record which has been made for Centralia by its law-abiding citizens.

Sincerely,

KENNETH MACKINTOSH

AFTER A FARCICAL TRIAL one of the Centralia defendants was incarcerated as insane, while seven were found guilty of murder in the second degree and, in spite of a recommendation for leniency from the jury, were sentenced to terms of from twenty-five to forty years in prison. A new trial was asked for, but it is not odd that it was refused by a Supreme Court one of the members of which had found in the events of Armistice Day—and night—reason to commend the "calm control" of Centralia and its "law-abiding citizens." Though the highest court of the State could see nothing amiss with the trial, five of the jurors have repudiated the verdict and seven have joined in a petition asking for the release of the eight imprisoned men—so far without success. We do not know whether President Hoover knew of Judge Mackintosh's letter when he appointed him to the commission on law enforcement. We do not know that Judge Mackintosh's fellow-members on the commission know of it, or what they think about him if they do. But we do feel that in the light of the letter many Americans will have a little less than no regard for any conclusions which the author may formulate in regard to obtaining greater reverence for law. The Sacco-Vanzetti executions, the continuing imprisonment of Mooney and Billings, the refusal to pardon the Centralia victims and the scandalous attitude of a judge of the State Supreme Court toward the tragedy—these facts, when contrasted with the acquittal of Doheny and Sinclair and the failure to try ex-Secretary Fall, make it hard even for those who are most eager to respect our processes of justice to do so.

IN THE DEATH on July 21 of John Cotton Dana, "first citizen of Newark," the United States loses one of the very foremost of its liberal leaders. A native of Vermont and a graduate of Dartmouth, obliged by ill health to spend his young manhood in a variety of occupations, among which he specially valued his experience as a surveyor in Colorado, he entered library work in 1889, and after serving in Denver and Springfield came to Newark in 1902. Since that time the Newark Public Library has become famous the world over for its extraordinary service as a genuinely educational institution. "The worth of a book is in its use" was one of Mr. Dana's favorite precepts, and his ingenuity in devising was matched only by his liberality in administering methods of getting books and the information they contain into the hands and heads of people of every sort. Founding the Newark Museum in 1909, he followed the same policy of making that institution serve the people, especially of helping them to discover the possibilities of beauty and excellence in the machine products of the day. In theory a philosophical anarchist, he was a free man in thought and action, a constant inspiration to the thousands of men and women who knew him personally and to other hundreds of thousands who knew only his work. He was in the true sense one of the makers of modern America; for the influence of his work has already been felt in the remotest parts of the country, and it will widen and deepen with the years.

SO PROFESSOR GODDARD'S ROCKET didn't get to the moon after all, but as a result of going off all at once, instead of in a series of successive explosions, as all well-behaved rockets should do, came tumbling back to earth with a clatter that brought the police and two ambulances to the Ward farm outside of Worcester. We sympathize with Professor Goddard, but our grief is tempered. If the rocket had gone 338,800 miles farther than it did, those happy beings, who now are not even troubled with an atmosphere that can be superheated in August, would undoubtedly in time have been brought down to earth, as last month's bachelors of arts have already been. They would get acquainted with Liberty and the New York Daily Mirror; they would learn to read our advertising of cigarettes and beauty creams; they would receive visits from bond salesmen and subscription agents working their way through college; they would have bigger and better automobiles and broader and more brazen loud speakers; their men would wear more clothing and their women less; and doubtless they would soon learn to spend most of their time talking about synthetic gin, the iniquities of prohibition, and the comparative merits of their various bootleggers. Yes, even Professor Goddard must feel that there are compensations for his disappointment.

Another Sacco-Vanzetti Case?

IT was night-time in a tent colony of cotton-mill strikers on the edge of a Southern town. The men, women, and children who were living in their tents after being evicted from company houses, had heard that the night-shift of the mill from which they had walked out was ready to strike if a demonstration took place in front of the plant. They formed a straggling picket line, led by a woman, and started toward the mill. They never reached it, for gangs of deputy sheriffs and police swooped down on them, broke up the line, and beat the leaders. Angry and bruised they returned to their tents, and their leaders were discussing the formation of a new picket line. At that moment five policemen came to the entrance of their tent colony, where an armed guard was posted to prevent attack. The police had no warrant and two of them have since been indicted for being drunk and disorderly earlier in that same evening. One of the policemen argued with the strikers' guard and wrested his gun from him. Perhaps the guard's gun went off in the tussle; if it did no one was injured by it. Out of the darkness came shots fired from shotguns. They seemed to come from the small building used as union headquarters. The police were struck, one died and two were injured.

Such is the background of the very significant murder case scheduled for trial at Gastonia, North Carolina, during the week of July 29. Fifteen men and women will be brought before a grand jury, indictments will be asked for the murder of Chief of Police O. F. Aderholt, and presumably the trial will take place immediately. We believe that this case is not only one of the most important in American labor history, but that it is exceedingly likely to lead to a miscarriage of justice. The man who shot Chief Aderholt was probably a striker, but no evidence has been produced in preliminary hearings to show that any of the prisoners fired the fatal shot. While the strikers are charged with cold-blooded murder and held without bail, it is not even certain that the man who shot Chief Aderholt committed a crime. American citizens have the legal right to resist a police officer who invades their homes without warrant, except when a felony is taking place there. A Southern correspondent writes us:

> The grimmest tragedy that has ever occurred in America is about to be enacted in this textile mill town of the South, and unless the spotlight of publicity is turned upon the scene, another Sacco-Vanzetti case, magnified many times, will probably take place. If an indictment for murder was all that the defendants had to face, their defense would probably be a simple matter, but, due to the fact that some of them have confessed certain political and religious beliefs and, due to the further fact that all of them have dared and persisted in an attempt to remedy a shameful and intolerable condition that has been forced upon the Southern workers by the greed of the owners of the Southern textile mills, the defense will by no means be simple and, at present, looks almost hopeless.
>
> There can be no question that the mill owners of the State are solidly behind and assisting in every way they can in the prosecution of the strikers because, outside of three lawyers in Charlotte and one lawyer from Asheville, it has been impossible to interest or secure the services of any lawyer of any standing or repute in the State to represent the defense, while the prosecution has hired sixteen lawyers, including every lawyer in Gastonia, and one from an adjoining county who, by the way, happens to be a brother-in-law of the Governor.

In spite of local prejudice, however, the defense will be supplied with good lawyers, notably John R. Neal of Tennessee, chief counsel in the Dayton evolution trial, who has volunteered his services without remuneration. The first thing that the attorneys will demand in case of indictment is a change of venue, and the arguments for transfer to another county are overwhelming. Gaston County has been flooded with anti-Communist propaganda since the beginning of the strike, and no person with enough sense to be a good juryman could possibly have escaped it. After the shooting of Chief Aderholt on June 7 the authorities became hysterical, jailed over fifty strikers who had no known connection with the shooting, arrested a college instructor who was asked by The Nation to send in a first-hand report of events, and even warned the chief attorney for the defense that he could not come near the town. An experienced reporter of the conservative Charlotte Daily News wrote on July 1:

> Gaston County is desperately near the mood to try a dozen or more malcontents for murder and condemn them by what they think about God, marriage, and the nigger—and the history of the world has shown that on the first and last of these subjects the human race, when it has tried to think, has invariably gone insane.

An analysis of the population of Gaston County in the light of jury regulations shows that the defendants, about half of whom are Northern Communist organizers, will face a more prejudiced venire than Sacco and Vanzetti faced. The county has a population of about 50,000, with 103 textile mills employing about 22,000 workers. Of course, no worker who has ever been connected with the union will be permitted to sit on the jury, and cotton-mill workers of any sort are virtually excluded by the requirement that every juror must own property. Cotton-mill workers in the South live in company houses and almost never own real property. So the jury must be drawn from the few hundred white-collared property owners of the towns, or from the relatively well-to-do farmers who own their own land. Their only source of information concerning the strike has been the newspapers of the county, which have been filled with specific attacks upon the prisoners now on trial. Civic organizations have passed resolutions against these same prisoners and pulpits have rung with denunciations of their "red" doctrine. For Communist organizers who confess, as one of them did in the preliminary hearing, that they actually doubt the existence of God the chance of measured justice before a Gaston County jury seems nil.

We hope that North Carolina will wake up to the gravity of the situation at Gastonia before it is too late. The State and the mill owners will be the ultimate losers if they allow local passion and prejudice to railroad men and women to the electric chair.

The Wickersham Letter

WHETHER George W. Wickersham was indiscreet in discussing prohibition in advance of the report of the President's commission on law enforcement of which he is the chairman, whether his suggestion was in some sense a trial balloon from the White House, or whether the letter to Governor Roosevelt was made public by mistake seem to us to be inconsequential details. The real question is: What does Mr. Wickersham suggest and is it a good idea?

We find ourselves little short of amazed at the tendency to misunderstand Mr. Wickersham's letter. Or perhaps there is less misunderstanding than conscious or unconscious misconstruction. To us Mr. Wickersham plainly suggests the virtual substitution of local option by States in place of national prohibition. Thus the idea is a considerable concession to Wets and a direct challenge to Drys. And when first published it was apparently received in that light. On the morning when it was printed Senator Walsh of Massachusetts and Representative Britten of Illinois, acknowledged Wets, were quoted in its favor, while the Chicago Tribune, a Wet newspaper, said the idea was "worth trying." On the other hand, Representative Volstead and Senator Caraway, stalwart Drys, denounced the suggestion as a betrayal of the prohibition cause.

But at the recently adjourned conference of governors, before whom the letter was read, Mr. Wickersham's proposal was interpreted in a directly contrary way. The Wets in that gathering apparently reached the conclusion that the plan was bad strategy, while the Drys persuaded themselves that it might be interpreted to mean that Mr. Wickersham recommended that the States should actively enforce prohibition in addition to the efforts of the national government. This interpretation, emanating from the Governors' conference, seems later to have been largely accepted by the public, although we can see nothing in Mr. Wickersham's letter to justify it. We quote in full Mr. Wickersham's words on prohibition, with his specific recommendation in italics:

> Of course, one of the most serious subjects we must deal with is the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment. That measure has written into the Constitution of the United States a prohibition of the importation, manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.
>
> The amendment confers upon the States concurrent jurisdiction with the national government for the enforcement of this measure. Thus far the federal government alone has borne the brunt of enforcement.
>
> It seems to me that the Governors' Conference might well consider approaching the Federal Government on some feasible proposal to share this burden. If the national government were to attend to preventing importation, manufacture, and shipment in interstate commerce of intoxicants, the State undertaking the internal police regulations to prevent sale, saloons, speakeasies, and so forth, national and State laws might be modified so as to become reasonably enforcible and one great source of demoralizing and pecuniarily profitable crime removed.
>
> Every State Executive has sworn to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. The Eighteenth Amendment is a part of the Constitution, just as much as any other part of it. Surely it is pertinent to their conference to suggest and consider how they may best carry out their solemn undertaking.

The Constitution forbids the importation, manufacture, transportation, and sale of intoxicating liquors. Mr. Wickersham proposes that the federal government look after the first three prohibitions, leaving the fourth to the States. That is, he would have the federal government patrol the borders to prevent smuggling, suppress illicit stills, and try to stop interstate shipments of liquor. But the whole question of sale, that is the control of saloons, speakeasies, and the like, would rest with the individual States.

Can there be any doubt that with conditions as they are this would mean practically State option in regard to prohibition? Mr. Wickersham's words in regard to the support which States owe to the Constitution are merely fine phrases. It is true that States are legally obligated to enforce federal laws as well as their own, even where they are not endowed with "concurrent" authority, as under the Eighteenth Amendment. So is every individual obligated to enforce all laws, State or national, and may be called upon to do so, as when requisitioned for a sheriff's posse. But practically the private individual acts to enforce law only when it is violated in his presence and when he personally objects to such violation. And the same attitude is generally taken by States toward federal law. State or city officials take no initiative to carry out the postal laws or prevent smuggling, although they will assist federal officers when asked to do so.

Thus under Mr. Wickersham's plan the States which have prohibition-enforcement acts, and in which public sentiment insists that they be carried out, would attain at least a measure of aridity. States which have no prohibition legislation, or do not want to enforce what they have, would be able to go their own way, free from federal interference at least so far as individual buying and selling of liquor is concerned. Whether or not Mr. Wickersham thinks the States might be allowed to pass laws establishing a more liberal definition of alcoholic liquor is uncertain. Anyhow the Supreme Court would have to decide that, and in practice the point might not be of much consequence.

We do not undertake to say here whether Mr. Wickersham's proposal is wise or not. We do undertake to say what his words plainly set forth and what, in practice, his plan would come to. It certainly would not entirely satisfy either Wets or Drys. Neither can any other plan. Mr. Wickersham's plan is not a scientific solution of the liquor problem; it is not even a strictly honest one. But in the light of ten years' experience with the Volstead Act, and in the midst of the hypocrisy and failure of present methods of enforcement, one is compelled to consider results rather than technique. Intelligent men who are not fanatics recognize that the country is in a serious muddle over prohibition. Mr. Wickersham at least suggests a plausible compromise.

"O Upright Judge!"

THE danger of arbitrary and unreasonable interference with the freedom of the press through punishment for contempt of court—to which The Nation has often called attention—is illustrated afresh in the conviction of Louis B. Seltzer, editor, and Carlton K. Matson, chief editorial writer, of the Cleveland Press. The sheriff was about to proceed against a Cleveland race track for permitting betting in violation of the law when an injunction was sought from Judge Frederick P. Walther of the Court of Common Pleas. The judge signed a restraining order unless, it read, the methods of the track were "illegal." In this qualification the judge obviously dodged the only point which it was his business to settle, and upon the advice of the county prosecutor the sheriff closed the track. The Cleveland Press, legitimately and reasonably, as it seems to us, said of the injunction: "If it enjoins the sheriff from doing his sworn duty, it is monstrous. If it merely enjoins him from interfering with a legal enterprise, it is ridiculous."

Messrs. Seltzer and Matson were haled before Judge Walther for contempt of court. They were ably defended by Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War under President Wilson. Mr. Baker argued that criticism is contempt only if the case under discussion is pending and if it operates to obstruct justice, neither of which was true in regard to the Cleveland Press. The judge sentenced the two men to a fine of $500 each and thirty days in jail. An appeal has been taken, and it hardly seems that His Honor can be upheld, although judges are prone to support one another on questions of contempt, and few convictions are reversed.

In his argument Mr. Baker necessarily sought to justify his clients within the prevailing practices in regard to contempt of court. The Nation takes a wider position and attacks the validity and justice of the entire process of contempt. It is a survival of absolutism and the theory of divine right which in a democracy is an anachronism and an atrocity, yet it is used more widely and with fewer limitations in the United States than in any other civilized country. It is a question if it is not a purely usurped power on the part of the courts in direct contravention to the federal Constitution and that of most of the States. The courts evade the guaranties of jury trial for crime by holding that contempt is not a crime and that punishment for it is merely part of their "inherent" right to maintain discipline and obtain obedience to their orders, but they fail to reconcile jail sentences under this theory with the Thirteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, which forbids involuntary servitude "except as a punishment for crime."

The sound way to proceed against this abuse is through amendments to the various State constitutions, as legislative acts have frequently been nullified by the courts. In place of the dangerous and tyrannical process of contempt we should substitute laws by which disorder in court or obstruction of a judicial decree could be punished in the manner of any other crime. So far as freedom from criticism goes, there is no reason for granting the courts in a democracy any more immunity than the executive and legislative branches have through the laws against libel and slander.

Bremen, Ahoy!

A NEW queen of the seas has appeared. Cutting her way smoothly but irresistibly westward on her maiden trip from Cherbourg to New York, the steamship Bremen of the North German Lloyd developed the greatest speed ever attained by a merchant vessel. For a whole day the Bremen averaged 29.6 knots an hour, 3½ knots faster than the best going of the Mauretania over the same route, and sliced 8 hours, 52 minutes from the Cunarder's westbound record of 5 days, 2 hours, 34 minutes. But even this does not tell the whole story, for a steamship is like an automobile in that it cannot be pushed to its greatest speed until its intricate and wonderful machinery has been running for a while—has become attune and begun to sing in close harmony each part with every other. So the Bremen is likely to travel even faster on later passages than she did on her first, while her sister ship, the Europa—when in commission—may attain still greater speed.

Thus the blue ribbon of the Atlantic goes back to Germany for the first time since 1908, when the Cunard Line, backed by the British Government, sent out the Lusitania and the Mauretania to yank the pennant from the old Deutschland of the Hamburg-American Line. The advent of the "Big Lucy" and the "Big Mary," with their astonishing preeminence in speed, must have seemed too much for rival companies to overcome, and for twenty years developments in steamship building took other directions. First there was the passion for bigness, reaching its climax in the Leviathan and Majestic, and later the trend toward luxury, as emphasized in the Ile de France and some recent Italian liners. In the Bremen and Europa there is a return to speed which, according to promises, British lines will soon attempt to push further.

In aiming at speed the Bremen was built with a bulb stem and a hull so molded as to push the water down rather than to one side, thus avoiding the wave created by most ships to their disadvantage. Air resistance has been cut by making the vessel unusually low and close to the water for her tonnage. The two funnels are short and squat, like those of a motorship, although the Bremen's power is from steam turbines.

But we do not wish to write only in praise of the Bremen. At this moment, when all others are hymning the wonders of this new queen of the seas, we dip our flag in all homage to the Mauretania, from whom after practically twenty years the speed pennant has just been snatched. For the first two years of the lives of the Lusitania and Mauretania the former was slightly faster than her sister. Then the "Big Mary" came to the front and for a score of years has kept up a marvelous series of performances. Twenty years is a long championship in this age of rapid obsolescence, yet the Mauretania has not only held her speed undiminished over all this time, but actually made her record westbound passage less than a year ago! No other steamship in history has had such a long and distinguished preeminence. She may well go down in maritime annals as the greatest creation of brain and tool during the first century of the steamship.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

HATE seems to me an abominable emotion and yet all the new-fashioned psychologists agree that the human animal can't get along without it. In forgiving your enemies there lies the possibility of headaches, neuritis, sleeplessness, and various psychic disorders. Of course the wise men of Vienna may be wrong. Perhaps it is not impossible to be meek and healthy at the same time.

I've got nothing against anger. Any well-regulated person should become angry at times. Only the individual wholly devoid of imagination can go through life completely unruffled. But anger isn't the same thing as hatred. It is a flash of feeling which goes over the dam upon the instant. No man who has expressed his anger with reasonable fluency need go back to it again. Revenge is a form of procrastination. The man who eases his soul by paying off a score at the end of twenty years confesses that he didn't have the nerve or the mental alertness to handle the situation when it lay immediately in front of him.

They say that elephants are very smart because they remember the boy who gave them a plug of tobacco in the summer of 1891 and squirt him with water when he comes around again in the late spring of 1929. I can't see the wisdom in that. The gray-haired gentleman who gets the drenching very possibly has forgotten the tobacco incident. Retribution is singularly ineffective unless both sides are conscious of what it is all about. And after thirty-nine years the victim of the elephant's revenge has probably so much on his conscience that the boyhood practical joke has entirely escaped him. It was stupid of the elephant to take the tobacco in the first place, and still less intelligent for him to devote mental store-room to a grudge when that same space might much better have been employed as an arena for mental effort.

"But," says an elephant who happens to be looking over my shoulder as I write these words, "I didn't get a chance to square up with him when he gave me that tobacco in the summer of 1891. He told me it was chocolate and walked away before I got it into my mouth. After I strangled on it and spat it out he was gone. I looked around and I trumpeted, but he'd skipped. I had to stow away the grudge and store it up until he returned thirty-nine years later with a brown beard and three children."

"Come, come," I say to the elephant severely, "you know as well as I do that we live largely through introverted processes. It wasn't your throat or your trunk which was injured by that plug of tobacco but your ego. I think it ought to have been possible for you to say, 'Oh, he's just a sap,' and dismiss the matter from your mind. No humiliation caused by a thoughtless boy could possibly have been profound to you at your age. The thing became important only because you stored away the memory and treasured it. You had every right to get mad. I admit that. But you tell me you did get mad. The emotion was not suppressed. It came into consciousness and you trumpeted. What more do you want? Nursemaids screamed and children ran from in front of your inclosure in terror. It was an effective expression of your righteous rage. In fact I hold it to be far more dignified and satisfactory than your later enterprise with the dirty water. Then you descended to the level of your adversary. There's not much to choose between foisting tobacco on an elephant and drenching a man who comes to spend a quiet afternoon at the zoo. Please bear in mind what I have said if the situation arises again."

The elephant said he would try not to forget and went away, but I'm not at all sure that I convinced him.

Upon second thought it seemed to me that my advice might have been much shrewder. If ever again I get the ear of that same elephant I plan to add: "I will even go so far as to admit that possibly some dull ache of injured pride might remain even after a good sound trumpeting. The tobacco giver is gone and you can't get at him. This is the place where fantasy should come in. Certainly there must have been some other young man in the circle round about not unlike the miscreant. You could have pretended that he was the guilty party and squirted him with water. You see in my opinion it is better to get square right away even at the expense of the wrong fellow than to waste thirty-nine years in waiting for the right one."

To be sure, and by now we might as well leave the elephant out of it, civilization imposes restraints which we must accept, but not all of them. It is necessary that we should resist the impulse to cleave every skull which invites us to swing the nearest dull blunt instrument. But on the other hand it is silly to remain sewed up to the last notch of buttoned existence as prescribed by the codes we call courtesy and good form.

Let us say, for instance, that I am affronted by Mr. X or Miss Q. I may take the injury smiling and calmly and make no retort, but that is bad business all around unless I am completely insulated by an utter contempt for Mr. X or Miss Q. In that case it may not be necessary for me to display anger. But if we meet on equal terms, then it is up to me not to deceive myself, or them, for that matter. If I do not behave in angry fashion or even admit that I am angry evil consequences will flow. The incident will impair my blood pressure and my digestion and, also, my friendship for Mr. X and Miss Q. Generally I like X. Often I admire Millicent Q, but by holding back from anger when I have every reason to be angry, something permanent may go into my chemistry which will always function whenever I am in the presence of these people. A valuable friendship has been marred because I have made a silly sacrifice to courtesy. What I should say is, "Andrew X, I think you've done a mean and contemptible thing." Or, "Millicent Q, you talk like a half-wit."

And after all of that has been said there is an excellent chance that we can go on being the best of friends. Miss Q may be the sort of person who believes that friendship is a bond which imposes a constant obligation of friendliness. Well, then, the more fool she. Obviously no close relationship can be maintained without pendulumic variation. And certainly the thing to do with grave distaste is to let your anger blaze fast and furiously and subside in embers.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Mr. Dawes in Santo Domingo

By ROY VEATCH

JUST two days before Charles G. Dawes ceased being Vice-President of the United States and became again merely General Dawes, he received a request from President Horacio Vasquez of the Dominican Republic to head a mission of Americans to advise the Dominican Government on administrative matters particularly connected with the national finances. Mr. Dawes accepted with alacrity, and before the end of March had marshaled a commission of twelve and was on his way to the city of Santo Domingo. The commission remained in Santo Domingo for 21 days—and nights; for at least some members of the party worked day and night. It presented a 200-page report to President Vasquez, and withdrew before the report could be translated into Spanish. The commission had been greeted upon arrival with sharp attacks in the Dominican press and murmurings among the populace. There apparently was no way of explaining the presence of so many great and rich Americans in the little republic except by some sinister motives connected with more foreign loans or economic concessions. But Mr. Dawes captured the Latin imagination with his dramatic personality and flattering diplomacy. The report was accepted, and in less than a month the five new laws proposed had been enacted by the legislature, and the chief executive was taking vigorous, almost violent, measures to carry out all the recommendations of the report.

The occasion for President Vasquez's request was a prospective Dominican budget deficit of over four million dollars, due to excessive appropriations and to a cash deficit of $1,631,227 accumulated since 1924. At the same time, economic conditions are not good in the republic, and the tax burden is already heavy. A presidential election is approaching, and recourse to loans or higher taxes would make the present administration unpopular. Therefore President Vasquez took the suggestion of Sumner Welles, unofficial adviser and recently American Commissioner to the Republic, that Mr. Dawes be invited to show the government how to save money.

There was an additional reason for the summoning of the Dawes Commission, one which rose above party lines and gained for the commission the support of all patriotic Dominicans. Their government now enjoys complete freedom from American control, except in financial matters. According to the 1924 Convention between the Dominican and American governments, the collection of customs in the republic is to continue under Americans, appointed by the President of the United States, until such time as the present foreign loans of the government shall be completely paid off. All these loans were issued in the United States. Mr. Dawes spoke of this situation in his address to President Vasquez and the Dominican people, on the occasion of the arrival of the commission in Santo Domingo:

> President Vasquez has expressed to us his determined purpose to rid this republic of the last vestige of foreign interference in its domestic affairs by bringing about that economical management of the government's business, which is the people's business, which will furnish the funds to pay the Dominican debt and relieve this republic from the control of its customs by outsiders.

Dawes Reforms

The Commission Report provides for what Mr. Dawes calls "the best budget system in the world." This system, under a director of the budget, supplemented by a coordinating service under a chief coordinator, and by central government accounting control, follows closely the scheme inaugurated by Mr. Dawes in the United States in 1921. There are, however, certain refinements designed to prevent any part of the plan from miscarrying—a result which Mr. Dawes claims has come to pass in the United States under Comptroller General J. R. McCarl. Further following the precedent of administrative reorganization in the United States, the Law of Projected Public Improvements is designed to keep all public-works projects within the financial resources of the government and coordinated with a general scheme of improvement, while a Law Reorganizing the Government Departments redistributes certain services and creates a new Department of War and Marine. The American example was departed from only when President Vasquez asked Mr. Dawes if there was objection to renaming the new department, giving it the more popular modern title of National Defense.

There were certain other recommendations calculated to save the government money: open competitive bids on all contracts and purchases; officers or employees handling funds or personal property to be under bond; full civil-service protection to be extended to all public services; cancelation of all unexpended continuing appropriations not absolutely required; sale of government-owned public utilities.

Dawes Anticipations

The commission seems to have been interested in presenting the anticipated results of its recommendations in the best possible light in its Summary of Fundamental Conclusions. Its optimism, or its weariness after weeks of hectic work, led it to state conclusions which unfortunately are neither exactly accurate nor particularly fundamental.

The commission estimates the probable deficit for 1929, with its reforms in operation, at $769,000. This figure is arrived at by using the excess of budget appropriations over budget resources on January 1, 1929, rather than the higher figure, given elsewhere in the report, of the estimated excess at the end of 1929. Further, a full year's savings in governmental administrative expense are included, although nearly four months of the year had passed before the recommendations were made and the government could hardly be expected to save more than eight-twelfths of the estimate for an entire year. These two items would increase the budget shortage given in the summary by over $1,000,000, and the lowest possible estimate of the 1929 deficit consistent with the commission's own figures is $1,821,707.29.

The statement in the summary as to the probable financial position of the government in 1930 is still more misleading. With the Dawes reforms in full operation, the report promises for that year a surplus of receipts over ordinary expenditures more than sufficient to meet the new charges, amounting to $1,262,500.33, for the sinking fund on the external debt—if there is no deficit carried over from 1929. What value there can be in such speculation it is difficult to grasp, when the facts, as contained in the report itself, indicate that there will be a large deficit in 1929. Instead of a surplus in 1930, on the basis of the present budget and the Dawes retrenchments, the most optimistic estimate would be a deficit of over $1,600,000. In 1931 this amount would be increased nearly $600,000 by higher sinking-fund requirements.

Instead of balancing the budget and wiping out the deficit, the Dawes plan for Santo Domingo only reduces the estimated deficit, for the present year, and the greatest reduction is to be effected through the cancelation of $1,788,000 of continuing appropriations, which could not be met in any case without surplus funds. Even with the assistance of the Dawes plan, the government must face large obligations at the end of 1929, and again in 1930 and 1931, and they will not be paper obligations that can be canceled by a stroke of the pen; the Dominican Government will find it absolutely necessary to cut expenditures beyond the Dawes recommendations, or to procure funds to meet these claims. These are fundamental conclusions based on the estimates and recommendations of the commission, and yet they are not clearly stated at any place in the report.

A conclusion that is stated in the introduction to the report, however, is that the "general economic and financial condition is inherently sound." The commission offers very little evidence to support this conclusion. Although it employed the title Dominican Economic Commission it included very few experts of any sort, and no trained economic investigators. Some members of the group looked around the country a bit and made sketchy observations, but generally reported that they did not have time to go into matters thoroughly. The commission had expected to remain in the republic six weeks, a sufficiently short period for the task it had to perform, but all of its work was crowded into half that time. No adequate survey of the economic basis of Dominican finances could be made. It is unfortunate that the work had to be done so hastily.

Public Utilities

Although the Dawes Plan does not anticipate further loans or higher taxes, it does leave one loophole through which American money might come to the assistance of the government. The commission recommends the sale of all public utilities owned by the government.

Government operation of the national telephone and telegraph system, the national radio, and the automatic telephone system of the city of Santo Domingo is condemned in the eyes of the commission because it resulted in a deficit of over $300,000 in 1928, with only a slight decrease in this amount estimated for 1929. The national railroad also is operated at a loss of something over $50,000 a year, caused chiefly by the competition of trucks on the highways built by the marines and the Dominican Government. But there must be some further reason for the recommended sale, for when the report comes to the light and water company of the city of Santiago, and the electric-light company of the city of Puerto Plata, both operated by the national government, it states that "the commission has the same recommendations to make as those previously expressed," in spite of the fact that new equipment has just been installed in these plants and that they are expected to produce a net profit of $76,000 this year.

It seems that the key to the commission's reasoning on Dominican utilities, as on any public utilities, is to be found in this statement in the report: "It is the experience of the world that public utilities are more efficiently administered and more economically operated by private interests than by governmental operation, . . ." This generalization may be understood when it is realized that the group which agreed upon it included a president of the Radio Corporation of America, a vice-president of the Indiana Refining Company, a vice-president of the Illinois Steel Company and director of several Chicago banks, a president of the Alabama Marble Company, a successful utilities consulting engineer, a corporation lawyer, and two investment bankers, as well as the head of the Dawes interests of Chicago. One hastens to add that these big business men could not be suspected of having designs themselves on the struggling little utilities of the Dominican Republic; their interest must lie only in the "principle" involved.

The commission recognizes elsewhere in the report that the government transmits free of charge over its telegraph system messages which would cost it nearly $100,000 at current rates, and there must be similar employment of the other utilities which might well be charged against the seeming deficit. Furthermore, the report does not take into account the fact that in the case of most of the utilities, especially the automatic telephones and the light and water works, the recent outlay for capital equipment has been very high, while the public use of these utilities is only now beginning. It is doubtless true, as has often been charged, that personnel costs are too high because of political influences, but the commission's recommendation of civil-service control seems the proper attack on this problem in public utilities, as in other government services. If we figure a budget for all these utilities for next year, counting on the 15 per cent savings in personnel cost that the commission has estimated, charging the value of services received by the government against the cost of operation, and including the increased revenues from automatic telephones now being installed, the net deficit to the government cannot be over $75,000. It may indeed be much less, or may even be completely wiped out, and in succeeding years it is quite possible that these utilities will be a source of considerable income.

Mr. Dawes wrote to President Vasquez on March 2, accepting his appointment, and voluntarily placing a strong restriction on the scope of the commission's task: "The work you ask myself and my associates to enter is one in no wise involved in questions of internal policy, but is only that of suggesting certain methods of organization under which the routine business of government is transacted." It appears that the ownership of public utilities is a debatable question, especially in a country like Santo Domingo, where government control of strong foreign enterprises is a difficult matter at best; the Dawes Commission might well have considered it a matter of internal policy, limiting itself to recommendations for the improvement of the government operation of these services.

What Next?

The Dominicans seem inclined to give the Dawes recommendations a thorough trial, and are even going beyond them in some lines of governmental retrenchment. The legislature has granted the executive power to dispose of some of the utilities, under conditions carefully guarding government control of their operation. But it is certain that the Dominicans will have hard sledding under their present program, and that there will be a tremendous pressure on them to take on additional foreign loans, or to "get on easy street" by granting economic and utility concessions to foreigners, particularly Americans.

There are at least three things that the Dominicans have acquired from the Americans. First is a taste for public improvements. They have projected and partially completed the extension of the highway system to every corner of the country, the improvement of three ports, two large irrigation projects, schools and public buildings, and municipal systems of electric lights, telephones, water supply, and sewerage. Second is a distaste for American loans and their consequences. Both the Government and the Opposition make political capital of the determination to rid the country of the last vestige of official foreign control. Third is a fear of economic development by foreign capital and enterprise. The American sugar industry in Santo Domingo grew tremendously during the American occupation, but the Dominican Government is inclined to embarrass it at present by such means as a tax of 150 per cent on all agricultural machinery entering the country for expansion purposes.

Now these three things do not fit together. If the present program of public works is to be continued, and education and other forms of desired social progress are to be extended, further foreign loans will be necessary in the near future, if not immediately. Greater debt charges on the budget, given the present receipts, would simply increase with the annual deficit. To meet such debt charges under the present forms of taxation, or to afford a surplus for public works over the present budget, would require an increase of the foreign trade of the country, and that could probably be achieved most quickly by attracting foreign capital and enterprise. If the Dominicans, then, want neither foreign loans nor foreign capital, they will have to forego, for the present at least, the expansion of their public works, and they may have difficulty in maintaining those acquired already.

The only way in which the Dominicans can recover complete political independence and avoid extensive economic dependence, is by exercising the freedom of action they now enjoy. They must clean house in their own government and live within their means. In this purpose they should be genuinely aided by the Dawes Report, at least by most of it. Further, they must be content with a slow economic and civic development, financed only by their own gradual accumulation of capital. If they can do those two things they will not only surprise a great many Americans at present interested in Santo Domingo, but they will also afford an almost unique experiment in the development of a "backward" country.

Republicans and the Rest of Us

By BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK, SR.

THE past eight years have been peculiarly dull in politics. The man who occupied the White House during the greater part of the period contributed materially to the dulness, but the chief contributing factor is to be found in the supine character of the opposition to dominant Republicanism. We are as impotent to discern the differences between the parties in the United States today as W. S. Gilbert was in England some forty years ago when he satirized the similarity of Conservatives and Liberals in the lines:

> Isn't it strange
> How Nature doth contrive
> That every boy and every gal,
> That's born into the world alive,
> Is either a little Liberal,
> Or else a little Conservative?

Why this tweedledum and tweedledee? The answer is simple: Prosperity and propaganda have converted a majority of Americans to the political creed of the business man. That creed runs: "I believe that government should make business prosperous and that if it does, some of the prosperity, like the gentle rain from heaven, will trickle down upon those beneath." Prosperity for some lines of business may be made by governmental action or inaction. Tariff legislation, easy access to natural resources, favorable tax laws, favorable banking laws, the granting of valuable franchises, the jailing of "agitators," are examples of action. Refraining from "going into business in competition with its citizens," from "meddling in business," from adequate regulation of public service rates, are examples of inaction. Both lists could be multiplied indefinitely. Finally, the "charmed circle of privilege" must be kept exclusively for business men of substance. Others, like laborers, farmers, most "white-collar" workers, and small business men must be kept out. Such is the political creed of the larger business men.

For nearly seventy years, with some slight exception during the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican Party has been the instrument for putting this creed into practice nationally. Locally, the same thing has been true in the East and broadly speaking in the West despite "Progressive" heresies. Recently, in the more industrialized areas of the South, the Democratic Party has come to represent essentially the same view as the Republican Party elsewhere. Woodrow Wilson committed his party to a progressive policy nationally, but by embarking on the stormy sea of world politics, he was largely responsible for the ensuing decline. But the Democratic leaders in Congress are not blameless. They did not fight to maintain the instrumentalities created under Wilson's leadership for the control of big business, but sat idly by and saw those instrumentalities transformed into the bulwarks of predatory vested interests, hoping thus to obtain the favor of the business barons. In this hope they were disappointed. Business men, like other human beings, trust old friends most, and their trust was not misplaced. Under Harding and Coolidge they got everything they wanted and nothing they did not want. Now their faith is in Hoover, and the prospect is that the Republican Party will continue for many years to come to deserve the confidence of the business interests.

In view of the decayed state of the national Democracy, is not the Socialist Party the logical alternative to Republican rule? Yes, but politics is not a matter of logic. Other influences prevent the Socialist Party from operating as a successful opposition. It should continue in existence, however, and it is to be hoped that in the course of time it will become a strong national party.

In the meanwhile, are we to have no opposition worthy the name? Admitting that the wish is in part, at least, father to the judgment, let us hazard a forecast. In the course of the next decade, very probably as early as 1932, the Democratic Party will divide into two parties—an Eastern and a Southern. There will follow quickly a definite secession of the Western Progressives from the Republican Party. Each of these three parties will be much more progressive than the present national Democracy. This judgment is based on what appears to be facts. First, the Democrats have learned that they cannot supplant the Republicans in the affections of big business. Second, Eastern and Southern Democrats are convinced that they can find no common ground of union on the liquor question. Moreover, their racial and religious differences, they fully realize, are too great to allow them to cooperate in a single party. Finally, millions of people are getting over the notion that huge profits for a few mean prosperity for the masses.

The present economic condition is bound to bring about a renewed moderate opposition to extreme Republicanism. Such opposition has not been dead, as the five million votes for La Follette in 1924 sufficiently attest. This opposition, too, is growing, but no Eastern or Southern Democrat or Western Progressive can command its undivided support. Governor Smith made a good candidate in the East, but a poor one in the South and West. Senator Norris would have done well in his own section, but not elsewhere. Senator George could have rallied support in the South, but almost none anywhere else.

The situation then calls for one national extreme capitalistic party, one socialist party, and three sectional parties representing various shades of moderate opposition to unregulated capitalism. Parties cannot go on forever standing for nothing in particular. They must in the end conform more or less closely to actual social-economic conditions. Extreme capitalism is the one thing that is nation-wide in scope. The Republicans will represent capitalism. Republican office-seekers, continuing to preach the gospel of prosperity, will admonish the people to put their trust in the great industrial lords, and multitudes will hearken to their voice. Against them the three sectional parties will have difficulty in making headway, but the situation is by no means hopeless.

What part will the Southern Democracy play? What ground is there for believing that it will become progressive? In the first place, it is being deserted by its most conservative element—the business men. Prohibition and religious issues were the immediate occasion of the large Republican vote in the South in 1928; but there was another cause, not so apparent on the surface. For many years considerable areas in the South have been undergoing industrialization and urbanization. A business group has been growing up whose political views are much like those of their fellows in the North. Many of them are of Northern origin. Many Southerners have been coming to the view that business is "safer" when there is a Republican administration in Washington, and therefore have been voting the Republican ticket in national elections. The next step will be for them to vote the Republican State ticket. Indeed, many did so in 1928. If President Hoover is successful in having "respectable" Republican machines organized in Southern States where none now exist, the conversion of the business men to State as well as national Republicanism will be rendered easy. It is to be hoped that success will attend his efforts.

Contemporaneously with this change, other significant movements have been going on. Southern labor is becoming class-conscious. The first generation of Southern workers, fresh from the hard conditions on the little farms they occupied, looked upon the new village or city life as a distinct improvement, even if hours were long, if work was monotonous, and if pay was small as compared with Northern wages. Today things are different. A new generation has appeared which never knew the farm. Its members are not one-tenth as isolated as they or their parents were even ten years ago. Among the more skilled workers in the cities unionism is taking hold rapidly. On the whole, the leaders are intelligent and socially minded.

Another influence making for discomfort in the South is the invasion of this territory by the chain stores, and the establishment of numerous branches of the great mail-order houses, with the consequent ruin of many small merchants. Southern agriculture is in a bad way. Some local observers look for a recrudescence of a Southern agrarian movement comparable to the Farmers' Alliance of the early nineties. We may confidently expect that within the next decade both the farmers and the small business men will be demanding relief at the hands of the State governments.

It would be a mistake not to say something about the young men and especially the young women of the Southern colleges. Almost without exception they are liberal, and in many cases even radical, in their outlook. Many of them are entering the teaching profession, where they are passing on the ideas they acquired in college. Moreover, they are not "tired" liberals. Whatever the situation elsewhere, in the South the young college men and women are optimistic, generous, and determined to improve social and economic conditions in their section. For the most part they are emancipated from the enervating tradition of a South of chivalry and romance. Of more practical importance, they will not yield obedience to the demands of an ignorant priesthood, bent upon maintaining a religious, social, and economic fundamentalism. They are thinking hard and biding their time.

And their time is coming soon. When the Democratic Party is deserted by the great business men, these young people, aided by the workers, farmers, and small business classes, will capture its machinery, and rededicate it to the principles of "equal rights for all and special privileges to none." They will conceive these principles, not as dead shibboleths, but in terms of twentieth-century realities. They will look into the mills and see that their Anglo-Saxon relatives are being exploited in the interest of local and foreign capitalists. They will recall that in the 1860's Southern Democrats fought against being machined, but incidentally to preserve a great social wrong—Negro slavery. Before the 1960's have arrived they will be engaged in the nobler struggle to free their own flesh and blood from slavery to the masters of the machines.

But this will be only a part of their program. Their party will advocate a thoroughgoing reform of the tax system so that the tax burden will fall upon those best able to pay, to the relief of the farmers and workers. It will demand the extension of the public-school system from the present six or seven months' term to a full nine or ten months' term. It will advocate the enlargement and more adequate support of the State institutions of higher learning, insisting that both public schools and State colleges be made more responsive to social needs. It will see to it that adequate social legislation of all sorts is provided. Public utilities must be effectively regulated so that their services may be supplied the public at reasonable cost, and if experience demonstrates that this is impossible, then new ground of public ownership must be taken. The party will insist that worthy tenants be aided by the state in securing ownership of their farms, following the precedent of Denmark and other progressive countries. Farmers' cooperatives will be encouraged and given State aid. Practical agricultural education will be extended and made more effective. Such in brief is the role that the new Southern Democracy will play in State affairs.

In national matters it will cooperate, as far as possible, with the two moderate parties from the East and the West. In Congress, the three together could make an effective opposition to the extreme Republicanism which we have witnessed during the past eight years and which seems destined to continue for some time. All three parties should oppose the overgrown pretensions and demands of the navalists, militarists, and imperialists generally. Pacifically inclined in foreign relations, they should be effective opponents of the headlong plunge which we seem to be making into the next war. The three parties could not agree on the prohibition question, or perhaps on immigration, so they should frankly agree to disagree and thus save their mutual respect. In the field of national domestic politics, they could together prevent the sort of shameless favors which have been given to the great power, oil, and transportation corporations during the past eight years, and even in opposition they should be able to prevent such tax refunds as have been made under Mr. Mellon's administration of the Treasury. And they could at least call a halt to any further protective tariff debauch. Perhaps within a decade or two their combined electoral votes would be sufficient to throw the election of the President into the House. A coalition administration could conceivably be provided and sufficient agreement reached to bring the government once more to grips with some of the country's insistent problems.

The Last of Edward Carpenter

By S. K. RATCLIFFE

IT was a cool sunny day of midsummer, the first of July. A company of English people, among whom at first the local newspapermen saw nobody whose name had for them any sound of eminence, had gathered on a hillside in Surrey for the burial of Edward Carpenter, "democratic author and poet," as he described himself, maker of "Towards Democracy," and, I suppose, the most remarkable of those few original English characters who are known and honored among certain orders of the elect throughout the world. He had died three days before in Guildford; the county seat, as Americans would call it—an ancient town grown during the past half-century into a congested suburb just beyond the outer rim of Greater London.

Thither he had removed, after the war, when within hail of his eightieth year, from the cottage and holding of Millthorpe, among the hills outside Sheffield, the city of steel, where he had lived his own life for forty years—writing, reflecting, and receiving at intervals the friends and unknown disciples who came to him from near and very far. On his seventieth birthday, and again on his eightieth, tributes of admiration and affection had been paid to him: by men of letters and of affairs, by labor and socialist leaders, by bands of social idealists belonging to the small undefeated minority, by inconspicuous men and women who, in places scattered over the globe, had been reached by the word of Edward Carpenter. In Guildford, he had lived for a time in a staring villa on a steep road; in his last years he found a less inappropriate refuge in a tiny bungalow on level ground, surrounded by flowers.

A brief announcement in the London Times had made known that the funeral would be held in the town cemetery. This seemed to imply that the customary routine would be followed; in other words, that the Church of England burial service would be read over the body of as complete a spiritual rebel as England had known for half a century. We remembered how, after going through his course in Cambridge University, he had been ordained, and had accepted a curacy under the once renowned Frederick Denison Maurice, that prophet of a strange semi-modernism of whom Matthew Arnold said that he expended enormous energy upon beating the bush without at any time starting the hare. Carpenter as curate in the Established Church had been unimaginable by all those who had come within his circle after the writing of his most famous book; but it looked as though a man's past must come back upon him in this England of ours. To our good friend Henry Nevinson I quoted a passage from his own autobiography, "Last Changes Last Chances," to the effect that those who threatened the speedy passing of the British system were given to forgetting that England always won one battle—the last. Let us, I suggested, amend that, and force ourselves to realize that the old churchy bourgeoisie will contrive to win the last battle over the body of the rebel.

The little cortège from the town below was late. We were waiting at the entrance of the cemetery when the chaplain rode up the hill on a motor-bicycle and swung into the gateway. The coffin was of the plainest unvarnished wood, covered with flowers. We crowded into the little chapel, and the chaplain began reading the burial service in the rapid level tone that generations of English clergy have established as the right and only way of going through the solemn ritual of farewell to the dead. Having finished with the prayers and readings of the first part, we followed the coffin up the slope of the cemetery to the grave, where the remainder of the service was read in the same voice, the words of committal being spoken, likewise inaudibly, by an older cleric of somewhat higher rank. Around the grave were some 200 people, mostly neighbor folk of the neighborhood—members of the local Labor Party, the cooperative society, the trade unions: people who knew that a remarkable man had gone from their midst. No national leaders of any kind were present.

There had been no reference to Carpenter by name. Burial in the Church of England is an entirely anonymous rite; the words are read over the body of "our dear brother here departed." Who, indeed, was this; who should it be? "So as I am, so shall you be," as the familiar rural epitaph has it. And now the formal benediction is spoken. The church has done its part.

As we were walking up from the chapel to the grave my companion said: "On these occasions some one ought to break out." Many among us, I do not doubt, were feeling precisely that; but, as it happened, there was no need for a break-out. The chaplain was moving away and the onlookers supposed that all was over, when a clear voice was heard over the scene, declaring that the company could not separate without some word of Edward Carpenter's own. It was the voice of a literary executor, Captain L. H. Green, who himself read the noble lines Into the Regions of the Sun, beginning:

> So at last passing (the great sea stilled, the raging ocean)—passing away
> All sorrow left behind, the great intolerable burdens which men vainly try to carry,
> All all abandoned, left there lying—
> Suddenly lightened, like a bird that shakes itself free from the limed twigs,
> Soaring, soaring, into joy supernal passing,
> Lo! the dead we leave behind and pass to the realms of the living.

It was clearly and beautifully done, and at the end the same voice announced that Henry Nevinson, a friend of forty years, would speak a few words about Carpenter and the significance of his work. Nevinson did, speaking slowly, in calm and moving sentences. He recalled the courage with which Carpenter had separated himself from a devouring convention, for the shaping of the life in which he believed, a life of simple labor, spent among the common folk. Carpenter was a great poet, a great writer, a great critic of life and society; but he was greater still in his life and in the spirit that he had passed on.

It was a singularly satisfying conclusion. The right thing had been done, the right page read, the appropriate word spoken. The victory had been snatched at the last moment from the official guardians of an outworn form; and I think every man and woman present was grateful to the two men who had succeeded in associating the end of Edward Carpenter with his own expression of open-eyed submission to reality, instead of with the rubric of an age from which his mind had moved decisively away.

Sex, if Any

Being, perhaps, a preview of the pamphlet Canon William Sheafe Chase is planning to write to replace Mary Ware Dennett's "The Sex Side of Life," in order that the Postal Inspectors may be kept unsullied and pure

By EDWARD HOPE

Introduction

As young folks grow out of their babyhood and begin to observe the world they live in, many of them notice that children are conventionally divided into two classes. There are Boys and there are Girls. To some of the young this comes as rather a shock, although it should not cause much comment among those whose home training has been properly looked after by their parents. It is only to young folks whose little minds have not been carefully safeguarded from thoughts of evil that the realization of Sex, or Gender, as it is more delicately called, proves disturbing.

Curiosity, especially in matters that are better neither discussed nor thought about, is a great evil and a besetting sin among certain young folks. Those who inquire boldly into the Divine Plan will come to no good end, but because curiosity in matters of Gender continues to rear its ugly head, in spite of all that wise and moral adults can do to stop it, this little book is prepared to settle the question once and for all and put the mind of the young at rest.

In what follows, you will find all the information you will need at present. Only those who are willing to risk damnation, or who are planning to lead immoral lives, will inquire further.

The Genders

There are, as you have already guessed, two major sexes, or Genders. The commonest terms for the Genders are Male and Female. We shall use these terms for convenience, although happier words could be found.

It is often important to be able to tell the Genders apart, and this is quite easy with a little practice. Men, for instance, wear trousers. The outstanding physical differences between the Genders are: Males, on the average, are bigger than Females, and stronger. Males have deeper voices than Females. Males have their hair cut shorter than Females. Males shave their faces or else grow beards, while Females do not have to shave. Little boys, and men, too, are Male. Little girls, and women, are Female.

These simple distinctions should be enough, under ordinary circumstances, to clear up any confusion as to which Gender a given individual belongs to. In any case where doubt persists, even when the given individual is judged by these standards, it is best to walk rapidly away from the person in question.

The Purpose of Gender

If you have any grasp of the ways of Providence, you will feel sure that there is some great reason in the Divine Plan for the creation of two Genders. And you will be quite right. The Genders are a part of the means the Almighty has devised for perpetuating the race of men and women.

All living things have their Genders in one way or another, and the best way to think of the reproductive functions of the Genders is to consider the flowers. It is the plant's mission, just as it is the mission of right-thinking human beings, to reproduce itself and perpetuate its race. Today you have a flowering plant; tomorrow there will be other flowering plants where that one now stands. Go and sit in front of a flowering plant for a day or a week and watch it. You will learn a great and good lesson. And although the flowers have no marriage ceremony, so far as we know, they may be pardoned for that, because they do not know any better.

Marriage

When you are grown up and are a Man or a Woman, Love will very probably come into your life. When you find that you love another man or woman (as the case may be), it is time to think of Marriage. Don't pay any attention to wicked people who try to tell you otherwise. In fact, beware of anyone who makes such a suggestion, for it may be part of an evil design.

A marriage is best when it is solemnized by a minister, although judges and other officials of the State are qualified to perform marriages. Marriage is not a state to be entered into lightly. By marriage you will take your Mate, your spiritual companion, for the rest of your life. You must be sure, therefore, that you have first Sacred Love, the kind of emotion for which you are willing to give up your happiness and your chance of earthly satisfaction. Millions of men and women have made these sacrifices to preserve marriage for you, and you must be ready to do as much for those who come after.

There are some light-minded and usually evil persons who enter marriage in a spirit of happiness and gaiety. This is very wrong. Marriage is holy and there should be no fun connected with it. For the most part, happily, there is none, for good people bring to the institution a spirit of sacred duty and seriousness. Marriages are made in Heaven, and Heaven is no place for nonsense.

Childbirth

There are several theories about childbirth, although no one knows which is exactly accurate. The two leading theories are (a) that the baby is brought by a stork, which carries its precious cargo slung from its beak, and (b) that babies are shipped direct from Heaven to the doctors and distributed by them to those who want them.

Myself, I am inclined to the stork theory. I feel that the stork is a much more lovely creature than the average doctor. And, anyway, some of the new babies I have seen would have been much too large to fit into the little black bags the doctors carry. Whatever the true theory is, there is no need for you to worry your little head with it now.

Immorality

It is necessary to mention briefly the fact that there are Bad Women in the world. These Bad Women are a menace to decent society, and cause all sorts of trouble. Some day, it is to be hoped, proper laws will be passed to do away with Bad Women entirely, but at present only a warning can be issued. Boys should avoid meeting them and Girls should avoid becoming them.

As for where they are found and how they are to be distinguished from decent and moral people, suffice it to say that a man will know almost instinctively when he is in the presence of a Bad Woman. At the slightest premonition, if he is a good man, he will go immediately away or call a policeman. Policemen can deal with Bad Women.

* * * * *

In this pamphlet, dear children, you have all the information you will need, as I have said, for the present. Now that all your questions are answered, put the matter out of your little mind entirely, and stick to marbles and jacks, which are simpler and safer.

In the Driftway

A COUPLE of years ago, in response to a contest on the subject, the Drifter undertook to list the "ten most beautiful things" in New York City. He prefers not to recall the exact date of this performance because in his hurry he included a view of lower Manhattan, the East River, and the Brooklyn Bridge from the foot of Montague Street, Brooklyn, and an attempt later at verification disclosed the fact that most of the alleged panorama was invisible on account of nearby warehouses. Still that fiasco was quite a while ago and has probably been forgotten, so the Drifter is inclined to answer the query of the Merchants' Association as to the "seven wonders of New York City." On the authority of Antipater of Sidon the Merchants' Association lists the Seven Wonders of the World as the walls of Babylon, the statue of Zeus at Olympia by Phidias, the Hanging Gardens of Babylon, the Colossus of Rhodes, the Pyramids of Egypt, the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus, and the Temple of Artemis at Ephesus. Certain other authorities give the lighthouse at Alexandria instead of the walls of Babylon, but that is a detail.

* * * * *

THE Merchants' Association put its question to a number of New Yorkers of prominence, and there is considerable repetition in their answers. There is a common tendency to name the subway system, the railway terminals, the East River bridges, the Stock Exchange, the Holland Tunnel, and the Woolworth Building. A good many of those responding to the question cited various views, usually containing skyscrapers, and some named objects of beauty without reference to their size or uniqueness. But if one is to follow the analogy of the Seven Wonders of the ancients in naming a similar list for New York City, beauty cannot be the only, or indeed the chief, criterion. The object should be colossal in size or amazing in construction, and it should be either unique or a bigger, better specimen than any elsewhere. Bearing these conditions in mind the Drifter likes best the list submitted by Gustav Lindenthal, engineer, who named New York's two great museums, the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History; the city's gravity water supply; the subway system; the Grand Central and Pennsylvania railway terminals; and the East River bridges. This is a good list, but the Drifter would make large changes in compiling one of his own. For various reasons, he would omit the two museums, the water system, the Pennslyvania terminal, and the East River bridges. These exceptions leave the Drifter with only two wonders listed: the subway system and the Grand Central railway terminal with its tunnel and approaches.

* * * * *

TO these two wonders the Drifter would add one of the city's great office buildings. The Woolworth is the tallest and easily the most beautiful, but perhaps it should yield to the Equitable Building because the latter is the largest in the world, housing 12,000 persons—a city in itself—while it is estimated that, in addition, it has 50,000 visitors daily. As a fourth wonder the Drifter would list that amazing and dramatic spectacle known as the Great White Way, the illuminated signs and the human surge on Broadway from Forty-second to Fiftieth Street at night. Fifth, the Drifter would like to name something connected with the great amusement business in New York, and he rests on Coney Island. For sixth choice he borrows an item from the list of Joseph E. Corrigan, city magistrate, who mentions as one of New York's wonders "the number, variety, and character of its inhabitants." Certainly this is one of the wonders of New York and of the world. Nothing is so surely the essence of the American metropolis as its human content of many races, with their differing tongues and varying manners, their restaurants, churches, shops, street and home life.

* * * * *

FINALLY, the Drifter sets down as the seventh and greatest wonder of all the patient industry, the docile humility of this human throng, nine-tenths of whom wear out their lives creating wealth for the other tenth to spend. The supreme marvel is that the nine-tenths do not rise in their wrath and their might, pick up the one-tenth by the scruff of the neck, and hurl them off the Battery sea wall into the bay. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Applejack Myth

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It appears to be getting conventional to assume that the farmer, in insisting on prohibition for the rest of the world, counts on hard cider and applejack for himself. In your columns it is first Heywood Broun and now the Drifter who makes applejack the farmer's drink. Broun seemed to think that the farmers had got applejack legalized under the statute; surely it is no more lawful than brandy.

I was raised in a Vermont town that had no other industry, except for strictly local service, than farming; Vermont counts maple-sugar-making as a part of farming. Vermont was a veteran prohibition State. The cider barrel was a familiar institution and its legitimate uses were understood to be to drink while sweet, to cook while sweet (cider applesauce, etc.), and to make vinegar. The definition of sweet cider was elastic, but it was not considered thoroughly respectable to make a practice of drinking it after it had become decidedly hard; and I never heard of doing anything to prevent hard cider from going on and turning to vinegar, so that even those who drank hard cider were not presumed to have it available all the year.

But, while the cider press and cider barrel were familiar institutions, the still was not. I never saw applejack. I never saw a receptacle that was said to contain applejack. I never heard of a man who made it, or had any, or had been drinking it. I never heard of applejack except in print, on pages printed in the city. Today, at the age of sixty, after having lived for longer and shorter times in three cities and ten country towns of five States, having once devoted a summer to canvassing a rural county of New York for a purpose that made it part of my ordinary experience to hear the local scandal against the prohibitionists of the county, I have not yet heard of a specified town or farm or house or other locality in which applejack was said to be made or used.

Ballard Vale, Mass., June 29 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Who Are Bad Citizens?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The ground on which the Connecticut judge the other day refused citizenship to Douglas C. Macintosh of the Yale Divinity School is rather amusing when read on our Independence Day. Professor Macintosh, who served faithfully in France during the World War, said in answering questions that he could not support a government in what he considered an unjust war. The judge said that when war is once on, a citizen has no business to discuss the question of its justice or injustice, but simply to support his government; and he therefore denied Professor Macintosh naturalization. He had not as much compunction on the score as even the Chicago Tribune, which has belatedly had qualms of conscience over carrying at the top of its editorial page the notorious old slogan, "My country, right or wrong." It did this regularly for years, impervious to the common criticism; but last winter it "got religion," frankly confessed its fear that it was mischievous, and took it off.

Almost all great Englishmen of the Revolutionary period whom we honor, and whom England herself now honors, denounced their government for its course, praised glowingly our rebellious fathers, and gave "aid and comfort" to the enemy in a way which our own Constitution pronounces treason, and which Rosika Schwimmer and Professor Macintosh would never dream of. It is doubtful whether we could have won our independence if these sympathizing and outspoken Englishmen had not made the war so unpopular in England and at times almost paralyzed their government. Our very map is dotted all over with Pittsfields and Chathams and Burkes and Foxboros and Conways and Graftons and Barres, witnessing to the gratitude of our fathers to the manly and liberty-loving critics of their government, who fought for our cause in Parliament as valiantly as Washington fought at Trenton and Yorktown.

"I rejoice that America has resisted," thundered Pitt in Parliament. "Three millions of people so dead to all feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to have made slaves of the rest." Our Connecticut judge would have disfranchised him forthwith; and he would have sent Fox after him for his "treasonable" speech when the news came of Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga. And Horace Walpole also who exclaimed on the same occasion, "Thank God, old England is safe."

Happily we do not have to go to England for examples of backbone and humanity in politics. We have had illustrious illustrations at home. Almost every conspicuous man of brains in New England denounced our war with Mexico from beginning to end; and the leaders of nearly our whole conscientious body, from our two ex-Presidents Grover Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison down, condemned the course of our government with equal energy when engaged in the subjugation of the Philippines at the hour when their struggling people had almost won their independence from Spain. Massachusetts should ever be proud that the leader in the Senate of the opposition to the infamy was George F. Hoar; that the leader of the organized popular opposition was the venerable George S. Boutwell; and that when his voice was stilled in death his mantle fell on the chivalric Moorfield Storey. Our Connecticut judge would have sent them all to jail. Such pronouncements as that of the New Haven judge are, thank God, a novelty in this republic of Adams and Jefferson.

Boston, July 4 EDWIN D. MEAD

Dawes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your discussion of Charles G. Dawes as British Ambassador from America you entirely failed to describe the man. He is one of the most cultured men in our nation, reads widely, and is familiar with many lines of thought. You will be surprised to know that when he was campaigning four years ago he took with him a select library of Greek and Latin books and never closed a day without long and careful study of their contents. His knowledge of ancient life and literature is very broad and deep. He has a large library and loves his books. Two years ago he told me that when he retired from the Vice-Presidency he hoped to satisfy a long ambition by taking up the excavation of some early Greek city or ruins.

Walter Leaf, the great Homeric scholar and man of letters, after spending four hours with Mr. Dawes said to me that he was one of the most cultured and widely informed gentlemen he had ever seen. Mr. Dawes can meet as an equal in learning and culture the very best of the British Empire.

Evanston, Illinois, May 30 JOHN A. SCOTT

Left-Handedness

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am astonished that as scholarly a journal as The Nation should attribute left-handedness to some usage when it has been known to two generations that its cause is anatomical in a right-handed brain. I suggest that Heywood Broun read up—possibly Dr. George Gould—on the subject.

Pacific Grove, California, July 10 J. C. REEVE

Catholicism and Tolerance

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The controversy between your correspondent, Mr. Robert Dell, and Roman Catholic writers is so acutely interesting that I break into it and am reminded of old times in South Carolina. In 1706 the Church of England became the "established church" of the colony, the state religion, and it was supported by public taxation. The Episcopalians paid most of the taxes. About 1740 the "upper country" (the interior) began to be settled, rapidly, by "dissenters" who trekked from Virginia and other Northern colonies. Most of them were Presbyterians. In 1776 "we" South Carolinians had a war on our hands, and that was the opportunity of the dissenters. So the legislature of this independent State, in 1778, adopted a "constitution" (the first was adopted in 1776) and, led by the Reverend William Tennent, the Church of England was disestablished. The constitution contained these words: "The Christian Protestant religion shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be the established religion of this State." The constitution of 1790 abolished all religious tests, and it was not until then that Jews and Roman Catholics could hold public office.

Were the Episcopalians (I am one of them) to become 90 per cent of the population (we are in fact less than 2 per cent of the whites), could they (or we) be trusted not to impress their religion on the constitution and laws—presupposing that your "Uncle Sam" kept his hands off? I doubt it. Even in these illumined days, could any church, or sect, were 90 per cent of the people enrolled in it, be trusted not to interfere in temporal affairs? To doubt it may be irreligious—but I do.

Accepting Mr. Dell's assertion that under the Concordat the Roman Catholics take complete charge of education in Italy and compel all children and youth to receive Roman Catholic instruction, my fellow-citizens of South Carolina will agree with me that it is a cruel hardship on the Protestants, and the Jews—but wait. Numerically, as Mr. Dell says, the Protestants and the Jews are negligible in Italy, and the great hardship is on the children of millions of freethinkers, "infidels." Were all religious instruction forbidden in tax-supported schools, and school attendance compulsory, the "atmosphere" in the Italian schools would be non-religious, in a great proportion of them anti-religious. Would we South Carolinian Protestants approve the exposure of Protestant children, few though they be in Italy, to that? I doubt it.

Mr. Dell holds that the Roman church, unlike other churches, not only has not receded from the old position that the church is supreme in temporal as well as spiritual affairs but emphatically reiterates it—therefore we should not "commit political suicide by giving our votes to members of a political organization with such principles as these which every member of that organization is bound to accept." Why stop with refusing to vote for them? Why allow them to vote? Does Mr. Dell fancy that exclusion from office-holding of Roman Catholics in New York and Boston would prevent them from "plumping" occasionally for a Protestant brother capable of betraying Protestantism? Would it not be rather perilous to proscribe a powerful and numerous group, as to office-holding, without disarming them? Would he degrade these people, madden them, and leave weapons in their hands?

Mr. Dell admits that the Pope does not attempt to impose his notions of temporal supremacy except where he thinks he can. Is not that enough? Enough at least to let us live in political peace and political fellowship, in the United States, with these Roman Catholics? Some of my South Carolina friends will disagree, but I think we are in as much danger of the political ascendancy of the Holy Rollers as of the Roman Catholics, and my limited observation is that a very great proportion of the present office-holders are rather indulgers and tolerators of Protestant Christianity than supporters of it, whatever the masks they wear. It is certain that, in these parts, the Devil has not abandoned his claims to temporal power, and as we have less than 12,000 Roman Catholics in 1,800,000 people, I fear that most of the members of his South Carolina junta have Protestant associations.

Do these disputations about Catholicism and Protestantism profit? It is not what the Pope might do in the United States, if he could, that concerns me. It is what Bishop Cannon can do in Virginia. What he has done. What he is doing.

Charleston, S. C., July 15 W. W. BALL

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
July 29—Mr. Mussey
August 5—Mr. Blanshard

Books

Phenomena

By MARK VAN DOREN

He thought some things were not to be compared.
They sprang from their own seed, that once had dared.
Dropping from several stars, to sow by night
One-half of earth with unexplained delight.
Then morning came on philosophic feet,
And leveling her voice denied the sweet,
Sharp difference; she was not to be confused
By novelty of names, and form abused.
So noon and afternoon saw nothing strange.
Only at twilight did unreason range,
And only now by night is wisdom had
In a spun world of which the name is mad;
Only through darkness will the meaning shine
Of things that are but planets fallen fine;
Only the black meridian declares
That old descent from big and little Bears.

A Great National Drama

The Wave. By Evelyn Scott. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

HISTORIANS and historical novelists of the conventional school have conspired to make us forget that wars happen to people as well as to governments. It has long been supposed that the best way to encompass artistically a great national event was to take a bird's-eye view of it; and, of course, from an altitude, a war would resolve itself into the movements of masses more or less controlled by the decisions of a few outstanding individuals and primarily actuated by some common ideal. That is the so-called heroic viewpoint.

For me, at least, the importance of Evelyn Scott's remarkable book lies in the fact that it is one of the few really formidable expressions in fiction of the anti-heroic viewpoint—or, if one may be permitted so lax a term, the modern viewpoint. It is not less sentimental than Barbusse or Remarque or Renn or Frey; but it seems to gain an added power and scope because it is so rigidly unautobiographical. Fine as is "All Quiet on the Western Front," for example, one cannot help closing the book with the feeling that, after all, this is one man's war, fine-fibered and intelligent as that man may be. "The Wave" recounts no one man's war; it recounts the Civil War, whole and entire, by the one possible method: that of tracing its impact on several hundred individuals, from Abraham Lincoln down to a newsboy selling battle extras, from the Portuguese fop who has made a fortune in cotton speculation down to the Manchester factory hand who has been thrown out of work by the economic repercussions of a struggle three thousand miles away.

By the time these words appear, so much just praise will have been lavished on Mrs. Scott's obviously torrential creative power that it hardly seems worth while to make further comment. She has set in motion a veritable army of characters, each provided with a complete background, as if each were originally conceived as the central figure of a novel. Indeed, Mrs. Scott's insight into and curiosity about her own creations are so vital and enthusiastic that it is only with great difficulty that she avoids what must have loomed up as her major difficulty: that of so subordinating the tragedies and comedies of her individuals as to give the reader a continuous sense of the great national drama in which they played their parts. That we do achieve this sense, despite the fact that there is little further connection between the hundred or more sections of the book other than that of vague chronological sequence, is an astounding technical triumph for the author.

Criticism has been directed, and will continue to be directed, against the "formlessness" of the book. It is hardly necessary to point out that this formlessness is designed, that it is in itself a way, a valid and exciting way, of viewing the national cataclysm which was the Civil War. It is, more than that, the only way in which a thoroughly modern temperament could survey the war completely because only thus can the utter madness and senseless horror of strife be completely communicated. The indictments of a Remarque or a Frey are powerful enough; but they are individual indictments; they have a quality of isolation; and, more pertinently, the indignant emotions they arouse are rather simple ones which tend to disappear after the book is read. But the emotions aroused by "The Wave" are not the simple ones of horror and indignation at all, but something far more profound. The most blighting as well as the simplest thing one can say against war is that it brings wretchedness to millions of people—and in different ways. It is the multifariousness, the incoherent and unrelated multifariousness of the tragedies, that is the most dreadful thing about war. And of these multifarious, senseless, individual tragedies no one, before the appearance of "The Wave," has given us more than a schematic picture. There is a certain nameless horror that comes with the reader's realization that the meanest Negro and General Robert E. Lee are both made sick to their very souls by the same event. As one reads on and on, passing from one social level to another, meeting soldiers, Negroes, generals, chaplains, old ladies, children, Polish immigrants, homeless Jews, bereft wives, deserters, politicians, one begins to lose sight of the fact that this is a war between Confederates and Unionists, between two sharply demarcated economic and social ideologies. The "issues" of the war fade away, except in so far as they present themselves for our ironical survey; but the war as a tremendous human tragic event begins to engross us and finally to overwhelm us in its brutal variety and meaninglessness.

For myself, I find certain imperfections and disharmonies which are minor but perhaps worth pointing out. They are not the results of weakness but of an excess of strength. I could wish, for example, that Mrs. Scott's senses were not so keen and excitable, that she would refrain from packing every sentence with more visual and auditory metaphor than it will bear. Her style is so agonizingly alive that it occasionally becomes confusing. Similarly, she is so intent on avoiding a series of mere "snapshots" that (but very infrequently) she overloads her stories with biographical detail, as in the Kalicz episode. Finally, she may be charged once in a great while with selecting her stories too obviously in order to represent or typify some phase of the conflict. In so far as we recognize these episodes as "representative," they lose in emotional quality what they gain in mere pertinency.

But that Mrs. Scott's major conception has been fulfilled, cannot, I think, be denied; and only a carping critic would dare to disagree with Mr. Krutch's final judgment that here, if anywhere, the Civil War has received its most adequate treatment in fiction. There can be no doubt that "The Wave" is an outstanding achievement in recent American letters.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Mohammedan India

The Cambridge History of India. Vol. III—The Turks and Afghans. Edited by Sir Wolseley Haig. The Macmillan Company. $11.

THAT early Mohammedan period of Indian history covered by this third volume, which comprises the years A.D. 1000 to 1500, cannot be described in any way either as great or notable. It is a signal example of what human life becomes when it is based on brute force alone, with hardly any higher appeal. The mind sickens, as page after page is turned over, without a single constructive idea, or anything that might be called a movement of the human spirit toward the highest life. The Islamic faith of the conquerors seems to have been occupied almost entirely with the mere external things of religion. It is noticeable that the only chapter in the whole book in which a slightly higher note is struck, The Monuments of Muslim India, deals with buildings in stone—tombs, mosques, fortifications, towers, city gates. Even here we can see the sheer brutality of force breaking through into the domain of art.

I can vividly remember taking the poet Rabindranath Tagore to see the Qutab Minor outside Delhi, one of the chief monuments of these ruthless years. He had already written one of his most perfect poems on the Taj Mahal at Agra, a poem that stands out for its peerless beauty in his Bengali verse. I had not realized how utterly different his emotions would be at this ancient monument which every one who comes as a stranger to Delhi goes "out into the wilderness to see." But when he reached there and saw the vandalism that had taken place—the beautiful Hindu columns that had been torn down in order to use their very stones to build up the massive and pretentious minaret, which had little semblance of dignity or artistic merit, he turned to me and said: "Let us get away from this place." All the way back to Delhi he remained silent, meditating over the barbaric ruthlessness of those vandal times.

Yet there was something in what the old medieval writers signified, when they called the fiery faith of the Arabian Prophet, as they saw it, the Scourge of God. No one can go among the temple shrines of South India, with their licensed devadasis and their obscene mural sculpture—witnessing at the same time the caste evil so deeply rooted that a whole human population has become "untouchable"—without realizing that the North of India has been "saved, though as by fire" from many of these ultimate evils.

It is only as we read these pages (to turn to another thought) that we can see in all its true proportions the greatness of the Mogul Empire, with its founder, the Emperor Akbar, who was surely one of the greatest of kings and noblest of men. For among the earlier dynasties, as we read how one king slaughters another and how one bloodthirsty victory is marked by a vengeance exceeding (if it were possible) its predecessor, we have no trace at all of any high endeavor or love of humankind or pity for the souls of men. We think of the Emperor Asoka, with his universal charity toward man and beast, who ruled over the very same realm more than a thousand years before. We go back still farther to Gautama, the Buddha, and recall how his divine compassion spread its saving mission of love and pity over the same lands, and then we wonder how it all could thus have retrograded. For the internal decay had come before the Mohammedan invasions began.

One thing is clear that history with its unerring finger records. The caste basis of ancient Hinduism, which came back full circle after the decay of the creed of the Buddha, led to fatal weakness. It is a miserable spectacle to witness the divided front which was offered a hundred times over to these perpetual Mohammedan invasions, as though the lesson of unity never could possibly be learned in spite of continual disasters. The invading forces were so small. The odds against them, if only some organic unity could have been achieved, were so great. But the result was everywhere the same. There was individual bravery among the Hindu people in abundance. There was often the sheer reckless courage of self-sacrifice. But the whole population was fissured by caste—like a mountain barrier with great chasms dividing it; and the invading host marched through. Time after time this happened, and yet the lesson could never be fully understood.

At a much later period in history we can see how this internal disruption was actually surmounted, when the Hindus who make up the Sikh community, having thrown aside caste altogether, became one united host, winning victory after victory against overwhelming odds, in their turn, against the decadent Moguls. But the secret lay in this one fact, that caste had been abandoned.

In concluding this review an extract may be taken, which gives a picture of the savage times through which this narrative of five hundred years is obliged to wade. It runs as follows:

> The army then set out on its return march to Lakhnawati, where Balban proposed to glut his revenge. On either side of the principal bazaar, a street more than two miles in length, a row of stakes was set up and the family and the adherents of Tughril were impaled on them. None of the beholders had ever seen a sight so terrible and many swooned with terror and disgust. But those who had deserted from the two armies sent against him were reserved for what was designed to be a yet more appalling spectacle at the capital.

We have not the heart any longer to impale living men and women and children today, but still the hideous barbarity of war goes on with unredeemed human misery; and it may be questioned whether the actual horrors of the "economic blockade" at the end of the World War were less tragic in their incidence of suffering than these naked brutalities of bygone days.

C. F. Andrews

In the German Manner

Class Reunion. By Franz Werfel. Translated from the German by Whittaker Chambers. Simon and Schuster. $2.

CONTEMPORARY fiction is not so completely international in tone as it is sometimes said to be, and the Germans, in particular, have developed a somber sort of romanticism peculiarly their own. In spite of all the differences between them, Werfel, Wassermann, and Thomas Mann have more in common with one another than they have with the leading novelists of any other nation, and the something which links them together belongs to a time and place. You may attribute the apparent kinship to simple literary influence, or you may, if you prefer, discover in the common element the result of that sense of defeat and guilt which tortured the post-war intellectuals of Germany. But the fact remains that the work of all three of them is colored by a dark and tempestuous mysticism. Their fables are extravagant and violent; their characters are at once gigantic and shadowy. Some spiritual cataclysm is generally their subject, and, fundamentally anti-rational, they are usually concerned with Guilt, Retribution, and Repentance considered as the most fundamentally important of human experiences.

In Mann this mysticism is intellectualized into a metaphysical system; in Wassermann it appears as something very like the Dostoevskian version of Christianity; while in Werfel it is, perhaps, rather more cloudy than in either of the others.

But though the mood is thus expressed in forms which reveal temperamental variations, each version is as conspicuously like the other as it is conspicuously unlike either the common-sense realism of the established Anglo-American school or the virtuosity of the reigning Frenchmen. A Proust or a Gide may be concerned with a realm of experience quite foreign to, for instance, a Galsworthy; but even a Proust or a Gide lives in a fundamentally rational and quite purely human world. Neither has any tinge of mysticism because neither is, like all three of these Germans, oppressed by the sense that there lies just beyond the reach of their clear perception a universe in which "spirits not themselves" fight the battle over a Good and Evil more important than anything which they can quite understand. We may call Wassermann and Werfel and Mann "romantic" because we have no more exact literary term, but their romanticism has nothing to do with the antiquarianism of a Scott, the slapdash adventurousness of a Dumas, or the erotic sentimentality of a George Sand. Actually what distinguishes them is the primarily ethical and religious character of their imagination. They are oppressed by a Sense of Sin thoroughly mystical and all but theological.

In "Class Reunion" Werfel has written a short tale of great ingenuity and considerable power. It seems that Ernest Sebastian, a magistrate, is called upon to examine a seedy journalist accused of the murder of a prostitute. Something in the name of the man—Adler, Franz—puzzles him, and he studies the face. There can be no doubt about it. Adler, Franz, is the brilliant classmate whom he had hated in the "gymnasium" for his intellectual superiority. Hastily dismissing the prisoner, Sebastian retires in confusion to his home and is overwhelmed in a torrent of guilty memory. In a sort of trance he writes (or thinks he writes) the whole night through, confessing as he has never confessed before, the intricate history of his own meanness. It was he who had first dared laugh at the eccentric Franz and he who had followed up his laughter with the persistent ridicule which finally broke the spirit of the boy and made him a pariah. Step by step, and because of his own cowardly envy, he had ruined a human soul. He remembers the moment when Franz first laughed at himself. "There was more than self-ridicule in it—there was self-annihilation. It was my laugh echoed, the laugh which had ruined him—. A work of annihilation had begun. It was to end twenty-five years later in the detention cell of a prison."

Crushed by his own guilt, by the sense of the meanness which has, in other respects also, ruled his life, Sebastian returns next day to his office and bursts out to the prisoner with a torrent of confession. But Franz Adler looks up bewildered. Actually he is not the same man at all though Sebastian has learned the fact too late. Sebastian is one of the wicked who flee when no man pursueth. Something out of the darkness has struck at last. He can hide from himself no longer. And the moral is enshrined in a phrase from Goethe: "Against the superiority of another there exists no weapon or remedy save love."

"Class Reunion" tells its story in a manner deceptively simple which succeeds, nevertheless, in maintaining a perpetual suspense and in getting the maximum of dramatic effect out of every incident. The whole work is suffused with an atmosphere of hardly definable foreboding and replete with a kind of psychological analysis which is not calm or scientific but extravagant, excited, and portentous. Perhaps there is something a little hysterical about its power, but the power to absorb and hold the attention is indubitably there. Werfel has done nothing else so consistently exciting, and nothing else which communicates more successfully his morbidly romantic sense that the soul is dark and tortuous.

The translation by Whittaker Chambers is excellent.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Leader of the Wobblies

Bill Haywood's Book. An Autobiography. International Publishers. $3.50.

BILL HAYWOOD typified the frontier in the labor movement. Though he was an internationalist and died a refugee in Moscow he was as American as the Rocky Mountains, and so was the I. W. W. with which his name is bound. That vivid left-wing labor movement was copper colored by the West. It was fathered by the Western Federation of Miners, a militant union of dispossessed pioneers who worked for the metal mine corporations when the best free land was gone and prospecting was petering out. Bill Haywood was a pioneer boy, alternately seeking gold in the hills, or homesteading, or working for wages in the mines. He joined the union at Silver City in 1896 and four years later was made general secretary-treasurer.

His book is not careful history. It rambles and misses significant organization detail. But it achieves a certain historical effect by its sharp close-ups of pioneer life and its fragmentary but dramatic narratives of the Rocky Mountain labor wars. Here are the agony and the thrills of American bull-pens, deportations, bankers' mobs, murder, martial law, and miners striking back. Bill Haywood himself, a reckless young giant, plunges with bare fists into a crowd of deputies who had assaulted President Moyer on the streets of Denver.

That early Rocky Mountain union believed in no quarter to employers who granted none. Haywood tells with pride of a strike so suddenly called that a smelter "froze" and stood years after as a monument of metal and slag to the tactics of the federation. Naturally this movement was hostile to the cautious collective bargaining and Civic Federationism of Gompers and Mitchell. So in 1905 the metal miners joined in launching a rival to the American Federation of Labor, after its own heart's desire. Haywood presided at the initial convention of the Industrial Workers of the World in Chicago.

The old man's youth recollections are freshest. The story of his more famous later years is less colorfully told. Boise gave him international celebrity. His acquittal of the charge of murdering ex-Governor Steunenberg of Idaho, the bull-pen governor of the Cœur d'Alenes, remains labor's outstanding victory over the hangman. After that "Big Bill" was always news. His triumphal European and American tours were public events. His expulsion from the Socialist Party as a direct actionist and anti-parliamentarian was of moment to the nation. Editors sharpened their pencils as he cast his fortunes again with the I.W.W., six years after the founding convention. That was the dramatic period of the I.W.W., the era of the labor revolts of Lawrence, Paterson, Little Falls, Louisiana timber, Akron rubber, with Haywood, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, Joe Ettor, Carlo Tresca, Jim Thompson, and others addressing thousands. Vincent St. John, keenest executive left-wing labor had known, a veteran of the Western Federation, was at the hub as secretary-treasurer till he went back to mining in 1915. Then Haywood succeeded him, holding the post till the war raids sent him to Leavenworth.

It is a pity his history is too exclusively a series of war-front episodes. He misses the subtle forces transforming his organizations. Why did the Western Federation fade? Not merely because Moyer went conservative, but also because the big corporations absorbed the independents who dealt with the union. Why did the I.W.W. finally fail in the industrial centers and become a migratory workers' union? Haywood does not answer, nor does he mention the changes wrought by the rank-and-file job delegate system that lessened the function and the prestige of the orator organizers.

But we have here the story of Bill Haywood, a pretty frank story in the main. When he admits his addiction to whiskey he is admitting a failing common to labor leaders at a time when much organizing was done in saloons. But it is a failing that most men would hush up. Such an admission is one of the marks of authenticity in his narrative. The sick old man evidently had much help in piecing together his random recollections. But the book is essentially his own. It should live as long as the memory of this significant American figure.

ART SHIELDS

Lobbies

Group Representation Before Congress. By E. Pendleton Herring. Johns Hopkins Press. $3.

IN America the "inherent" right to a voice in lawmaking still means primarily the right of casting a vote for a Congressman. Of all the hoary, political traditions which have survived in full bloom the most persistent is that of government by geographical representation. Even in this late day, with powerful lobbies in operation, it is heresy to question this orthodox, democratic dogma. In the face of functional movements in Europe, of national economic councils, of guild and syndicate ideas, and in the face of what is taking place in Washington today, the citizen here still clings to his eighteenth-century notion of representation. So does our passing generation of political theorists, a fact reflected in the sterility of American political thought.

What the practical American won't admit in theory, however, he follows in practice. The four hundred lobbies in Washington listed in Dr. Herring's book give ample proof of this. Millions of citizens who profess orthodox politics have strayed far from traditional democratic faith, have organized into special groups, and set up lobbies in Washington. Occupational, professional, social, and religious groups today maintain offices at the capital. As pointed out by Dr. Herring Congressmen are no longer accepted as adequate means for representing specific or even general interests. Causes and interests have outgrown local districts, have swept local Congressmen off their pedestals and jammed them into legislative committee rooms where the unorthodox representatives of the people—the lobbyists—can get at them.

Dr. Herring's work, brought out by the Institute for Government Research, is a study of the relationship between legislation and the organized interests, although most of the book is given over to a descriptive account of the outstanding interests which maintain lobbies at the capital. The chapters on lobby methods should prove interesting to the reader. The old back-door tactics have largely given way to open, above-board activities. Today publicity is the stock in trade of the successful lobby. The press, the radio, the cinema, the rostrum, and the pulpit, every medium for reaching the public, is employed by one or another of the organized groups agitating for legislation in the capital. Tons of printed matter are used in creating public sentiment to be directed against stubborn Congressmen. Home constituencies are invaded and often influential men from the home districts are brought before Congressional committees to bolster up the claims of the lobby. The Congressman, in turn, has learned to regard the lobbyist as the official spokesman of an organized group.

The author comes to the conclusion that "with proper safeguards against abuse and deception, associations promise well as a means of meeting the problems of representation that have arisen with the growing complexity of society." In his enthusiasm for economic representation the author may indeed have overestimated the "honesty" of the lobby. It is obvious that in his investigation the "open and above-board tactics" were more accessible than corrupt practices. The swing no doubt is from individual to mass persuasion, with direct bribery and corruption yielding to the more effective method of propaganda.

The chief significance of the work is its emphasis on economic representation as a supplement to Congress. The author is careful not to lean too far toward the guild plan or the syndicat with their socialistic implications. He prefers to believe rather that the American problem is not primarily that of capital and labor, but of representation in which the employer and the employee, the consumer and the producer and all the multitudinous interests of our complex society will find expression. What Europe has done by formal legislation, such as the setting-up in Germany of the Reichswirtschaftsrat, we have informally accomplished by means of the lobby. The significance of this development has been fully portrayed for the first time in this admirable study.

M. W. ROYSE

Civil War Memories

Personal Recollections of the Civil War. By John Gibbon, Brig.-Gen. U. S. A. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

DESPITE the fact that this book lacks an index and is quite inadequately edited, it is a striking and valuable addition to the long roll of Civil War narratives by the important army leaders. John Gibbon was a West Pointer, a regular army officer, a loyal North Carolinian, who was one of the best of the division and corps commanders. Its appearance so many years after the death of its author is rather extraordinary. An excellent disciplinarian who enjoyed the confidence of McClellan, Meade, and Grant, General Gibbon commanded at Gettysburg the line at which Pickett's charge was directed but was severely wounded so early in the attack that he saw relatively little of it.

As an old regular General Gibbon stresses in his narrative the heart-breaking ills and losses which followed the control of the armies by civilians in Washington and the appointment of politicians or political soldiers to high positions where their blunders cost untold misery and lives. For this Lincoln bears his share of the responsibility. General Gibbon was an ardent partisan of McClellan, whose final removal from the command after Antietam he felt to be a dreadful injury to the army and the cause. Gibbon was himself constantly in hot water with General Hancock during 1864 and became the center of several of the long series of after-the-war battles in which the surviving generals engaged. He gives an admirable picture of the dreadful slaughter in the Wilderness campaign as a result of General Grant's incessant frontal attacks on Lee's intrenchments. Finally, he was the senior officer of the board to receive the surrender of Lee's army.

Although a West Pointer and somewhat of a martinet, General Gibbon had no illusions as to his own profession. Once having to demote a raw colonel, he tried to let him down gently by pointing out the need of long instruction and experience in leaders.

> Wishing to draw a comparison based on his own experience which would convince him of this, I asked: "Now, Colonel, what was your profession before you came into the army?" To my discomfiture he replied: "I was a butcher." I did not suppose he would name a calling so nearly allied to my own but after a moment's hesitation I rallied. . . .

Today it would be treason for a general to write anything like this.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A Catholic Poet

A Rime of the Rood. By Charles L. O'Donnell, C. S. C. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.

IT is a little startling for me, as a non-Catholic, to be obliged to admit that one of the few books of beauty and power I have read in recent years is the poetry of this Catholic mystic.

What does it mean? That the Catholic dogmas of the Triune Creation and the Atonement, which are the chief inspiration and subject matter of Father O'Donnell's poetry, are true? Not at all. "What is truth?" asked Pontius Pilate, being at the moment, probably, as close to the spirit of the Man whose body he surrendered to the high priests as any other of Jesus's contemporaries. The implied answer, of course, is that truth is merely an algebraic variable; poetry, on the other hand, is an organic reality. The New Testament legend of Jesus is poetry. Father O'Donnell, being both a poet and a Catholic priest, accepts this legend. It is safe in his hands; indeed it grows and flowers, nourished by the essentially poetic devotions of all the Christian centuries of Europe.

Perhaps because, from the Catholic point of view, Father O'Donnell is in a state of grace, his book maintains a consistently high level of poetic taste, from which it rises frequently to impressive heights of intense, clear, and beautiful perception. The title poem is too long to quote. It deserves, I think, as secure a place in Catholic anthologies—or in any anthologies of English poetry for that matter—as Thompson's "The Hound of Heaven." The volume has so much variety of both form and subject matter that one is puzzled in trying to select a representative quotation. Most of the poems are in short rhymed stanzas: yet Father O'Donnell is too vigorous and sensitive, even too "modern" an artist to be mastered by the limitations of any one form. Here is the second poem in the volume, which is a fair specimen of the sure architectural line that distinguishes Father O'Donnell's experiments with free cadences:

DESIGN FOR A HOUSE

In my love, I would build you a house.
Its north wall will be God.
Its south wall will be God.
East and west you shall be walled with God.
You will need to fear no storms from the north.
Your south wall will be a sunny wall.
Dawn will stand for you, a wall of ivory growing into gold.
Your west wall will be a pearl, on fire.

Walk to the north wall forever, you will not reach it,
You will never stroke with your hands the arras that streams down the southern side:
Run eastward, infinitely, dawn will be still beyond you,
And you will be footsore indeed before ever your travel stop at the starred west wall.

In my love I would give you liberty, confining you only in the Infinite,
I would wall you up in the beauty of God,
In the reach and range of God.

I can think of nothing better I could do for you
Than build you a house, out of my love.

The vitality of the Catholic metaphysical synthesis is indeed amazing. Seemingly Catholicism has resisted the impact of twentieth-century science: yet it has survived unshattered—it has even grown. Meanwhile Protestant fundamentalism has gone down in a shameful welter of ignorance and fear, and Protestant liberalism writhes in a maze of secular rationalization. Will the Church of Rome be able to absorb science, the "False Messiah," into the extraordinary metabolism of a new world synthesis—a proper synthesis of church and state, remember—just as in the past it has absorbed the anthropomorphic rites of countless heathen gods? Probably not. Yet if there are many minds as good as Father O'Donnell's in the church, such speculations are perhaps not wholly absurd.

Father O'Donnell's volume is panoplied with the nihil obstat of Arthur J. Scanlon, censor librorum, the imprimatur of Archbishop Hayes, and the cum permissu superiorum of J. W. Donohue, Superior-General, C. S. C. This is in itself impressive. If one waits long enough, I suppose, one may expect the collected works of E. A. Robinson to come out with the imprimatur of the Federal Council of Churches in America. . . . Well, why not?

JAMES RORTY

The New Miasmal Mist

Religion. By Edward Scribner Ames. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

DESPITE the excellent and often quoted advice which Jesus gave on the matter of putting new wine in old bottles, even the most radical of religionists usually devote a considerable portion of their time to preserving as many elements as possible of conventional Christian terminology. From Episcopalians who want to recite the Apostles' Creed with their fingers crossed to Unitarians who talk about God and prayer while practicing a humanistic agnosticism, the so-called modernists rationalize in a dozen different ways their habit of saying one thing and meaning another.

Of the various devices for keeping the language while discarding the doctrines of theism, perhaps the most ingenious is that expounded by Professor Ames of the University of Chicago, who maintains that God symbolizes the spirit of the world in the sense that Uncle Sam symbolizes the spirit of this country or Alma Mater symbolizes the spirit of a college. "The term God," he writes, "expresses order and purpose and moral values in the great Reality which we call Life or the World. Reality conceived as friendly, as furnishing support for man's existence and for the realization of ideal ends, is God."

This doctrine proves less than satisfactory to orthodox theologians, who sometimes scoffingly designate it as the Uncle Sam theory of God. It must also, it seems to me, fail to commend itself to most of those who, like Professor Ames, cannot accept conventional theism. Certainly the universe is not wholly unfriendly to men, any more than it is wholly unfriendly to squirrels, for both men and squirrels manage to survive. Nor is it disputable that some ends which some people thought to be ideal have been realized in the past. But there is no apparent reason why we should not also, with equal justice and in practically the same way, conceive of reality as hostile. We might have many gods as easily as one, and we are almost forced to have a devil. Professor Ames cannot eat his cake and have it too: either God is reality, which he seems unwilling to admit, or God is merely an "aspect" of reality, which is to say that he is no God at all.

One balks at Professor Ames's arguments, and yet one cannot fail to sympathize with his attempt to preserve the value of religion to society. The book pleads sincerely for social justice, for a spirit of brotherhood, for the development of the kind of character that will create a better type of civilization. Leave out the theological jargon, and there is little reason to object to the book.

Mr. Ames apparently feels that his ideal ends can be served only if they are associated with what people have commonly regarded as religious conceptions. To some extent he is right: the notion that atheism and wickedness go hand in hand is still so prevalent that humanism is almost forced to seek some form of smoke-screen. But I believe that the price in muddled thinking is, in the long run, too great to pay even for this useful protection.

If we believe that religious systems of the past grew out of, expressed, and perpetuated certain values which it is essential to preserve, let us make the rigorous effort necessary to separate the sound from the unsound, instead of juggling language. How would it be if the terms God and religion were barred from ethical and philosophical discourse for a period of perhaps twenty years? I make the suggestion seriously and not irreverently. The gain in lucidity of thought and charity of conduct might be tremendous. One would not expect a fundamentalist or even the average modernist to participate in the experiment, but could not Professor Ames be persuaded to lend a hand?

GRANVILLE HICKS

Antiquated Legalism

Studies in International Law and Relations. By A. Pearce Higgins. The Macmillan Company. $5.

WE are here offered by the Whewell Professor of International Law at the University of Cambridge a revised reproduction of lectures, addresses, and magazine articles of the period between 1909 and 1927. The topics discussed include International Relations and International Law, Some Difficulties in International Relations, The Duties of States, The Papacy and International Law, The Monroe Doctrine, The Work of Grotius and of the Modern International Lawyer, and Locarno Treaties. The remaining titles relate to questions of war law, to indulge in a contradictory term, and make up a full half of the work.

It is fair to say that the portion of the book of which we have given the titles represents Professor Higgins's latest and at the same time best thought. His discussion of the Monroe Doctrine is balanced, temperate, and informing and, despite his manifest Conservative Party leanings, his description of the Locarno pacts is useful. Often he stresses the fact that the duties of states rather than their rights should be given emphasis, but we are left with a regret that he has not explained with sufficient fulness what he understands by duties and the fundamental reasons for their existence.

Generally speaking Professor Higgins illustrates in his own person what he regards as "a tendency on the part of writers to follow the beaten track of their predecessors," in considering international law, and he shows that he believes, as he says, that "in many ways this has not been altogether a bad plan." Perhaps as good an illustration as any that he is a follower instead of a leader is shown by his statement that "situations sometimes arise in which the acceptance of peace would be felt by a nation to be an intolerable humiliation, and when a state would have no alternative but war to preserve its legitimate self-respect and dignity." In essence the same language was used by Lord Russell when he refused to arbitrate the Alabama claims on the theory that the honor of England forbade it. Nevertheless England preserved honor through arbitration.

In this statement Professor Higgins not only follows the "beaten track" of his "predecessors" but neglects an analysis of the real situation. For in truth how can the self-respect and dignity of a state be assailed? A state is but a machine for carrying out the interests of its inhabitants, and machines are incapable of giving or receiving insults and possess no self-respect. As well might one in the material world accuse a monotype of insulting a linotype typesetting machine. If instead of "state" Professor Higgins means the people who control or who are represented by the machine then we have to say that his doctrine is not that which society tolerates in its bosom, for dueling is now almost universally rejected and dignity and self-respect have not appreciably suffered because of such rejection. There are today courts to which states or their managers can appeal if in truth they have been injured. There is no use in repeating in 1928 words which were not well founded in right, though more understandable, in 1914.

Unfortunately Professor Higgins appears to live too much in the past. As late as in 1927 he told the University of Illinois that "the principles of naval warfare are in many respects different from those of land warfare." In so saying he ignored the vital difference between principles and practices; the World War demonstrated for, perhaps, the thousandth time that there were no principles pertaining to either land or sea warfare.

In another important respect we venture to suggest that Professor Higgins has erred. He reprints in 1928 an address to the London School of Economics and Political Science in 1914 wherein he reproached Germany for violating treaties and international law in invading Belgium. The reproach was well founded. Today it should be tempered by the knowledge that England and her Allies bought Italy's entrance into the war and imitated at Saloniki the primal German offense against Belgium.

It is also to be regretted that Professor Higgins largely devotes his abilities to a consideration of problems of naval warfare, discussing matters likely to have little or no place in possible future international encounters. To what advantage is it to devote two chapters to Defensively Armed Merchant Vessels in an era of the airplane and bombs?

JACKSON H. RALSTON

A Cultural Vagabondage

Thru

Soviet Russia

with MICHAEL GOLD

via

LONDON · COPENHAGEN · HELSINFORS
and 10 days in LENINGRAD and MOSCOW

To study the new theatres in the Soviet Union—Interviews and talks with Eisenstein, Mayakowsky, Lunacharsky and other noted writers, producers and directors.

SAILING—SEPT. 18—on the Berengaria $488

Inquire:

175 Fifth Ave.
Flatiron Bldg.
NEW YORK

WORLD TOURISTS INC.

Telephone
ALGONQUIN
6656

CHICAGO · MOSCOW · TOKIO

Books in Brief

An Anthology of Revolutionary Poetry. Compiled and Edited by Marcus Graham. With an Introduction by Ralph Cheyney and Lucia Trent. First Limited Edition. Active Press. $3.

Mr. Graham is an anarchist, and so has built his very impressive anthology around the idea—or the impulse—of freedom. Thus he includes poems by Shakespeare, Shelley, and Blake that a communist editor might have missed, and thus his book gives a warm and interesting impression of himself. Yet it covers other revolutionary ground, too, and does not hesitate to enter the field of vegetarianism. Altogether it is the best and most copious collection of radical verse so far made. That much of this verse is bad is declared by Ralph Cheyney and Lucia Trent in their introduction not to matter. It does, however, to the extent that bad verse is ineffectual. If the world is to be saved by poetry, let the poetry be good. Otherwise we shall have too long to wait.

The Older Woman in Industry. By Johanna Lobsenz. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

We are beginning to realize the difficulties of the older woman who has no specialized ability to offer the business world and who has lost the very important appeal of youth. There appears to be a definite tendency in business to set up barriers against the older person, whether man or woman, and to make all the presumptions in favor of the young. That this can work genuine hardship to the employee and loss to the employer is undoubted. Mrs. Lobsenz has confined her survey to Manhattan and to a consideration of the woman of thirty-five and over in industry, general office work, selling, and domestic work. She has turned up some exceedingly interesting material, though it is significant of the extraordinarily careless organization of industry that she could get so little exact material on the subject of turnover. Turnover figures appear to be kept generally in an undiscriminated mass that permits no analysis according to sex and age groups. Mrs. Lobsenz contends that the older woman saves industry thousands of dollars because of a lessened tendency to shift jobs. She also shows that the importance of higher insurance rates for older employees is very much less in actual cost than personnel managers sometimes think. She has made a valuable attack upon an important problem, in a field in which she must have encountered many difficulties as an investigator.

The History of Biology. By Erik Nordenskiöld. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.

In this day of the new history it is discouraging to find the great need for an analytical history of biology capitalized by a chronological list of Who's Who biographies. Erik Nordenskiöld, as docent in the University of Helsingfors, gave a course of lectures (1916-1917). These he made into a book (1920-1924) which now appears in English. The differences between this book and an encyclopedia of biologists lie in the abandonment of the alphabetical order, in the omission of many distinguished names, and in the presence of connecting paragraphs. The author's interest is clearly philosophical; vitalism versus mechanism is his chief problem. What a man thinks is emphasized more than what he discovers. The circulation of the blood is the only discovery honored with a chapter; and in discussing this work, "the most revolutionary that the development of biology has to show," nothing is said of how this discovery was made nor of why Harvey was the one to inaugurate the science of biology. Yet it is his method of experimentation that is said to mark the epoch and separate ancient from modern. Instead of revealing the grand crescendo of accelerating penetration into the ways of life, we are given the wraith of philosophical juggling which sways futilely hither and yon through the centuries with no consciousness of the enormous advances and activity that characterize the present. The biographies have been selected and brought together with scholarly dignity and laborious care.

The Strange Adventure. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

Mrs. Rinehart has written the story of an intelligent, sensitive girl born in the days when women wore corsets mentally and physically. Being the daughter of an American aristocrat and a vaudeville artiste, she is aware subconsciously of her tight lacing. Her husband is unworthy of her, and she refuses escape with her peer, because that would entail the loss of her only son. She loses the son imaginatively in the last war and actually in a wife. "The Strange Adventure" is her life. If it really was tragic, Mrs. Rinehart fails to be convincing. The book has all the qualities of a Victorian drawing-room. It is full of knick-knacks and what-nots, and the furniture is plush. Those who like plush can sink in it comfortably.

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

ONE WEEK ONLY! Starting this Sat. July 27

TRIPLE - FEATURE PROGRAM

1 THE PRINCE OF ROGUES (First Showing) a thrilling drama of the daring exploits of the German "Robin Hood."

2 LIFE of BEETHOVEN authentic screen-biography taken in the actual locales—with a remarkable characterization by Fritz Kortner.

An event for every music-lover!

3 SO THIS IS PARIS! sophisticated, scintillating high comedy minted by the subtle direction of LUBITSCH

Film Guild Cinema

52 West 8th Street

Just West of 5th Ave.

Spring 5095-5090

Continuous Daily 2 p.m. to Midnight

Last 3 Days — Wed., Thurs., Fri., July 24-25-26— JOHN BARRYMORE in "DR. JEKYLL AND MR. HYDE" & "FIGHTING FOR THE FATHERLAND"

GILBERT MILLER

(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)

presents

Journey's End

By R. C. Sheriff

HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street

Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

International Relations Section

The Manchurian Crisis

THE present struggle between Russia and China for control of the Chinese Eastern Railway in Northern Manchuria involves many difficult points of international law which can be understood only in the light of the agreements made between the two governments in 1924. Russia and China, on May 31, 1924, signed a preliminary agreement on general principles for the settlement of disputes and stipulated that a conference should be held within one month to carry out detailed arrangements. The clauses concerning the Chinese Eastern Railway in the preliminary agreement are as follows:

1. The Governments of the two Contracting Parties declare that the Chinese Eastern Railway is a purely commercial enterprise.

The Governments of the two Contracting Parties mutually declare that with the exception of matters pertaining to the business operations which are under the direct control of the Chinese Eastern Railway, all other matters affecting the rights of the National and the Local Governments of the Republic of China—such as judicial matters, matters relating to civil administration, military administration, police, municipal government, taxation, and landed property (with the exception of lands required by the said railway)—shall be administered by the Chinese Authorities.

2. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to the redemption by the Government of the Republic of China, with Chinese capital, of the Chinese Eastern Railway, as well as all appurtenant properties, and to the transfer to China of all shares and bonds of the said Railway.

3. The Governments of the two Contracting Parties shall settle at the Conference as provided in Article II of the present Agreement the amount and conditions governing the redemption as well as the procedure for the transfer of the Chinese Eastern Railway.

4. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees to be responsible for the entire claims of the shareholders, bondholders, and creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway incurred prior to the Revolution of March 9, 1917.

5. The Governments of the two Contracting Parties mutually agree that the future of the Chinese Eastern Railway shall be determined by the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, to the exclusion of any third party or parties.

6. The Governments of the two Contracting Parties agree to draw up an arrangement for the provisional management of the Chinese Eastern Railway.

7. Until the various questions relating to the Chinese Eastern Railway are settled at the Conference as provided in Article II of the present Agreement, the rights of the two governments arising out of the Contract of August 27-September 8, 1896, for the Construction and Operation of the Chinese Eastern Railway, which do not conflict with the present agreement and the Agreement for the Provisional Management of the said Railway and which do not prejudice China's rights of sovereignty, shall be maintained.

One clause in this general agreement is now being cited by the Chinese to justify their claim that Russia has broken the treaty:

ARTICLE VI. The Governments of the two Contracting Parties mutually pledge themselves not to permit, within their respective territories, the existence and/or activities of any organizations or groups whose aim is to struggle by acts of violence against the Governments of either Contracting Party.

The Governments of the two Contracting Parties further pledge themselves not to engage in propaganda directed against the political and social systems of either Contracting Party.

In accordance with this treaty an agreement was made for the provisional management of the Chinese Eastern Railway which contained the following main provisions:

ARTICLE I. The Railway shall establish, for discussion and decision of all matters relative to the Chinese Eastern Railway, a Board of Directors to be composed of ten persons, of whom five shall be appointed by the Government of the Republic of China and five by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

ART. II. The Railway shall establish a Board of Auditors to be composed of five persons, namely, two Chinese Auditors who shall be appointed by the Government of the Republic of China, and three Russian Auditors who shall be appointed by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

ART. III. The Railway shall have a Manager who shall be a national of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and two Assistant Managers, one to be a national of the Republic of China and the other to be a national of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

ART. IV. The Chiefs and Assistant Chiefs of the various Departments of the Railway shall be appointed by the Board of Directors.

If the Chief of Department is a national of the Republic of China, the Assistant Chief of Department shall be a national of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and if the Chief of Department is a national of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Assistant Chief of Department shall be a national of the Republic of China.

ART. V. The employment of persons in the various departments of the Railway shall be in accordance with the principle of equal representation between the nationals of the Republic of China and those of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

ART. VI. With the exception of the estimates and budgets, as provided in Article VII of the present Agreement, all other matters on which the Board of Directors cannot reach an agreement shall be referred for settlement to the Governments of the Contracting Parties.

ART. VII. The Board of Directors shall present the estimates and budgets of the Railway to a joint meeting of the Board of Directors and the Board of Auditors for consideration and approval.

ART. VIII. All the net profits of the Railway shall be held by the Board of Directors and shall not be used pending a final settlement of the question of the present Railway.

ART. IX. The Board of Directors shall revise as soon as possible the statutes of the Chinese Eastern Railway Company, approved on December 4, 1896, by the Czarist Government, in accordance with the present Agreement and the Agreement on General Principles for the Settlement of the Questions between the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of May 31, 1924, and in any case, not later than six months from the date of the constitution of the Board of Directors.

ART. X. The present Agreement shall cease to have effect as soon as the question of the Chinese Eastern Railway is finally settled at the Conference as provided in Article II of the Agreement on General Principles for the Settlement of the Questions between the Republic of China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of May 31, 1924.

Contributors to This Issue

ROY VEATCH, as fellow at Robert Brookings Graduate School of Government and Economics, has made a special study of the finances of Santo Domingo.

BENJAMIN B. KENDRICK, SR., is professor of history and political science at the North Carolina College for Women.

S. K. RATCLIFFE is an English journalist, now on the staff of the New Statesman.

EDWARD HOPE conducts a column, The Lantern, in the New York Herald Tribune.

MARK VAN DOREN is author of "Now the Sky and Other Poems," and editor of "An Anthology of World Poetry."

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

C. F. ANDREWS, who has lived more than fifteen years among the villages of Bengal, is connected with the Tagore School in India.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is dramatic editor of The Nation.

ART SHIELDS is Southern representative for the Federated Press.

M. W. ROYSE teaches government at the College of the City of New York.

JAMES RORTY is the author of "Children of the Sun."

GRANVILLE HICKS was formerly on the faculty of Smith College.

JACKSON H. RALSTON is a lawyer of California and author of "Law and Procedure of International Tribunals."

The Bible
The Christ

By John E. Remsburg

These two comprehensive, scholarly works contain a most thorough, systematic exposition of the character and contents of the Jewish-Christian Bible. Cloth bound; 500 pages each. Price, postpaid: $2.50 each.

Anti-religious tracts and book catalogue FREE

ATHEIST BOOK STORE
119 E. 14th St. New York City

FEUERBACH
The Roots of the Socialist Philosophy By Frederick Engels
This book is not a mere story of philosophy but is an able analysis of the various schools of thought by a great thinker. The fundamental dividing line between the materialists, agnostics and the idealists is here presented in a clear and convincing manner. In this day of sensationalist nonsense this book is a great treasure.
Cloth 60 cents postpaid

HOW THE GODS WERE MADE
A study in Historical Materialism By John Keracher
Just off the Press! The most concise, scientific explanation of the god-idea yet published in pamphlet form. It is far sounder than the usual rationalistic explanation of religious phenomena. It is written from the sound viewpoint of historical materialism.
25 cents postpaid
Charles H. Kerr Co., 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago, Ill.

WHEN changing your address for the summer, please be sure to send your old as well as your new address, and allow about two weeks for the change to be made.
Circulation Dept., THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

OPEN SHELF

BEHIND THE SCENES IN THE SACCO-VANZETTI CASE
Many hitherto unpublished facts and poems about this great tragedy will be revealed in the August Issue of Road to Freedom.
The only English Anarchist Monthly in America.
P. O. Box 486 Madison Sq. Sta., N. Y.
Also on the more important newsstands.

LECTURES

the songlore society, 263 W. 11th St. at 8:30 every sunday evening presents daca, composer and chansonneur, in songlore lecture recitals. exit fee $1. tickets 63 washington sq. and 88 greenwich ave.

EDUCATIONAL

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN
Short course. Conversational methods. Experienced native teachers. Daily 8 to 9.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
75c a lesson 1264 LEXINGTON AVE., Bet. 85th and 86th Sts., N. Y.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISERS:
Mail your classified ads so they reach us Friday, to insure their appearance in the issue of THE NATION on the stands the following Thursday.
Rates: $3.08 for one-half inch (30 words) minimum. Additional lines of 6 words 62 cents each. Please accompany order with remittance.
THE NATION 20 Vesey St., N. Y.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SUMMER

Trout Lake Camp

An Ideal Camp for Adults

On Trout Lake, In the Adirondacks

Tennis Golfing
Horseback Canoeing
Handball Dancing
Basketball Hiking
Baseball Fishing

Splendid Social and Athletic Staff

Unsurpassed Cuisine

Write for Souvenir Booklet

City Office
489 Fifth Ave., Room 409
Tel. Vanderbilt 4197

P. O. Lake George, New York

PEP!

ON TROUT LAKE

3 miles of crystal-clear water.

Accommodations offer every modern convenience.

Every sport encouraged by splendid facilities.

Unsurpassed Cuisine, Dietary Laws.

Write for Souvenir Booklet

SCOPUS

An Adult Camp of Distinction
IN THE ADIRONDACKS
P. O. LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.
City Address
11 WEST 42nd STREET
Longacre 3411

SECOR LAKE LODGE

on beautiful Secor Lake, N. Y.

One of the few large lakes within 50 miles of New York. Well stocked with game fish.

An ideal summer camp with excellent facilities for BATHING, BOATING, FISHING, TENNIS

$30 Weekly—Weekends $6 daily

Particular attention paid to menu

Guests met at Lake Mahopac station, N. Y. Central. Write or phone for booklet

SECOR LAKE LODGE
Mahopac Falls, N. Y.
Mahopac 175F3 City: Riverside 9499

IDEAL OF SMALL CAMPS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

A Camp for Adults in the ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE

A Glorious Vacation

Seven clay tennis courts
GOLF—FISHING
Capacity limited to 150

N. Y. Office 33 W. 42 St.
PENnsylvania 8313
R. B. NUDELL
A. B. SILVER

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

Brushy Mountain Lodge

E. Stroudsburg, Pa.
In the Heart of the Pocono Mtns.

Nature's Fairyland
A combination of camp and hotel.
Refined Surroundings.
Dietary Laws Observed.
Tennis, Dancing, Swimming Pool, etc.
Golf Nearby.

Write for booklet or Telephone Stroudsburg 61-R-4

Dance! Laugh! Play!

In this glorious Mountain-Lake country.

Special events all [illegible] in celebration of our 10th anniversary.

Camp Sports in a Setting of Hotel Comforts

Write for descriptive booklet "N"

NEW MODERN BUILDINGS

KENMORE

North White Lake, N. Y.
Station: Liberty
N. Y. Office: 182 Fifth Ave.

For a glorious September vacation in the Heart of the Adirondacks

TIMBERLAND

Pottersville New York

Where Congenial Folk Gather

Accommodations in Bungalows—modern in every respect.

Excellent Sport Facilities

TENNIS — HANDBALL — GOLF — SADDLE HORSES — WATER SPORTS. SOCIAL ACTIVITIES and DANCING.

Directors	N. Y. Office
ESTHER R. KESSLER	33 WEST 42ND ST.
MORRIS HARKAVY	PENNSYLVANIA 7663

For reservations apply to N. Y. office.

Booklet on request

INDIAN HEAD

on Echo Lake, Warrensburg, N. Y.
AN IDEAL CAMP FOR ADULTS

Swimming Baseball
Fishing Tennis
Canoeing Basketball
Rowing Handball
Dancing Horseback

Take Albany Night Boat on any Saturday night and meet our Sight Seeing Bus at the Albany Pier, which will transport you to camp without any extra charge, passing through Albany, Schenectady, Saratoga, Glen Falls, and Warrensburg.

Booklet on Request

New York Address:
885 Brook Ave.,
Bronx, N. Y.
Tel. Melrose 1821

Camp Address:
Warrensburg, N. Y.
Tel. Warrensburg 198

PIONEER LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults

Near Thousand Islands

Limited to Seventy-five . . Has all Conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows . . All Sports . . Boating on Large Lake . . Golf Within Fifteen minutes' Walk . . Rate $30 per Week.

Accessible over night by N. Y. Central

STAR LAKE, N. Y.
ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY

N. Y. CITY OFFICE
977 FOX [illegible]
DAYTON 8752

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 7, 1929 No. 3344

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 129
EDITORIALS:
- Peace Pact and Disarmament 132
- Fashions in Food 133
- Panama Awaits the Ax 133
- This Lawless Nation 134

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 135
A LICENSE TO STEAL. By William C. Murphy, Jr. 136
THE CHINESE AND THE CHINESE EASTERN. By E. K. Moy .. 138
THE U.S.S.R. AND THE CHINESE EASTERN. By Harold Kellock 140
VERNON LOUIS PARRINGTON. By Russell Blankenship 141
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 143
CORRESPONDENCE 143
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 144
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
- Fiddler's Green. By Audrey Wurdemann 145
- Loneliness. By Eda Lou Walton 145
- Mary Webb. By Alice Beal Parsons 145
- Poor Law. By J. A. Hobson 146
- The Mysterious Aborigine. By Anita Brenner 146
- An Old-Fashioned Tyrant. By William MacDonald 147
- A Popular Moralist. By William Seagle 148
- Lincoln's Family. By Luther Emerson Robinson 148
- Lyrics of a Feather. By Eda Lou Walton 150
- Fiction Briefs 151

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Bethlehem, Britain, and the Chinese Navy. By K. K. Kawakami .. 152

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

IN THIS DAY OF RECORDS the fact which the public will note chiefly in connection with the return of Aristide Briand to the helm in France is that it is his twelfth time as Premier. While the sporting almanacs give no statistics on the subject, we imagine that Briand's performance must be the record for all weights and classes. And Briand's capacity to be Johnny-on-the-spot whenever there is a premiership vacant is in a way the best clue to his political significance. For while he may not be all things to all men, he has at least been many things to many men. Entering politics as a radical, he gradually took a more "practical" position, and he has been too busy as a small politician ever to become a great statesman. Yet his mobility has been of service. He has worked with his ear to the ground, but his hearing has been attuned to some of the finer sounds as well as the opportunist cat-calls of the mob. Thus he was able to bring about the agreements of Locarno, and he suggested (as a pact between France and this country) the anti-war treaties which on this side of the Atlantic have been baptized with the name of ex-Secretary Kellogg. He can be counted upon to continue his work for peace. Raymond Poincaré, the retiring Premier, is a type almost the opposite of Briand. Poincaré has been one thing to all men always—a hard-headed conservative nationalist. His intransigence had much to do with bringing about the post-war economic havoc both in Germany and France, but it must be admitted that his views had grown somewhat saner lately, and undoubtedly he is entitled to the chief credit for stabilizing France's currency. Clemenceau once said: "Poincaré knows everything and understands nothing; Briand knows nothing and understands everything."

WHEN THE SINO-RUSSIAN word-bombs were bursting in mid-air, and hostilities seemed inevitable, Secretary Stimson almost forgot that his predecessors had unanimously declared that it was impossible to deal with the Russians. There was a threat of war, and he did his best to prevent its realization. Unfortunately, since we had no direct relations with Soviet Russia, he had to negotiate through France, and a certain awkwardness seems to have resulted. No one seems yet to be sure whether the French transmitted Mr. Stimson's message as a billet-doux from Washington or acted as of their own initiative. As far as world peace goes, it does not matter; the important point was to get the message to Stalin. In the light of this incident how silly our stubborn policy of non-recognition seems! Soviet Russia is a part of the world, and when a crisis comes there is no alternative to dealing with its Bolshevik rulers. They exist; they cannot be ignored, however little one may like them. Mr. Stimson acted sanely in sending his message to them; now will he not admit that the same government which exists in time of crisis exists in calm days too? It would be a healthy thing if Washington could get over its new-fangled habit of exercising censorship over the morals of foreign governments. It seems to us that it is the State Department's business to deal with any government which another people is willing to tolerate, whether it be tory, socialist, or communist, republican, fascist, or monarchical. Meanwhile, the tension between China and Russia has relaxed, a neutral zone on the Manchurian border has been created by the retirement of Chinese and Russian troops, and there are prospects of direct negotiations between the two governments.

RAMSAY MACDONALD, by virtually forcing the resignation of Lord Lloyd, the high-handed tory High Commissioner in Egypt, suggests that he intends to inaugurate a new era in Anglo-Egyptian relations. That will not be easy, as he discovered in his first term in office, in 1924, for British opinion is fairly solid behind the unilateral declaration of February 28, 1922, and Egypt is as solid against it. In that declaration the British recognized Egypt as an "independent, sovereign state" but "absolutely reserved to the discretion of His Majesty's Government" the four questions of the protection of the Suez Canal, the defense of Egypt, the protection of foreign interests in Egypt, and the Sudan. Zaglul Pasha, the veteran Nationalist leader, then Prime Minister, demanded the withdrawal of Britain's army, financial, and judicial advisers; control of foreign relations and control over foreigners in Egypt; a share in protection of the canal; and an Egyptian Sudan. Zaglul and MacDonald met, but while both were prepared to be friendly—something new in British-Egyptian relations—neither was prepared to compromise. After MacDonald's fall things went from bad to worse. Following the assassination of Sir Lee Stack, the commander-in-chief of the "Egyptian" army, in November, 1924, the tory Government of Britain sent a twenty-four-hour ultimatum, accompanied by a regiment of cavalry, to demand apologies, suppression of "all popular political demonstrations," a fine of $2,500,000, withdrawal of Egyptian troops from the Sudan, and cessation of all opposition to British control. When Egypt hesitated, the British drove the Egyptians out of the Sudan and occupied the customs house at Alexandria. Zaglul resigned, Parliament was dismissed, and a puppet dictator was installed by the British to carry out their orders. Finally, at Lord Lloyd's order, the constitution was suspended for three years. Now the High Commissioner is to be changed, but is the Government ready to make real, substantial concessions to the Egyptians' demand for sovereignty in their own land?

BRITAIN'S LABOR GOVERNMENT will do its best to settle the grievances which lie behind the great strike and lockout of half a million cotton-mill workers in Lancashire, but it is difficult to see how it can do more than effect a temporary compromise. The depression in the Lancashire mills is part of an international situation beyond its control, and the employers and workers are both victims of that situation. The British textile industry has been depressed for a long time because its ascendancy in the world market was lost after the war. The Lancashire workers can scarcely keep alive if they accept the entire 12½ per cent wage-cut that the employers demand, but they seem doomed to accept part of that cut or go without work. Meanwhile, in our Southern States, strikes of cotton-mill workers multiply with increasing prospects of success in lifting the labor standards of the industry. A strike in Ware Shoals, South Carolina, has ended in defeat after a brave fight by the workers against the owners, the State militia, and an anti-labor governor; but in Marion, North Carolina, the strike of 700 cotton-mill workers against the Marion Manufacturing Company was continuing vigorously as this issue of The Nation went to press. Under the leadership of the United Textile Workers of the American Federation of Labor the strikers were fighting for the reinstatement of twenty-two discharged union members and for the ten-hour day in place of the eleven and twelve-hour shift. R. W. Baldwin, president of the company and one of the most loudly philanthropic of Southern textile manufacturers, was recently struck on the head while leading some strikebreakers to his mill. Seventeen strikers were placed under bail, charged with conspiracy to commit murder.

THE POLICY OF THE FARM BOARD is rapidly being made clear. Its theory was set forth by the chairman, Alexander Legge, in his address before the American Institute of Cooperation at Baton Rouge on July 30. Agriculture, he declares, is not keeping pace with other industries because "agriculture has operated as an individual enterprise competing with organized effort in other industries —individual action and planning as compared with collective thinking and action." The present trouble with agriculture, he holds, is largely a matter of marketing, and he states the central feature of the board's program thus: "The board believes that it can be of great assistance to the American farmers by encouraging the development of large-scale, central cooperative organizations." The records of the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Legge states, show that 2,000,000 farmers, or nearly one-third of the total, already belong to the 12,500 existing cooperative associations, and he hopes that by developing the activities of these organizations it may be possible in time to control surplus production and to stabilize marketing conditions. As a first step in the board's program, it has already arranged for the formation of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, a central marketing organization with an initial capital of $10,000,000. The fifty-two officials of existing farm organizations who met with the board at the organizing meeting included leaders of the farm revolt at last year's Republican convention, so one purpose of the Farm Relief Act is in way of attainment. American agricultural history is not too reassuring as to the possibilities of cooperative effort among farmers, but it will be interesting, at any rate, to see what the application of big-business methods to agricultural marketing can accomplish.

TARIFF LAWS, as they are written under our system, are always so full of mischiefs that one can scarcely keep track of them. The flexible provision so dear to the heart of Matthew Woll, formerly of the labor movement, now of the National Civic Federation, in the hands of a protectionist President is in fact just a device for the further raising of particular duties, as Messrs. Coolidge and Hoover have shown plainly enough. The proposals of the House bill concerning methods of valuing imports are no less mischievous. If they are accepted, customs officials will have power to determine the basis of valuation in any given case, and there will be no appeal except to the Secretary of the Treasury. In practice, under this arrangement, the customs officials might substitute American for foreign valuations, thus raising sharply the duties payable without any change of rates. In some cases there are sound reasons for using the American valuation, and we give the framers of the bill credit for having them in mind; but the tariff vultures, it ought to be remembered, long ago scented fresh carrion hidden under this valuation cover, and if the change is made it is safe to say they will see to it that they get some choice morsels. The Association of the Customs Bar two months ago protested against the proposal on the ground that by making the Secretary of the Treasury the final authority it would deprive the importer of the right of judicial review. We protest against it on the ground that it is all too likely to mean a further jacking up of duties.

THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE has clarified the question of what one must swear to in order to get a passport by a letter written in reply to criticism of the oath which Dorothy Detzer, executive secretary of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, was allowed to take. Miss Detzer refused to promise to "defend" the Constitution if by that the bearing of arms or assistance in war was implied. So she was allowed to take an oath to "support" the Constitution, according to the form that was used for Roger N. Baldwin in 1926. This modification is justified by the Department of State by pointing out that the oath administered to one receiving a passport does not rest on the same legal basis as that required of one applying for citizenship. In the latter case the oath is prescribed in the law, but there is no act of Congress requiring a statement of allegiance in connection with a passport. The practice of the Department of State in asking for an oath of allegiance is based solely on an executive order, but no particular form has been insisted upon. Evidently, therefore, anyone is justified in asking for a modification of the usual form and probably would be within his legal rights in insisting upon a passport without taking an oath at all.

IN THE GENERAL CHORUS of rejoicing over President Hoover's action for disarmament, Paul V. McNutt, commander of the American Legion, of course sounded a discordant note. The Legion, he declares in a telegram to the President, opposes any action which will prevent the United States from regaining "its lost naval parity with Great Britain"—whatever that may be. Senator Brookhart takes issue with Mr. McNutt's protest in vigorous fashion, and in so doing calls attention to an important truth about the body of the Legion as compared with its officers. Mr. McNutt, he asserts, in his picturesque way, is "merely representing a little bloodthirsty coterie at the head of the Legion, which has become the chief propagandist of the war profiteers." "Resolutions," he declares, "are usually . . . indorsed by a small number of organized delegates . . . and they never represent the Legion membership in its sober judgment." The Legion manages to be unfailingly wrong officially on important questions. We are likely to forget that its officers are—the kind of men who get to be officers of a semi-social patriotic organization. They manage, then, to put the whole weight of their organization behind their own short-sighted views of national policy, while in fact the membership contains about the same proportion of intelligent and thoughtful young men as any other rank-and-file group. Official statements of the American Legion are pretty much an unqualified nuisance, and it is a great pity that there are no means of making vocal the ideas of the intelligent unofficial membership.

OUR FIRST PRIZE for golden deeds goes this week to the Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut, which in one decision has voided 1,493 laws, a substantial part of the legislative crop of the State for the past ten years. The State constitution provides that in order to be valid an act of the legislature must be signed within three days of the adjournment of that body, but the passion of Connecticut legislators to make the citizens wise and pure and good has been such that they have piled a prodigious heap of would-be law on the Governor's desk in the closing days of recent sessions, and through a bit of that legal legerdemain which is so excellent a lubricant for the wheels of government the last four chief executives of the State have all disregarded the time limit in signing many bills. Now the Supreme Court of Errors has called the practice unconstitutional, and bang go 1,493 hand-tailored, full-fashioned, glove-fitting, only slightly worn statutes. We commend this splendid constructive step of the Nutmeg high tribunal to President Hoover's commission on law enforcement. Nothing is better calculated to simplify law observance than not having any laws to observe. If the high courts of all the States would follow the Connecticut example, what a blessing it would be! And if legislatures would cease to enact most of their legislation, how much better still it would be! Then the commission on law enforcement might wind the clock, put out the cat, and go to sleep. It is practically impossible to violate an unenacted act.

FRANCE SAVED her international lawn-tennis championship by winning the Davis Cup challenge round in Paris, three matches to two, but the Americans made so brave a bid for the laurels that they emerged with new glory. In the years since Dwight F. Davis first presented the cup for international competition tennis has become well-nigh the most universal of sports and the Davis Cup matches include almost every modernized nation of the world. Around the matches have developed such traditions of fair play and sportsmanship that Tilden and Hunter received more applause in Berlin than Moldenhauer and Prenn, and the French crowds cheered every effort of George Lott in his deciding match against Cochet as if he were the defender of the tri-color. The heartiest cheers of all this year are due to William T. Tilden, who closed his brilliant career as an internationalist by defeating Jean Borotra. Perhaps there will be greater tennis players than Tilden, but we doubt if there will ever be one who combines his speed and strategy with the histrionic ability to make every court a stage. In spite of some derogatory newspaper comment, Tilden leaves international tennis, at the age of thirty-six, still the third ranking player of the world and probably capable of winning our national championship several more times if he cares to try for it. The only thing that may darken Tilden's retirement as an internationalist is the thought that the United States might have captured the Davis Cup by a score of three to two if the American committee had played Hunter instead of Lott against Borotra.

FOR GENTLEMEN who cannot spend the month with endurance fliers or with the Byrd expedition we suggest pajamas. It is time that these faithful garments were rescued from the outer fringes of undress where they have been consigned. Why the police should rate them lower than pants is beyond our comprehension. Anyone can go almost anywhere in pants, but let any broiling male describe his cotton pants as pajamas and immediately the police swoop down upon him. Paul Partridge of the University of Oklahoma tried breakfasting in the university cafeteria in bright purple pajamas and was led out gently by the ear. W. B. Bizzell, president of the university, warned the college paper that he would stop its publication if it printed a picture of Partridge in pajamas. W. O. Saunders of the Elizabeth City (North Carolina) Independent had better luck. Strolling down the main street of his town in a pair of beautiful tan pajamas with a long, smock-like coat, attached collar, and cravat, Mr. Saunders was arrested. He took his case to the mayor and won from his honor a decision which should go down in sartorial annals as the Magna Charta of the sweltering sex:

> It is the inherent right of every citizen [said the mayor] or inhabitant of the city and every visitor to dress as he pleases, and go and come as he pleases, as long as there is no indecent exposure of his person. And [he added] if I had the nerve I would adopt pajamas for street wear myself.

Peace Pact and Disarmament

THE Briand-Kellogg pact is formally in effect, and the peoples and governments of the world now face the stern task of building the peace. The pact, despite the strictures of its critics, means, or may mean, a first step in that great work; despite the plaudits of its friends, it of course means no more than a first step. Friends of peace may congratulate themselves that that step is taken, and Americans may take justifiable pride in the recent action of our President and Secretary of State in connection with this international engagement.

During the weeks of midsummer madness just past certain forces in China and Russia were working the peoples up to that stage of insane fury where war becomes a reality. It was our own Secretary of State who at the right moment reminded the two governments, theretofore apparently growing more and more belligerent, of their obligations under the pact. Since that time the exchanges between Nanking and Moscow have become more moderate, and the present outlook is for a settlement of the real differences between the two governments on a basis of reason and common-sense, not of hatred and bloodshed. We do not say that the pact prevented war, for we do not believe that it did. We do say that the pact gave Secretary Stimson a good opening, which he utilized skilfully, and that to such an extent the treaty made it easier for the governments of China and Russia to take the way of reason. We rejoice that it was an American secretary of state who in a crisis first successfully invoked the pact, and that its moral authority is in so far enhanced.

Distinctly more important, probably, in the long run, and no less creditable to Mr. Hoover's Administration, are the exchanges now going on between Washington and London in respect to the reduction of armaments. The events of the past month are full of encouragement to the friends of peace, and we should be less than fair if we failed to express our hearty appreciation of the steps Mr. Hoover has taken thus far, and our hope that he will not hesitate or falter in the good work so well begun; for of course the big fight is all ahead.

Mr. Dawes's first speech served notice on the world, and particularly on the generals and admirals, that so far as the Administration was concerned, our government was actually ready to reduce its armaments. All the silly talk about yardsticks and parity and like nonsense does not alter the significance of one basic fact: the responsible heads of the British and the American government are ready to sit down together as intelligent and friendly human beings and talk over plans of cutting navies and taxes, instead of leaving it to professional fighting men and their civilian allies to scare us all into believing that it can't be done. Prime Minister MacDonald, in discussing parity, points out that the governments have agreed to a certain elasticity in meeting their peace-time needs, and that technical considerations will not be allowed to interfere with the main purpose. This is to say that parity is poppycock, and that the governments have agreed on reduction as the important thing—which it is.

And now comes Mr. Hoover, the very day before the peace pact goes into formal effect, saying flatly:

> The American people should understand that current expenditures on strictly military activities of the army and navy constitute the largest military budget of any nation in the world today, and at a time when there is less real danger of extensive disturbance to peace than at any time in more than half a century. The hope of tax reduction lies in large degree in our ability to economize on the military and naval expenditure and still maintain adequate defense. Our whole situation is certainly modified by the Kellogg pact.

This statement the President follows up with actual figures of such expenditures for four of the leading powers, showing us outlays on the army and navy above a hundred millions more during the past year and two hundred millions more in the present year than our nearest competitor, Great Britain, and more than three times as much as Japan. Further, he points out that the $685,000,000 of last year will rise to $803,000,000 three years hence if our plans be not changed. These are not the words of those advocates of "adequate" defense who forever demand more guns and ships and planes and poison.

Nor is this all. Mr. Hoover announces the appointment of a commission (unfortunately from the general staff) to study reduction of army costs; and then, plainly by agreement with Mr. MacDonald, who makes a corresponding announcement in London, he gives notice of delay in laying down the keels of three of the five cruisers in this year's building program, the other two being under contract in private yards, where the work can less readily be stopped—a fact worthy of remark in considering the forces back of naval building. Small wonder that that doughty naval expert and Briton-baiter, Representative Britten, gives forth an agonized wail that the President is violating the intent of Congress, and that the misguided president of the American Legion utters a shout of alarm. It is only the first faint rumbling of the storm that will come; for the President actually proposes to cut down army and navy expenditures, on the ground that the pact really means something. That is the way to make it mean something, and we honor the President for his action.

We are not so silly as to imagine that Mr. Hoover has turned pacifist, but we do say that, within the limits of his ideas and his position, his moves up to this point have been admirable. Thus far, with the MacDonald Government collaborating in England, his task has been comparatively easy; now comes the real fight and the real test of the President, who does not love a fight. But the army and navy and all their war-making allies in Congress and out of it will unquestionably gather their forces and fight for their life. Their forces are immensely powerful. No indirect methods, no simple, quiet conferences with a few leaders will do the work that must be done. We believe that Mr. Hoover can find irresistible popular support for the moderate measure of armament reduction at present contemplated if he will use the power of his position to make the issue clear. Will he lead the American people to take this short step from fear toward friendliness? It is a great task for any man.

Fashions in Food

WE noted some time ago the advent of the odd cult of sauerkraut juice. Now the tomato-juice cocktail is regnant, a harmless, vapid drink, a sort of vegetarian cousin of the clam-juice cocktail which has done so much to restore the profits of the restaurant business. Time was when clam broth was served free with steamed clams, and the liquid from cold clams on the halfshell went down the sink; nowadays it is carefully saved, watered, peppered, and served in tiny glasses at from thirty to sixty cents a glass, depending upon the toniness of the restaurant. It would be a good drink at a dime, but we predict that in another decade it will be as completely forgotten as the limeades which, together with Geronimo, the tired Apache, were the chief glory of the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo in 1901.

For foods are as modish and shifting as women's dresses. It was only a few years ago that every stenographer in New York, wearing a smock to protect her dress and, like as not, a Helen Wills eyeshade to protect her eyes, spent the noon hour munching raisins because the ads had taught her that her system needed iron. Next came the daily apples, driving the doctors away. Now the girls cultivate yeast gardens in their patient stomachs. And then, having done their hygienic duty, they rush out to fill up on Eskimo pies—undoubtedly, with the airplane and the radio, one of the chief characteristics of American civilization in this decade—and Baby Ruths and Oh Henrys.

The days of the old "fancy" are gone forever—the neighborhood store where candies lay in tempting display, fly-specked and grimy from sampling fingers, ranging from twenty-for-a-cent "pills" to great "lickrish-sticks" at one cent each, and fat, powdered marshmallow bars, three cubic inches for one Indian-head copper. It is a different, oil-paper world that the child of today faces when in quest of candy. Each stock is precisely like the next—the same spearmint chewing gum, the same delectable chocolate mints, the same brands of accurately counted caramels and immaculately wrapped toffees, the same peanuts and almonds and fig bars and life-savers. In the old days one was faithful to his "fancy"; one knew the quality of its marshmallows as distinguished from that of another store. Today the stands are all alike, all equally hygienic, all shifting mechanically in accordance with the advertising and the sales campaigns. No doubt the child of today gets cleaner candy—he should, for the four-for-a-cent has been replaced by five-for-a-nickel—but we doubt if he has the same opportunity to develop his own tastes. And in one particular the candy-makers have made a deplorable retrogression. Twenty years ago it was still possible for a small boy to get chocolate—real, honest-to-God, dark brown, not-too-much-sweetened chocolate. Today there is little on the stands but the insipidly sweet milk chocolates. Even the Eskimo pie-makers have gone over to milk chocolate.

Still, the world does move. Modern science has taught us to eat greens as diligently as our ancestors did before science discovered vitamines; and prohibition has brought the delectable lime to the remotest delicatessens. Broccoli, after a century's obscurity, has returned to the American table; and the iced-drink emporiums have imported a magnificent discovery from the tropics. The "orange drink," despite its synthetic flavors, was at least an improvement on the old ice-cream soda; and this season a pale adaptation of the West Indian jugo de piña has blossomed upon the counter. To those who cannot endure the thought or the name of the tomato-juice cocktail, we commend 1929's finest hot-weather drink—pineapple juice!

Panama Awaits the Ax

IMPERIALISM does not always advance by leaps and bounds. More often it flows, quietly and hardly noticeable at a distance, or even merely trickles. The latter seems to be the present process in Panama. Ever since President Roosevelt despoiled Colombia of Panama by assisting a revolution in that neck of the woods and then recognizing overnight the independence of the revolutionaries, the isthmian republic has been under our domination. But actual interference or exploitation has been guarded and gradual. The cupidity of native politicians is always a favorite opening in the game of imperialism. The weaker countries get into financial troubles because of having extravagant expenditures foisted upon them and by the erosion of their revenues through graft. In this age of universal borrowing what is more natural then than to seek a foreign loan? And what is more inevitable than that the foreign banker, in order to secure the loan, will seek extraordinary rights and call upon his government to back him in the protection of that modern sacred cow, private property?

Last year Panama, having got into financial difficulties, sought a foreign loan of $12,000,000. A number of American bankers were ready to accommodate, for these Latin American loans are floated at a nice commission and good interest rates. The Guaranty Trust Company of New York was declared the successful bidder, but there was delay in issuing the bonds. Finally, the Guaranty Trust withdrew its offer and the National City Bank of New York took over the contract. Perhaps the National City voted first and discussed afterward, according to the philosophy of the late E. H. Harriman. At any rate, after floating the loan and making some advances to the government of Panama, the National City indicated some apprehension in regard to Panamanian finances. The republic was induced to "invite" a commission from the National City Bank to make a financial and economic survey. The "invitation" is said to have cost Panama $32,000, and such of the findings as were made public last spring were not entirely rosy. George E. Roberts, vice-president of the National City Bank, who headed the commission, reported that the country's revenues were good but that the deficits and the floating debt made the financial situation unsatisfactory. The commission recommended the appointment of a citizen of the United States as comptroller, although the republic is already paying a fiscal agent supposedly acting under the advice of our Department of State. The National City Bank first suggested one of its own men, but his demand for $25,000 annually and expenses, with six months a year in the United States, was a bit thick even for the docile Panamanians. Finally a business man on the Isthmus was selected, presumably equally satisfactory to the bank, so that we may take it for granted that henceforth the finances of the republic will be directed primarily from Wall Street.

Meanwhile the treaty which our Department of State sought to impose upon Panama in 1926 is still hanging fire. That instrument, described in our issue of January 5, 1927, provides that Panama "will consider herself in a state of war in case of any war in which the United States should be a belligerent," and if necessary "in the opinion of the United States Government" to defend the Canal, Panama will turn over to the Untied States the control of wireless and radio communication and aircraft. In addition "the United States shall have the direction and control of all military operations" in the republic during actual or threatened hostilities.

Obviously the treaty is an infamous one to present to any supposedly independent nation and is due to our original error in fortifying the Panama Canal as part of our national defense instead of making it a neutral international highway. Panama refused to ratify the treaty when first presented, and President Arosemena was at pains to say last spring that unless the document was modified by us it would not again be placed before the National Assembly. But the Department of State seems still to cherish the notion that it wants the treaty, and, as we said earlier, imperialism does not always proceed by leaps and bounds. More often it flows or merely trickles. But it proceeds. Our financial and political overlordship of Panama is bound to grow ever stronger unless a drastic change of sentiment in this country calls for a new policy. Of this we see no present sign. On the contrary, we are disposed to echo the remark of a writer in the Patria of San Salvador:

> We are bound to be swallowed in the end, whatever happens; nothing remains for us but to try to make the process of deglutition as slow and difficult as possible. And let us keep the hope that our bones may stick in Uncle Sam's throat.

This Lawless Nation

WE are, and we have always been, a lawless nation. It is fashionable today to blame lawlessness upon the mixture of races in our population, but that is nonsense which ignores history. Good pure-blooded Anglo-Saxons built up the bloody tradition of the frontier; English stock burned Irish Catholic convents in the Know-Nothing days of the middle of the last century; and while New York and Chicago have their high percentages of crime, it is in the pure-blooded South that the homicide rate runs highest and that the tradition of ignoring inconvenient laws reaches its peak. Prohibition violations are a small matter compared to the wholesale, persistent, unashamed, and official violation of the Constitutional provisions protecting the Negro which are current throughout the South.

It may be disconcerting, but it is eminently fitting, that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People should present to the President's commission on law enforcement a brief recalling its attention from the recent difficulties about prohibition to the long-continued law-breaking involved in the tradition of lynching, the custom of peonage, the official illegalities of segregation and white primary laws, and the flagrant partiality with which the school and Jim Crow laws are applied. The commission will convict itself of superficiality and of political evasion if it fails thoroughly to study these basic violations of constitutional guaranties and of the nation's legal fabric.

That most bestial of crimes, lynching, is, fortunately, declining. Public opinion in the South itself has turned against this stain upon the name of mankind. But the fact that there were only 11 lynchings in 1928, 21 in 1927, 34 in 1926, and 64 in 1921 should not blind us to the truth that while this worst excrescence of interracial violence is waning, the indecent conditions out of which it grew largely persist. Peonage, which is essentially a form of human slavery, degrading both master and debt-slave and poisoning their human relations, persists in many States. The conditions officially reported by the Governor of Georgia in 1921 have not been wiped out. A federal law exists under which punishment of those responsible for peonage is authorized, but, as the N. A. A. C. P. points out, prosecutions have been infrequent and the illegal system is complacently tolerated.

We commented recently upon the unequal application of the Jim Crow laws which nominally grant separate and equal accommodation to the two races, but in practice give only third-class accommodation to Negroes. The expenditure of the school taxes in all the Southern States is a similar example of flagrant disrespect for the provisions of law. In some States from five to ten times as much in proportion to the number of children of each race is spent on white schools as on Negro schools. Even border States like Maryland and Missouri grossly discriminate against the schools for Negro pupils.

But the disfranchisement of the colored half of the South is, of course, the most appalling violation of law. State after State passes laws intended to circumvent the plain meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and as soon as the Supreme Court declares them unconstitutional the States devise new forms of defiance. The white South does not intend the black South to vote, and it is notorious how election boards contrive to disfranchise Negroes. A white citizen may prove his literacy by merely reading his abc's; a colored man must prove himself a constitutional lawyer before a white board will admit that he is able to read and write. And these white aristocrats will regard such tactics as a joke!

Possibly the most bare-faced recent example of complete disregard for law by gentlemen sworn to uphold it was the contemptuous action of the City Council of Atlanta, Georgia, which, by a vote of 28 to 0, overrode the mayor's veto of a segregation law that was patently and unquestionably unconstitutional, paralleling closely, as it did, another ordinance upon which the courts had already ruled.

Such practices are at their worst in the South. But the recent violence at North Platte, Nebraska, and the only less recent outbreaks in Detroit, Chicago, East St. Louis, and other Northern cities reveal only too clearly that such contempt for law, when race prejudices are concerned, has no geographical limits. It lies deep in American nature. And if President Hoover's commission really wishes to get at the root of American contempt for law, it will do well to begin by poring over the documents attached to the brief of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, by studying American attitudes toward race problems.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THE Times-Journal of Selma, Alabama, has solved the race problem very simply in a recent editorial by asserting that there is none. Except of course in the minds of a few Negro agitators and a small group of ignorant white commentators mostly situated in the North. "Down here in Dixie," says the gentleman behind the rose-colored spectacles, "we have grown to know each other and we don't have problems. We have settled them satisfactorily to both races." The basis of this mutually satisfactory settlement is outlined in the sentence, "Neither race wants social or political equality and we only hear of it from agitators on the outside."

Since the white man in the South has managed to set up political and social superiority for his own race it is probably true that he is making no great outcry for equality. I am even willing to grant that in many sections of the South the Negro has accepted disfranchisement tamely enough. He is not anxious to run the risk and bother of trying to assert his rights. Indeed, his political interests have become atrophied. It makes little difference to him which party sits in the high seats. But this acceptance of a condition is not quite the same thing as a contented satisfaction. It would hardly be fair to cram wax down the ears of an individual and after it was firmly set to explain, "Can't you comprehend that this good fellow has no desire whatever to attend the symphony concert?"

If the Selma Times-Journal is in any sense correct in asserting that the Negro is thoroughly complacent in his present situation it may be a plausible quibble to maintain that there is no Negro problem, but in that case the terminology must be shifted about to admit the very lively presence of a white problem. Nor is the issue a local one. If millions of adults in the United States are barred from the polls and restive under this disability a serious situation exists. But to my mind the condition is still more grave and tragic if it is true that they have cheerfully accepted their lot. Such a state of affairs puts the whole democratic theory of government in danger. Can a nation exist part quick and part dead? If it is both reasonable and feasible to take the vote away from the Negro on the ground that he is insufficiently intelligent to exercise the franchise there is no logical reason why the limitation of manhood suffrage should stop there. Under any such a philosophy of government it would be not at all unreasonable to confine voting only to persons listed in Who's Who or to such college men as were graduated cum laude.

Complete and successful disfranchisement of the Negro is a long step toward the creation of an oligarchic state. It raises the vital issue of whether America can carry upon its back a helot class and still move on and up to the bright dreams which have animated the noble army of martyrs for freedom's cause. Fortunately it seems likely that the Alabama editorial writer takes far too grave a view of the situation. His pessimism is blacker than is in any way justified. He sees the long dark ranks of supine men and women and thinks that they are dead to the cause of democracy. They sleep and are not dead. Some stir, and if the ear is sensitive it can detect that here and there one moans and mutters through his slumber. A great gulf is fixed between patience and resignation. There will be a morning of freedom. Democracy has always been a slow ferment and manhood is not to be forever mocked.

Fortunately the South has been much less than adroit in its attempt to create a half-way house on the road to Utopia. Speaking of the Negro the Selma Times-Journal says, "We find him ambitious, happy, and contented. Equally with the white man, he is protected in life and liberty—in the ownership of his property, and in the pursuit of happiness. . . . Side by side, with 'one increasing purpose'—the preservation of the integrity and welfare of each race—we are moving forward down here in the South."

But one has but to see the mulatto millions to know that neither North nor South has been fanatical in its effort to preserve the integrity of the Negro race. When the last lynching is a memory of one hundred years ago then it will be time enough to talk of equality in protection of life and liberty. And I would not have the audacity to speak of the "pursuit of happiness" until it was quite unknown for any white man in the land to curl the lip of scorn and say "Here you, nigger!"

Communities in which segregation exists by law have not played the game fairly even according to their own principles and professions. There are hundreds of statutes establishing separate and equal accommodations on railroads. Does any fair-minded man dare to stand up and assert that the Jim Crow car is as good a piece of rolling stock as that assigned to the white man? Nor does one have to live his whole life south of the Mason and Dixon line to know that whenever a separate place is set aside for the Negro it is a poorer place than that reserved for the white man. For the Nordic, the orchestra; for the Negro, the second balcony—it is through these humiliating devices that the white man preserves the integrity of each race.

I am aware of the fact that one fault has come too much into many articles which I have written about white and black. One might get the impression that I believe prejudice to be purely geographical. The South is more articulate in expressing its feeling. Otherwise there is not a vast difference between the Northern and the Southern attitude. Some of the most rabid Negro baiters I have ever known came down from the North and enthusiastically accepted the attitude of the community in which they found themselves. There ought to be an old adage running, "There's no fool like a convert."

It is also true that in increasing numbers the white people of the South are coming to realize that the present situation between white and black is not satisfactory for either race. Pat on his tumble from the Woolworth Tower cried out to horrified observers on the fourteenth floor, "I'm all right so far." And the Southerner who says, "We have this thing all settled," is blood cousin to the peasant who plants his vines upon the slope of some Vesuvius. When an oppressed race asks for the bread of liberty it is not enough to toss it a mammy song. HEYWOOD BROUN

A License to Steal

By WILLIAM C. MURPHY, JR.

ENACTMENT of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, over which Republican members of the Senate Finance Committee are now sweltering in Washington, will determine whether the power to levy taxes shall remain with Congress where it was vested by the Constitution or shall be transferred to the President. This is the question which overshadows all others in any consideration of the pending bill. Incidentally, it is the question upon which hinges the comparatively minor issue of whether or not President Hoover is to be repudiated by a Congress of his own party at the very outset of his administration.

It is true that the bill which has been passed by the House would increase the living costs of the American people by from $600,000,000 to $700,000,000 annually; that there are proposed increases amounting to 2,000 per cent on some commodities—imitation pearl beads for example—but these are merely transient iniquities when compared to the major issue involved. Individual larcenies, whether petty or grand, are trivialities when placed alongside a proposition to issue a license to steal.

Briefly, the bill proposes to give the President power to raise or lower duties up to fifty per cent of the statutory rates whenever the Tariff Commission shall determine that such a change is justified by conditions of competition between domestic and imported products. To make sure that determinations will be forthcoming as desired from the Commission, it is further proposed to abolish the bi-partisan character of that body, leaving the President free to name the entire membership from adherents of his own political faith and to remove any member at will. But this is not all; another section of the bill would take away most of the powers now vested in the courts and leave the Treasury Department—another agency of the President—as the arbiter on questions of valuation. The possibilities of increasing valuations through one agency and then pyramiding increased rates on the increased valuations are obvious. These two administrative provisions would thus give to a protectionist Administration the power to raise duties almost at will. The action of President Coolidge and President Hoover under the flexible provisions of the present law leaves little doubt that if these new sections are written into the forthcoming law we shall see many duties raised by executive fiat.

These are the facts and possibilities which have brought into being a Democratic-Progressive Republican coalition which, as this is written, seems to have a fair chance of overturning the entire flexible tariff plan in the Senate. So definite has the coalition become that Senator Borah, most ardent and vociferous of Mr. Hoover's campaign orators, has taken to issuing his statements against the bill through the Democratic National Committee. Even an ardent Administration protectionist, Senator Reed of Pennsylvania, has indicated unmistakably that he thinks the expansion of the executive's tariff-making powers has gone far enough. The point involved is the perpetuation of the dearly established principle that the power that holds the sword must be separated from the power that controls the purse. It has been suggested that if the President is given power to raise or lower customs duties there is no logical reason why he should not be given similar power over income-tax rates.

Another shadow hovering over the huge Turkish bath which is the Senate Finance Committee room, is the threat of potential retaliations by foreign countries which may not take kindly to having their products shut off from the American market by a prohibitive tariff wall. Foreign nations always register protests when an American tariff bill is in the making. It is still recalled in Washington that a former Greek Minister made himself popularly known as "the currant issue" by his persistent wailings over a prospective increase in the duties on currants a few years ago.

But the present deluge of foreign protests—so far there have been more than forty—are more ominous as well as more numerous than on former occasions. No longer are they mere polite intimations that some foreign government would appreciate it if the duties on certain products were not increased. Almost without exception, the present crop of protests speak of the inevitable decrease in the foreign demand for American products in the event of tariff raises inimical to foreign industrial interests. More important than these diplomatically worded threats are the hard facts of economics which tend to make the threats credible. It is not being overlooked that the United States now sells more than it buys, and that it has become a creditor nation, with net payments of more than half a billion a year due it on account of interest and dividends. Therefore, if we prevent foreign nations from selling to us, they must in time buy less and less from the United States, for the very adequate reason that they will not have the money to buy with. This was less plain when most of the former tariff bills were being framed. Then the United States was still a debtor nation, with a balance due to other countries on account. Such considerations as these cause even some ardent protectionists to wonder if the Hawley bill will be an unmixed blessing for an Administration which was ushered in by a glorified drummer's tour of South America to stimulate trade with that continent.

But there are more definite indications of danger from abroad than the academic questions of economics. For example, there was the Canadian remonstrance against the proposed duties on shingles, lumber and feeder cattle, coupled with the intimation that enactment of those rates might result in retaliatory British duties on American wheat. Secretary Stimson denied that any such representations had been made by Canada on the same day that the Canadian Government at Ottawa was announcing that they had been made—and after it had been learned on unimpeachable authority that several prominent senators had been summoned to conferences by high Administration officials, including Mr. Stimson, who were excited about the possibilities involved in the Canadian situation.

Leaving the question of relative diplomatic veracity for settlement by those who may be interested in useless abstractions, there is the concrete fact that the State Department has practically abandoned any attempts to negotiate commercial treaties. It has given up this futile activity because, in view of American tariff practices, foreign nations will not accept the customary "most favored nation" clause in treaties with the United States. The situation is illustrated strikingly by comparing Canada and the United States. The former, not counting her favored status in the British Empire, has treaties including the most-favored-nation clause with twenty-two nations. These twenty-two nations include practically all of the great trading and commercial powers and most of their colonies. The United States has such treaties with exactly seven countries, of which Germany and China are the only two of any commercial importance.

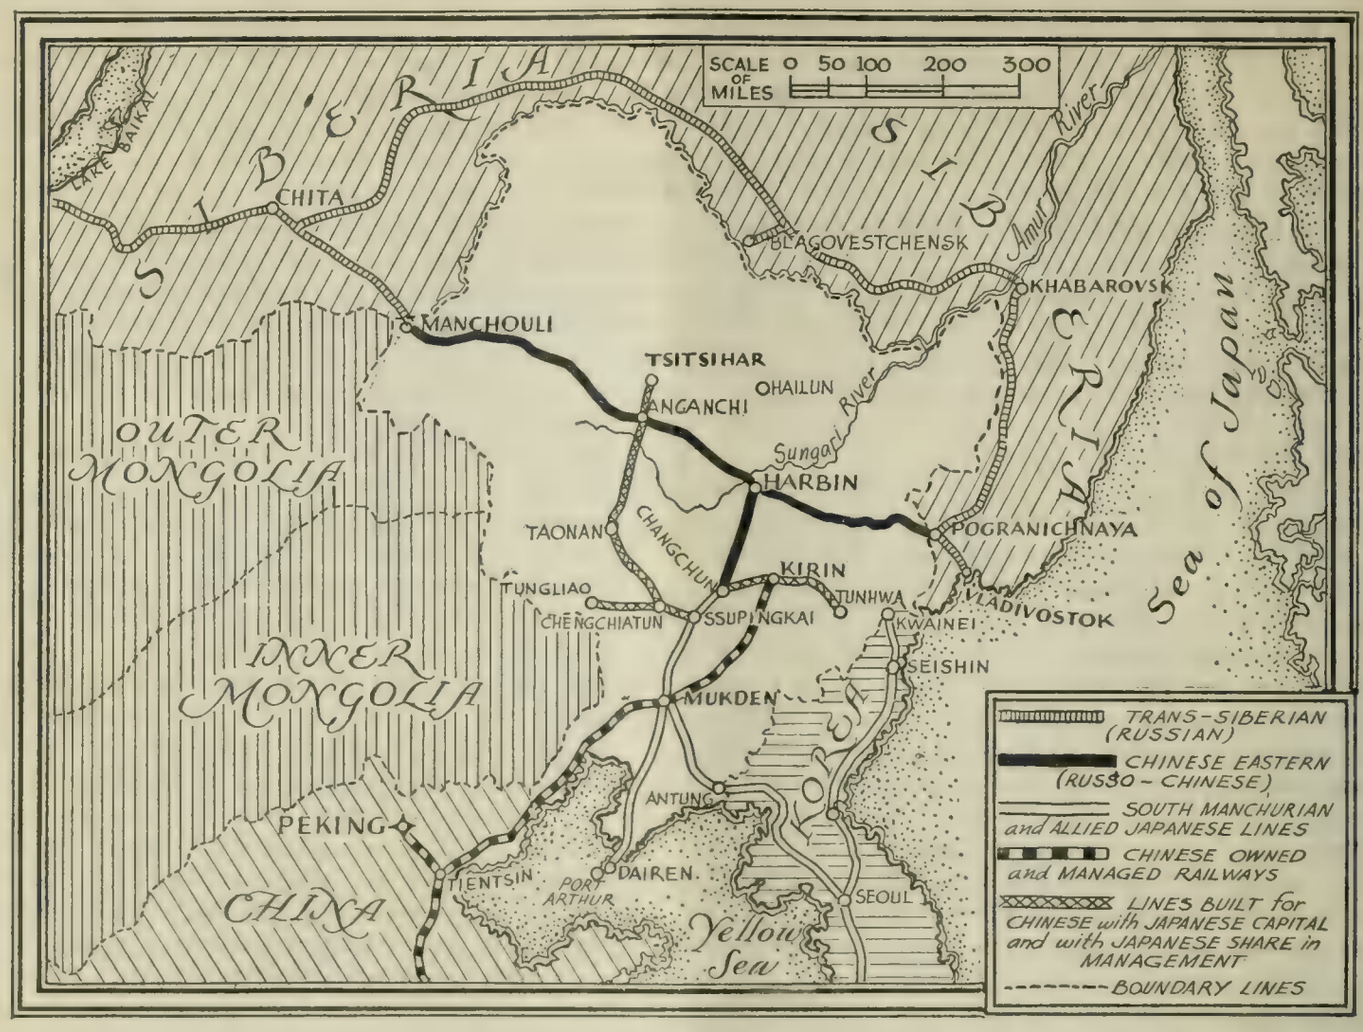
It will be recalled that the announced purpose of the Republican Party, as set forth in its most recent platform, and of President Hoover in his message to the special session of Congress, is to place agriculture on an economic parity with industry, partly, at least, through tariff revision. The problem of translating that principle into definite rates is one that is adding gray hairs to the heads of Republican senators now engaged in putting the Hawley bill into shape for presentation to the Senate. They are somewhat handicapped because, after the President had suggested a revision limited to agricultural products and a few commodities faced with emergency conditions, the House ran wild and passed a bill containing nearly a thousand changes in rates. Practically all of the changes were increases, of course, so the bill became to all practical purposes a general upward revision. Agriculture was given many of the increases, to be sure, but in nearly every case where the products of agriculture enter into industry there were "compensatory" increases on the finished products. Naturally, the representatives of the industries concerned wish to retain the "compensatory" increases. At the same time the farm bloc has blood in its collective eye and is proclaiming loudly that agriculture is in exactly the same relative position as before.

It has been asserted that the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 gave agricultural products an average of 25.85% protection while the average for industrial products is 42.03%, and that the Hawley bill protects agriculture theoretically by an average of 29.90% and industry by an average of 47.07%. In other words, while both agricultural and industrial rates are increased by the present bill, the gap between the protection accorded agriculture and that accorded industry has been widened. To this, of course, is added the contention that tariff protection is entirely valueless on some of the great agricultural staples such as wheat, in which there is a surplus over domestic consumption resulting in the domestic price being practically fixed by the open-market world price on which a protective tariff does not operate.



Thus the learned gentlemen on the Finance Committee face a real dilemma. For reasons of political expediency, at least, many of them would be perfectly willing to raise the agricultural rates to any point demanded by the agricultural interests. They are particularly willing to do this in view of the widely held view that agricultural tariffs are meaningless for the most part anyway. But if they raise the agricultural rates they will have the disciples of "compensatory" increase on their backs.

The other alternative is to reduce some of the industrial rates as a gesture toward the "economic parity" heretofore referred to. It may be a leaning toward this procedure which has caused the chairman of the Finance Committee, Senator Smoot, to send out a call to the Tariff Commission for a list of commodities upon which the House granted increases and of which imports amount to less than ten per cent of domestic consumption. This move has been interpreted as forecasting a retention of existing rates on commodities in this category, the theory being that where American producers have been able to acquire ninety per cent or more of the market they may be able to worry along without additional protection.

Another move toward cutting down the general level of industrial rates was that of summoning a group of prominent automobile manufacturers to Washington to ask them if it was really true that they did not need the twenty-five per cent ad valorem and countervailing duties carried in the present law. The Ford Company advocated free trade but the other motor representatives insisted that the countervailing duties, at least, be retained, these duties being as high as forty-five per cent ad valorem in some instances.

As this is written there is real anxiety in Republican senatorial circles concerning the fate of the tariff bill. After prolonged and prayerful effort the Old Guard has succeeded for the time being in convincing Mr. Hoover that he is a Republican President and should stand for a Republican tariff bill. But their alliance with the White House is none too secure as was demonstrated by the recent comedy of errors when those two doughty Administration leaders, Watson of Indiana and Reed of Pennsylvania, breakfasted with the President. They returned to the Capitol and broadcasted the news that the President wanted a "sane and sensible" tariff to be measured by "the yardstick of adequate protection." That seemed innocuous enough to have a ring of truth, but hardly had the word been passed out—and printed—than a denial came forth from the White House. The source of the denial was that unquotable and unmentionable entity which has succeeded the ghostly "White House spokesman" of the Coolidge regime, but the denial was definite and authentic. The President, it was said, had not mentioned anything about "yardsticks" or "adequate protection." Then, to make the picture perfect, Senator Watson received a telephone message from the White House informing him that no denial had been issued. There has been, so far, no denial of the denial of the denial.

Lurking behind the maze of denials, committee manipulations, and star-chamber sessions is the ever-present specter of that afternoon in the Senate when only one vote—and that vote Democratic—stood between the Administration and the wrecking of the entire tariff-revision program. That was the day Senator Borah's resolution to restrict tariff revision to the agricultural and directly related schedules was defeated by a vote of 38 to 39. One of the votes against the Borah resolution was that of Senator Heflin, Alabama Democrat. Heflin had fallen out with Borah because the latter had opposed the Alabaman's demand that the Senate condemn some unnamed person who had thrown a beer bottle at Heflin when the latter delivered a Ku Klux speech at Brockton, Massachusetts, last March. A margin of one vote—and that vote Heflin's—is a slender thing upon which to rest the fate of a Republican Administration in a crisis.

The Chinese and the Chinese Eastern

By ERNEST K. MOY

THE GIST of the Chinese position in the Sino-Russian controversy involving the Chinese Eastern Railway may be stated in the answer to two questions: (1) Has China the right, in her own territory, to arrest and, if deemed expedient, to deport aliens caught participating in political agitation constituting a menace to the government? (2) If these foreign agitators happen to be connected with a railroad in China, does their arrest constitute a seizure of the railway? The Chinese answer to the first question is Yes; to the second it is No.

It will be remembered that the occasion of the present strained relations between China and Soviet Russia, entailing ruptured diplomatic intercourse, rumors of impending war, reported outbreak of hostilities, and the efforts of neutral governments to preserve peace, was the raid which the Chinese authorities conducted on the premises of the Russian Consulate in Harbin on May 27. The raid was undertaken in consequence of information reaching the local Chinese officials that members of the Communist Third International were scheduled to hold a meeting in the quarters of the Russian Consulate to discuss and formulate plans for the promotion of communist agitation in Manchuria and other parts of China.

About forty Russians were arrested as a result of the search which, the Chinese Government declared, netted documents showing, among other things, that these foreigners, including Russian officials of the Chinese Eastern Railway, were parties to plans contemplating the destruction of Chinese property and the murder of Chinese officials by a communist "assassination corps."

If it is conceded that the Chinese Government has the right in this particular instance to arrest alien agitators against the public order, is that right materially modified because some of these aliens happen to be officials of a railway in China? And, in this case of the Chinese Eastern Railway, does the arrest of its Russian officials, who have been found to be parties to a conspiracy to undermine the Chinese Government, constitute a seizure of that railway?

It is the contention of the Chinese people that their government has an unquestionable moral as well as legal right to suppress any alien activities in Chinese territory that may be deemed inimical to public peace and the safety of that government. The arrest of the Russian officials is a matter aside from their connection with the Chinese Eastern Railway and therefore, does not constitute a "seizure" of that railway. Russia has the right, which China cannot dispute, to appoint other officials to fill the vacancies thus created by the arrests, provided the Soviet Government can disavow responsibility for the objectionable activities of its arrested citizens. At least theoretically this is the case.

But because of the official connections of the Russians who were arrested in the Harbin raid, and in view of the fact that they were also using the quarters of the Russian consulate, the question of treaty violation is involved.

In both the Peking and the Mukden treaties of 1924 there is the following provision to which China and Russia committed themselves:

> The Governments of the two Contracting Parties mutually pledge themselves not to permit within their respective territories the existence or activities of any organizations or groups whose aim is to struggle by acts of violence against the Government of either Contracting Party.
>
> The Governments of the two Contracting Parties further pledge themselves not to engage in propaganda directed against the political and social systems of either Contracting Party.

It is the contention of the Nanking Government that the evidence uncovered in the Harbin raid is conclusive proof of Soviet Russia's violation of the foregoing treaty stipulation. Russia, on the other hand, maintains that by ousting the Russian officials of the Chinese Eastern Railway China has committed an unlawful act. Assuming that the Russian contention is correct, the Chinese maintain that such a charge constitutes no satisfactory reply to China's complaint of Russia's original violation of the treaty.

The Chinese Government has expressed its willingness to negotiate a settlement of the differences, but as the situation stands at the moment of writing, Russia insists upon the restoration of the status quo ante before she will consent to negotiation. This involves the release and reinstatement of the arrested officials of the railway. To comply with such a condition would necessarily entail implications which the Chinese Government could not admit. How the difficulty will be surmounted is of interest to those concerned with the technique of diplomatic "face-saving."

The important question to the Chinese people, however, concerns the ultimate and permanent solution of the Chinese Eastern Railway problem. No one questions the fact that this railway originated in the imperialistic schemes of Czarist Russia for territorial expansion in Eastern Asia. As long as Russia exercises any control over this line, the road will remain a symbol of the foreign imperialism which present-day China is determined to uproot. To regain complete sovereignty over the entire territory of China is the purpose of the present government in Nanking; it is the unanimous determination of the Chinese people. And, ironical as it is, Russia worked three years with China professedly to help the Chinese realize this aim.

What makes the Chinese distrustful of Russia today is the contradiction in the position of the Soviet Government. That government has posed and is posing as the friend of all oppressed people who are victims of foreign imperialism. That government recognized that the Chinese Eastern Railway was an expression of this imperialism and, in 1920, it offered to restore the road to China "without demanding any kind of compensation." It experienced a very decided change of heart, however; for in the treaty of 1924 Russia was content with nothing less than the management of the railway. To the Chinese this meant only one thing: Capitalistic imperialism had simply given place to Soviet imperialism.

Nor was this attitude changed during the period of Russian cooperation with the Nationalist movement. Within the Kuomintang there were many who were irrevocably opposed to accepting Russian assistance in the ambitious project of bringing China under the Nationalist regime, because they suspected Russia's motives. The majority, however, were willing to match wits with Russia; not believing that Russia's proffered friendship was motivated by pure altruism, they were yet willing to accept her material help.

The majority of the Kuomintang leadership felt then that the policy of Soviet Russia toward China was not different from that of Czarist Russia, nor was the method of giving effect to that policy different. In a scholarly treatise on China's foreign relations, a Chinese author described Czarist Russia's policy in China as one of "territorial expansion." "To carry out this policy astutely," he wrote, "she adopted a method of reaching her ends which was unique and, at the same time, unscrupulous. That is, she always pretended to be the friend of the weaker state which she aimed to absorb or annex by extending the protection of her alliance to the latter." It was the opinion of the Kuomintang leaders that this was the policy of Soviet Russia also. They believed that it was the purpose of Moscow to sovietize the whole of China just as she had succeeded in sovietizing a part of China in Outer Mongolia. The circumstances attending and leading up to the present controversy tend only to strengthen this conviction.

What are the possible solutions that would satisfy the Chinese? The existing treaties between China and Russia afford the latter an opportunity to remove suspicion from the mind of the Chinese people. The original understanding with Czarist Russia provided that the Chinese Eastern Railway would be turned over to China "free of charge" after the expiration of eighty years. In the Mukden Agreement of 1924 this period was reduced to sixty years. To provide for the possibility of a further modification the following paragraph was added:

> The question of further reducing the aforementioned period of sixty years may be taken up for consideration with the approval of the two Contracting Parties.

This provision would enable Russia to repeat and stand by the grand gesture she made in 1920: to return the railway to China "without demanding any kind of compensation."

Soviet Russia today, however, may not be in a position to indulge the generosity she seemed ready to show in 1920. Or perhaps she may believe that the Chinese would not appreciate it. In that case she can sell her interest in the Chinese Eastern Railway to China. There is a provision in both the Peking and the Mukden agreement under which China may redeem the road at a "fair cost." A satisfactory arrangement for the redemption of the road by China on a basis perhaps similar to the one connected with the redemption of the Shantung Railway from Japan might be practicable. And still it may not be within the means of China today to buy out Russia.

To maintain the existing arrangement unaltered will be without question to maintain an active cause of continued suspicion and antipathy on the part of the Chinese people. An American editor summarized the situation succinctly when he wrote: "The Chinese Eastern Railway is not a local issue; it is a symbol of the foreign influence which the Chinese are determined to tolerate no longer."

The U.S.S.R. and the Chinese Eastern*

By HAROLD KELLOCK

THE CHINESE EASTERN RAILWAY was built in the nineties with capital furnished by the Czarist Government. Economically it was and is a short line of great value, cutting off about 1,000 miles between Chita and Vladivostok as compared with the main line of the Trans-Siberian railway which curves northward in Russian territory along the line of the Amur river. What devious non-economic purposes the bureaucrats of St. Petersburg had in mind need not particularly concern us here. After the October Revolution in Russia in 1917 they ceased to be operative.

The position of the railway in respect to the new order in Russia was not regularized until the spring of 1924 when the Chinese Government and the Soviet Government signed a treaty with certain clauses relating to the status of the railway and a supplementary agreement for the provisional management of the road.

This treaty was unique among those signed by a Chinese Government in recent times with any European power, in that it was a treaty between equals, with no European mailed fist menacing the Chinese signers. In fact it was a treaty notable for its abnegations on the part of the Soviet Government. In 1919 and 1920 the newly-formed Soviet Government in Russia had declared that it abandoned forthwith all extra-territorial rights and territorial concessions exacted from various Chinese Governments by the Czarist power. The treaty of 1924 was a formal expression of these renunciations. In it the Soviet Government agreed to scrap the old Czarist imperialist agreements. It declared null and void all treaties and agreements between the Czarist Government and other powers affecting the sovereign rights and interests of China. It renounced the Russian portion of the Boxer indemnity. It renounced the special rights and privileges relating to all concessions acquired by the Czarist Government. It abandoned the rights of extra-territoriality and consular jurisdiction. In every respect it restored China, so far as its Slavic neighbor was concerned, to the dignity of a fully independent and self-responsible nation. The precedent established by this treaty was certainly beyond price so far as Chinese nationalism was concerned.

In respect to the Chinese Eastern Railway, built by capital originating in the sweat of the Russian workers and peasants, the spirit of the treaty was fully carried out. Under the original agreement with the Czarist Government the territory through which the railway ran became in effect an imperial province of the St. Petersburg bureaucracy. The Russian officers and employees of the road, along with all other Russian nationals, were not subject to the jurisdiction of any Chinese law or Chinese courts. A special Czarist gendarmerie "protected" the road and under this armed force the Russians virtually usurped all civil powers in the territory through which the road passed.

These imperialist arrangements were scrapped in the treaty of 1924. The first clause of Article IX of the treaty makes a decisive clearance of them. It reads:

> (1) The Governments of the two Contracting Parties declare that the Chinese Eastern Railway is a purely commercial enterprise.
>
> The Governments of the Contracting Parties mutually declare that with the exception of matters pertaining to the business operations, which are under the direct control of the Chinese Eastern Railway, all other matters affecting the rights of the National and the Local Governments of the Republic of China—such as judicial matters, matters relating to civil administration, military administration, police, municipal government, taxation, and landed property (with the exception of lands required by the said railway)—shall be administered by the Chinese authorities.

The original Czarist agreement on the road included a trick recapture clause, whereby the Chinese after 36 years could take possession at a price which vaguely included the capital involved, plus all debts incurred, plus accrued interest. It was not the sort of recapture agreement intended to be taken seriously. In the treaty of 1924 the Soviet Government agreed without condition that the road could be redeemed by the Chinese Government, the details to be fixed at a later conference. This conference has not yet been held. For a time China was plunged in civil war, with no internal authority in a position to speak for the whole country. Since the Nationalist Government gained power it has made no effort to effect an orderly agreement for the future redemption of the road.

In connection with the treaty the two governments signed an agreement for the management and operation of the road. This provided for a board of ten directors, five appointed by each government. The president of the board was to be a Chinese. The manager of the road was to be a Soviet citizen. Officers and employes were to be divided equally between the two nationalities.

Without preliminary warning, early in July, the Chinese authorities in Manchuria seized the persons of Soviet officers of the road, and of many Soviet railway workers, deprived them of their positions, and expelled many of them from the country under conditions of hardship. The Soviet portion of the management of the railway was wiped out at one swoop, and the treaty of 1924 was turned into a scrap of paper. A desultory series of violent acts against Soviet consulates in Manchuria, and also in other parts of China, preceded this snatching of the railway. No adequate explanation of the abrupt violation of the treaty was obtainable either from the authorities in Manchuria or from the Nationalist Government. Meanwhile refugees struggling over the Manchurian border brought with them tales of armed bodies of Czarist refugees advancing towards Soviet territory. The memory of these relics of Czarist militarism, as Mr. Walter Duranty of the New York Times remarked in a recent dispatch, is written in blood in the mind of every Siberian peasant family; not in generations will they forget Kolchak and Semenoff.

* This article is a personal interpretation by Mr. Kellock. It is in no sense an official Soviet statement.

The Soviet Government sent a request to the Nationalist Government for explanations and a conference. The reply of the Chinese Government, as reported in the press, was not in any sense a reply. It contained but two positive statements, each wholly irrelevant as an explanation of the breaking of the five-year-old treaty and the seizure of the railway.

One statement was a demand that the Soviet Government immediately release the Chinese imprisoned in the Soviet Union. These, the correspondents were told, numbered about 1,000. In fact, the only Chinese in prison in the Soviet Union were a negligible number of opium traders, smugglers and white slavers.

The other statement was equally disingenuous—it was to the effect that the seizure of the road was necessary because certain unnamed Soviet citizens had been carrying on unspecified "Bolshevik propaganda." Assuming that this were true, and that some enthusiastic Soviet officials and workers had been transmitting Marxian pamphlets among the illiterate peasants and herdsmen in Manchuria, this would be only a comic-opera excuse for tearing up the whole treaty. The treaty contained a clause against propaganda directed to the overthrow of either Government. A large proportion of the scores of thousands of Czarist relicts in Manchuria, on the other hand, without molestation, spend most of their time plotting the overthrow of the Soviet Government. If certain Soviet railway officials or workers were conspiring to spread anti-Nationalist doctrines, that surely could be taken care of by a little simple negotiation. The very fact that the Chinese authorities did not attempt to take the matter up in an orderly and regular way, and clear up the misunderstanding, lends point to a suspicion that the "propaganda" story was a pretext.

Dispatches from Harbin have intimated that documentary evidence of "propaganda" was discovered in the raids on Soviet consulates that preceded the seizure of the railway. These violations of the traditional immunities of consular offices have been more or less a feature of Soviet consular life in China since the Soviet Government abandoned extra-territorial rights for its citizens. After Chang-Tso-lin had conducted a series of such raids he announced that his raiders, or rather the former Czarist officers who accompanied them, had discovered documents implicating Soviet consular officers in "subversive propaganda." The documents seemed plausible, until Chang-Tso-lin unfortunately published some facsimiles. The facsimiles bore the stamp of forgery on their own face. They were written in the pre-revolutionary alphabet and spellings no longer used in the Soviet Union by anyone. The Russian alphabet was revised after the revolution, and for a dozen years only the emigrès have used the letters that have been dropped.

After the reception of the casuistical Chinese note, apparently a hangover of the war-lord psychology, the Soviet Government summoned home its diplomatic and consular representatives in China and broke off relations. It announced that as soon as China restored the legal status quo under the treaty it stood ready to negotiate a settlement of all matters in dispute. Obviously it is now awaiting the sober second thought of the Nationalist Government.

Meanwhile the successors of the war lords hold the road, but the lucrative through traffic has ceased, the two termini are blank walls. The Soviet citizens who spend annually $8,000,000 for tea in China each year will purchase it elsewhere. Their total trade of $25,000,000 a year with China will be broken off.

War? Newspaper dispatches have rumbled war ever since the railway was seized. The Soviet Government has made it clear that it will make no invasion of Chinese territory. It was, I believe, the first European Government to ratify the Kellogg pact renouncing war as an instrument of national policy. It went further in getting its immediate neighbors on the west to sign with it an agreement making the pact immediately effective as among them. The acting head of the Soviet Government has formally stated that that Government will observe the pact in the present crisis.

Aside from sentiment, the Soviet Union has good practical reasons for adhering to a policy of peace. It inherited a country in ruins. Its first five years of life were a bitter struggle against insurrections, invasions and starvation, all of which intensified the economic disorganization. The Soviet Union has literally pulled itself up out of the ruins by its own bootstraps. It has embarked on a carefully drawn five-year plan of development, which will give it a real place in modern economic progress. All the energies of the country are absorbed in the carrying out of that plan. War, even a little war, would severely cripple the effort for lifting the Soviet Union far above the low levels of Czarist medievalism and establishing a high grade of social well-being. It is fair to give the Soviet leaders credit for a realistic sense of proportion. "National honor" is a fine phrase, but good schools and healthy children are better realities. The advantages of having red soldiers camped along the ruins of the Chinese Eastern are far outweighed by the disadvantages of a war budget absorbing the revenues of the country.

The breaking of the 1924 treaty and the accompanying acts of violence against Soviet citizens will injure the Chinese Nationalist Government more than they injure the Soviet Government or the people of the Soviet state. What influences impelled the Nationalist leaders to this peculiar break can only be guessed at from this distance. The most sympathetic guess can hardly be creditable to them.

Vernon Louis Parrington

By RUSSELL BLANKENSHIP

THE sudden death of Professor V. L. Parrington of the University of Washington closed with tragic abruptness a life whose influence had only recently broadened from strictly local to national scope. For more than twenty years Mr. Parrington had done vivid and stimulating teaching; and yet, aside from his colleagues in the English department and his almost fanatically devoted students, his reputation was limited to a very small academic circle. For years he had made a first-hand study of every document of major importance in the development of the American mind, publishing scarcely anything, but reading, writing, and revising with tireless energy. Until a year ago when the first two volumes of his "Main Currents in American Thought" won the Pulitzer Prize, Mr. Parrington's unrivaled knowledge of American intellectual development was almost completely unrecognized. But in the last two years the recognition that was so long delayed came abundantly.

In his short sketch in "Who's Who" Mr. Parrington wrote himself down as a Democrat and an Episcopalian. One can imagine his rather cryptic smile as he did so; for his religion was far removed from that usually associated with Episcopalian doctrine and practice, and his great passion in politics was democracy with a small "d," regardless of party labels. The one American churchman for whom he had nothing but praise was Theodore Parker, and Parker was singled out because of his belief in evolutionary religion and especially because of his sermon "On the Transient and Permanent in Christianity." In this sermon Parker waived as immaterial the long-cherished dogmas of theology and accepted as permanent only the simple but untried social teachings of Jesus. Mr. Parrington's open admiration for Parker and his equally open contempt for much that passes current as religion did not endear the late professor of English to those churches that have surrounded the university campus with the obvious if unexpressed intent to counteract the "subversive" views of such men. Fortunately the Parrington virus was usually too powerful for ecclesiastical therapeutics.

In politics, as in religion, Mr. Parrington was a militant democrat, and a democrat he would define as one who loves liberty, both in theory and in practice, and hates ignorance, injustice, and intolerance. His study of American thought was dedicated to J. Alden Smith,

"Scholar Teacher Democrat Gentleman omnium Amicus erat qui Justiciam amant"

There are those who insist that in that dedication the author wrote his own epitaph, true in every stroke.

Like all men to whom individual liberty means something real, Mr. Parrington preferred to study the rise of freedom in America rather than to contemplate its recent debacle. No one in his seminar can ever forget his discriminating treatment of such libertarians as Roger Williams, Franklin, Jefferson, Paine, Garrison, Lincoln, Eugene Debs, and the late Senator La Follette. Under the hand of the historian past politics became present issues. American literature became a masculine thing worthy of a treatment different from that dictated by the Genteel Tradition. Current politics Mr. Parrington watched closely, but it is to be doubted if he had a political party. Almost forty years ago in a small town in Kansas he ran for the school board on the Populist ticket. That action is the surest clue to his political doctrines, for the man was always an agrarian democrat. One of his most frequent quotations was the cryptic remark made by Emerson when industrialism began to overshadow the buoyant individualism of New England: "Things are in the saddle." And "things" in the shape of the instruments of industrialization Mr. Parrington always loathed. No man deplored more than he the passing of the American small farmer with his traditional independence, his physiocratic economics, and his rooted equalitarian principles. Agrarianism today is outmoded, and its votaries are politically homeless, but some men would rather be homeless than to be housed with incompatible fellows.

In his work-a-day philosophy, also, Mr. Parrington freely acknowledged his allegiance to a doctrine that is of the past. The high idealism of such men as Emerson, Thoreau, Garrison, and Parker, their cheery faith in the divine self-sufficiency of the individual, and their contempt for society-made creeds and catchwords set the pitch for the life of this twentieth-century thinker. Few men today have the courage to consider transcendental individualism more notable than a new airport, or agrarian ideals more important than "a million people in Seattle by 1940." Such courage Mr. Parrington had in ample quantity. If any epoch of American development gave him as much pleasure as the Golden Day of the forties, it was the period of ebullient liberalism brought to an untimely close by the World War.

Critics of Mr. Parrington's published work will inevitably arise. The scope of the study was too great and the way too inaccurately charted for any man to travel with unerring precision. But the chief criticism will concern the fundamental point of view; for Mr. Parrington was frankly a liberal and an economic determinist. "Der Mensch ist was er isst," he never wearied of saying, and his liberalism is openly acknowledged on his first page. By so forthright an admission the author drew the sting of many a critic.

Although Mr. Parrington carefully indicated that he was eschewing aesthetic considerations in his study of American literature, it should not be assumed that he was insensitive to verbal beauty. His own style will belie any such assumption, and besides, one of his earliest bits of writing was a warmly appreciative estimate of "The Incomparable Mr. Cabell." Mr. Cabell's appeal was twofold: his matchless prose and his literary and intellectual significance. Poe suffered cavalier dismissal not because he could write, but because he is of no significance in the development of the American mind.

The final estimate of Mr. Parrington must be made on the basis of his published work. On such a basis he must be accounted the flintiest defender of democracy that twentieth-century America has thus far produced. To him equalitarian simplicity in word and act and the right to live one's own life in one's own way were as fundamental as ever they were to any democrat of an earlier, less-regimented society.

We who worked with him can never forget the man as he came into the classroom and seated himself, with easy disdain for academic proprieties, upon the long table that stretched across the front of the room. From this vantage-point, swinging one foot and smiling blandly, he would suddenly pounce upon a student with a volley of Socratic questions that usually shocked the victim into awed silence. Hardier or less sophisticated students would sally to the aid of the distressed one, and the noise of verbal combat would fill the room, only to subside in private debates that frequently were protracted long after the clanging chimes brought the academic day to an official close. Taking notes in a Parrington class was almost impossible, but it was wholly impossible to leave a single session without carrying away some pithy comment that illuminated a whole section of our national life or letters. Above all one carried away a stimulus to labor and to still greater labor. The stimulating presence of the man, the unfeigned interest in our trivial investigations, the unfailing urbanity of manner, and the guiding touch of the skilled instructor are gone forever, but the books and the vivifying memories are left us.

In the Driftway

HAY is still made on our farms, the Drifter is glad to discover, because he has seen the process going on within the last few weeks. Until then he had begun to wonder if haymaking was not an extinct industry, because all the stories he heard were of people who tried to give away crops of hay on the hoof, so to speak, and could find no takers. Time was when anybody with a few acres of likely grass would be visited by a nearby farmer who would offer to cut and haul it off, paying a fair sum for the privilege. Then, as the automobile spread, the offers were merely to cut and take away the hay. Finally the time seems to have arrived when one has to go out and coax somebody to accept the grass as a gift, and then, after an unenthusiastic taker has been found, he commonly forgets to come and cut it.

* * * * *

BUT lately the Drifter has been reassured that hay is still made, not only because he has seen the process going on but also because he has read an appreciation of haying in the Minneapolis Journal, which calls the occupation the most romantic of all farm work. The Drifter is more impressed by the words of the newspaper than by his recent glimpse of haying, which seemed somewhat less magnificent than his boyhood recollections. The Drifter left the farm too young ever to have sat in the seat of the mighty at haying time, that is to have run a mower. It was always his ambition to do so, and he thought then—and thinks today—that he would have made good. The Drifter agrees with the Minneapolis Journal that nothing on a farm has quite the zest of driving the clicking teeth of a mowing machine through thick red clover or tall timothy behind two fine horses. But the Drifter had the next best job; he used to ride the hayrake, collecting the beautifully fragrant new-dried grass and dumping it in windrows as straight and regular as possible. Also he was allowed to help load the wagons, standing on top and tramping the hay down as it was thrown up. Somebody more skilful than he was up there too, distributing the hay and piling it scientifically until the horses were almost obscured and the load had reached a prodigious height, towering, as the Drifter recalls it, about to the summit of Mount McKinley. Then there was the ride to the barn, perhaps the best part of all the fine drama of haying. And at the barn the Drifter had another job. He led the horse which ran the fork by which the hay was snatched in great gobs from the wagon, swung up to an opening in the top of the barn, and dropped safely inside.

* * * * *

YES, haying is—or was—the pinnacle or romance on a farm. Harvesting is more monotonous, and the grain field lacks the fragrance of the meadow overlaid with new-dried hay. The most eminent perfume makers of France have yet to produce a choicer scent. But probably it is well that the Drifter left the farm before he was promoted to the seat of a mowing machine, and it is a fair guess that the writer in the Minneapolis Journal hasn't worked in a hayfield in twenty years. Actual farmers are an ungrateful lot with but little appreciation of their blessings, even when reminded of them by folks in the city. No doubt the farmer is what the politician calls him, the "backbone of the nation," but his only evidence of that fact is that the end of the day so often finds him with a backache.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Jingoism and the Press

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read with interest "England and America," by Charles E. Payne. However, I feel that like many other writers for The Nation Mr. Payne does the press of the United States injustice when he uses such phrases as "There is much evidence that even now the American public is beginning to resent the kind of foreign news service it has thus far received—." A few lines farther on he says, seeming to realize this injustice, "It is only just to add that an influential part of our press and the better weeklies on both sides of the Atlantic have done yeoman service in this same direction." These two statements are too contradictory to justify the sweeping innuendo contained in the first.

It is perfectly true the Hearst press is a jingo note in the newspaper symphony. But there are only twenty-nine Hearst papers in the United States, which has more than 2,000 newspapers published daily. Does Mr. Payne consider that the Associated Press, the United Press, and such papers as the Chicago Daily News, the New York World, the New York Times, and scores of others are deliberately presenting distorted pictures of affairs in the nations in which they are represented? I doubt it. His entire essay is too well balanced and sensible to admit of such an assumption. But that is substantially what he implies.

As a matter of fact Mr. Payne should know that today the American public is receiving a truer picture of other peoples, more unbiased and factual news, and more honest and intelligent editorial opinion on not only foreign but domestic affairs than any other people in the world. I make this statement without reservations and every experienced American journalist knows it to be true.

Rochester, N. Y., July 15 PAUL BENTON

Injustice to Germany

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just finished reading the editorial in your issue of June 19, entitled The Liquidation of the War. This is a hard life. I suppose we must be grateful for small things and rejoice that a settlement of some sort was reached. But at the same time should be remembered the fundamental facts that all the leading warring nations had a share in bringing on the war, that the responsibility of none of them can be measured in money, and that hence to demand any payment at all from Germany beyond a share in the rehabilitation of devasted territory is basically unjust.

Those who believe that the reparations settlement has laid the cornerstone of a peaceful Europe should feel the intensity of the resentment against it in Germany. For the jingoists and reactionaries it is raw meat, and even the Socialists find it very difficult to hang on to their international idealism when they see their country being so consistently kicked by the rest of the world.

Ilagen in Westfalen, Germany, July 2 SPEAR KNEBEL

Southern Race Prejudice

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Nation is inclined to overestimate the race prejudice of the South. If Mrs. Hoover should entertain a family of Negroes at the White House for a week-end the South would not "storm" so much as you seem to think. The ripple in the South caused by Mrs. De Priest's visit to the White House was as much of interest as it was of resentment. Of course the old Southern mind still works in a subconscious way as manifested by the actions of some of the Southern State senates, but the more alert Southerners looked upon the incident only with interest.

Lynchburg, Va., July 8 T. Y. Steptoe

Loyalty and Liquor

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: If naturalization courts cannot be satisfied with general declarations of loyalty to the constitution and laws of the United States, but must question a candidate for naturalization narrowly about his willingness to conform in this or that particular respect, why in the name of Mahershalalhashbaz don't they catechize them about their loyalty to the law that there is most danger of their being disloyal to, that is, the Volstead Law?

Steven T. Byington

Ballard Vale, Massachusetts, July 7

Money for Gastonia

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The American Civil Liberties Union would greatly appreciate an opportunity to clarify for its friends among your readers certain facts bearing on the relation of the Union to the defense of the Gastonia cases which will come to trial July 29.

A number of clear civil liberties issues are involved, such as the right to organize and to strike, the right to hold lawful meetings and enjoy free speech, the right to be unmolested in a private domain, the right of private opinion, and the right to a fair trial in court. But the overshadowing fact in this case is that men and women are being held for their lives on strictly criminal charges. In such a situation civil liberties issues, however important, are necessarily subordinate. We therefore recognize the reasonableness of the insistence by the International Labor Defense, which specializes in working-class cases and has a particular interest in this group of defendants, that the defense should be conducted under that organization's sole sponsorship.

At the same time the American Civil Liberties Union is keenly and sympathetically interested. Conscious of that interest and anxious to be helpful, many of our friends have been asking us to receive contributions for the support of the case. While we cannot under the circumstances ask for such contributions, we have decided to form a fund for the convenience of those who would like to help. Such amounts as we receive will be turned over to John R. Neal of the defense counsel to be disbursed at his discretion strictly for legal defense and expenses. Checks may be made payable to the American Civil Liberties Union and mailed to 100 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

New York, July 25 Forrest Bailey

The Gangster

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of July 10 you give a very interesting account of the research of Dr. William J. Hickson into the case of the gangster. The gangster is the ideal soldier from the drill sergeant's viewpoint. "He does not kill for revenge. He is superstitious and talks a great deal about religion. He is sentimental and has a childlike code of honor. Shooting is part of his business. He kills without a quickening of the pulse and he can die without a tremor."

The official instructions to recruits tell the initiate that he must put away all ideas of chivalry or sportsmanship, and that he must cease to think, and learn only to obey. Has not the gangster these qualifications well developed in addition to the other soldierly qualities enumerated? The obvious outlet for the gangster's energy is an American equivalent of the French Foreign Legion, the Algerian regiment, one of the most efficient military associations in the world. I submit this solution in all seriousness. We have been given such a silly idea of the soldier that many might jump to the conclusion that this letter is ironical. Let us face the facts like intelligent beings and we have found the drill sergeant's ideal soldier.

Oakland, Calif., July 17 E. Scott

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
August 5—Mr. Blanshard
August 12—Mr. Mussey

Contributors to This Issue

William C. Murphy, Jr., is on the staff of the tariff bureau of the New York World.

Ernest K. Moy is American director of the Kuo Min News Agency of China.

Harold Kellock is an American journalist, now connected with the Soviet Union Information Bureau.

Russell Blankenship is associate professor of English at Whitman College.

Eda Lou Walton is the editor of "A City Day," an anthology of city poetry.

Alice Beal Parsons's new novel, "The Insider," has recently been published.

J. A. Hobson is a foremost British economist and a contributing editor of The Nation.

Anita Brenner contributes to The Nation frequently on Latin-American topics.

William MacDonald is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

William Seagle is on the staff of the Encyclopaedia of Social Sciences and is co-author of "To the Pure. . . ."

Luther Emerson Robinson is professor of English at Monmouth College and author of "Abraham Lincoln As a Man of Letters."

K. K. Kawakami is Washington representative of the Osaka Mainichi.

Books

Fiddler's Green

BY AUDREY WURDEMANN

The boatman winnowed by a windy wrath
Will find him here a quarter from the storm
That takes him suddenly—his rest be warm
Where phosphorescent fishes light his path.

The waves are fitting cerements for sailors.
Let the white foam be delicate and kind
To all the earthly ones who have a mind
To probe these winding caverns with their oars.

They will sink down to quiet here, and turn
From restless flesh to peaceful, silent things,
And little silver fish with fins like wings
Will thread the ways from rib to rib, and learn

The spacing of the eyes, hands warped by sails,
The wonder of hard wrists and ankles set
Point within point; and then they will forget,
In chasing golden minnows' flashing tails.

Such is this haven; sullen waters bless
These coraled bones. Here is a final home,
A sunken city far beneath the foam,
Where all is thunder and then quietness.

Loneliness

By EDA LOU WALTON

Down the dark funnel speeding
Like a flame and gone,
Steel-coupled day; and every windowed face
Receded with a flicker, and the one
Memory a whistle struck on air.
No station anywhere, no tree gone bare
Holding its widowed strength to a warm wall.
Tunnel on tunnel, in and out, the flash
Of day across the forehead like a lash,
Then tears and the recessional of light.

Somewhere within the pound of steel
The sun gone down, and twilight like a wheel
Whirled on a star between two mouths of dark;
Then acrid and eternal the curved night
To circumscribe a brain. Too smooth for pain
The undulating flight waning
To stunned acceptance.
Contained within a circle and denied
The lanced side, the thorn-crowned brow,
Downward and downward sucked to center now
In slackened and reiterative speed,
Till earth is funneled upward from the breast,
And all rock roaring downward,
And the crushed heart may bleed,
And slow to rest.

Mary Webb

Precious Bane, Gone To Earth, Armour Wherein He Trusted, Poems and The Spring of Joy, The House in Dormer Forest, Seven for a Secret, The Golden Arrow. By Mary Webb. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50 each.

WE are only beginning to apprehend the loss literature suffered when Mary Webb died on October 8, 1927; its full extent we shall be many years learning. That she should have died before her time and through the privations of poverty, becomes a sorer wound to me with each of these lovely books I read; for she who could not afford the necessary care to save her life and who stood in the Shrewsbury Market selling her vegetables and flowers, gave bounteously as only a few can ever give. Her gifts stand now on my shelves, all nicely bound, all nicely printed, all introduced by famous men and women who were able to recognize genius while it still lived among them, but I who write and many of you who read have come to her too late to help the passionate loving woman who lived.

There are those who can love only the sort of country they know, mountain dwellers who look with aversion on the plain, and plains dwellers who are stifled in the mountains. Such will need to be led gently to Mary Webb, or to be told that she belongs to the small company of great writers and that one should approach her with respectful awe as one does Dr. Eliot's shelf; for her country is her own. Like the land of "Seven for a Secret," it lies "between the dimpled lands of England and the gaunt purple steeps of Wales—half in Faery and half out of it." Her people are her own. Their speech, observed with tender fidelity, is the rich idiom of Shropshire, their lives such as were lived in Shropshire in their several days; but she has woven them and the sights and sounds and scents among which they lived into patterns that are like the webs the poet spins. Seeming often to be as unlike everyday day as "Wuthering Heights" or "The Cenci," they nevertheless hold everyday life within them.

Robert Lynd writes of her that she "has that always fascinating quality of genius, imaginative energy," and that for this energy we will forgive her her defects, as we do "Dumas, the seventy times seven to be forgiven," and Victor Hugo and Emily Brontë. I prefer to take her without forgiveness, without asking the wild deer to be a blooded hunter, or White of Selborne to write like Thackeray or Lamb; and yet I know why he uses the word. Taken literally there is a naive wish-fulfilment quality in all the tales. The wicked perish and the righteous prevail. One thread is repeated in each pattern, that of the physically ill-favored but intrinsically beautiful woman who wins in time the one perfect man. Mrs. Webb exhausts her ingenuity in devising situations that unexpectedly reveal this woman in her own true beauty; and the situations she contrives are those a romantic young girl sighing for her lover would dream. But there is also wisdom in this naivete, and the books are not to be taken literally.

Their author will go down as one of the great writers of our time. Few have loved the English countryside as passionately as she, and only one or two have united to such love a keenness and precision of observation so great that it is a constant joy to read her pages.

> There are the twisted hawthorne trees,
> Thick-set with buds, as clear and pale
> As golden water or green hail. . . .

"The pollen grain of chicory—an outer and inner hexagon united by rays—is a rose-window in a shrine of lapis lazuli.

It needs no light behind it, for it illumines itself." Old-country legends, salty gossip, delighted her, and she has woven them richly into her pages. Wherever her emotions were not involved she had a lively sense of character, and quite as lively a talent for making it live. Her Jonathan at odds with the material world should live with Touchstone, her Enoch with some of Tolstoy's wise earthy men. "Missus Miller was a poor creature like a mealworm, but very pleasant spoken. Sexton's missus was just the opposite. She always made me think of a new painted coach, big and wide, with an open road, and the horn blowing loud and cheerful, and full speed ahead. . . ." Gideon, "with the wounded look that is ever on the faces of men between the coming of the lust of the eye and its satisfying." Her lyrical prose has a precise and tender beauty; and on every page she expressed her glowing love of life.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Poor Law

English Poor Law History. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. Part I—The Old Poor Law. $8.50. Part II—The Last Hundred Years. Two volumes. $14. Longmans, Green and Company.

TWO years ago Part I of this monumental work saw the light of day. This spring two portly volumes containing Part II brought to a conclusion what is perhaps the most heroic literary task of our age. For thirty years this incomparable pair have been turning out volumes, laden with original research of materials and minute analysis, upon the structure and functions of English local government. They have done this work amid an immense variety of other political, economic and literary activities connected with the reform movements of the time.

It cannot be pretended that these volumes of Poor Law History are easy reading. Every aspect of our local government has lent itself to variations so numerous as to baffle any generalizing process. Particularly is this true of Poor Law administration. Our early Poor Laws, going back to the Statute of Laborers (1350) were for the most part a series of penal attempts to thrust back the free laborer into the serfdom from which he sought to escape, dealing with issues of Settlement and Vagrancy. The Elizabethan Poor Law was essentially a codification and extension of this process, until in the late Eighteenth Century, the forces of the Industrial Revolution broke the bonds of the older local life, and, by the Speenhamland policy of rate allowances in aid of wages, imposed wholesale pauperism on Southern England. The visible degradations thus brought about, together with the challenge of the new doctrines of Population and of Wages, compelled the Government to take action, and the Royal Commission of 1832 was followed by the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1834. The two volumes of the Webbs describe in detail the evolution within the framework of this Act of a new method of handling problems of destitution.

While the Act of 1834 remained essentially a framework of repression, its administration was continually modified, and the growth of new outside social-economic policies brought its activities more and more into preventive channels. It is in many ways a pathetic, even a tragic, story of the conflict between a repressive policy, dictated by fear, greed, and class bias, and the new spirit of democracy and humanity. From 1834 onwards through the nineteenth century the repressive policy was gradually modified by new structures in the shape of Factory Codes, Education and Public Health Acts, Pension and Insurance. These provisions taken in conjunction with improvements in the character of Poor Law institutions, and the growth of specialized provisions for the sick, the old, the insane, the blind, the children, were found to impair the repressive policy which still remained the orthodox official view. The poorer classes showed less reluctance to accept poor relief, and there was a disquieting growth in the number of recipients of relief and the cost. Hence the appointment of the Commission of 1905-1907 in which Mrs. Webb played such an active part, followed by the launching of an agitation for the break-up of the whole system of Poor Law, and the delegation of its remaining functions to specialized preventive and curative institutions. A large part of this final volume is concerned with the closely related problems of able-bodied pauperism and unemployment. The chapters treating Unemployment as a Modern Disease are particularly deserving of attention, discussing as they do the origins, character and effects of the disease in relation to the defective organization of our economic system. Though seemingly immersed in a flood of local detail, the writers preserve throughout a firm grasp of the larger significance of their problem expressed in the conflict between the two doctrines of "adequate relief" and "less eligibility." How safely to give relief, either "indoor" or "outdoor," that is sufficient to preserve the health and efficiency of destitute families, in a society where wages are so low and irregular, housing so unsanitary and wretched as is still the case with the lowest-paid of our workers in town and country, is indeed a problem that baffles separate solution. The problem can only be solved as an integral part of the wider problem of democracy. "The idols of 1834 have fallen because their clay feet were in the gutter: the ideals of the future must stand on the rock of a general well-being, a deliberately prescribed and effectively enforced National Minimum of Civilized Life."

J. A. HOBSON

The Mysterious Aborigine

Old Civilizations of the New World. By A. Hyatt Verrill. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $5.

THE ideal outline of native American history has not yet been written, and it may never be, because the task is formidable. Awe of ancient peoples is common to most authors not very familiar with their records, and a clear account can hardly be expected under such an affliction. A professional archaeologist seldom takes any attitude but that of the detective he resembles by the nature of his work, but his account is usually technical, and unless he knows a great deal about his subject he can rarely write simply enough for popular consumption. Most attempts suffer from this lack of profound familiarity, and from the habit of speaking of human phenomena in the limited terms of science; and from dull writing.

"Old Civilizations of the New World" is no exception to this unfortunate precedent. The author, an explorer and collector in Central America, has followed a previous "popular account" of the North American Indian with this volume about the organized civilizations of the New World. In relation to this area the book compares favorably with Paul Radin's recent poetic account because Mr. Verrill gives much more information and includes numerous and interesting illustrations. However, Mr. Verrill's notion of "popularizing" appears to be limited to the literary device of sprinkling many superlative adjectives through a diffuse text. To call the Mayas, Peruvians, Aztecs, and other of our cultured neighbors astounding, amazing, remarkable, unique, incredible, fascinating may sound impressive, but it is not very good reporting, particularly since the book is less clear to the average uninformed but interested reader than, for example, Joyce's older archaeological handbooks, and less entertaining than Stephens's or Charnay's travels in the Maya territory.

Possibly for sensational effect, Mr. Verrill insists that there is something extremely mysterious about the development of the great American civilizations. How could mere Indians think out an astronomical calendar, build pyramids, practice agriculture and medicine, make symmetrical and delicate pottery, weave and dye so intricately, with so few mechanical instruments? How could they carve hard stone with no other chisel or drill than stone or bone and sand, how engrave jade and crystal jewels, how smelt copper, silver, gold with little other resource than well-trained hands and eyes? And how travel as far as they did on foot, or sail so many hundred miles in open boats with no motors?

These questions would probably not be puzzles and problems to a Chinese, an Egyptian, an ancient Greek. The Mycenaeans engraved jewels before they acquired iron. Indeed, most of the Old World civilization we respect so highly was achieved without the aid of much machinery. We have in so many ways substituted instruments for skill, imagination, ingenuity that these qualities acquire for us the glamor of forgotten chemical or mechanical secrets, or their possessors seem to us mysterious supermen. Mr. Verrill is so naively the doubting foreigner that he made what he calls a "test"; he put several natives to carving in the way he thought it might have been done, giving them ancient stone implements to use; and their inexperienced efforts proved to him conclusively that, although no traces of iron or steel have been found in any of the ruins excavated or in any of the collections made by the Spaniards contemporary to the life of these peoples, the native sculptors must nevertheless have possessed them!

One might still consider "Old Civilizations of the New World" a useful book, and compliment Mr. Verrill on his enterprise, had he not undervalued the capacity of his readers in other ways. The thoughtless organization, the small inaccuracies, the wholesale patchwork of technical authorities make the book seem almost a hack job. An owl and the well-known quetzal bird, Mr. Verrill captions Plumed Serpent; a native pictograph of warriors attacking an island, interpreted by Joyce and other authorities as precisely an attack on an island, Mr. Verrill unaccountably titles Feast of Xipe Topec. He states that the famous Dwarf's House at Uxmal in Yucatan is named so because it seems to have been built for supernatural occupants, as the doors are for too small for human beings. As a matter of fact the name is based on a legend, and the doors and windows of the buildings are the size normal in Maya architecture; they may to a hasty eye appear smaller because the lower portion of the building is buried.

Two portions of the book, based on the author's research, are valuable. One reports archaeologically an extremely ancient settlement or "culture" in Panama. The other is titled Where Montezuma Still Rules and is an account of the Aztecs or Nahuas isolated at the time of the conquest in the northwestern hills of the isthmian region. Mr. Verrill lived among these reticent people long enough to become familiar with their habits, their clothing, many of their ideas, and some of their rites. He describes a people so similar in all these things to the Mexicans whom colonial missionaries three hundred years ago proselytized that this chapter might almost be a vivid condensed version of their records.

Mr. Verrill nevertheless remarks that "most of the ancient Aztec customs and observances have been lost or forgotten during the centuries that the tribe has been isolated. . . ." This is typically your cautious scientist's tone, and it contrasts confusingly with the flaunting clamor of the portions referring to the pre-Spanish state of these same people. One assumes that Mr. Verrill could not decide whether to be an archaeologist or a successful journalist, and one concludes that the latter choice was not fully justified.

ANITA BRENNER

An Old-Fashioned Tyrant

Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria. A Biography. By Joseph Redlich. The Macmillan Company. $5.

PROFESSOR REDLICH has succeeded remarkably well in writing a life of Francis Joseph without turning the narrative into a history of Austria or of the Europe in which Austria long played a great part. The task was the more difficult because Francis Joseph, more than most rulers of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, identified himself with the state so completely that the one is not to be understood at all without the other. Professor Redlich gives enough of the historical setting to enable the reader to keep the place, but his chief concern is with the personal traits of the Emperor and the influence of his personality and ideas of government in making Austria, and the later Dual Monarchy, what they were.

Francis Joseph, born in 1830, became Emperor of Austria in 1848, and died as late as 1916. Into his unprecedentedly long reign was crowded a succession of great events: the revolutions of 1848, the war with Prussia which excluded Austria from the German Confederation, the Franco-Prussian War with its seeds of later conflict, the unification of Italy with its accompanying territorial losses by Austria, and somewhat more than half of the World War. Throughout a period in which political liberalism, in one form or another, was making strong headway in Western Europe, Francis Joseph stood as the most marked embodiment of royal absolutism. Time and circumstances forced him to yield something to constitutionalism, but it was only a concession, and his views remained the same. It was always his will that was to prevail, always the people that were to be governed, not for his pleasure but for their own good as he saw it.

His personal characteristics, as exhibited by Professor Redlich, were such as today have begun to seem remote. "His outstanding intellectual defect was a complete lack of imagination." Although he showed, in his later life, "an extraordinary understanding of men," he was not attracted by personality, and his own thoughts were not profound. "In his youth, and right on up to his death, Francis Joseph was dominated, spiritually and intellectually, by the notion of maintaining intact the might of the dynasty whose head he had become through his accession to the throne, and preserving the foundations of this might, namely, all the territories of his realm, as a unit." Only from this point of view is his foreign policy in particular to be understood. It is not surprising, therefore, that he never knew his people, and "literally never saw or heard a free independent person, not even from among the ranks of the high nobility. He did not even see his ministers often, and then as a rule only on official business." He could speak of the Bohemians as "numbskulls," of the Italians as "calculating and cheats," of the Magyars as "obstinate."

There is something imposing, little as there may be to admire, in the picture of the old Emperor struggling to uphold a theory of government which was fast being discredited. "The unmistakable change in public opinion in the wider sense, both within and without his realm, on his personality," which toward the end of his life brought him popularity and confidence, is associated, in Professor Redlich's mind, with an almost instinctive popular apprehension of the essentially tragic nature of his career. The tragedy, however, was in the imperial idea, hopelessly at odds with the temper of the age. He did not live to see the downfall of his empire, and "succeeded only in maintaining what existed so as to be a burden to his successor." If destiny gave him that mission, he may at least be said to have fulfilled it.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

A Popular Moralist

A Preface to Morals. By Walter Lippmann. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

I IMAGINE that the most disconcerting thing that can happen to any moralist is suddenly to find himself popular. The warmth with which Mr. Lippmann's "A Preface to Morals" has been received makes him undoubtedly a popular moralist. It is only in part that the phenomenon can be explained by his suavity and charm. There appears to be not much comfort in the first of the two parts into which the argument of the book itself is divided. It is devoted to an exposition of the moral anarchy which has been caused by the decay of religion and the traditional order not only in our personal lives but in the public affairs of business and government. But it becomes obvious soon that our moralist is not addressing himself to the too sophisticated modern, judging from the fact that he is at pains to show at such great length that it is only a personal God who can be real, and only personal immortality that can have meaning. This, indeed, is done with such conviction that one awaits with alarm the apparently inevitable conclusion that we must return to faith. It comes almost as an agreeable surprise when religion is finally rejected as a possible way of life in the modern world.

But this apparent disharmony of purpose which really divides the book against itself is shrewd as far as its ultimate objective is concerned. Its second part is given over to an attempt to reconstruct the shattered foundations of morality in the course of which all the traditional virtues are rediscovered as the truths which all the saints and sages have been teaching for countless generations. However, since authority and the modern spirit are incompatible, these precepts are no longer to be accepted upon authority but for their own sake and are to be observed without regard for possible benefits or our own desires but in a noble spirit of mature "disinterestedness," constituting a modern "humanism" and a "high religion." An evident element of attraction is at once discoverable in a system of morals without authoritarianism, compounded of the ancient and incontrovertible virtues of honor, decency, and loyalty, particularly when it is assumed that they are simple and static instead of constantly changing under different conditions of life. Moreover, the mistake has been avoided of calling this morals without authoritarianism by that forbidding word which has been current for many decades since Darwin, to wit, "ethics."

Mr. Lippmann's adumbration of the moral man as one who has achieved maturity in "disinterestedness" seems at first glance less consistent with the demands of a popular morality. But for the very reason that it implies a severe stoicism it may very well appeal to more conventional minds who have had a background and training in Christian resignation. On the other hand, to freer minds who find themselves confused by the complexity of the Great Society it may well come as a welcome gospel of justification for "uninterestedness." It implies a certain effortlessness particularly when applied, as Mr. Lippmann applies it, less to personal morality than to the public morality of government and business which we are told are evolving toward this ideal because of the very exigencies inherent in the intricate structure of modern life. The implication seems to be that all will be for the best in the most rapidly self-improving of all worlds. But, alas, the problems of personal morality have not always been decided in the same way as those of public morality even in the modern world. Whatever may be true of the future, Big Business, for instance, if one may judge alone from the power trusts, still hardly warrants this extension of disinterestedness. Mr. Lippmann's mood has certainly changed since he wrote "The Phantom Public."

It may be that I am grossly unfair to him. His concept of "disinterestedness" is not fully communicated and perhaps it has implications that I miss. Cogito ergo sum, for instance, is an exalted and self-evident proposition as far as Descartes is concerned but it becomes a huge joke when applied to a Babbitt. If morals without authoritarianism is simply "ethics," I am afraid that moral "disinterestedness" may similarly be taken for the familiar principle of mutual interest in an ethical system. The truth is that the "humanism" Mr. Lippmann talks about is really a cleverly disguised neo Victorianism. Not even his derivation of the disinterested man from the Freudian mature personality can gainsay the fact. It has been said that "A Preface to Morals" represents a shift of interest on Mr. Lippmann's part from politics to morals. The shift, however, is more apparent than real. He is interested in religion primarily because it is a system of divine government which has helped to make human government easier. And it will be recalled that this was precisely the attitude of the Victorians when Darwinism broke in upon their frightened world. But no true modern would dwell upon the decay of religion and the dissolution of the ancestral order, except as a minor prelude to the confusion that has been brought about in his soul. This personal unhappiness is, however, not the theme of Mr. Lippmann. Despite its connection with modernism, "A Preface to Morals" cannot be called a part of that literature of disillusion which future historians no doubt will recognize as symptomatic of the Middle Ages of science.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Lincoln's Family

The Lineage of Lincoln. By William E. Barton. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $7.50.

THE authentic biographer should be an expert judge of genealogical evidence. As such Dr. Barton has qualified well in matters touching the lineage of Lincoln. This special study embodies his pertinacious research to discover and record a veracious account of Lincoln's forbears, English and American, and to correct errors that have previously been accepted as history. During his several research visits to England he had the assistance of persons who had access to parish and other public records and he made contacts which led to information he desired. He confirms the conclusion of Lea and Hutchinson, whose investigations pointed to Samuel Lincoln, of Hingham, England, as Lincoln's English progenitor, who voyaged to Hingham, Massachusetts, about the year 1637. He verifies the previously published information that Samuel Lincoln's grandson, Mordecai, drifted to New Jersey and later to Berks County, Pennsylvania, whence his descendants took root in Virginia. From these came Captain Abraham Lincoln, who went as a pioneer to Kentucky, where his son Thomas and his wife, Nancy Hanks Lincoln, became the parents of President Lincoln.

This authoritative volume is full of interesting collateral information and comment on seventeenth-century Norfolk out of which Samuel Lincoln emerged during the Puritan migrations to America. The author has succeeded in tracing the ancestor of Nancy Hanks Lincoln to Thomas Hanks, a Puritan of Malmsbury, England, who, following his capture by the king's partisans, was deported to Virginia. Here he became a landowner and, according to Dr. Barton's deductions, one of his descendants, Joseph Hanks, married Ann Lee, who belonged to the Lees from whom General Robert E. Lee descended. Since Joseph and Ann Lee Hanks were the grandparents of Nancy Hanks Lincoln, Abraham Lincoln and Robert E. Lee appear to have belonged to the same house divided against itself.

PLEASE ACCEPT this book free!

. . . and learn how you can get books never before published

for only* 42c each

Article below gives full details. Note coupon . . .

WE offer, free, the book pictured to the right in order to introduce an idea in publishing utterly new to America. It is an idea that brings you fine modern literature at an astonishingly low price.

Briefly, the plan is this. Every month the distinguished Board of Editors pictured below will select a book from the vivid and significant literary work being done today. These books will be books that have never been published before, not reprints. They will be selected from the manuscripts of both American and European authors. Biography, history, fiction and philosophy . . . all will be considered, and only the books of outstanding merit will be chosen. All books will be complete editions. And the names of the Board of Editors are sufficient guarantee that these will be books you want to read.

Early each month you will receive your book by mail. One every month for a whole year. Twelve books for only $5.00. That's less than 42c each!

We are able to offer you good books at such low prices because now, for the first time, the economies of the book club idea are fully passed on to the reader, and because we have eliminated costly cloth binding in favor of attractive paper covers.

And yet, in spite of their low price, these books will be beautiful and durable. Books that you will be proud to own and have on your library shelves.

The cover design, end papers and decorations are by Rockwell Kent, internationally famous artist. The beautiful and readable type pages were designed by Elmer Adler of the Pynson Printers.

The only way you can appreciate how fine these books are is to see for yourself. So we have taken a famous, widely discussed novel, printed it as the Paper Books will be printed, and we now offer to send it to you—free.

This famous book FREE

Send us the coupon at the bottom of this page. By return mail we will send you, postpaid, THE BRIDGE OF SAN LUIS REY, by Thornton Wilder, printed as the Paper Books will be printed.

This book has been published before, of course. But let us send it to you so that you may see for yourself how the Paper Books will look.

Keep this volume for 5 days. Read it. Examine it. Note the distinguished cover design by the famous American artist, Rockwell Kent. Note the attractive type dress, the quality of the paper, the perfect bookmaking. You will quickly appreciate the real beauty of the books, as books.

At the end of 5 days send us $5.00 for a charter subscription for the Paper Books, or return the volume to us.

This unusual offer is good for a limited time only. So mail the coupon now!

THE BOARD OF EDITORS OF THE PAPER BOOKS

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN

PADRAIC COLUM

HORACE M. KALLEN

LOUIS UNTERMEYER

LINCOLN COLCORD

Charles Boni PAPER BOOKS New York

66 FIFTH AVENUE

8 QUICK FACTS ABOUT THE PAPER BOOKS

1. Twelve important new books (standard size) for only $5.00.
2. Literary quality guaranteed by a distinguished Board of Editors.
3. American and European books, both fiction and non-fiction.
4. Bound in durable paper covers designed by Rockwell Kent.
5. Typography by Elmer Adler.
6. You own a new book at the ordinary rental price of second-hand books.
7. Twelve books never before published, delivered to your house postpaid on the day of publication.
8. Free, "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," by Thornton Wilder, if you order now

ALL FOR ONLY $5!

PAPER BOOKS N3
Charles Boni, Publisher
66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Please send me, free, "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" by Thornton Wilder. Within 5 days after receiving the book I will send you $5.00 for a charter subscription for the Paper Books, or return the book.

SEND CHECK WITH COUPON, IF YOU PREFER.

Name.....

Street..... City.....
($5.50 in Canada, $6.00 abroad)

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Dr. Barton flays a number of assumptions which certain biographers, notably Mrs. Caroline Hanks Hitchcock, have employed in their efforts to reconstruct the obscure Hanks family lineage in America. In tracing the Hanks and Lincoln ancestry he finds it necessary to snuff out and bury several fictitious members of both families, a sacrifice he instituted in his life of Lincoln, 1925. One of these interpolations was Mary Shipley, once regarded as the first or second wife of Captain Abraham Lincoln. Dr. Barton is sure that Captain Lincoln had but one wife, whose name was Bathsheba. Other inventions he now discards are Nancy Sparrow, Nancy Shipley Hanks, Elizabeth Shipley Sparrow, and Lucy Shipley Berry. Having definitely, and apparently with good reason, eliminated these fabled Kentucky kinswomen of Lincoln from the biographical account, and having retraced with searching scrutiny the family lineage of both the Hankses and the Lincolns, Mr. Barton has done much to simplify the work of future biographers of Lincoln. LUTHER EMERSON ROBINSON

Lyrics of a Feather

Golden Falcon. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

A Cedar Box. By Robert Nathan. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.

Along Old Trails. By William Haskell Simpson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

Poems from the Ranges. By Charles Erskine Scott Wood. San Francisco: The Lantern Press. $2.

Thalia. By John Finley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.

MOST of these lyrics which have flown to us together have a quality in common—their slightness. They vary, of course, in technical sufficiency, in subject matter, but all of them are flute tones and not piano. One book only, Mr. Wood's, might be said to be trombone.

Of the poets, Robert P. Tristram Coffin has, in my estimation, most poetry. Mr. Coffin in his earlier work dwelt somewhere in a remote past. He was essentially conservative. Something has happened. He has discovered, it seems, Robert Frost and Frost's "modernism." In "Golden Falcon" he has come out of his past and has attempted Frost's suggestiveness. He falls short of it, usually, because he has nothing of Frost's hardiness and ruggedness. He is still like Blake in choice of tiny subjects for large significance and in some of his flashes of mysticism. But he is without Blake's frightening honesty—the quality which, according to Eliot, is most definitive of Blake. I have no desire to suggest in these comparisons that Mr. Coffin is imitative. He is quite himself. His unique gift in verse writing is a gift of language and super-sensitivity. His subjects are slight, but his language is so perfectly explicit, so delicately musical in sentence composition that his poems are unmistakably his own. He has the precision of a scholar and the leanings of a mystic. The combination makes for a chrysalis of wording through which, in its glasslike clarity, one sees the subject matter growing from grub to butterfly. Often within the last of his consistent quatrains the lines come which set the wings free under sunlight:

> The trees in worship fill the world
> With prayers benign and wise,
> On all the altars of the night
> Burn the moth's cool eyes.

That Mr. Coffin is a sincere artist no one can doubt; that he penetrates a universe delicately but intensely meaningful to himself, is evident. When he says

> I have kept the ancient law,
> I have written what I saw. . . .

no critic would question him. "Golden Falcon" is poetry which describes in perfect taste a religious search through bird and beast and flower for a definition of God.

> Golden, cruel word of God
> Written on the sky!
> Living things are lovely things
> And lovely things must die.

Robert Nathan, known better for his poetic prose, gives us in "The Cedar Box" slighter poetry than that which he defines as prose. He has not the penetration nor the perfection of Mr. Coffin. His themes are more general. But he uses the quatrain aptly and his brief character sketches are interesting; as this, The Mountaineer:

> He came from hills to comfortable plains
> With eyes like scars,
> Weary of mountain sun and mountain rains,
> Weary of stars.
>
> He sought a home. He was a lonely man,
> With mountain ills.
> He found one shelter—in a caravan
> Bound for the hills.

There is economy here and intuition and sensitiveness of introspection. "The Cedar Box" is worth looking into.

William Haskell Simpson has discovered "along old trails" the natural religion and intense coloring of the Pueblo Indians. His poems have been influenced by Pueblo lore and by Mexican melancholy. Both have childishly direct expression. And the chief virtue of Mr. Simpson's work is that he keeps just this childish directness in his poems. The songs which are taken from the Indian are not so successful as interpretations by other well-known poets, such as Alice Corbin Henderson, Lew Sarett, and Mary Austin, but the songs which are Mr. Simpson's interpretation of what he himself has seen in the Spanish-Indian country are more interesting. The forms are free, often too free—this in imitation of Indian song structure and without the exact parallelism which conventionalizes true Indian song. His subject matter is almost entirely Southwestern, personal only in that it is a sensitive man's reaction to that country.

> At Cordova the adobes hang on tight, > and this you may see, with seeing eyes:
> young hills, that push the sky up;
> old hills, that slide down to a singsong river.
> and this you may see, riding up or down:
> José and Maria, who cross themselves;
> they hug little Jésus Maria closer;
> they stir the fire—
> the smokes ride up with the high-riding hills.

The pictorial quality of the verse makes one wonder if Mr. Simpson may not also be a painter.

Charles Erskine Wood can never be accused of "slightness." He blows a robust horn. He is a Western rancher giving us the West expansively. "Cows bawl," "carrion birds wing," "the sky is above and the desert flood of silence all around," and Mr. Wood's prayer is to be laid on the hill-top close to the sky. His verse is always strong and refreshing wind. It is certainly not always good poetry. His best effects are those of open-air oratory.

The masque has, in the past, been a beautiful poetic form. It is high time that poets turned to it again. But John Finley in his "Thalia" has made the mistake of thinking that a modern masque should be written in archaic language and on an old pastoral theme. His animal characters, his countrymen are the usual figures. The play within the masque has the old theme of the werewolf. The result is that for the modern reader the long poem, despite its evidence of careful workmanship, is dull.

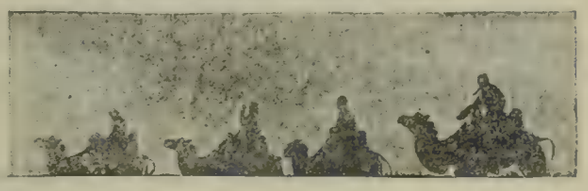
EDA LOU WALTON

Fiction Briefs

The Pathway. By Henry Williamson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.50.

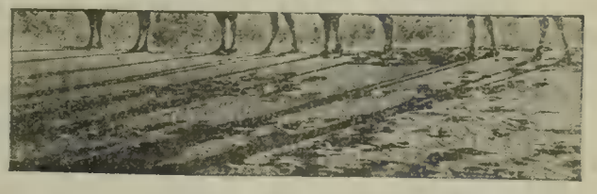
It is a pity that Mr. Williamson's recent novel has had to endure so much unthinking and rhapsodical praise, particularly from English critics who should know better. His gifts are undeniable and have been on exhibition ever since "The Dreams of Fair Women": a really beautiful and passionate feeling for landscape, weather, and animals; a style, occasionally over-fluent and uncritical of itself, but suffused with an admirable lyric quality; and a terrific sincerity. These talents have never been so finely demonstrated as in "The Pathway"; but there is nothing more added to indicate that Mr. Williamson is a great novelist or that he, as yet, measures up to the laudation which has been showered upon him. The fact that he has attacked a great and simple theme (the revolt of the Christ-Shelley temperament against the barbarism of our times) has perhaps moved critics to applaud his artistry when they should be merely admiring his courage. It requires only a little reflection for one to realize that Mr. Williamson finds it so hard to divorce himself from his hero, Willie Maddison, that his book falls inevitably into sentimentality and a rather painfully obvious self-pity. Further, the temper of his mind is almost exclusively lyric; and the result is that his hero, ostensibly a poet and philosopher, gradually becomes so de-intellectualized as to appear positively sappy. His tirades against the brutalities of civilization are so repetitious and vapid that the reader rapidly tires of his personality; and the last straw is added when the author, in an orgy of teary self-indulgence, sends his hero to a watery grave almost slavishly in accord with the Shelley tradition. It is clear from this over-ambitious work that Mr. Williamson would do well to cultivate his own garden and re-employ himself in the depiction of those scenes of English rural life where he is so thoroughly at home.

The Coat Without Seam. By Maurice Baring. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.



Reading "The Coat Without Seam" is like looking through an old postal-card album of Europe. Here are pictures of Constantinople with Turks still in national dress, glimpses of St. Petersburg still with its Romanoff name and statutes, scenes from France before the American invasion, and series of Rome without any gentlemen in black shirts posed before the ruins. Conversation among educated people still affords an evening's amusement. The symbol of life comes from Golgotha instead of Vienna, and only an incorrigible young journalist worries about its meaning. The modulated charm of "The Puppet-Show of Memory" is, however, lacking. Like the postal card the style is too concise, too constrained to tell the whole story. There is no invention in the handling of the material. Christopher's experiences are listed like the items of an inventory and are equally uncorrelated. While the variations of the legend of the "Coat" are of interest in themselves they make clumsy transitions between episodes. As in Mr. Baring's other novels the characters are the best part of the book.

Marie Bonifas. By Jacques de Lacretelle. Translated from the French by Winifred Stephens Whale. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.



Contrary to much of the comment given this book in America, it is not enough to say that "Marie Bonifas" is another study of perversion. M. de Lacretelle's heroine differs from similar women in recent novels in that her life has a natural fulfilment in spite of her unnatural partiality for members of her own sex. What seems to pass equally unnoticed is that the author's chief concern is with the rule rather than the exception of her character, and that this rule is of such unusual measure that the abnormality, although lending a certain strangeness to her personality, is secondary in comparison. Moreover, we can think of no other writer of the present—unless, perhaps, of another Frenchman, Mauriac—who could set himself such limitations and realize such possibilities without sacrificing any of the essential unity of the individual. It takes mastery in delineation to sustain an intrinsic harmony between the jealous, impulsive child who strikes down her rival with her fist, the anguished, suspicion-stung woman who doubts her own sanity, and the decorous person in black who wears the colored ribbon of an order on her dress. M. de Lacretelle does this and does it with conviction. Marie Bonifas is sound and impressive; astride her old mare, riding alone to make a truce with the German army, she is magnificent.

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Starting This Saturday, August 3rd
DOUBLE-FEATURE PROGRAM
FIRST SHOWING IN AMERICA

"THROUGH THE DEATH-DESERTS OF ASIA" VIVID! ACTUAL!
WITH SVEN HEDIN
A HAZARDOUS TWO-YEAR EXPEDITION TO THE UNKNOWN REGIONS OF TIBET and MONGOLIA

and on the same program—
"WARNING SHADOWS"
a sequel to "NOSFERATU THE VAMPIRE"

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th St., bet. 5th and 6th Aves. Spring 5095-5090
Continuous Daily—2 P. M. to Midnight.

Last Two Days—Thur., Fri., Aug. 1-2
"LIFE OF BEETHOVEN"—
and on the same program
"So This Is Paris" and "The Prince of Rogues."

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

International Relations Section

Bethlehem, Britain, and the Chinese Navy

By K. K. KAWAKAMI

ON July 1 the National Government at Nanking announced that "an agreement has been signed by the Chinese and British Governments providing for the training of Chinese naval cadets in England and for the engagement by the Chinese Government of a British naval mission to assist in the development of the Chinese navy." It was also stated that "the Chinese Government has a comprehensive program for the building of a substantial navy, and that it is its intention to construct certain vessels in Great Britain."

The significance of this announcement will be the better appreciated if one remembers the secret contract of October 21, 1911, whereby the Chinese Government agreed, among other things, to buy from the Bethlehem Steel Corporation all the necessary materials for the naval vessels it might construct. This agreement, though eighteen years old, is intact and valid. As late as 1923 the American Government, in a memorandum addressed to the diplomatic corps at Peking, officially endorsed and supported it, "reserving the eventual rights of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation under its contract of October 21, 1911."

The interesting question is whether the American Government will acquiesce in that section of the new Nanking-London agreement under which Chinese warships are to be built in British yards. If it does its intention, presumably, is to let the Bethlehem agreement lapse, or at least that part of it which obligates the Chinese Government to purchase all materials from the Bethlehem Steel Corporation required in China's naval construction.

Even if the above-mentioned provision of the Bethlehem contract is superseded, in whole or in part, by the British agreement, that contract has another equally important aspect which, provided that the American Government's intention conveyed to the diplomatic body at Peking in 1923 remains unchanged, will continue to be a matter of no small concern to Japan. For the Bethlehem agreement, not only contains a monopolistic provision for the supply of naval materials, but also calls for the construction of a navy yard at Samsah Inlet and a dockyard at Mavee, both near the port of Fuchow in Fukien Province across narrow straits from the Japanese island of Formosa.

The Bethlehem contract was, as I have said, concluded in great secrecy, and its contents have ever since been jealously guarded. But no agreement of such importance and magnitude can be kept entirely secret. In 1911, even before it was actually signed, enough leaked out to cause alarm in Japan. The Japanese newspapers in those days raised a hue and cry against the "American imperialism" evidenced in the Bethlehem project. They were not entirely unreasonable. They recalled that only a decade before the American navy sought to establish a coaling station at exactly the same place where the Bethlehem Steel Corporation now proposed to build a navy yard. In 1900 John Hay, then Secretary of State, asked the Japanese Government if it would object to the American Navy leasing land at Fuchow for the purpose of establishing a coaling station there. Japan, politely but in no uncertain terms, expressed disapproval, and the American Government was considerate enough not to press the matter. The correspondence on this question is now a matter of public record.

But when the Bethlehem agreement was made, the Japanese could not but feel that it was the old scheme in new guise. True, the navy yard and dockyard were to be built by the Bethlehem Steel Corporation for the Chinese Government, but inasmuch as China, of course, had no money to pay for them, they would be controlled by the American corporation which would in turn be influenced by the Navy Department at Washington. I do not say that the suspicion was justifiable or unjustifiable. I only state a fact. In fact, Secretary Hay's sounding of Japan in 1900 and the Bethlehem agreement of 1911 furnished the motive for that clause of Japan's famous or infamous "twenty-one demands," whereby she sought to establish the principle that she should be previously consulted should China need foreign capital for railway or harbor construction in Fukien Province.

That the American Government, at least up to 1923, officially supported and defended before the Powers the Bethlehem agrement of 1911 is also a matter of record. This became known in connection with the arms embargo which was established for China by an international agreement in 1919, and which was removed only three months ago. As the embargo has an important bearing both upon the Bethlehem agreement and the new Sino-British naval agreement, we may take a glance at it.

The embargo agreement was made among the foreign representatives at Peking in 1911, on the initiative of Dr. Paul S. Reisch, then American Minister to China. It provided that in view of the factional strife prevailing in China the Powers should "restrain their subjects and citizens from exporting to or importing into China arms and munitions of war and material destined exclusively for their manufacture until the establishment of a government whose authority is recognized throughout the whole country, and also to prohibit during the above period the delivery of arms and munitions for which contracts have already been made but not executed." This agreement, though couched in general terms, was really aimed at Japan. The Cabinet at Tokyo at that time was headed by General Count Terauchi, who believed that the Government at Peking was China's central authority, recognized as such by the Powers, and that it was best to stabilize it by supplying it with money and munitions of war. Naturally other powers, particularly the United States, were more or less apprehensive. They relished no thought of Peking becoming a tool in Japan's hand. That was the real reason back of the embargo agreement. Whatever the motive, the agreement was just and desirable. It was, and is, best to let China's various factions settle their own disputes.

Soon after the above embargo was established, the Powers concerned also agreed to extend its application to naval armament. This put in abeyance the Bethlehem agreement of 1911, which had remained unexecuted largely because of China's uncertain condition and partly because of Japan's objection. In July, 1922, and again in January, 1923, the American Government, through its minister to China, notified the diplomatic corps at Peking to the effect that although it "reserved the eventual rights of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation under its contract of October 21, 1911," it would, pending the restoration of a unified government in China, take no steps to execute that contract.

In April of this year Sir Miles Lampson, the British Minister to China, proposed to the Peking diplomatic body that the embargo be removed and that the removal be interpreted to apply not only to arms and munitions of war but also to naval armament. Two months later, like a bolt out of a clear sky, Nanking officially announced the agreement with London as stated in the beginning of this article. Had the British Admiralty already struck the bargain with Nanking when Sir Miles proposed the lifting of the embargo? It looks as though the Admiralty has stolen a march on the Bethlehem Steel in the matter of supplying China with naval armament. Will Washington act?

As for China, she will gain nothing, except a negative gain of more foreign debts, by building a navy before she has put her own house in a little better order. One feels that China's internal condition, which caused the Powers to adopt an embargo agreement in 1919, has not materially changed. Meanwhile, the American Government should, it seems to me, remove the injunction it has persistently placed upon the publication of the Bethlehem agreement, for secrecy, however well intentioned, breeds suspicion which may in the light of publicity prove unfounded.

Do you know your

MIDDLETOWN

by Robert S. and H. M. Lynd

"One of the most disconcerting books published in years came out a few months ago under the title "Middletown." "It is a carefully documented, scientific scrutiny of the way life is lived in a typical American community,"—said Raymond B. Fosdick, beginning his Commencement Address delivered at Smith College and printed in the N. Y. Times Special Feature Section.

"The most authoritative book ever written on an American industrial community,"—says Stuart Chase in an article in the current issue of Harper's. $5.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 Madison Avenue New York

The

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS

of

GUY de MAUPASSANT

These famous letters were written to Gustave Flaubert in the years 1878-1880, during which time the rising young French author published his first book of verse. Their extreme wit and daring show clearly the tendencies that gave birth to his genius as one of the world's foremost writers.

His aspirations, enthusiasms and youthful passions so clearly portrayed within the paragraphs of these letters give us an intimate picture of this unusual young man whom nations were to honor in later years.

We have established the authenticity of these letters beyond a doubt, and now offer them to you complete in the coming issues of Plain Talk.

SIMPLY MAIL US THE COUPON BELOW!

Plain Talk is sold everywhere on the newsstands at 35c. a copy, but as a special offer to those who want these hitherto unpublished letters in their libraries, we are offering 5 issues of Plain Talk all for a single dollar. These will contain Guy de Maupassant's letters complete. Send us your dollar with your name and address on the coupon below! Do it now. We would like to know just how many we shall have to print.

PLAIN TALK, Inc.
Dept. 1108, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

I enclose $1 for the next five issues of Plain Talk ($1.75 if purchased at the newsstands), containing the Unpublished Letters of Guy de Maupassant.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

SUMMER

Trout Lake Camp

An Ideal Camp for Adults

On Trout Lake, In the Adirondacks

Tennis Golfing
Horseback Canoeing
Handball Dancing
Basketball Hiking
Baseball Fishing

Splendid Social and Athletic Staff

Unsurpassed Cuisine

Write for Souvenir Booklet

City Office
489 Fifth Ave., Room 409
Tel. Vanderbilt 4197

P. O. Lake George, New York
Tel. Bolton 96

IDEAL OF SMALL CAMPS

ECHO LAKE TAVERN
A Camp for Adults in the ADIRONDACKS
WARRENSBURG N. Y.

5 MILES ABOVE LAKE GEORGE

A Glorious Vacation

Seven clay tennis courts
GOLF—FISHING
Capacity limited to 150

N. Y. Office 33 W. 42 St.
PENnsylvania 8313
R. B. NUDELL
A. B. SILVER

For a glorious SEPTEMBER vacation in the Heart of the Adirondacks

TIMBERLAND

Pottersville New York

Where Congenial Folk Gather

Accommodations in Bungalows—modern in every respect.

Excellent Sport Facilities

TENNIS — HANDBALL — GOLF — SADDLE HORSES — WATER SPORTS. SOCIAL ACTIVITIES and DANCING.

Directors
ESTHER R. KESSLER
MORRIS HARKAVY

N. Y. Office
33 WEST 42ND ST.
PENNSYLVANIA 7663

For reservations apply to N. Y. office.

Booklet on request

Unsurpassed Cuisine, Dietary Laws.

SCOPUS

An Adult Camp of Distinction
IN THE ADIRONDACKS
P. O. LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

City Address
11 WEST 42nd STREET
Longacre 3411

Spend Your Vacation on the shores of the Queen of Mountain Lakes

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

Superb location at "America's first summer resort." All the most desirable camp features. The Wunnishaunta Booklet, sent free, includes pictures of camp activities, auto routes, train and airplane information.

MRS. SADIE BRICKMAN, Hostess
WOLFEBORO, NEW HAMPSHIRE

PIONEER LODGE

A Summer Camp for Adults

Near Thousand Islands

Limited to Seventy-five . . Has all Conveniences in Lodge and Bungalows . . All Sports . . Boating on Large Lake . . Golf Within Fifteen minutes' Walk . . Rate $30 per Week.

Accessible over night by N. Y. Central

STAR LAKE, N. Y.
ST. LAWRENCE COUNTY

N. Y. CITY OFFICE
977 FOX STREET
DAYTON 8752

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.
A Camp for Adults

At Uncas Lodge you will find new charm and congeniality—a rustic camp with all modern facilities—165 acres of woodland and winding brooks all bordering twin lakes—excellent clay tennis courts—cement handball court—basketball—rowing—swimming in crystal-clear waters—dancing—golf within 10 minutes. Additional accommodations for couples. Weekly rates, $25 July; $28 August. Delightful overnight sail via L. I. Sound—$2.88.

Let us send you our booklet.

City Tel.: Ambassador 4684 evenings | Camp Tel.: Norwich 1858 ring 5

WOCOLONA A Workers' Cooperative CAMP

On Beautiful Lake Walton, Monroe, N. Y. 50 miles from N. Y. Modern bungalows, running water, electricity. Lectures, sports, music and dancing. Rates $27 per week—$5.50 per Day. $23 per week in tents. Round trip ticket through our office $2.00 and save $1.60.

Special Low Rates to Members.

COMMONWEALTH COOPERATIVE
799 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY
Room 524

N. Y. Office Phone: Stuyvesant 6015
Camp Phone: Monroe 89

For Your Summer Recreation

The Connecticut hills with their little-traveled roads and trails here afford delightful opportunities for riding and tramping. We keep good saddle horses, and give instruction. Swimming. Environment adapted for rest and concentrated work. Only 1½ hours from New York. Make reservations now for the summer.

TOPSTONE FARM
Mail address: Ridgefield, Conn.
Tel. Ridgefield 648

SECOR LAKE LODGE

on beautiful Secor Lake, N. Y.

One of the few large lakes within 50 miles of New York. Well stocked with [illegible] fish.

An ideal summer camp with excellent facilities for BATHING, BOATING, FISHING, TENNIS

$30 Weekly—Weekends $[illegible] daily

Particular attention paid to menu

Guests met at Lake Mahopac station, N. Y. Central. Write or phone for booklet

SECOR LAKE LODGE
Mahopac Falls, N. Y.
Mahopac 175F3 City: Riverside 9499

Dance! Laugh! Play!

In this glorious Mountain-Lake country.

Special events all season in celebration of our 10th anniversary.

Camp Sports in a Setting of Hotel Comforts

Write for descriptive booklet "N"

NEW MODERN BUILDINGS

KENMORE

North White Lake, N. Y.
Station: Liberty
N. Y. Office: 182 Fifth Ave.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 14, 1929 No. 3345

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 155

EDITORIALS:

The War on Crime 158
The Sweltering Sex 159
Official Lying 159
Justice in Gastonia 160

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 161

WHERE ARE WE FLYING? By George Britt 162

THE CHALLENGE TO LABOR STANDARDS. By Merryle Stanley Rukeyser 164

THE DOMINANT SEX. By T. Swann Harding 166

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 168

CORRESPONDENCE 169

BOOKS AND DRAMA:

Maine: November. By Hal Saunders White 171
Voyage. By Evelyn Scott 171
"The Father of the House." By Henry W. Nevinson 171
Russia Moves On. By Joshua Kunitz 172
More from the Front. By James B. Wharton 173
Tales of Success. By Roland A. Gibson 174
Deux Ex Machina. By James Rorty 174
Epic of the Banana. By Lewis S. Gannett 175
Chinese Portraits. By Signe Toksvig 175
Psychology and Education. By Elisabeth Irwin 175
Japanese Ideals. By William L. Nunn 176
The Vanished Gaucho. By Harriet V. Wishnieff 176
Books in Brief 176

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Color in the Caribbean. By Arnold Roller 178

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 180

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

EVEN POLITICS MAY BE AMUSING. The agony of the Republican Party in New York City, for instance. It is an open secret that the local Republican chieftains—the Hon. Sam Koenig in Manhattan and the Hon. Jake Livingston in Brooklyn, in particular—find it easy to work with Tammany Hall. They get out the Republican vote in national elections and do not bother about city issues. Tammany obligingly provides an adequate number of jobs for the local Republicans, and all is harmonious. It was generally understood that Jesting Jimmie Walker would be reelected this autumn without a serious contest. Enter, however, Fiorello H. La Guardia, wrapped in a long Republican cloak. Mr. La Guardia was in 1924 a supporter of La Follette for President, has on occasion solicited and obtained the Socialist nomination for Congress, and has been sent to Washington both as Socialist and as Republican. He is a wringing Wet, which is popular in New York, has successfully straddled the five-cent subway issue, and has a capacity, unmatched by any local Republican, for getting sympathetic headlines on the first pages of the newspapers. Mr. La Guardia announced that he wanted to be mayor. Party chieftains who knew that he played with the Western Progressives in Washington hooted at the thought. But the politicians soon discovered that he had a rank-and-file following in every district. They tried to stop him by suggesting various estimable nonentities, all of whom declined to be thrust under the Tammany steam roller. The only opposition candidate who had any show was Mrs. Ruth B. Pratt, and the regular politicians would almost prefer a Socialist to a woman. In the end they had to accept Mr. La Guardia. So the party of the seven-cent fare and the power companies, the staunchest group of reactionaries anywhere short of Pennsylvania, will be found nominally cheering for a near-Socialist. It will be entertaining to see whether the Republican machine gives Mr. La Guardia any better support for mayor than the disgruntled Tammany gave Al Smith for President.

IT TOOK THE ARREST of several prominent social leaders, including the daughter of former Governor Pennypacker of Pennsylvania, to arouse the people of Philadelphia to the knowledge that freedom of speech in the cradle of liberty is a dead letter. When the Workers' International Relief called a meeting in Philadelphia on the night of July 26 an audience gathered at the Grand Fraternity Hall to discuss the Gastonia trial and to raise funds for the sixteen prisoners charged with murder in the Southern strike-center. The meeting had not been in progress more than thirty minutes when a corps of policemen with four patrol wagons appeared and arrested the entire gathering of some fifty persons, carting them unceremoniously to the police station, where they were lodged in cells for the night. They were discharged without penalty in the morning, but we hope that they will not let the matter rest there and that they will sue the police for damages. It is time that some one called a halt to the frequent raids upon meetings by police in Philadelphia and in western Pennsylvania. After the police had refused to grant a permit for the meeting on July 26 and had insisted that a permit was necessary, it was discovered that no such formality was legally required and Superintendent of Police Mills admitted that the arrests were "a mistake." If the presence of some of the city's socially elite had not advertised the action of the police, "the mistake" would never have been rectified.

AT LAST A DENT in the high-tariff armor! The Hawley bill, as passed by the House, imposed duties on logs, lumber, and shingles, so as to aid the farmer, we suppose, by making it more expensive for him to get such wood products as might come across the Canadian border. The Senate Committee on Finance on July 30 decided to put them back on the free list. It is not much, but in these hot days we are grateful for small things, particularly for any evidence that the dissatisfaction of the farmers and the rest of us is producing any effect in the framing of tariff schedules. If free lumber should result in cheaper coffins, we should be especially glad, as we are strongly in favor of more and less expensive funerals. We stand ready to furnish the Senate committee with a long list of ultimate consumers of coffins—first-class prospects whom it would be highly desirable to develop as fast as possible into actual consumers, and we urge upon our lawmakers the advantage, from this point of view, of having wood as cheap as possible. The information about the wood schedule the public owes to Senator Couzens, who says, sensibly enough, that as news of the action of the committee in some way apparently leaks from its members to their constituents, he does not propose to be bound by the rule of secrecy under which it is supposed to operate.

THE "MILLION DOLLAR LOBBY" of the utilities companies came in for some attention a year ago. It filled the columns of the newspapers with stories of the virtues of the power companies, taught school children the evils of public operation, filled the ears of Senators with subtle wisdom. But it was, after all, amateurish, compared with the recent triumphs of the power companies' publicity boys. The high point in promotion work for 1929—which should certainly win a Harvard advertising prize—was the feat of persuading the Post Office to get out a special two-cent stamp advertising Mr. Edison's electric light. But a close runner-up has been the publicity given, free of charge, to the advertising stunt of bringing bright boys from forty-eight States to Mr. Edison's New Jersey laboratory. Every day for a week these lads—aided by the forethought of the publicity man in arranging for the simultaneous presence of Messrs. Edison, Eastman, Ford, and Lindbergh—made the front pages. Every day the thought was subtly instilled into impressionable young minds that the electric-light companies yearned to help bright boys and to achieve more inventions, all for the benefit of the dear old Ultimate Consumer. Mr. Edison's name happens to be attached to sundry companies which send out electric-light bills in New York and other cities; and that was all that was needed. Credit for this super-advertising, we understand, belongs to Mr. Edward L. Bernays, "counsel on public relations." If Mr. Ivy L. Lee is to maintain his reputation, he will have to do some tall thinking.

CUPIDITY, NOT STUPIDITY, was the chief cause of the foundering last November of the Lamport and Holt steamship Vestris with the loss of 112 lives, in the judgment of the court of inquiry of the British Board of Trade. This is directly contrary to the facts revealed by the newspaper accounts and the official investigations in this country, where officers and lawyers of the company frightened the crew into silence, leaving the public with the impression that the disaster was due mainly to failure and fatuousness on the part of the ship's company. But the British inquiry brought out the previously concealed fact that the Vestris was dangerously overloaded, and the verdict of the investigators emphasizes above all that on this account the ship was "not fit" for the passage from New York to Buenos Aires. Sanderson and Company, the New York agents of the line, are held chiefly to blame, therefore, for the disaster, while a lesser amount of censure—too little, it seems to us—is visited upon the general manager of the company in London, who knew that the vessel had been overloaded before but took no steps to stop the practice. The crew of the Vestris is practically cleared of blame with the exception of Captain Carey, who is said to have been six hours late in sending his S O S call. But some of the sting is taken out of this criticism by the condemnation as "highly undesirable" of the company's general orders telling a captain that he "must carefully consider the actual amount of peril there may be for the lives under his charge and then judge whether he will be justified or not in fighting his way unaided to the nearest port," success in which will be "a matter of high recommendation as a master." As we have pointed out before, peculiar laxity was possible in the official inspection and control of the Vestris because although a British ship she did not sail from a British port, and while she cleared from an American port she did not fly our flag. Perhaps Congress may so calk our inspection laws as to stop up this hole, but beyond all legislation is the more insistent need of greater integrity and responsibility in the seats of steamship management.

"I LOVE PROTESTANTS but I hate the Buddhists," shouted a Roman Catholic bishop as he was introduced to a Buddhist priest—his fellow guest at a luncheon. "If he is a guest here I will leave. I refuse to eat at the same table——" Thereupon an Anglican dean stepped to the bishop's side and said that he too hated Buddhists and apostates. The two outraged Christians started for the door, when the Buddhist spoke. "Do not go, please," said he. "You are of greater importance at this meeting than I am. I am the one who will leave." The foregoing incident took place on July 9, 1929, A. D., as reported in the Hawaii Hochi, in the lobby of a hotel in Honolulu, at a luncheon arranged by the Rev. Henry P. Judd of the Hawaiian Board of Missions. The Catholic bishop was Stephen Alencastre, head of his church in the Paradise of the Pacific. The Anglican was Dean Ault, head of his church in the same islands of the blessed. The Buddhist priest, whose church, by the way, has the largest membership of any religious group in Hawaii, was the Rev. Ernest Hunt. After the offending Buddhist had departed, the meeting settled down to the business in hand—"discussing certain community problems involving the education of the youth along moral, ethical, and cultural lines from a non-sectarian standpoint." Let students of comparative religions try that on their ukuleles. Its title is "Pineapplesauce."

WISELY THE AMERICAN PILGRIMS to the third session of the Institute of Pacific Relations—meeting at Kyoto, Japan, in October—have decided to carry out their plan to travel eastward via Moscow and the Trans-Siberian railroad. They may meet difficulties before they reach Harbin, though it seems likely that the crisis will have simmered down before they reach even Moscow; but they will surely gain a perspective which the institute needs. For earnest as were the Honolulu meetings, a note of unreality crept in whenever they faced the problem of the Pacific as a whole. Britain, America, and Japan are the three great Powers of the Pacific today; but Russia, America, and China are almost certain to be the three great Powers tomorrow, and discussion of Pacific problems without Russia is "Hamlet" with Hamlet left out. Professor Nasu, one of the Japanese delegates for the coming conference, suggested the other day that had Russia been represented at previous sessions the Manchurian crisis might never have arisen. Certainly the meetings of minds between British and Chinese, and between Americans and Japanese, have been impressive and not without tangible results. The ostrich-like refusal to face the importance of Russia will surely be dissipated when the American delegation—which counts John D. Rockefeller, 3d, and Frederick Vanderbilt Field among its secretaries—emerges from its tour of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. James G. McDonald of the Foreign Policy Association, one of the American party, left America with the hope of obtaining a delegation in Russia to attend the forthcoming meeting. If that is not possible this year, it surely must become the most important task in organizing the fourth conference.

AN AWKWARD PAUSE occurred in the negotiations between Great Britain and Russia for recognition of the Soviet Government when Valerian Dovgalevsky, Russian Ambassador to France, chatted a while with the British Foreign Secretary, Arthur Henderson, in London and then packed up his week-end bag and went back to Paris. The British Labor Government announced that before it recognized the Soviet Government it would demand "guarantees" (whatever that may mean) from Moscow that there should be no Soviet propaganda in the British Empire against the existing forms of government, and that assurances should be given of the payment of Russian debts. The Russian Government, on the other hand, wanted recognition first and discussion of differences afterward. The real issue involved in the diplomatic jockeying is Communist propaganda in Great Britain; the debts do not matter so much because the Soviet Government has given polite though rather meaningless assurances about debts in the past. What Premier MacDonald fears now, in view of the furore created in 1924 by the Zinoviev letter, is that his own Government may be overthrown if he recognizes Russia again and there are subsequent revelations of revolutionary propaganda coming from Russian official sources in London.

BY PRESIDENTIAL DECREE the National University of Mexico has become a private corporation, as a result of a two months' strike of the student body and sympathetic allies in other schools. The strikers, declaring that students and teachers must have an equal voice in all matters pertaining to curriculum, administration, and academic activities, demanded that the university be separated from the National Secretariat of Education and be reorganized and reorientated. They took the position that political factors had had too much weight in university affairs and intellectual not enough; that they were taught haphazardly and in many cases by teachers out of sympathy with their needs, or ignorant of them. The decree which ended the strike accedes to the students' demands. The university will be administered henceforth by a council made up of the rector, the secretary, and the treasurer; a delegate from the National Secretariat of Education; two professorial delegates elected by their colleagues in each of the schools; two students, a man and a woman, representing corresponding school bodies; a delegate from each alumni association; and two representatives of the Students' Federation. Delegates will hold office for two years. The council will supervise the curriculum and all academic activities, authorize expenditures, appoint and remove officials and teachers, and confer degrees. This victory by no means signifies that Mexican students are dangerous creatures who must be placated, for their attitude is much like that of the government itself. The university's divorce from the government may come to mean, therefore, closer cooperation with its aims.

AS THE WORLD WAGS America is a newly-settled country, and it lacks the ingrained, historically-based differences in speech which exist in some of the older lands. In spite of the greater size of the United States, there is no such variation of language from New York Bay to the Golden Gate, from the Lake of the Woods to Lake Pontchartrain, as there is in the United Kingdom from Norfolk to Connaught, from the Scilly Islands to the Shetlands. Yet our dialects and individualities are quaint and precious. And passing. The newspaper and the railroad have for years been bringing us nearer to a common pronunciation and vocabulary, while recently such progress has been greatly hastened by the phonograph and the radio. So it is well that the American Council of Learned Societies is planning to make a record of our dialects by a scientific system of phonetic spelling. One of our great foundations, we understand, is already making phonograph records of speech in the United States, and for the average person this kind of preservation will be the most interesting and understandable. Besides there is a certain happy revenge in making the phonograph and the radio preserve and give back to us the Americana which they are so rapidly destroying.

THORSTEIN VEBLEN, who died in Palo Alto on August 3, has had a far-reaching influence on American thinking. He taught at Chicago, Leland Stanford, and Missouri universities, and since 1918 at the New School for Social Research in New York City, exercising a profound influence on successive generations of students. But he was known to a far wider audience through his books and other writings. The ideas and the phrases of "The Theory of the Leisure Class," which appeared thirty years ago, have already become coin of the intellectual realm, and the very school boy of today knows about the canons of conspicuous consumption and the other whimsical realities of that delightful classic. Professor Veblen's mordant wit, his extraordinary gift of phrase-making, and his uncanny power of discovering wholly new meanings in old facts gave to his writings an appeal wider than their purely scientific interest, and have already extended his influence far beyond the ranks of the technical economists. But within that fraternity probably no man, unless it be the late Simon N. Patten, had done more to shake thinking out of its old ruts, and to open the way for new truths to be received into the accepted body of theory. Professor Veblen's fruitful distinction between the pecuniary and the industrial functions of the business man is one of the basic ideas of contemporary economic analysis, and his emphasis on "use and wont" is perhaps the very source of that whole stream of thought known as institutional economics. It must always be a matter of regret that the movement vigorously pushed by his friends a few years ago to have him elected president of the American Economic Association, the highest honor within the gift of economists, should have been blocked by the regulars in that organization. If Veblen today looks down from some Olympian height, it is doubtless to smile at the grip of the vested interests on the minds of some of those who devote themselves to the impartial study of the working of those interests.

The War on Crime

THE recent riots in the New York State prisons at Dannemora and Auburn and the Federal prison at Leavenworth have again stirred a languid public interest, which in a few days will doubtless die down, in the question of the treatment of criminals. In all the long and melancholy history of human stupidity and folly there is no more depressing chapter than that which records the dealings of society with its delinquent classes. It is not clear that we have made any substantial progress from the days of Draco in dealing effectively with crime.

Indeed, it is doubtful whether there exists, even today, any adequate and clear-cut body of theory on the basis of which it is reasonable to look for a satisfactory working out of the problem. The whole question of crime and the criminal is intimately bound up with our basic institutions of property and the present state resting on force. Few men, therefore, are willing to face the implications of any real plan for improving the lot of our criminal population. You cannot reform the criminal without reforming society. Few persons are willing to reform society, and those who are, unless they be harmless and ineffective intellectuals, are likely of course to get clapped into jail themselves for their efforts.

In the wake of the war, which did so much to set back thought and practice in almost every field of human endeavor except that of material accomplishment, we have witnessed a backward swing of public opinion in respect to the treatment of criminals. The world became accustomed again to violence, bestiality, and sanctified hate and cruelty. With the new habituation to violence, and the added facilities offered by the automobile, there came a marked increase in certain crimes of violence. Acting in the unthinking fashion all too common in such cases, our law makers struck back. We have had a veritable plague of laws based on the idea of making penalties so severe as to put the fear of God into the hearts of law-breakers and thus restrain them from crime. Two examples at once occur to everyone: the Jones Law, which is undoubtedly going to help make it impossible to convict violators of the Volstead Act, and the notorious Baumes laws of New York, which as their crowning glory provide life imprisonment for persons convicted of four felonies. These laws are only examples of a whole crop of legislative measures which seek to repress crime by threatening law-breakers with unconscionable penalties. The Jones Law has been widely and justly condemned, but it has been criticized far more often because its critics did not want prohibition enforced than because of the false theory underlying it. The Baumes laws and their like, repudiated though they have been by practically all competent students, have yet not so much as been threatened with repeal or modification. Almost the country over, we have gaily and unthinkingly rushed into a war on crime.

At Dannemora and Auburn and Leavenworth we are simply reaping what we have sown. From each of these prisons and from others throughout the country come essentially the same reports, of desperate men subjected to rigid discipline in over-crowded quarters under conditions offering no hope here or hereafter. Any incident starts a revolt. Where shall it end? A Special Committee on Penal and Reformatory Institutions of the federal House of Representatives last January found that Atlanta, with a normal capacity of 1,712 prisoners, was actually housing 3,107, while Leavenworth, with a capacity not greatly different from Atlanta, had 3,700 inmates, more than twice the number for whom it was intended. The committee declares that "due to the lack of a proper program and to the tremendous increase (italics ours) in the number of persons arrested, convicted, and committed for violations of federal penal laws, the penitentiaries are overcrowded with those sentenced to prison for more than one year." New York shows the same condition, which could be duplicated in many other States, and the House committee calls attention to the overcrowding and idleness in the 1,100 local jails in which short-term federal prisoners are confined. The prison keepers of the country sleep on their riot guns, and with good reason.

Another extremely dangerous element is injected into the situation by the growth of the bootlegging industry. In our war on crime we make it all but impossible for the ex-convict to get and keep an honest job. But the organized sellers of illegal liquor offer him a job at good money, and protection, so far as possible, in case he is caught. This combination means, plainly enough, an increase of crime and a demand for more repression.

The time has come, then—and happily these prison outbreaks have led public authorities to call attention to the necessity—for a new public attitude concerning crime. We do not refer simply to the necessity for a modification and repeal of savage laws, important as that is at the proper time. We do mean that we have got to get rid of the notion of retaliation on the criminal and even of the notion of punishment in the ordinary sense. Society must protect itself of course, but in so doing it has no right to destroy the bodies and souls of those against whom it must protect itself, and that is just what we always have done, what we are doing, and what we shall continue to do so long as we act on our present theory of punishment as essentially a deterrent. We are advocating no softness with criminals, but we are advocating the enlightened as well as humane prison policy which regards the ends of punishment as solely the protection of society and the reform, if possible, of the offender. As stated in the beginning, we cannot go far without fundamental social and economic reforms for which we must doubtless wait a long while, but we can make a beginning, as certain enlightened penologists have already shown. The indeterminate sentence, the parole system, the juvenile court, the payment of prisoners, the scientific examination and treatment of individual offenders, and other reform measures may put some element of hope for future normal life into the existence of those unfortunate beings who for one reason and another, mostly connected with poverty, lack of training, or mental defect, have come within the clutches of the law. It is to measures such as these, and not to the multiplication of savage laws, that we must look. Intelligence and humanity are still our only hope. We shall never lessen crime by making war on it.

The Sweltering Sex

IN spite of the publicity recently given to pajamas as summer street dress for men, we have no stalwart hope of the arrival of such a fashion in the near future. Granting the intrinsic excellence of such garments—and there may be reservations on that point—there is no probability of so drastic a change all at once. The world may move, but it's all-fired deliberate about it, and the fact that pajamas as a day costume may be reasonable will not hasten their adoption—perhaps the contrary—in the queer civilization of make-believe in which we live. So we think that the manufacturers of men's suits need not be thrown into despair, nor should the producers of pajamas increase their plants too greatly in the hope of booming business.

But merely to talk about dress reform is some relief for sweltering males in hot weather, and if they don't get pajamas they may win some less dramatic but equally valuable concession—say the right to go without their coats with the same freedom with which a woman lays aside her jacket. What sane summer dress for men in the United States ought to be we would not be so rash as to advance in one brief article. Even the single item of belt versus suspenders will cause an argument hotter than an eruption of Vesuvius and longer than the moral law. For although the supporters of galluses—or shall we say those supported by galluses?—are now few in number, their passion exceeds that of a fundamentalist parson for a good old-fashioned rip-roaring hell. But everybody is agreed that men wear too many and too heavy clothes in summer. The Life Extension Institute weighed the street clothing of a dozen men and that of an equal number of women in New York City last June. The clothing of the women, who varied from a modern girl of eighteen to an "old-fashioned" woman of sixty-one, averaged two pounds, ten ounces, while that of the men was eight pounds, six ounces.

In England a number of prominent men, including Dean Inge, have organized the Men's Dress Reform Party, and there are embryo associations of a similar sort here at home. The English society may accomplish something; Englishmen are like that. But our confidence in the success of similar organizations in America is tepid. We doubt the success of any serious campaign organized by earnest disciples—especially if supported editorially by The Nation. Even the phrase "dress reform" is likely to be disastrous. Better clothing for women has come not as a crusade but as a fad. In the Victorian Age women were dressed more uncomfortably and absurdly—no, it doesn't sound possible, does it?—than men. There were always brave souls campaigning for "dress reform." And they got nowhere. It wasn't until the women of our day began to want to express their increased freedom in new fashions that better clothing arrived. The cult of women's sports, the crumbling of old moralities, the mere desire to "step out" all had some part. When it became possible to speak of a woman's legs it became possible also to display them. The leaders of the new era in clothing were not women educators or physicians. They were pretty movie actresses and smart "society matrons." And the flappers did their bit. Neither health nor economy was a slogan. In fact abbreviated dress was at first denounced as provocative of various diseases, and it has proved notoriously expensive. The rule in women's clothes is the fewer, the higher. All of which is saying that our hope for lighter summer clothing for the Sweltering Sex rests less in the reformers than in the college boys—who have already done a lot, without intending or knowing it.

In fact men have made a prodigious advance in the way both of saner and better-looking clothing in this century. It seems slight only by comparison with the greater progress of women. Men have largely discarded long-sleeved, long-legged underwear both in summer and in winter; the once obligatory starched shirt and collar have collapsed before the soft varieties; high shoes have given place to low; and stiff derbies have yielded to soft hats or none at all. Even in torrid weather a man may be pretty comfortable as it is without offending too much the accepted etiquette. He may dress in Palm Beach or other light, washable fabrics, yet more than half the men one meets fail to do so, preferring apparently to broil in wool and complain of the heat. Even the most punctilious men may now take off their coats in their offices, their homes, and in most of their friends' houses. When the weather is hot enough they may walk around the streets without coats, though they still get a dirty look or a request to mend their habits when they enter a restaurant of any pretensions in that mode. Thanks to the college boy, too, a man may go hatless the year around without exciting a single stare. In fact the only reason for wearing a hat nowadays is to be able to take it off when the band plays "The Star Spangled Banner."

Official Lying

AN unfortunate practice of the Department of State has been brought to light by a recent incident in connection with Canadian tariff protests. On July 13, when newspaper reports of such protests were called to the attention of Secretary Stimson, he said:

> I wish to deny unequivocally that any such statement was made by the Canadian Minister or any representative of the Canadian Government to me or to any representative of this Government. There has been absolutely no such protest or threat or any mention of such a subject that I know of, and I think I would know of it if it had been made.

According to a dispatch appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 14, over the signature of its careful and well-informed correspondent, Paul Y. Anderson:

> While Secretary of State Stimson today was issuing an "unequivocal" denial that any protests or threats of retaliation had been received from Canada concerning the proposed increase in the tariff on imports from Canada further information concerning the protest was obtained from a thoroughly reliable source. It was ascertained that the Canadian Minister, Vincent Massey, not only had intimated to the State Department that a British tariff on American wheat might be the result of the Hawley-Smoot rates, but that the State Department also had been informed that enactment of the Hawley-Smoot rates probably would produce the downfall of the Liberal Government in Canada and the establishment of a Conservative Administration pledged to a more militant policy toward the United States.

The startling contrast between Secretary Stimson's statement and the known facts was subsequently explained by Senator Borah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, who disclosed that conversations between the representatives of foreign governments and officers of the State Department are officially considered as never having taken place unless they are recorded in writing.

It is not only legitimate but desirable for Mr. Massey to tell Mr. Stimson in an informal, unofficial way what he knows or thinks about the probable effects of our proposed tariff rates in Canada—or in Timbuctoo for that matter. In these days of hourly cable and wireless communication between governments, we should suppose, indeed, that just such informal contacts constitute one of the chief values of expensive systems of government representation abroad. Of Mr. Massey's informal communication Mr. Stimson may then legitimately pass on as much or as little as seems wise.

If the Secretary of State, however, relying on a technical practice of the department, gives a statement to the press, intended for the common man, denying unequivocally that any protest has been received, the Secretary knows, and everybody knows, that the common man will understand him to mean that no protest has been received—not that no protest has been received in writing—and the common man will be deceived. Most of us will call to mind a number of disagreeable instances before where department statements were absolutely at variance with known facts, and we should be happy if the department would point out in what particular Mr. Anderson's statement in this case is incorrect. If the department finds it necessary to observe the rule stated (and there are evident grounds for defending such a rule), then, in the light of its extra-official as well as official information, it carries an extraordinary responsibility for being an absolutely honest guide to everyday public opinion. The Department of State has no more important duty than to supply the public with an adequate body of fact to serve as a basis for sound and correct opinion.

Justice in Gastonia

JUSTICE conquered prejudice in the first round of the conflict at Gastonia, North Carolina, when Judge M. V. Barnhill granted a change of venue to the sixteen strikers and strike leaders charged with the murder of Chief of Police Aderholt. We salute Judge Barnhill for his courage and fairness in a critical situation.

In his charge to the grand jury and in his whole conduct of the trial preliminaries this tall, kindly-faced, and informal-mannered jurist, who is the youngest judge on the circuit bench of his State, impressed observers with his independence and common-sense. No prisoner, said Judge Barnhill in addressing the grand jury, should receive "either more or less than is just on account of his race, color, or condition in life, or on account of his convictions upon social, economic, industrial, political, or religious matters. These matters have no place in a criminal trial, and should not and will not be permitted to becloud the one issue we are to try."

Fair words these, but the nature of the indictment against the Gastonia prisoners is such that a discussion of their social philosophy cannot be avoided. Not one of the sixteen defendants was indicted for firing the shot that killed Chief Aderholt; no one seems to have any information on that subject. The prisoners have been indicted for what their leaders have said and for what their organization has stood for. The official charge is conspiracy to commit murder, and apart from the charge that the Communist policy in conducting the strike was deliberately directed against law and order the prosecution has no case. Against the strike chief, Fred E. Beal, who was indicted for first-degree murder, the prosecution's entire case consists of a few quotations from speeches at strikers' mass meetings in which Beal allegedly used phrases about blood and battle. Since conspiracy is so sweeping and vague a charge, it seems almost certain that the prosecution must be allowed to admit a great deal of general evidence to show that the Communist tactics in the strike deliberately led to violence.

The critical point in the trial may come when the defense tries to present the other side of the picture—the raid of masked men upon the strike headquarters, the assaults upon strike pickets, the threats of lynching, the appeals to violence in the local press. Will the conspiracy of the mill owners and the citizen-gangsters to do violence to the Communist union be described for the jury? If not, the trial will be a farce, for it is only in the light of this conspiracy that the policy of the strikers can be understood.

The transfer of the case to the neighboring city of Charlotte, to be tried in the week beginning August 26, does not end the danger of an unfair verdict. Any North Carolina jury, particularly in the Piedmont belt, is to be feared by Northern labor organizers whether they bear the Communist label or not. In 1921 the South's greatest textile strike centered in Charlotte, and the countryside was aflame with prejudice against the Northern leaders of the American Federation of Labor. In the Gastonia strike the Charlotte papers have been second only to the Gastonia daily in vituperative attacks upon the defendants. Added to their other handicaps the prisoners, as we pointed out in the issue of July 31, will face a jury composed entirely of owners of real property whose interests are far removed from those of the workers of the isolated mill villages.

Unfortunately, too, the Gastonia defendants have some theatrical-minded friends, who are somewhat more zealous than wise, and insist upon dramatizing the case as the prologue to world revolution. The International Labor Defense, the Communist organization which is so vigorously defending its comrades in Gastonia, demanded a change of venue and then, when the change had been granted, issued a statement saying: "The false show of fairness of repeated hypocrisies about no economic or political beliefs of the strikers being admitted in the court room must be met by mass action of the workers." Mass action? That is not a phrase to toy with lightly in a hostile community when comrades are threatened with the electric chair. To many North Carolinians it may suggest barricades, red flags waving over crazed foreign faces, and American women being butchered by squint-eyed Red villains such as Hearst and Liberty love to depict. We hope that the Communists will prune their appeals of all phrases that may be interpreted as threats. Events of the last two weeks have proved that North Carolina justice is not dead and that North Carolina public opinion is susceptible to rational persuasion.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

JAMES CANNON, the bullish bishop, has been devoting a good deal of his attention lately to the ethics of active participation in Hoover prosperity through the medium of Wall Street. After considerable study the good Bishop reports, "I became convinced that there was very much latent hypocrisy in the attitude of very many persons on this subject." What a pity it is that Bishop Cannon has not had the leisure to devote an equal amount of clear and hard thinking to the subject of prohibition.

Though many will agree with the comforting conclusion reached by the devoted dry leader in regard to Wall Street trading he has a fight on his hands in the matter of some generalizations into which he then proceeds. The Bishop has been accused by enemies, all paid hirelings of the whisky trust, of the sin of gambling. Logically enough he insists that before the charge can be tried there must be a precise definition of the offense. Nobody abhors gambling more than Bishop Cannon. But what is gambling? Frankly enough he admits that it is hard to draw the line. As a veteran dealer in building lots, timber, and stumps, he is naturally loath to confess that these pleasant pursuits are iniquitous. "Gambling," he confesses, "is difficult to define wholly and completely. The throwing of dice, shooting of craps, the purchase of lottery tickets are all clearly gambling; for there is no element of skill or intelligence involved, nothing but pure chance."

In other words, the Bishop is maintaining that he was entitled to take a flier in stocks because he brought to this pursuit a superior skill and intelligence. "The purchase of stocks," he continues, "may be made entirely on the gambling basis or upon the knowledge of the value of the stock and a study of business conditions."

It seems to me that the Bishop is trying to say that it is sinful to play a bad tip and virtuous to follow a good one. But in the light of this philosophy Bishop Cannon should admit some strange bedfellows to his couch. The late Arnold Rothstein was just as eager as the Methodist leader to eliminate the evil factor of chance from his transactions. Before Mr. Rothstein bet upon a horse race he had been in close contact with both jockeys as well as the horses. He studied the situation as thoroughly as Bishop Cannon studied the Lehigh Valley Railroad when he bought his shares on generous margin. As a matter of fact I will maintain that the Rothstein risks were even less than those shouldered by the Bishop in embarking on the Kable monthly payment plan.

Some few partisans may contend that the Bishop hardly lived up to his own stipulations for a moral stock-market trader. While nobody denies that he made exhaustive researches into the corporations which he favored with his support, he did neglect the small matter of investigating his broker. This seems to me an unjust argument. Though the Bishop did lose the funds which he tried to augment for the glory of righteousness he scored a moral victory. The stocks upon his list went up. Only the broker declined.

It is a pity that Mr. Rothstein's untimely death stands in the way of a debate between these two students of the laws of chance. I think that any seasoned gambler would sincerely dispute the good Bishop's statement that the shooting of craps is sheer gambling without any element of skill whatsoever. If Mr. Cannon feels that according to the law of averages he would have an even chance in a dice contest I can find ever so many willing to accommodate him. Indeed, many a man has gone into such a transaction with an assurance of success far beyond that which strengthened the moral fiber of the Methodist playboy when he first took his famous shot in Wall Street. It is true that mathematically speaking no player should have an advantage over any other provided the dice are reasonably honest. But by now I trust that Bishop Cannon has had sufficient experience to know that mathematics do not prevail even in Wall Street where he made his businesslike investments. Some stocks sell for twenty times their earnings while others languish even though they may be priced at less than ten times the amount of the corporation's yearly income.

In support of his position Bishop Cannon calls upon John Wesley. "I have tried," he says, "to make money in order that it might be an instrument for service. I fully agree with John Wesley's sermon on money: 'Make all you can; save all you can; give all you can.'" It would have been decidedly interesting if Bishop Cannon had supplemented this with a list of the stocks of which John Wesley was long.

The Bishop is not enunciating a wholly new theory in regard to gambling. Members of the fraternity of those who live by their wits will agree with much of what he says. Indeed, the Bishop's philosophy on the subject of chance was brilliantly expounded in the last act of a melodrama called "Checkers" which was popular some twenty years ago. The hero of the play was also a disciple of chance but his racket was the track and not the stock market. The somewhat prissy heroine made him swear off these activities and in reward for his promise of renunciation gave him her love and a silver dollar as a souvenir of her devotion. But in spite of promises the urge remained in his blood. Bishop Cannon will understand. After making a close study of a horse called Remorse the hero decided that he was confronted with an excellent business opportunity. Because of a temporary lack of capital he was obliged to invest the silver dollar. The last scene found him standing humbly before the girl and confessing that he had staked the love token on a horse race. "How could you?" she exclaimed. "How could you lose that silver dollar which was a symbol of our love?"

"But," replied the hero, "I didn't lose. I won and the odds on Remorse were a hundred to one." Whereupon the girl threw herself into his arms and said, "Of course, you did it all for my sake."

The analogy is not quite accurate because the Bishop serves a sacred and not a profane love. But the Cannon's law holds good in either instance. I think it may be accurately and briskly summed up in the sentence, "The only sinner is the sucker." Accordingly I urge upon Bishop Cannon that for the glory of God he let the utilities alone and buy himself instead one share of General American Tank Car.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Where Are We Flying?

By GEORGE BRITT

A QUICK turning of newspaper files from July 13 to 31, covering the 420 hours during which the two pilots of the St. Louis Robin were setting the latest airplane endurance record, reveals that during the same hours nineteen persons in the United States were killed in airplane accidents. The same papers also noted the fatal crash of two marine flyers in Nicaragua, and the deaths of six aviators in foreign countries, including Major Idzikowski, the Polish transatlantic pilot. The examination of the press was by no means exhaustive. Among aviation items was also an account of a celebration by an air-mail pilot of his one-millionth mile in the air without serious mishap.

On both the business and the human side, this death record is a constant nightmare to the new half-billion-dollar industry of American flying; yet in view of the tremendous progress of aviation since Lindbergh's flight, it has become almost a commonplace. Flying has, in fact, become a great deal safer. Especially in the established transport lines does the mortality rate appear practically negligible. The Western Air Express celebrated its first anniversary in May with the announcement that it had carried more than 3,000 passengers between Los Angeles and San Francisco without a single accident. But transatlantic flying, stunting and carelessness in the air still are extremely hazardous. Even the majestic Zeppelin is not without its roll of the dead.

The green beginner who has just completed his fifteen hours of dual and ten hours of solo flying and has received his private pilot's license is one of the major worries to the owners of aviation systems. They realize how likely he is to fall, and falls do not sell business.

The Guggenheim Fund for the Promotion of Aeronautics is conducting at present a safe-airplane contest in which it has obtained entries from sixteen manufacturers. The first prize will be $100,000, to be awarded within two months. The beginnings of a network of weather reporting stations along the air routes have been put into effect officially in California. The Department of Commerce is enlarging its functions of licensing and inspection, and is forcing stricter requirements upon manufacturers. At present the department is also beginning its authorized inspection and rating of flying schools, with a view to weeding out the unfit. All these moves are part of a vast campaign for safety.

Figures on safety and accidents have been kept in only the loosest fashion. There was no reporting at all on the subject until the passage of the Air Commerce Act, which became law in May, 1926. Your statistical juggler will demonstrate that flying is safer than riding on the railroad. The 1928 record shows 65,658,936 miles flown and 368 lives lost, an average of about 178,400 miles per fatality. At the same time, the railroads traveled a total of 1,122,997,000 miles and reported 6,500 persons killed, an average of about 172,768 miles per fatality. Of course, more than two-thirds of the railroad deaths were of trespassers, yardmen, and persons struck at grade crossings. But the real catch is in the fact that a train-mile represents hundreds of passenger-miles; an airplane mile probably not more than two or three. Figures actually reported but probably incomplete show 79 persons killed in air accidents in 1926, 164 in 1927, and 368 in 1928.

The increased number of persons flying is indicated by the Department of Commerce figures on licensed pilots. At the close of 1927, the first full year of government licensing, 1,572 licenses had been issued; during 1928, 4,940. On June 30 of this year, there were 7,881 licensed pilots, and permits for training had been issued since January at the rate of more than 1,500 a month. The number of fatalities went up, of course, but fortunately, more slowly than the number of pilots. There was one death for each 9.5 pilots flying two years ago; one for each 13.4 last year.

Turning now to the air transportation lines, one finds last year an aggregate of 52,934 persons carried 10,472,024 miles with only 22 fatalities, against 12,000 passengers, 5,000,000 miles, and 6 fatalities in 1927.

Insurance policies are among the best indications that careful flying is reasonably safe. Although flying is forbidden in the ordinary-rate policy, it may be permitted with full protection by the payment of an additional rate. The minimum extra charge is $5 per $1,000 of policy, and the maximum is $25 extra in the case of an accepted air-mail pilot.

The rate of coverage for crashes amounts to from nine per cent to 20 per cent of the value of the plane. The policy is issued for a specific plane, to fly over a certain territory with a designated pilot, and a record is kept on that pilot. One company announces lower rates for pilots than for taxicab drivers in liability and other classifications. Its statement is:

> The total cost of those coverages on a $3,000 aircraft of good type, plying for hire in the Middle West and driven by a pilot of normal qualifications, might amount to as much as $1,410 for one year, the exact amount depending partly, of course, upon the amounts of indemnity; whereas the cost of those coverages on an automobile of the same value, used for similar purposes in New York and operated by a man or firm of satisfactory status, would not exceed about $1,668.

Insurance companies now are competing hotly for airplane policies, and rates have been reduced by 40 per cent since 1922.

Accidents, which menace the prestige and earning power of the industry, cannot be prevented by law. Learning to handle the controls after a fashion is simple. The most famous example of reckless amateurism was given by Charles A. Levine, the transatlantic passenger. He never had flown solo until he decided suddenly to go from Paris to London, two years ago. He went up alone, without charts, crossed the channel, and bounced down for a landing which terrorized the experts.

Anyone may attempt a similar feat in his own plane. A plane, equipped with a 23-horsepower motorcycle engine and guaranteed to fly, may be bought new for as little as $675 from a Chicago mail order house. Or the buyer may go up to $7,000 and make a selection from thirty-two different models. Or he may go shopping for a Keystone Patrician at $100,000, and smash it if he desires.

To fly across State boundaries, however, one must have a private pilot's license from the Department of Commerce. To take up a passenger for hire, one must have an additional 50 hours' experience in the air. For a transport pilot, the highest rating, the requirement is a further minimum of 200 hours. Some of the States have adopted these same regulations for intrastate flying.

The careless or irresponsible flyer, however, is not a novelty. In the romantic and more dangerous age of flying before Lingbergh there was the barnstorming gipsy flyer. The government after the war was left with some 30,000 of the Curtiss JN models, "Jennies," which cost as much as $22,000 each. Thousands were sold for as little as $300.

The boys out of a job who had flown during the war now bought Jennies and went adventuring. They astonished farmers at county fairs and took up passengers for as much as the traffic would bear. They went in for sky writing, crop dusting, mosquito oiling, movie daredeviling, photography and mapping, and the transporting of whosoever chanced to be in a hurry. Accidents were frequent. Conservative business men were cold toward flying. Then Lindbergh set the country air-minded overnight.

Before all the medals were pinned on, however, aviation ceased to be a game for heroes and became a prize for modern Jay Goulds and Jim Hills to fight over. Hundreds of companies sprang up. Investors began to realize that here was a coming development in which the backers might see their stocks progress as in the case of radio. Out of this activity, the gods of the air having been on the side of those with the most powerful banking connections, a trio of giants has just now emerged and set to work in railroad fashion, going after business.

These predimonant factors in aviation today are the United Aircraft and Transport Corporation, financed by the National City Bank of New York; the Aviation Corporation, with W. Averill Harriman and Robert Lehman of the Lehman Brothers banking house; and the recently consolidated Curtiss-Wright Corporation, combining the aviation companies of C. M. Keys, himself a broker and banker, with those of Richard F. Hoyt, of Hayden, Stone & Co. One subsidiary of the Aviation Corporation is allied with the Mellon interests.

Along with these giant groups are many powerful independent companies. Henry Ford is an extensive manufacturer. General Motors owns 40 per cent of Fokker, Ford's principal competitor. The smaller companies are legion.

The business of an aviation system today includes all the steps of manufacturing, marketing, and exporting planes, operating mail and passenger lines, maintaining air taxi service subject to call anywhere, and the operation of flying schools. Manufacturers see a prospect of persons of moderate income buying planes as they do automobiles. One wealthy young man in New York now maintains five ships in his own hangar for his personal use at a flying field.

The family bread winner in aviation is the air-mail contract. For example, consider the Boston to New York line. The rate is $3 a pound, paid every day on a constantly increasing bulk. The passenger rate on the other hand is $34.85 one way, $64.70 round trip, $277 for a commutation ticket of ten rides. One hundred pounds of mail on one trip earns more than 150 pounds of passenger on ten trips; furthermore, the mail travels every day, carries no baggage, asks no questions, and demands no cabin steward.

As an addition to the mail contract, however, passenger and express business may bring in clear profit. Passenger service is likely to remain in the luxury price-schedule for a considerable time—until planes and operating costs are lowered. But even now one may fly from Chicago to the Pacific Coast in less than twenty-four hours for $200, only about twice the train and Pullman rate. One may fly from Chicago to Detroit for $30, a longer ride than from London to Paris at approximately the same rate.

The money paid out by the government on mail contracts last year amounted to $6,105,247. The mail itself weighed more than 3,000,000 pounds, tripling in bulk during the year. In July this year it was more than 100,000 pounds ahead of January.

The profits already collected in the infant industry are indicated by the report of the Curtiss Aeroplane and Motor Company, Inc., for last year, announcing a net profit of $1,528,782. This was one of the companies on the verge of ruin just after the war. C. M. Keys obtained control of it at that time from John N. Willys, the automobile manufacturer, paying around $3 a share for it, according to report.

Given a continuance of the present public confidence, the industry is now ready for the operating of a practical transportation service. The Lindbergh era of personal heroism and the bankers' era of consolidations will carry over, but in the growth of flying as a whole they probably have done their part. But the demand of the times has swung around toward the railroader type who can develop new feeder lines and persuade the public to ride with him.

The steps just ahead, leaders say, must start with a redistribution of operating lines to territories where they actually will fit. In the East with convenient overnight train schedules between cities, there will be less traffic than in the far-spread West. Wichita, Kansas, builds more ships than the whole of New York State.

Another step will be to reduce the cost of manufacture by factory methods. Every ship now is practically handmade. Manufacturers talk of being able to stamp out a wing with one stroke of a die. When they do, hundreds of airports will have to enlarge their acreage. The metal plane would be part of such a program, and its life would be much longer than the present estimated limit of three years.

Most ambitious of all present plans is that for obtaining eventually complete handling of the first-class mail, leaving only bulk mail to the railroads. Such a plan has the partial endorsement already of the assistant postmaster general in charge of air-mail, who said recently: "It seems to me that in the near future the department will have to consider the carrying of two-cent or first-class mail in the air, especially on the long hops over those passenger lines now going into operation." Such a shift might involve serious conflict with the railroads, and the prize of the mail contracts would bring in a more intense rivalry among the aviation lines than they have yet seen.

Aviation by all these tokens appears too vigorous a development to be stopped, even by a casualty list built up through uncontrollable and often reckless elements. It doesn't want even to be slowed up by such a handicap.

The Challenge to Labor Standards

By MERRYLE STANLEY RUKEYSER

IF there is anything in the theory of a protective tariff then Massachusettes is entitled to a tariff to protect its workers from competition with toilers in South Carolina, with its low labor standards. In the South generally, labor is cheaper, hours are longer, and taxes are lower than in the North. Only the Constitution of the United States, which forbids tariffs as between the States, prevents an application of the G. O. P. doctrine of protection to the new competition between the North and the South; for our country is a conglomeration of widely differentiated communities of varying ideals and standards.

It is perhaps well to remind those who think that the millennium is just around the corner that night work for women and minors is still common in the South, whereas it is forbidden by law in most of the North, and in England, continental Europe, India and China. Until recently, some of our Southern States were tied in backwardness by Japan, but a law went into effect on July 1, 1929, forbidding night work for women and children in Nippon.

The truth is that the South, which since the war has had a remarkable industrial renaissance, has turned back the clock of industrial history, and the same struggle which was successfully waged in the factories of England in the nineteenth century must be repeated.

So careful an observer as Leo Wolman, labor economist, informally remarked to me: "My opinion is, of course, that the prevalence of low wage levels and long work weeks has already contributed much to reducing standards of labor in Northern competitive States and that as long as this state of affairs continues Northern levels are likely to be still further depressed."

This opinion tends to confirm my own view that one of the principal social issues in the United States is the problem of converting Southern manufacturers and law makers to progressive labor standards which prevail in the North. The efforts along these lines of humane church and liberal publications are hopeful signs, and the recent series of strikes indicates that the necessary motive power for altering conditions will not be lacking. The principal job for organized labor in the United States is to unionize the South effectively. Otherwise, the victories of labor in the North will prove ephemeral and illusory, as the drift of business from the unionized soft coal mines of the North to the non-union mines of Kentucky and West Virginia in recent years has so clearly demonstrated.

The necessary objectives should be approached without blind emotion. Owners of Southern mills have not as a class been fabulous profiteers. As a matter of fact, in spite of low wages, a majority have been hard pressed to make both ends meet. They have in many instances been victims of promoters among machinery vendors who "oversold" the advantages of the South. As a result, the productive capacity of the nation's cotton textile mills was expanded out of all proportion to the steady increase in the demand for the product. Accordingly, in the midst of record-breaking Coolidge-Mellon-Hoover prosperity, the cotton textile trade has been a laggard—a lean and hungry member in a highly prosperous family of diversified industry.

From a strictly economic standpoint without reference to human considerations, profit and loss statements have demonstrated in the United States since the war that industries, like coal and textiles, which depend for their success in a measure on sweating labor, have fared relatively poorly. On the other hand, the automobile, steel, and electrical industries, which find well-paid labor the most economical, have amassed the largest profits; for they have learned the technique of adding to the productivity of human beings through aiding them with machinery.

But it takes slower-witted business executives at least a generation to learn the new truth that high wages constitute the road to national prosperity, in which all soundly managed industries are bound to share. Capital has been lured to the South by the repetition of ancient economic fallacies. In underbidding the Northern labor market, the South is sacrificing its longer-term advantages for temporary benefits. As long as it sweats labor, it is in reality exporting products, consisting largely of labor, at inadequate prices. The result in strictly business terms is that the purchasing power of its population is low, and the prosperity of its local merchants and manufacturers is accordingly held down.

Meantime, numerous bourbon manufacturers are solidly lined up determined to maintain the reactionary status quo. Asked whether it would be desirable for the Southern textile States to imitate the laws of Massachusetts, one of the leading cotton men in the Southwest candidly replied: "It is neither necessary nor advisable for the Southern textile States to enact labor legislation similar to that on the books of the State of Massachusetts."

To the extent that the South possesses legitimate advantages over the North, such as proximity to sources of raw material, it deserves to take over much of the textile business. In respect to the effect of this transition on the earnings of mill stocks in New Bedford, Fall River and Lawrence, the disinterested observer will be unconcerned. But to the extent that Southern industry is built up by depressing wage standards and ideals in social legislation, its activities constitute an important national issue.

Originally, the textile business flourished along the seacoast of Massachusetts, instead of in the South, because those Northern cities possessed a natural dampness which was needed in spinning cotton. In recent years, however, artificial humidification has made it possible to emulate the fogginess in the driest Southern towns. Accordingly, a basic reason for running textile mills in New England, far from the source of raw materials, has disappeared as a result of technological progress.

To some extent, the moving of mills to the South has been accomplished without a careful analysis of the advantages. One of the principal cotton textile manufacturers in the country informed me:

It must be borne in mind that fine cotton goods are made from cotton grown in Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana. Medium cotton goods or print cloths are best made and most commonly made from cotton grown in Texas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. There is, therefore, no particular economic reason for making medium or fine goods in the Carolinas, except for low wages and longer hours. It is obvious that the climatic conditions of the Northeast are better suited for factory labor than the warmer and more enervating climate of the Southeast and South.

This same manufacturer, in alluding to alleged unfair competition in the South, said:

The factor that is operating to develop the manufacture of cotton goods in the South more rapidly than in the North is the longer hours and lower wages permitted and customary in the South. I would refer you to the labor statistics published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics which show that wages in South Carolina average about $14 a week for 55 hours' work as against about $20 a week for 48 hours' work in Massachusetts. The trend toward the South will continue until wages are on a more nearly equal basis.

If Southern textile States should enact labor legislation comparable to that in Massachusetts, New York, or Illinois, it would sharply curtail the increase in cotton manufacturing in the South. It might, however, be better from a social standpoint for the communities involved.

The neutral bystander might get the idea that the competition between the North and the South constitutes a laboratory experiment which would demonstrate the advantage of paying adequate wages. However, the facts hardly warrant such a conclusion. In the first place, the textile industry in New England is not one of the modern, conspicuously well-directed industries, for which American business executives have become renowned. It suffers from obsolete machinery, traditionalism, and nepotism. Moreover, its labor conditions, though better than those prevailing in the South, have been distinctly unsatisfactory as compared with standards in more successful industries of the North. Furthermore, some of the identical interests own mills in both the North and the South. The whole industry is in flux, and is seeking to adjust itself to changes wrought by the competition of other products, such as rayon, and of fluctuating fashions. Accordingly, this sick industry cannot be depended on to give any conclusive demonstration of the economic validity of the high-wage theory.

In alluding to wage differences in the North and South, the National Bureau of Economic Research in a bulletin published last year offered this sensible interpretation:

Hourly rates of wages for either men or women are consistently lower in the South. In 1913 men's wages in the North are 44 per cent higher than men's wages in the South and women's 47 per cent. By 1926 the difference is even wider: men's wages in the North are 56 per cent greater than in the South and women's wages more than 60 per cent.

The full-time week was in 1914 nearly 10 per cent longer in the South than in the North and in 1926, at the end of the period, nearly 11 per cent longer.

Although wages and hours are a significant item in labor cost, these differences between the North and the South in hourly rates of wages and full-time hours per week cannot be regarded as measures of differences in labor cost in these two competing industrial areas. Unmeasured factors such as differences in the efficiency of labor, gratuities to workers in the form of rent or other services, are factors in labor cost that are not reflected in the wage rate. The same figures, likewise, are not measures of relative well-being because they do not take into consideration local differences, sometimes great, in the costs of living. Allowing for all such items, however, the figures appear on their face to indicate substantial competitive advantage to the South.

These comparative advantages, however, cannot be considered decisive in fixing the future localization of the cotton textile industry. Industry is subject to considerable inertia which resists its movement from one region to another. The existence of a supply of experienced labor and of substantial numbers of persons who have managerial capacity and who know the business, which is characteristic of the established industrial area, often acts to interrupt a trend that on its surface appears irresistible. Observers of the cotton textile industry point to the operation of such recuperative forces in the New England States that may conceivably interrupt, if not change, the trend of the industry toward the South.

My own opinion is that the South faces an excellent long-term economic future, which in the long run will be heightened by appropriate advances in social standards. Real prosperity, as Frank A. Vanderlip has observed, consists of the full employment of labor at high effective wages, rather than fabulous riches for a handful of mill owners and poverty for the multitudes of toilers.

The hostility of reactionary mill owners and their editorial cronies to conservative efforts to improve working conditions in the South automatically opened the field to the communist union in Gastonia. Where working conditions are wretched, the soil is fertile for the propagation of ideas of radical reform.

The American Federation of Labor, representing the right wing of American labor, is, of course, best equipped to do the missionary work of introducing trade unionism in the South. The organization, stimulated by strikes in Gastonia, in Elizabethton, Tennessee, and in South Carolina, has redoubled its efforts. William Green, president of the American Federation, in reporting tentative accomplishments, recently remarked:

It is a moving sight to record the steady formation of trade unions in the South. This group of workers maligned as docile and cheap has risen in the strength of their manhood and womanhood and said, "We want the agency of justice and freedom." Low wages, long hours, child labor, company houses, and a long list of other grievances are the cause of the revolt which spreads from mill to mill, and town to town.

The radical will be impatient with the cautious methods of the American Federation of Labor, but the objective observer recognizes that it can be extraordinarily helpful in guiding the transitional period. The Northern public should not forget that industrially the South is still several decades behind, and that in reality a new economic empire is being opened up.

Meantime, the competition of the South is a challenge to Northern labor standards, and even the meager advances thus far won for the Northern toiler have not yet been consolidated.

The Dominant Sex

By T. SWANN HARDING

ISAIAH, an ancient Hebrew gentleman of doubtful historicity and prophetic inclinations, was once reported to have remarked in a moment of irritated candor: "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, we will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach." There have been people who devoted almost their entire lives to the laudable work of tracing out the accuracy of Isaiah's predictions.

The period described by the prophet, however, has passed and gone. It would be difficult to find a woman today who desired to be called by any man's name to take away any conceivable sort of reproach. Nor does she eat her own bread and wear her own apparel, if she can easily help it. She eats and wears man's, but renounces his name in the interests of the Lucy Stone League and "sex equality." So much for the lucubrations of a bachelor prophet as inspired by a divinity also reputed to have avoided matrimony.

Today many expositors of doctrines on sex relations assume that man subjugated woman in savage society and that he consciously seeks to keep her subjugated in civilized society. The facts that you can find a "primitive" society conveniently adapted to illustrate almost any social theory you have in mind (I shall later produce some primitives to "prove" my own contentions, of course) and that in many such societies man does not subjugate woman, are customarily ignored. Furthermore, even among genuine primitives woman repeatedly worms her way in through man's prohibitions, whenever she wishes and however stringent the prohibitions are. Today, certainly, no man dares exercise his full legal rights over woman in this country. He knows better and he has now rechristened his timidity. He calls it chivalry.

The exponents of fanatical feminism are wrong. They are wrong individually and they are wrong collectively. While we cannot peer as closely as we should like behind the veil which shadows the past, what we can see darkly indicates that woman had her period of dominance and lost it. It was her own fault, and it was especially stupid on her part because every physiological fact lined itself up in her support!

It is not necessary for us to subscribe to the plenary inspiration of the remarkable and too little known "Dominant Sex" by Mathilde and Mathias Vaerting, in which the philosophy of matriarchy perhaps overleaps the facts in its enthusiasm. That comes of having a dogma to sustain. But there is little historical and still less physiological reason to believe that woman lost out except by her own crass stupidity. A few words of exposition may be in order.

Primitive tribes still exist today, as Malinowski has pointed out in "The Father in Primitive Psychology," which have no idea at all of the paternal function in procreation! This idea has its humorous implications if we dare think of it. The father as a family adjunct stands, a supernumerary, upon a very insecure foundation of social usage and custom, and the mother is the Parent. She wanders on occasion to the tall grass where spirits graciously attend her—and the father evinces no surprise or indignation, nor indeed suspects his wife's virtue, if upon a return from a two-year trip he finds new children at hand calling him daddy. It is difficult to imagine how any reasonably intelligent sex could ever be so utterly lethargic mentally as to let so powerful and so useful an instrument of dominance slip from its grasp.

But one may well ask what the antics of primitives of today have to do with conditions in the distant past. The partial reply is that we may insist in season and out of season that woman's physiological function in procreation made her inevitably the Parent of importance among all real primitives, gave over into her hands power, prestige, authority, possession and inheritance rights, and, by natural law, left the male in a position almost as ridiculous as that occupied by a drone bee who is not selected by the divine providence which presides over bee destinies to mate with the queen! Woman had, then, a tremendous running start over man.

Her physiological relationship to her progeny made her the founder of the home and, as its founder, she was originally its unconstitutional monarch or dictator. Man came and went sheepishly, a powerless and impotent adjunct to the habitation. Time and time again he was rather son than husband, when he married exogamically. Indeed, he was adopted by his wife into her tribe, but his major duty remained to a woman, his mother. When war between the tribes took place her relationship was paramount and he was subject to the maternal command. But he never escaped subjugation by woman, for his marriage was arranged for him by women.

His position in his wife's family was much more precarious than that of any modern wife marrying into her husband's family. He was there on sufferance. He got there originally because councils of old women put him there, and if those old ladies later decided that he should be expelled he returned home some day to find his tent opening facing the west and his possessions significantly outside. He thereupon passed placidly out of the picture and returned to mother. If in Roman civilization an Augustus put aside his beloved wife because his father found her objectionable, it was woman's own fault, for originally she undoubtedly had the upper hand and set man rudely in his place.

We may become more recent. In 1917 the women of New York State after much travail and hysteria at last achieved the right to vote, which most of them now value as men value it, which is to say, very little indeed. But among the Iroquois tribes which inhabited that State before modern padlocking refinements were introduced, all adults, male and female, belonged to the tribal council, which gave them equal suffrage on a democratic basis. Centuries before this the women of the Senecas were electing the tribal officers and exercising the power of recall as well, when necessary. Among the Wyandottes and Hurons the clan was governed by a council composed of one man and four women; the women were elected by the women of the tribe; the man was elected by the four women of the council!

The chief of these associated tribes was elected by women; he served a probationary period during which he was denied vote or voice, and if he made good he was invested with the tunic of office—by a woman! Since the combined tribal council of these peoples was made up of the aforementioned clan councils it was four-fifths women too. Could feminism hope to go further? Then through what crass idiocy did the sex lose this power?

There are other primitives I can use for my purpose, since one of the maxims of sociology is: "Prove it by Primitives." I therefore remark the savage African. We are reliably informed that Yoruba, Ashanti, and many other tribal chiefs were restrained from the more lurid forms of violence by feminine influence; wives, mothers, and sisters successfully prevailed upon and thus ruled over the chiefs. The Bushongo blacks have (or since the white man has corrupted them we may better now say "had") a parliament three hundred years old. It was chosen by popular vote—all adults voting regardless of sex. It systematically represented not only each territory, but each craft and trade.

Ancient legends celebrate this early feminine dominance. Tales of Amazons and the homage paid to Athene, goddess of wisdom, attest it. Five thousand years ago the sophisticated culture of Babylon and Egypt yielded to feminine power. Woman was better off at that time than she is anywhere in the world today. Herodotus, after visiting Egypt, returned to report to man-ruled Greece that things were topsy-turvy on the Nile. No wonder he thought so. For he found that "they call themselves after their mothers and not their fathers; and if one ask his neighbor who he is he will state his mother's parentage and enumerate his fore-mothers."

The Egyptian woman, married or single, made contracts in her own right and for her own benefit. She could bring action at law and plead her own case in court. She practiced medicine and officiated as priestess in the temple. She shared the social freedom of her husband, and Cleopatra, as Queen of Egypt, early directed her own army and navy in person, conceiving and directing military and naval maneuvers.

But ah, this Egyptian woman's marriage contracts! There was dominance with which to reckon. The possession of her own property was retained by her in marriage, frequently supplemented by the property of her husband made over to her as a bridal gift. The partnership thereafter was joint, but it was profoundly partial to the wife. It was usual for the husband's deeds to be indorsed by his wife, but his indorsement on hers was totally unnecessary. Furthermore, he was required to stipulate in the marriage contract how much he would allow the wife yearly for her personal support, his entire property being at times pledged as security. The wife was further protected by a charge on her husband to be paid at once in the event of her divorcement.

Did man chafe under this feminine dominance? Was he in militant revolt? Hardly. Instead he spoke of her as "glad and gladdening like the midday sun," as "cheerful and rejoicing," as "set in honor." He was always delightfully submissive. He was advised by Petah Hotep in 3360 B.C. to "observe that which she wisheth and that on which her mind runneth; thereby thou shalt make her stay in thy house." For it was the man's job to make the home attractive. Finally he was admonished by philosophical advisers: "If thou resistest her will it is ruin." Man still remembers that admonition.

When man ceased to accept his subjection and began to subdue the world, woman, tradition-ridden and inert, failed to sense the coming change and stepped docile into bondage. Of man's uprising, his revolt and seizure of power, our reports are meager. But woman became subject to man, she became a chattel and, so far as history saith, she took all this lying down. She deserves what she got, just as the American man of today, supinely subject to woman in all things that matter, impotent, downtrodden, and sequacious, deserves what he has brought upon himself; for of course woman assumes dominance again today.

No doubt one fact bulked large in woman's defeat. Man found out that he was the father of his own children, and instantly he assumed control. Woman was caught by surprise at his perspicacity. At last he had his eyes open. He had been fooled long enough, and he must now go the whole road to liberty. In fact, he began to reserve liberty as his own prerogative and restricted his wife exclusively to himself at the same time. He not only usurped woman's privileges; he invented some new ones. He took sex liberty and ironically turned to exalt female virtue, chastity and fidelity. He held woman to monogamy and reserved group marriage for himself. For if mothers are faithful, descent may still be reckoned paternally even in polygynous unions, a thing impossible in polyandry, anyway.

Only recently has woman had sufficient courage to revolt and to demand the same rights, liberties, and license that man has. She has done this successfully because man has in his turn taken his new subjugation lying down. He protests feebly, but plays golf, supplies the cash, seeks to support his wife in conspicuous leisure and to keep her out of too much mischief, and hopes for the best, usually getting much less than that.

But when man first took the helm he was master. He told woman in China (Chun Ka Po; "Transmitted Family Pearls"): "No one desires that you should be intelligent or your abilities of a high order. . . . You ought to know that the husband is the wife's heaven; that you have not been born a male is owing to your amount of wickedness in a previous state of existence having been deep and heavy." And she believed him!

He told her in Greece (Hesiod) that she was Pandora opening a jar of troubles and (Simonides) that she was "the greatest evil that God had ever created." In fact Mettullicus Macedonicus indignantly declared: "If we could get along without wives we would dispense with the nuisance." That does have a decidedly querulous modern tone. Aristotle said: "The male is by nature superior, and the female inferior; and the one rules while the other is ruled." His dictum was flat and unadorned, and destined long to hold sway.

In Rome Cato was saying: "The husband is judge of his wife. . . . If she has been guilty of adultery, he kills her." There is somehow no mistaking that imperious voice. Woman heard, and was silent. The Hebrews adopted the same pagan ways. Among them man, quite characteristically, assumed the voice of God and informed woman: "Thy desire shall be thy husband and he shall rule over thee"; and he added contemptuously: "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children."

Then there seems to have arisen among the Hebrews, a legendary figure, sedulously repudiated by them, of course, shrouded in the fogs of history, half-obliterated by the miasmas of theology, an intrepid social reformer. He consorted with prostitutes and condoned them, but blamed men for their sin. He did not explain it economically. He perhaps knew that the 1926 Report of the New York Salvation Army Headquarters would remark that the professional prostitute had almost disappeared now since maternity homes were filled to capacity with school-children of an average age of sixteen. But, says the contemporary reformer, prostitution is caused exclusively by economic injustice. Yes?

Today prostitution declines, female promiscuity increases, the economic system meanwhile remains intact. But this ancient Hebrew iconoclast dashed his head bravely against the stone wall of Oriental female seclusion; he reasoned with women and considered them worth intellectual regeneration.

Then the man who put Christ over to the masses came to undo this revolutionary step toward feminine emancipation. For Paul averred: "A man ought to cover his head forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of man." He continued austerely: "Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law." Finally he ordered: "Let them be silent and at home consult their husbands." Again woman heard her master's voice, believed him, and obeyed.

The early church fathers hastened to sustain Paul. "Above all it seems right that we turn away from the sight of women," they said, "for it is a sin not only to touch, but to look; and he who is rightly trained must especially avoid them." St. Chrysostom echoed this righteous sentiment when he added: "What is woman but an enemy to friendship, and unavoidable punishment, a necessary evil, a natural temptation, a wicked work of nature covered with shining varnish?"

Man then spoke throughout the world with authority, and woman stupidly trembled. She let him wrest economic power from her and stood aghast, unable to cope with him in a battle of wits. Nor did she come to herself for years, and it was the nineteenth century before she tried the very obvious and simple experiment of invading man's outside economic sphere as a way of equalizing her status. When she did this who stopped her? No one.

Who stopped the very emancipated Mrs. Samuel Pepys? Who stopped Aspasia, the ruler of Pericles, or Sappho, who decided to be learned in a bachelor-girl way? Determination always succeeds in such cases. In Persia woman, unlike her emancipated Turkish sister, was still subdued even in 1926-1927. The dictator Reza Shah Pahlavi believed in no modern woman tomfoolery. But little bespectacled Parvin Khanun, defying him, refused to enter his palace as court poetess and tutor to his wife and children.

In Turkey women cast aside their veils and the religion of Mohammed when they wished to do so. In Tibet they have for generations controlled businesses of their own; in Spain, France, Italy, and South America they arise to power when they desire power sufficiently. In England and America man now stands helpless in turn, unable to think up anything sufficiently clever to limit woman's increasing sway. Sex domination is always built upon the collective stupidity of one sex or the other. Today the trend is against man in the United States and Great Britain, and he is too stupid to stay the march of victorious woman.

Of course in this day of enlightenment, when each school-child is better equipped with scientific fact than was Aristotle, no such simple expedient as discovering that he is the father of his own child, or domesticating animals, will save man. Nor can woman ever be saved again by the simple expedient of entering man's extra-household economic sphere. A compromise expedient is necessary, and this can have but one basis and one foundation.

The foundation must be a realization of the fact that men and women are entirely different animals. We must have sense enough to allow for the scientific implications of this definite physiological and psychological fact. Then the basis of adjustment or compromise must be that equality which exists among incommensurable, complementary, and asymmetrical coordinates. What does all this mean?

Fortunately it means something quite simple. A peach and a pear cannot justly be compared. There is no common measure of value; they cannot be superimposed, and you cannot say which is better and which is worse. Exactly the same holds for a horse and a cow, for a chronometer and a microscope, and for a man and a woman. Physiology and psychology set definite limits to their characters and adaptabilities. Each has its peculiar faults and fine qualities. Each may be as good of its kind as the other of its kind and that is all that can be said. There is no sound basis for sex dominance.

In the Driftway

THE New York World shows itself to be a true lover of Americana in its scornful refusal to accept the claim of the motor launch Bogie to beating the record of the famous Mississippi River steamboat Robert E. Lee. The Bogie is doubtless a good boat, and her crew is to be congratulated on having made the run from New Orleans to St. Louis in a couple of hours less time than did the Lee in the memorable race against the Natchez fifty-nine years ago. But the record of the Lee still stands, and is unlikely to be either beaten or forgotten as long as steamboats are remembered and the Mississippi still flows from the prairies to the sea. The performance of the Bogie hasn't anything more to do with the record of the Robert E. Lee than the crossing-time of the new steamship Bremen has to do with the best transatlantic passage of the celebrated sailing ship Red Jacket.

* * * * *

IT is good, though, to be reminded of those proud packets of the Mississippi in the 70's which churned up and down the river when it was the great highway of the Middle West. People used to stand on the river banks at night to see the crack steamboats go by, fire pouring from their smokestacks, and crowds gathered at the landings as they do now in New York for the arrival of the Leviathan or the Ile de France. The great days of Mississippi River steamboating were the decade just previous to the Civil War and again for a few years shortly after the conflict—before the railroads finally robbed the river of its trade and its glory. The earlier boats, though fast, were dangerous, and explosions of the boilers in those still primitive days of steam were common. Most of the Mississippi River craft were the "high pressure" type of which Charles Dickens wrote: "It always conveyed that kind of feeling to me which I should be likely to experience, I think, if I had lodgings on the first floor of a powder mill."

* * * * *

THE Robert E. Lee was one of the last and greatest of the crack fleet of Old Man River. The Lee is credited with a speed of eighteen miles an hour against the current and as much as twenty-five miles when running downstream. The steamboat still lives in the song and story of the river and in our own generation was recalled in a bit of early jazz. The Drifter was abroad at the time and was doubly impressed to have the song first reach his ears from the throats of scores of young Cockneys picnicking on a rainy Easter Monday in 1913 on the water-soaked grass of London's Hampstead Heath. (The English never postpone a picnic because of rain. There just wouldn't be any picnics if they did.) Everywhere the Drifter went he found groups of young men and women, weaving back and forth in an improvised dance on the sodden grass, singing a lilting chorus:

Waiting on the levee,
Waiting on the levee,
Waiting for the Robert E. Lee!

* * * * *

ANYHOW the Drifter is glad of the reminder of old times on the Mississippi brought by the publicity gained from the recent trip of the motor launch Bogie. Though racing days may be dead on the Mississippi, there has lately been a revival of the old rivalries on the Ohio. A year ago there was a nip-and-tuck race between two side-wheelers on the Ohio near Louisville and this summer the Tom Greene and the Betsy Ann had a contest near New Richmond. It must have been a perfect race in every way even to the fact that the spectators quarrelled with the verdict of the judges and half of the onlookers went home protesting vehemently that the Betsy Ann had won although victory was officially awarded to the Tom Greene. That sounds like the old river spirit. The accounts which the Drifter read failed to say whether the rival steamboats were side-wheelers or stern-wheelers. He imagines that they were the former, although all the steamboats which the Drifter has seen around Pittsburgh lately have been propelled by one great churning wheel at the stern. Most of these craft have seemed dingy and drooping compared with the vessels which Pittsburgh once knew. For it should not be forgotten that our present metropolis of belching iron foundries and steel rolling-mills was at one time a great town for the building of wooden ships. In the early days of the nineteenth century its yards not only turned out flatboats and steamboats but fashioned schooners, brigs, and even full-rigged ships, which were floated down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers at high water and thus to the sea. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Whose Vandalism?

[We have received a multitude of letters concerning Max Bahr's article on the destruction of the Münsterwalde bridge in The Nation of April 3. From these we select the three following communications as representative, and beg to consider the controversy closed.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In The Nation of April 3 Max Bahr, a German publicist, signed a brief but fiery arraignment of Polish vandalism and its menace to the peace of Europe. The vandalism of which Poland was accused is the willful destruction of a great bridge, a masterpiece of engineering skill, on the Polish-German East Prussia frontier, for the purpose of annihilating peaceful intercourse between these territories, an act claimed to be open defiance of a treaty.

The bridge across the Vistula, a little south of Gniew (Mewe), known as the Opalenie (Münsterwalde) bridge, was erected in 1909 by Prussia at a cost of more than $4,000,000 (no doubt from Polish taxes). By final decision of the International Commission on the plebiscite for the Polish-German East Prussia frontier, Poland received this bridge and, on the German side, five small villages. If it were true that Poland is exceeding her rights in razing a bridge on her own territory, Germany would have a good case to present to the League of Nations; it is significant that none has been presented.

This bridge, whose depreciated value in 1928 was estimated at about $3,000,000, is being torn down by the Polish government for two reasons, both of which Herr Bahr and other Germans have neglected to mention:

(1) Whatever the conditions demanding the bridge in 1909 were, the traffic at that point was so small in 1927 and 1928 that the passage of each person over the bridge, because of high maintenance expenses, cost the Polish government 425 zlotys, or $50. It is a higher toll rate than individuals will pay, and more than a new government can ask its taxpayers to pay. During 1927 there were only 203 automobiles and 1,554 carriages passing over the bridge, and during 1928 the average daily traffic amounted to 38 persons, which, remembering that on the border each person is counted twice, actually meant 19 (quoting the German figures, which, understandably, are a little higher than the Polish).

(2) Since before the war the bridge standing at Toruń, farther south on the river, through which both Polish and East Prussian commerce is served, has been insufficient to accommodate the traffic at that point. Conditions demand a new bridge, and, although a modern one was desired, the Treasury was unable to furnish it: calculation showed that it would be cheaper to transfer the Opalenie bridge. The steamboat traffic at Toruń in 1927 was, monthly, 81,000 people, and in summer months, increased up to 120,000. The bridge at Toruń monthly was serving 82,000 people, 12,000 carriages, 6,000 automobiles, and 6,000 bicycles (Toruń is not a border city and there is no duplicate counting). In other words, the bridge standing at Opalenie, where it was a heavy burden on the government, if moved to Toruń, would serve 1,400 times more traffic. (The figures quoted are from a statement by the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs).

The bridge is being moved and will be ready for use within a year or two at Toruń. Is it not, as the Germans declare, an outrageous piece of vandalism?

HELEN R. MICHEJDA

Giszowiec; Górny, Slask, Poland, July 17

Dr. Bahr's Defense

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Albert Morawski-Nawench tries to ironise my essay about the destruction of the bridge at Münsterwalde saying: "One cannot very well see a threatening of the peace of Europe by this." He is of course misinterpreting my deductions rather violently. Nobody with common sense will assume that there will be a European war because of the bridge of Münsterwalde. But the sentiment marked by such a deed bears in itself the germ of war, that would set Europe ablaze.

Only very short-sighted people may be misled by the description of the small traffic over the bridge nowadays and the high cost to each traveler. Before the war the daily railway traffic amounted to 30, sometimes even 40 trains. At present of course the traffic is smaller. Still, however, from the first of January to the last of June, 1928, 6,796 persons crossed the bridge in 183 days—371 for a day—not 19!

In times of normal peaceful business connections between Poland and Germany the bridge would serve for the nearer traffic of about half the part of West Prussia that remained with Germany—including about 120,000 souls—and a quarter of the part which came to Poland, including about 240,000 souls, totalling 360,000. A look at the map shows a well-developed net of railroads on both sides of the Vistula and in a distance of about thirty miles a number of smaller towns, and a well developed agriculture. Certainly with a treaty of commerce between Poland and Germany also a part of the greater through traffic would have taken its way over this bridge, so that probably more than "five wagons with wood for a sawmill" would pass it. It is rather childish to find the arithmetical sum of nineteen (?) people passing every day to and fro on a bridge that has a value of 26,000,000 zloties with 1,300,000 zloties rent a year, and 232 zloties as the share of the costs per traveler. Poland itself has not spent a cent for the cost, neither does it transfer the value of 26,000,000 zloties to Thorn. To blow up the pillars might cost hundreds of thousands of zloties.

[In the second paragraph Mr. Bahr has made a serious mathematical error which exaggerates the number of persons using the bridge. 6,796 ÷ 183 = 37.1, not 371.—Editor The Nation.]

Lansberg, Germany, July 14 Max Bahr

From a Polish Editor

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: My attention has been drawn to a letter from Mr. H. D. Isenberg, appearing in The Nation of June 26, in which he undertakes to bolster up the original contentions about alleged "Polish vandalism" in the destruction of the Münsterwalde bridge across the Vistula. Mr. Isenberg makes the statement that "the railroad from Münsterwalde bridge was virtually the only practical route through the corridor to the fatherland for marketing the agricultural produce of East Prussia." The Treaty of Versailles definitely obligated Poland to give "free transit between Germany and East Prussia through the territory ceded to Poland and through the Free City of Danzig." All questions of railway communications have to be regulated with the participation of Germany. Accordingly, agreement was reached in 1921—not in 1925, as Mr. Isenberg says—naming eight railway lines for this transit through Poland. The line over the Münsterwalde bridge was not one of them. Consequently, it was discontinued eight years ago and the official custom-house figures quoted in the letter of Mr. Albert Morawski-Nawench omitted the record of railroad traffic over this bridge for the excellent reason that there was none. Mr. Isenberg's statement that the proposed ferry—which is not only proposed, but is in operation—can never be an adequate substitute for the bridge, is merely an uninformed opinion.

Documentary evidence of Germany's satisfaction with the rail communications with East Prussia across Polish territory is contained in a published opinion of the Directory of German Railways in Königsberg under the title "East Prussian Economics and Communication Before and After the War." I quote from this publication as follows: "In regard to transit traffic, East Prussia can no longer be called an 'enclave.' The Reich Railways have bridged the way over the Polish transit territory."

New York, July 5 Ignace Morawski

Catullus on Aviation

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In this day of rival flights across the Seven Seas, let us not forget Catullus's immortal reference to aviation in his time! It reads:

Iam ver egelidos refert tepores,
iam caeli furor aequinoctialis iucundis Zephyri silescit aureis.
Linquantur Phrygii, Catulle, campi
Nicaeaeque ager uber aestuosae:
ad claras Asiae volemus urbes.
Iam mens praetrepidans avet vagari,
iam laeti studio pedes vigescunt.
O dulces comitum valete coetus, longe quos simul a domo profectos diversae variae viae reportant.

Emerson assures us that Rome practiced many arts now lost. Flying may have been one of them; if we translate volemus literally, of course it was!

Nathan Haskell Dole

Ogunquit, Maine, June 15, MDCDXXIX

[For the benefit of the occasional reader of The Nation who may have been too busy during recent years tinkering his radio or handling the controls of his airplane to keep his Latin absolutely fresh, we append Martin's translation of the poem of Catullus to which Mr. Dole so delightfully calls attention. —Editor The Nation.]

A balmy warmth comes wafted o'er the seas,
The savage howl of wintry tempests drear
In the sweet whispers of the western breeze
Has died away; the spring, the spring is here!

Now quit, Catullus, quit the Phrygian plain,
Where days of sweltering sunshine soon shall crown
Nicaea's fields with wealth of golden grain,
And fly to Asia's cities of renown!

Already through each nerve a flutter runs
Of eager hope, that longs to be away,
Already 'neath the light of other suns
My feet, new-wing'd for travel, yearn to stray.

And you, ye band of comrades tried and true,
Who side by side went forth from home, farewell!
How far apart the paths shall carry you
Back to your native shore, ah, who can tell?

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
August 12—Mr. Mussey
August 19—Mr. Warner

Books

Maine: November

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Outside the wall cut fir-boughs nestling,
A fragrant barricade against the cold,
Wait for increase of winter. Brown vines cling Along the eaves. Chill window-boxes hold
The whispering ghosts of gaunt geraniums.
The drifted silver of the moon is lost
Where upon deepening windows faintly comes Premonitory fingering of frost
Against the whitening hour . . . Cold sands blow
Up from the sea and straggling under hedges
Sting the dull grass to hissing as they go.
Threadbare of soil, a moon-lit rock's lean edges,
Holding proud nakedness from burial
Beneath the steely crystals' thin turmoil,
Stand as of right amid a shifting soil
To wait cold comfort in the white snow's fall.

Voyage

By EVELYN SCOTT

I

Upright and proud and isolate,
The mast; already past, the slow land.
Gulls cleave the sky
Into clean remnants of a lost earth motion;
The hooting gulls
That are the carrion angels of the ocean;
The slow gulls who write themselves severely
On the sinking glare,
Turning their pale heads between
Phantom-feathered shoulders and observing
Where all light-ships crash away, extinct.
A thin tincture, a small essence that is star,
A drop, hangs over blued and sooted waters
As they slope and curve and smite
With heavier bludgeoning
The ruddy orchards of the hazy west.
I am alone, and blest.

II

Moon, fine as a shrill whip,
Lashes the clouds,
Shreds gloomy gold
From bitter tendril curled,
Excites a sodden world
To moving tremors.
I feel the waters sway with me.
And all the giddy universe with stars
Beats vastly, like a gale-flapped banner.

III

Over the numb edge of sky
Climb the snow-traveling mountains,
Vapor-fuming,
In ice-grey, running hummocks,
Until the moving Andes has turned white with gale.
Jade-stained valleys, soot-blue peaks,
Milk-gushing springs in marble-curled alleys,
Diamond-smoking, choking with refused reflections
Of sunset like the slag eruption of a cold volcano:
In all this vividness-to-animality,
A hell for exquisites.
Even with the forecast of the night,
When the horizon is harsh horn of shadow scarcely seen,
This gentle bedlam, in its vastness,
Seems serene;
And Death here
In black innocence.

"The Father of the House"

Memoirs of an Old Parliamentarian. By The Right Honorable T. P. O'Connor, M. P. D. Appleton and Company. Two volumes. $10.

THE oldest Member of the House of Commons is called "The Father of the House," and well does dear old "T. P." deserve the name. Not only for his age (and he is eighty-one), but for a certain kindliness and benignity that we should all like to associate with the name of father, no matter how often we are disappointed. I should say that never in his long life has he felt or shown a trace of malice or malignity toward any human soul, no matter how violently opposed upon political opinions or public actions. Most journalists in London have at one time or another known his unselfish helpfulness, and like most journalists, I can speak of it from experience. And now that he is old, though not past work, his friends in Parliament (and that must surely include all the Members) have combined to make him a presentation tomorrow (July 18), partly to show their personal esteem, partly to ensure for him freedom from money cares. For in spite of his persistent labors, and energetic public life, and the numerous successful papers he has started and edited, he remains a comparatively poor man, and, as he told me lately, the fear of poverty still haunts him.

These volumes alone ought to remove that fear for the rest of his life, for I suppose a great sale is certain. So that The Nation may have this notice in good time, I have devoted a long day and a long night to reading them, but in any case I should have read them straight through without a break. So absorbing is their interest. Possibly their interest is peculiarly strong to me, for they treat of those terrible years when first I began to turn special attention to Ireland and her piteous condition. But to everyone with a sense for personality and dramatic action their interest must be overwhelming. We find brief introductions from previous years just to show what the Irish question implied (and in fact O'Connor was himself born in the very year of the worst famine, 1848), but the main story is concerned only with those eleven years from 1880 to 1891, marked by the intensely dramatic incidents of the Land League, the Phoenix Park murders, Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, the Pigott forgeries, and the fall of Parnell owing to his passionate love for Mrs. O'Shea. Other matters of great interest come in by the way, especially the disasters that befell Mr. Gladstone's Government after his triumph in 1880—the conflict over Bradlaugh's refusal to take the oath in Parliament, the terrible fate of Gordon at Khartoum, the danger from Russia on the Indian frontier, and other troubles that pursued that ill-fated Ministry. But throughout, the main interest of the time was Ireland, and here we have the history of those tempestuous years told by one who was himself a great part of the events, and always stood behind the scene.

How different is such a record from the sneering and malignant sketches by writers who have never in their lives known responsibility or taken a share in action or exposed themselves to danger or even to anxiety for a great cause, but think they have written history and penetrated into character when they have contrived to squeeze from their acrid brains the pungent epigrams that will gain popularity and a big sale for their books. They succeed because the majority of ordinary people like to be told evil of accepted heroes, and to be shown that the noble figures of an age are not much better than their poor little selves. Surely in the last seven or eight years we have had enough of those blow-fly epigrammatists! Here at all events is the antidote to their acidulated depreciation. My one regret in these volumes is that the author quotes from Mr. Lytton Strachey's "Eminent Victorians" one of the passages in which we are shown General Gordon as addicted to brandy and soda. A writer who has probably never suffered heat in his life unless sheltered by sympathetic parasols, has never known thirst beyond the reach of iced lemonade, and probably has never known a moment's danger or risked a hair for a noble object—that such a man should devote his eminent wit to making light of Gordon in a hot and thirsty desert, exposed by day and night to the peril of savage death, and contending for the safety of thousands of fellow men—that may delight the exquisite dwellers in Bloomsbury Square, and it is evidently what the public likes, but Mr. T. P. O'Connor has not followed that popular line.

With patient skill he brings before us all the most prominent figures of those eleven dramatic years—Isaac Butt, Joseph Biggar, Michael Davitt, Tim Healy, Thomas Sexton, John Dillon, Swift MacNeill, Charles Bradlaugh, Randolph Churchill, A. J. Balfour, W. E. Forster, and other friends or enemies of the Irish cause, most of whom I have known, at all events by sight, and some of whom still survive as ghosts of an almost incredible past. But the two figures that stand out most prominently in the drama are Mr. Gladstone and Charles Stewart Parnell. To both Mr. O'Connor was at one time or other politically and even violently opposed, but what an impression of heroic qualities he leaves upon our minds! In the case of Mr. Gladstone this is the more remarkable and the more welcome. For clever writers, from Mr. Lytton Strachey and M. Maurois downward, have chosen Mr. Gladstone as the chief butt of their envenomed sneers, and now every whippersnapper imitates their easy game. They never knew, never heard, never saw that amazing man, but Mr. O'Connor knew him for years, and we who only saw and heard him know the incalculable greatness of the commanding figure. The nobility of his character and the greatness of his intellect shine throughout these volumes, but let me quote only two passages on his personal qualities:

> As he walked up the floor of the House he seemed to be enveloped by a great solitude, so unmistakably did he stand out from all the figures around him. I must add to this description of his extreme physical gifts the wonderful quality of his voice. It was a powerful voice, but sweet and melodious, and it was managed as exquisitely and as faithfully as the song of a great prima donna. If the speech were ringing, it came to your ears almost soft by that constant change of tone which the voice displayed; it could whisper, it could thunder.

Or again, take this brief account of the noble-hearted old man who at seventy-six had led the great revolution of his life—his Home Rule Bill—and just been defeated:

> Gladstone was at his best in his speech [at Liverpool, June, 1886]—playful, argumentative, solemn, all these moods were conveyed in a voice that, in spite of the terrible strain upon it, seemed as fresh as ever. Then he went into the streets and received the same rapturous reception. It was not the first occasion on which I saw proof that the appearance of Gladstone—with his magnificent face, his splendid eyes, the expression at once so benignant as well as so resolute, his broad shoulders, and the sense of vigour and resolution, not weakened by seventy-six years of life—had almost the effect of the trailing of a miraculous saint among masses of idolaters.

After those and many similar accurate descriptions, coming from one who fought in the very thick of the dramatic conflict, perhaps the literary amateurs in politics who have never known what action is had better hold their peace.

The other personality who stands foremost in this absorbing record is the heroic and enigmatic figure of Parnell. I suppose he remains the most inscrutable nature in political history, but here we are shown him more clearly than in any other book known to me, even than in his lover's and wife's own reminiscences. Who could fathom that glacial nature under which stormed so violent a torrent of passion, of love, of hatred, and of utter devotion to the cause of national freedom? No element of tragedy on the grand scale was wanting to his purpose, his struggle, and his fall. As to the cause of that fall, I have never understood how even the most conscientious "Nonconformist conscience" could have greatly condemned—condemned to utter ruin—a man whose love was so natural, so loyal, and so excusable; for no love had ever been lost between Mrs. O'Shea and her contemptible husband. But let me quote Mr. O'Connor himself, though, to his grief—his permanent grief, as I feel assured—he parted from his great leader at the time of crisis:

> At what precise time this evidently growing love between them developed into intimacy is left unanswered, but it must have happened pretty soon. The two people were violently drawn together by a natural affinity, and in soul, in heart, and in body they reached the unity of perfect love as much as any two human beings.

There, unhappily, this notice must end. The Father of the House has lived to see a greater measure of freedom gained for his country than Parnell ever dreamed of. But if those who have the good fortune to be so young that they cannot remember the conflict of the 'eighties as I can would realize what that measure of freedom cost the patriots who fought for it forty or fifty years ago, let them read the record of its inner history in this irresistible account by one who then played a leading part in the conflict.

HENRY W. NEVINSON

Russia Moves On

The Diary of a Communist Undergraduate. By N. Ognyov. Translated from the Russian by Alexander Werth. Payson and Clarke. $2.50.

LIKE his "Diary of a Communist Schoolboy," Ognyov's present "Diary" offers a fascinating and vividly authentic picture of the bewildering social and psychological changes in the student life of Soviet Russia. Against the background of a tumultuously changing milieu and of numerous ailments and contradictions incident to a transition period, the undergraduate's notes reveal a university world stimulatingly perplexing and bizarre and a student body glowingly vital and promising. Twelve years of civil war and revolution have almost eliminated the queer, neurotic, ineffectual, broodingly introspective, morbidly sensitive, excessively cultivated "hero" of the past. The Onegins and the Pechorins, the Rudins and the Oblomovs, the Karamazovs and the Sanins had had no useful outlet for their energies and were driven into futile sexual sophistications, weird self-analysis, mystical aberrations. But life has changed and the hero has changed. There has been a complete dethronement of the pre-revolutionary protagonist. The contemporary Russian hero is certainly no introvert. "To hell with degenerate reflection!" exclaims Kostya, the fictitious author of the "Diary." "I must work, and keep control over myself and the life around me; I must be constructive not contemplative." It matters little to Kostya that he is repeatedly disillusioned, that Soviet reality is not nearly so beatific as he had imagined, that he is forced to sleep in the park and to wheedle an occasional meal from his bourgeois classmate, that there is a great deal of ugliness and coarseness and maladjustment in the Russian student's life—this, he feels, is a temporary condition; things, though bad, are improving all the while, there is no reason to despair. Frustration? Futility? Doubt? . . . Nonsense! "But there is an outlet for my energy," he exults: "Science. Socialism. Struggle." He must work, and build, and organize, and conquer. Indeed, he is, in the words of the intelligent Shahov, "a round and oily ball, and will pass, like a croquet-ball, through all the gates"; he has no tragic edges, no acute angularities.

Of course, the old has not yet been completely eradicated. In addition to the distressingly cynical and individualistic student Korsuntsev, his gormandizing and bibulous uncle, the lascivious and empty-headed Zizi, the diaphanously attired "fox-trot" lassies, the secret circle of vapid mystics, the distracted princess, the pious shoemaker, and others, there is the "triangular" intellectual Shahov who is unable to get rid of the past or to become part of the present or to see anything but "nonsense" in the future, and who escapes the terrific strain of irremediable inner contradictions by ending his own life; there is also the idealistic old teacher N. Ozhegov (incidentally, this name is strangely similar in sound and derivation to the author's name) who finds himself in a "Hamlet dilemma . . . crucified on the crossroads . . . while life goes rushing past him, bringing new creative forces to the surface . . . ."

Poor Ozhegov is a typical member of the revolutionary intelligentsia and, despite his popularity with his Communist pupils, is so utterly wretched in this raucous proletarian world that his mind almost gives way under the pressure. Significantly enough, Ozhegov is finally saved from insanity and suicide by contact with the village, the peasant. In his letter to Kostya with which the book is concluded, Ozhegov writes lyrically:

> We keep forgetting that there is this vast, immense Russia, the rural Russia on whose crest we are living. . . . When I see the blue outline of a wood against the snowy horizon, and somewhere in the distance the lights of a factory, and when the little horse pulls the sledge through the deep snow, with the driver and myself, and mail-bags full of complaints and applications and facts and orders and information and money, I suddenly have a dim vision of my home country, and I sometimes whisper to myself:
>
> Onward, dear Russia, onward!

Thus, contrary to all dictates of artistic unity, is the diary of a Communist student concluded with what sounds like a veritable nationalist rhapsody. There is a subtle discrepancy here, a scarcely perceptible shift of emphasis from the proletariat to the peasant, from urban to rural ideals. And it makes one wonder, since Ozhegov apparently speaks for Ognyov, whether the prominence given to his patriotic effusions reflects the Communist author's conscious or unconscious personal attitude or whether this subtle substitution of Russia for the proletariat is symptomatic of a widespread tendency in Soviet life and in the Russian Communist Party.

JOSHUA KUNITZ

More from the Front

War. By Ludwig Renn. Translated from the German by Willa and Edwin Muir. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

THE blurbs on the jacket and band around this book say it is very fine. I agree. It is the simple, sincere and candid narrative of the experience at the front of a German N. C. O. of infantry. It is offered by the publishers as non-fiction. It reads like fiction. Why not? Fine fiction seems real; actual experience, when handled with literary skill, tends toward fiction.

One would not expect, in such a book, a note on the art of writing. Yet on pp. 140-141, when the book carries the reader behind the lines for a brief period of rest, the author allows himself the following comment:

> About writers it struck me how arbitrary was the order in which they set down their words, in spite of the fact that there is an obvious inevitability about the arrangement of words, which must be set down in the exact order in which the reader is to feel them. For instance, not "a green, over-several-knolls-rising meadow"; for one has to know first that it is a meadow, and so the word "meadow" should come at the beginning of the sentence.

That is how the book is written. The author has taken care of his words. He understands, too, the value of the appeal to the senses of sight and hearing (in so far as literature can appeal, by association, to the eye and the ear). To wit:

> . . . I covered the nearest man. Shots rang out.
> I pulled my trigger.
> He fell.
> I loaded again.
> Hartmann shot.
> Some of our men came racing up behind us.

And again:

> The shells crashed, and burst, the ground shook.
> Whizz! Something flew close over my head and behind me into the valley.
> Bang! rat-a-tat! Bang!
> I crouched lower.
> My ears sang.
> Something or other hit my helmet.
> I drew the blanket quite over me.
> Bang! Whack! Crash! Bamm-bamm-bang! Rat-a-tat! B-rrr!
> . . . And if one of them hit you—you would never notice it, no pain even—simply be finished with it. What was so terrible about that, after all?

Isn't there order in those passages? Don't those words appeal to the eye and the ear? Everywhere in the book are scenes which are like visual and audible images of war.

"War" lacks the philosophic perspective of Remarque's "All Quiet on the Western Front." It is perhaps not so great a book, although no one can yet judge with any certainty of that quality between the two. Renn's story strikes me, however, as more authentic than Remarque's. Renn's descriptions of actual combat, and of the front, are truer, more real and accurate. As I read "War" I did not have a feeling, as I did with "All Quiet on the Western Front," that it was occasionally unreal. As a transcript of war Renn's book has the greater value. It is, too, the braver of the two volumes.

The translation by Willa and Edwin Muir is excellent, far better than that of "All Quiet on the Western Front." In fairness to the latter, however, it must be said that it was by far the more difficult to translate. The reviewer has read both books in the original and in English.

JAMES B. WHARTON

Tales of Success

John D., A Portrait in Oils. By John K. Winkler. Vanguard Press. $2.25.

An American Business Adventure: the Story of Henry A. Dix. By Mark H. Dix. Harper and Brothers. $3.

An Inside Story of Success: Life of William Burnette. By Neil McCullough Clark. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

The Life of George Chaffey. By J. A. Alexander. The Macmillan Company. $7.50.

NO capitalist in history has stirred up more universal hatred against himself than John D. Rockefeller, and in no case has the white heat of people's passions cooled down to such a degree of frigidity with the passing years. "John D." is taken for granted, and the abundance of his ill-gotten gain now enriches our institutions of higher learning and medical research and foundations "to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world." His dimes go to the thousands of his humbler fellow-countrymen whom he encounters on his occasional trips from one palatial estate to another.

Mr. Winkler's contribution does not consist in the originality of his material but in his way of bringing to life an almost forgotten figure of the pioneer days of American industrialism. We see young John borrowing money from his rascal father at an exorbitant rate of interest to launch a commission business in Cleveland. With the first discovery of oil in Pennsylvania, his keen nose for money scents profits. One after another, he gathers about him with unerring judgment the men best fitted to play his game. On Sunday he teaches Sunday-school classes, carrying out his God-given Baptist mission with the same zeal he shows in what he regards as his divine call to become a millionaire.

Secretly he undermines all competitors. Before the world or his adversaries are allowed to know it, he has put over a deal with the railroads which makes competition practically impossible. At length the truth is found out and his opponents and an infuriated public opinion unite against him. But he is already a multi-millionaire possessed of power greater than the strength of court edicts and editorials. The great Standard Oil Company is dissolved into its component parts, in each of which John D. holds a controlling interest, and the colossal plunder goes on as before.

When John D.'s health is well-nigh ruined by the nerve-racking struggle, direction of his empire is entrusted to his son. This upright Christian business man comes to be regarded as a liberal capitalist. He even promises the leaders of a strike in the Rockefeller Colorado Fuel and Iron Company that he will investigate their ills. Down into the mines he goes, in overalls, eats with the workers, discusses their problems—and presents them with a "Republic of Labor" to quiet their troubled spirits. This device staves off the onslaughts of trade unionism and the Rockefeller profits continue pouring into the family coffers. Ivy Lee becomes the master magician to handle public opinion. Foundations for giving away money are organized. At last everybody is satisfied! And the Rockefeller dynasty is worth today well over a billion dollars.

The picture is completed with a few strokes of Mr. Winkler's brush, showing John D., III, in his Princeton dormitory; Nelson a sophomore at Dartmouth, and John D., Sr., at home on his $3,000,000 estate at Pocantico Hills. The old man's tradition will carry on in his amazing progeny, in whom are combined the Rockefeller traits of lust for money, shrewd judgment of men, and the utmost piety and Christian virtue.

The "American Business Adventure" described by Mark H. Dix stands in sharp contrast to this tale. Here was a man who refused to allow his business to expand beyond the limits of human control, a man who really had the interests of his workers at heart and who finally turned his clothing factory over to a directorate of men who had risen from the ranks of workers. Henry A. Dix deplored certain methods of some labor leaders but in general approved of trade unionism, although his plant was never organized.

The "Life of William Burnette" is another American Magazine success story, told with delightful naivete. Readers of The Nation will not be likely to rush to it eager to get the inside dope on how to achieve success by selling aluminum.

"The Life of George Chaffey" can be helpful only to persons interested in irrigation.

ROLAND A. GIBSON

Deux Ex Machina

Make Everybody Rich: Industry's New Goal. By B. A. Javits and Charles W. Wood. B. C. Forbes Publishing Company. $3.00.

ONE of the most interesting contemporary commentators on our machine civilization is Mr. Charles W. Wood, author of "The Myth of the Individual." In that book he pointed out that man is a social animal; that his individual significance is derived from his participation in the thought and activity of the group; that in the economic field he as an individual can only profit, ultimately, by serving the group; that business is wrong in supposing that we can all make a living by taking in each other's washing; that industry, the machine, which follows the severe logic of the physical sciences, is far more intelligent than man because it obeys the logic of the universe; that this logic entails progressively more efficient production, the elimination of waste in distribution, and the increase in demand through the increase of wages. Mr. Wood's latest extension of this thesis appears in a book written in collaboration with B. A. Javits. In this book he develops his theory into an energetic and well-argued plea for the repeal of the anti-trust laws, which hamper the logical march of industry toward a millennium in which everybody will be rich—and in which, presumably, the machine, freed from legislative and other human impertinences, will automatically tell us what to be and do. One's basic criticism of Mr. Wood is implied in the last clause. It would seem that he wholly ignores the metaphysical problem, which includes the problems of leadership, of government, and of human choice and self-determination. Furthermore, do his facts add up to the dizzy hope which he offers us? Industry, the machine, has been freed to a considerable degree. The Sherman and Clayton laws are only minor impediments in the speech of the machine, which tells us in the clear and definite language of statistics that the rich in this country are becoming very much richer, and no happier; that the poor are becoming a very little richer during the intermittent periods when the machine permits them to serve it—and no happier. Granted that Mr. Wood does not blink this problem of machine-made unemployment; he even guesses that it is connected with the crime wave, and is probably right. But for a solution he is obliged to turn not to the machine but to familiar liberal concepts of human good will and intelligence. Is Mr. Wood's doctrine anything but a new version of laissez-faire—a new rationalization of the machine, which is so much easier to rationalize than to govern. I wish I thought so. Yet Mr. Wood has contributed importantly to our understanding of the machine. Perhaps, indeed, the machine is God. But that doesn't relieve us of the job of reconciling the ways of God to man.

JAMES RORTY

Epic of the Banana

The Romance and Rise of the American Tropics. By Samuel Crowther. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

THIS is the saga of the United Fruit Company, "one of the great civilizing forces of the century." Mr. Crowther, coauthor with Henry Ford of "My Life and Work" and "Today and Tomorrow," with A. B. Farquhar of "The First Million the Hardest," and with Harvey S. Firestone of "Men and Rubber," pays his smiling respects to the old conquistadores, gives a chapter to the great duel between William Walker and Commodore Vanderbilt, and summarizes the histories of the Central American republics and of Colombia; but he hits his stride only when he reaches Minor Keith, Victor Cutten, and the United Fruit. The formation of the United Fruit Company he ranks as more important than the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine. He is quite right.

His conclusion is curiously like that of a very different book —Dr. Wilhelm Bitter's "Die Eroberung Mittelamerikas durch den Bananentrust." The two histories agree that without political and military intervention the great banana company has molded the life of whole nations and is reshaping their destinies as part of an economic unit centering in North America. But what a difference in approach! Dr. Bitter is a cynical German; Mr. Crowther a warm-hearted hundred per cent American. The fact that of the first 2,200 Americans whom Minor Keith imported to help him build a railroad in Costa Rica, 2,175 died of fever, would, had he known it, have disturbed Dr. Bitter; to Mr. Crowther it merely provides a setting for the heroic fact that in twenty-seven years in the tropics Minor Keith never needed a doctor. It would not be fair to stop with that, though it is indicative of Mr. Crowther's habit of mind; the saga of the United Fruit is the story of one of the great movements of history. The United Fruit and Minor Keith's other enterprises have turned malarial jungles into rich plantations, created an economic structure which may well become the basis of stable government in the Caribbean, and largely solved the sanitary problems of the region. The banana is as important a factor in Caribbean history as oil, and despite the occasional tone of a house organ, Mr. Crowther has assembled and correlated a mass of important material and made it readable.

LEWIS S. GANNETT

Chinese Portraits

Fièvre jaune. By Simone Téry. Paris: Flammarion. 12 francs.

"YELLOW FEVER" Simone Téry calls her book on China, which makes one wonder whether she would not like, retrospectively, to call her excellent book on Ireland "Green Sickness," for surely the Irish "trouble times" were the mere maidenly chlorotic ailments of a young nation compared with the violent scourge now raging in China.

Mademoiselle Téry begins her book with a backward glance at Ireland, and a sort of sight that all revolutions cannot be so devoted, comprehensible, and successful. But she faces the facts, and indeed nobody ever went more courageously in search of them. She spent a year in China, and of course she is well aware that the "facts" in that country are not politely yielded up to strangers with a year, or with many years. But she reports vividly what she saw and the result is a book which renders China less unfamiliar—no small thing that!

The way she does it is to go intrepidly in search of the personalities labeled Chiang Kai-shek and Wang Ching-wei and Kiang and Yang and Pei Chon-chi, and many others of the deciders of Chinese destinies. These she makes human. There is no nonsense about her. She wants to see a certain leader; she is told it is impossible, dangerous; she finds him, nevertheless, unearths an interpreter, and talks to him (or her, for there are "hers" too in the Chinese troubles); and once Mlle Téry has her eye fixed on the interviewee, she carries away a sense of that person which she conveys in strokes as simple, strong, and skilful as a Chinese brush-drawing.

Besides these there are landscapes in her book, endless plains dotted with cemeteries, cities in ruins and cities with an incredible multiplicity of human beings. There is the strange, sad little scene of her visit to the fifteenth concubine of a general who, for once, bears a familiar name—X. There are horrors of famine and flaying torture, and large anonymous mass executions. "If the Chinese weren't so afraid of dying," a Chinese woman said to her, "perhaps they wouldn't be killed so much." After seeing General Chiang Kai-shek, and noting his lack-luster patriotism, she exclaims: "I have heard other accents elsewhere. Arthur Griffith, Michael Collins, Erskine Childers, how differently your voices pleaded your cause!" But, as she admits, to be a Chinese patriot is a bit like asking a European to be a European patriot, to die for Europe.

SIGNE TOKSVIG

Psychology and Education

Difficulties in Child Development. By Mary Chadwick. The John Day Company. $4.

Psycho-Analysis and Education. By Barbara Low. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.25.

WHEN a fellow sets out to own and run a car, he has a number of safeguards against the emergencies of such an adventure. He has a guaranty as to how the car is going to pan out and three or four kinds of insurance against his own mishandling of the machine. He has in addition to this a little book that comes in the right-hand pocket to tell him what to do in case all kinds of unexpected crises occur. When a fellow sets out to be a parent and bring up a child, however, he is not nearly so well protected. He has no guaranty whatever as to how this strictly non-returnable offspring will turn out, and no insurance of any kind against his own blunders in management. His only hope perhaps lies in a little book to tell him what mistakes he is likely to make and how to mend them. Just such a little book is "Difficulties in Child Development" by Mary Chadwick. This is a practical handbook and if it discourages the reader by suggesting a great many things that may go wrong with children, it has also a good supply of antidotes to keep them from proving fatal. The author is by no means an alarmist but one who sees childhood realistically rather than sentimentally or theoretically. Her point of view about education is modern and—as follows almost axiomatically—her attitude toward parents critical. As between parent and child or teacher and child her sympathies are uniformly on the side of the child.

The chapter on Types of Those in Charge of Children is an interesting one. It describes the characteristics of adults that make for certain methods of mishandling of children. Among the undesirable parents which the chapter includes are the jealous, the over-conscientious, the sadistic, and the sentimental. We all know them among our friends.

Another chapter which makes a contribution to the subject in hand is the one on children's games and phantasies. In this is pointed out quite ingeniously and convincingly the relation between the games of children and the more or less universal phantasies of which they are symbolic. The patterns of adult day dreams would seem to be woven on the same warp. It is evident that the author's acquaintance with psycho-analytic theory is not new. She has digested her Freud well and tested and retested, by application to everyday children, the ideas which often come to us raw and unrelated to real life situations.

Barbara Low's book on "Psycho-Analysis and Education," unlike that of Miss Chadwick, is a purely theoretical work. It shows the author's grasp of her subject, and makes a moderate though thoroughly conventional exposition of the Freudian psychology. It has the odor of a doctor's thesis and, remembering her former volume of a similar nature, one wonders what compulsion has driven her to write her dissertation a second time.

Her subject is clearly and logically developed but seems to be all bones and no meat. The volume bears the stamp of a typical disciple of Freud who, in order to be true to the master, dares not introduce an original idea nor propound even the most orthodox complex without quoting chapter and verse: "couched in Freud's lucid and terse style" is as automatic as "your majesty" or "your honor" in their required places.

ELISABETH IRWIN

Japanese Ideals

Nippon Shindo Ron or The National Ideals of the Japanese People. By Yutaka Hibino. Translated with an Introduction by A. P. McKenzie. Cambridge University Press. $3.

"NIPPON SHINDO RON" goes far to explain the type of mind the middle-school student of Japan exhibits on graduation. Through this book and others of a similar nature he has been taught that his race is a favored one; that the gods, of whom his Emperor is a direct descendant, have blessed the country and its people; that his country boasts the most fertile soil; that the generals, writers, artists, and statesmen of his country are the most able; and that his schools, institutions, and society are ideal. Isolated statements from chapters of this book will serve as examples:

> On Aspirations of the Subject. Subjects have no thought but to obey the will of the Emperor and serve the interests of the state with their might, seeking only to fulfill their high obligations.
>
> In time of danger we are ready to die at the Emperor's command. There is no greater honor for a subject than to offer his life for his country's cause.
>
> On Loyalty. Should worm-like foreign reptiles dare insult the dignity of the Emperor or pollute his virtuous name the spirit of heaven and earth cannot refrain from meting out punishment, nor can his subjects withhold their indignant ire.
>
> On Connubial Accord. As there is but one supreme authority there cannot be two Emperors in the land. It is equally self-evident that there cannot be two heads to a family.
>
> If husband and wife cannot live peacefully together the family is destroyed and the nation injured.
>
> That the husband should command and the wife submit, thus establishing the wholesome home and forming the healthy constituents of the nation, is the true teaching. . . .
>
> On Mastery of a Profession. It is absolutely essential to consider the bearing of this selection upon the general question of the prosperity of the nation.
>
> On Development of Intellect. By a careful cultivation of our intellectual faculties we shall be deemed worthy to unfurl the Banner of the Rising Sun freely and confidently among nations of the world.

The Japanese Department of Education has authorized the use of "Nippon Shindo Ron" as a textbook for all middle schools. The author, Mr. Yutaka Hibino, founder of the Ikuye Commercial College, Nagoya, formerly principal of the First Government Middle School, Aichi Prefecture, and member of Parliament, states in his preface to the third edition: "For twenty years I have endeavored to plant these conceptions firmly in the hearts and minds of the scholars intrusted to my care." It is significant that all recent editions of "Nippon Shindo Ron" include laudatory marginal notes made by General Maresuke Nogi, hero of the Russo-Japanese war.

WILLIAM L. NUNN

The Vanished Gaucho

Don Segundo Sombra. Por Ricardo Güiraldes. Buenos Aires: Libraria El Ateneo.

NOT since the epoch-making innovations of Rubén Darío's "Azul" and "Prosas Profanas," more than thirty years ago, has a more interesting work, from the technical standpoint, been produced in Spanish America than Ricardo Güiraldes's novel, "Don Segundo Sombra." It meets every requirement of the new "dehumanized" art; the action is slight, diffuse, devoid of climax, creating at times the sensation of a motion picture al rallenti. The subconscious psychological impressions and motives are sought after and insisted upon. The language is difficult, deliberately, and the syntax elliptical and arbitrary. The plot is so frankly romantic that it becomes the satire of a plot, the old cliche of the long-lost son and missing heir reduced ad absurdum, to show how unnecessary a plot is—a modern contention. And yet, remarkable though it might seem in a book of this type, it is not interesting alone as an example of the newest literary art; it possesses a vital and eternal significance for the Argentine nation. In what may often seem aimless pages Güiraldes has fixed for all time the enduring charactristics of the gaucho. The nameless hero of the book—Don Segundo Sombra is his mentor—exists by virtue of his one ambition: to become the embodiment of those qualities considered essential in a good gaucho, and the story is the account of this werden.

The gaucho has disappeared from the reality of the Argentine, engulfed in the flood of immigration and the economic development of the past sixty years. But he lives as a legend, an ideal, haloed by all his virtues and with most of his vices transmuted, cherished by every son of the Argentine. His songs, his dances, the history he has made, the very defects of his language have permeated the fiber of his country's civilization, and he has been and is being immortalized in every phase of its culture.

HARRIET V. WISHNIEFF

Books in Brief

Danger Zones of Europe: A Study of National Minorities. By John S. Stephens. London: Hogarth Press. $2.

This is a small, but highly important book. It is a study, as scholarly as it is frank and fearless, of the plight of the national minorities of Europe as an instance of international injustice and an occasion of future war. Against the background of "nationality in the nineteenth century" and the part it played in the Great War, Professor Stephens presents the disabilities and oppressions suffered by minorities at the hands of conquerors to whose rule they were committed by peace treaties whose every safeguard of mercy and of right is now being so wantonly violated. If one would know the difference between the Fascist and the Bolshevik dictatorships, let him read the story here set down of the South Tyrol. While the people of this unhappy region are enduring at the hands of Mussolini iniquities unknown since the Middle Ages, in Russia "the claims of nationality are satisfied as in few other countries." There are solutions of the problem, clearly outlined by the author, but their acceptance by such nations as Italy, Poland, Rumania is altogether unlikely. Meanwhile the League of Nations, legally and morally responsible for what is going on, does nothing at the behest of the guilty Powers which control its Council. Professor Stephens is a trained historian, close bound to first-hand data. Just for this reason his survey of these "danger zones" is of great and terrible significance.

Life and Labor in the Old South. By Ulrich B. Phillips. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

This volume of social and economic history of the American South before the Civil War is based on years of research in original source material. Its scholarly character is notable; it is, besides, absorbing reading. Perhaps only one serious omission has been made by Professor Phillips. While the South was almost universally agricultural, the trend toward industry did make itself felt significantly, if slightly, before the War. A discussion of such phenomena as the enterprises of William Gregg, whose life was recently written by Broadus Mitchell, would have made this good book better still. The volume, incidentally, was awarded the Little, Brown and Company prize of $2,500.

The Era of the French Revolution. By Louis R. Gottschalk. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

Professor Gottschalk is a leader among American historians devoting themselves to the study of France. His compact and soberly written handbook of almost 500 pages, with its excellent bibliography and other apparatus, is as useful a volume on its subject as America has produced.

Adam, the Baby and the Man from Mars. By Irwin Edman. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

Mr. Edman's book, one is happy to say, is not so bad as it at first appears to be. The rather silly name, the two or three extremely commonplace essays that are placed first, and the use of several such titles as Religion for the Faithless, Reason for the Rapturous, and Sentiment for the Cynical, cannot help but prejudice the reader. Edman has, however, something to say. In guiding himself by the ideal he holds out for others—"the tough mind and the gentle heart"—he has laid perhaps a trifle too much emphasis on the latter quality, but he has not altogether forgotten the former. His goal is the preservation of the virtues of the past without any sacrifice of the virtues of the present, and in carrying on this mediatorial function he proceeds with marked discrimination and with an honesty that is rare in reconcilers. He is not trying to lure us into the surrender of what the modern spirit has gained, but he does warn us against giving up more than is necessary. On many points he is in agreement with Walter Lippmann; on others his urbane and sympathetic treatment of problems of belief and conduct supplements the more rigorously systematic approach of the "Preface to Morals."

Little Caesar. By W. R. Burnett. The Dial Press. $2.

"Little Caesar" tells rapidly and well, in a brisk, unemotional, reportorial style, the story of the rise and fall of Rico, Chicago racketeer. In essence it is an effective synthesis of the recent flood of gunman literature, adding little (because there is little enough to add) to the by this time conventional hard-boiled interpretation with which plays such as "The Racket" and "Broadway" have familiarized us. Aside from its casual realism and the fact that its characters possess no moral virtues, "Little Caesar" is not radically different from any good action-and-adventure story. The locale has shifted from the Wild West to the Chicago underworld, and the hero, instead of winning the girl, receives a bullet through the heart; but the main narrative lines are similar. The book makes excellent light reading, is cordially recommended as such; and has elicted the warmest and most serious tributes from the more literary critics.

Poor Women! By Nora Hoult. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

These tales, which recount the emotional or practical defeat of five women, are excellently written, with sympathy and clarity; but many readers will feel, I think, that they but feebly illustrate the author's thesis. "Poor Women!" though it stresses no note of propaganda is, in a sort, a feminist document. Miss Hoult would wish to show that her heroines' failures are due to their tragic dependence on men and on their anomalous positions in a man-made world. Actually her poor women are not so much enslaved by man-made conventions as by the weakness of their own intelligences. They are indecisive, priggish, cowardly, stupid; and their male counterparts, hampered by the same intellectual handicaps, would probably encounter analogous defeats. The perception of the fact does not lessen the reader's admiration for Miss Hoult's talent, which is real; it merely changes the object of his sympathy from "poor women" to "poor creatures"—which would have been a better title for the book.

The Lady is Cold. By E. B. White. Harper and Brothers. $2.

Mr. White—known to the readers of the Conning Tower and the New Yorker as E. B. W.—in addition to being a skilful versifier with a rare sensitiveness for words, shows in this book flashes of poetic distinction. He possesses much of the bite and sting of Dorothy Parker with none of her sardonic bitterness, and his lighter verses have all of the fantastic whimsicality and none of the mawkishness of A. A. Milne. He is a poet who will bear watching.

THEATER

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sherriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

ANNOUNCEMENT

NEXT WEEK

The Nation will issue a special

SACCO-VANZETTI NUMBER

International Relations Section

Color in the Caribbean

By ARNOLD ROLLER

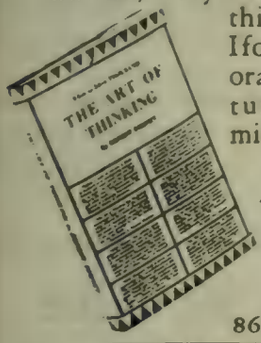
FORMS of human society belonging to different epochs, and races whose original habitats were separated from each other by many thousands of miles are set side by side as in an ethnological museum, in the islands and territories of the Caribbean.

Around the great American lake bordered by the Antilles, Central America, Colombia, and Venezuela, skins of nearly every color can be found: "pure" whites of exclusive Spanish ancestry with a slight infusion of Jewish blood from the Maranos who fled to Spain's colonies from the Inquisition in the mother country; full-blooded Haitian Negroes, reddish Indians, swarthy Hindus, light and dark Chinese, ashgray, yellow, golden, brown, and bronze mulattoes, mestizos and zambos in all their subtle shades. And in general each color and shade represents a different social class—the lighter the higher—in each of these countries, which otherwise differ remarkably in their social structure.

The population of Cuba is 70 per cent white and near-white, the remaining 30 per cent consisting mainly of Negroes and dark mulattoes, with a sprinkling of Chinese peddlers and merchants in the cities and, in the country, almost black Chinese mulatto peasants (half-breeds of Chinese and Negroes, called chinos del pais). Sociologically, Cuba is a combination of modern capitalism and agricultural feudalism. Enormous sugar plantations with modern American-owned sugar mills run by Negro peon labor, in the interior, contrast strangely with the ultra-modern wharves, warehouses, hotels, department stores, and factories, a large middle class, and a vigorous labor movement to be found in the capital and large cities.

A short airplane trip brings one to Haiti, where a social and economic structure which disappeared long ago in less isolated countries still survives. Here a pre-bourgeois society is engaged chiefly in agriculture by primitive methods. The upper strata, less than a tenth of the population, are mulattoes of varying degree; the remaining nine-tenths are illiterate, full-blooded Negroes who carry on their agriculture within a system of semi-patriarchal family communism of African derivation, to which they returned after the expulsion of their French masters.

These "families" often include three or more generations and their kin, numbering sometimes as many as two hundred members in all. When a young man finds a wife and builds a house he is allotted a plot by the head of the "family" for cultivation. These parcels cannot be sold and revert to the family in case of death, emigration or neglect. The per capita ownership is less than one acre. About half of the total area cultivated in this manner is state property, and comparatively few peasants have titles. From the legal point of view most of them are squatters—sometimes for hundreds of years—but nevertheless squatters who can be driven from the land because, according to Haitian law, occupation and possession of state lands does not create ownership.



In view of the efficient system of land titles which it is expected will soon be established under American administration, loss of their land seems imminent to a large proportion of the Haitian peasantry. The state has power to fix a rental of six per cent of the sale value of the land, which is also established by the state. If a high price is offered, the six per cent is prohibitive to the peasant. Since he can offer no legal title of ownership, and since the peasant seldom has any cash, it is very simple to expropriate him whenever his land may be considered useful for large concessions to be granted by the state. The expropriated peasant becomes a laborer, for twenty cents a day, on the newly created plantation, or emigrates to find work elsewhere in the Caribbean.

The upper class of highly educated mulattoes in Haiti consists of landowners, government officials, doctors, and lawyers. This aristocracy speaks the pure French of educated Paris. The peasants who speak "Creole"—an Africanized French patois mixed with Spanish—do not understand the language of their masters. There is no middle class, no industry, no crafts, and the few stores in the capital and the larger towns are almost all owned by Syrians who are ostracized by rich and poor alike. "Syrian" is as much an insult in Haiti as "Dirty Jew" in Poland or Rumania. For this reason the Haitian Syrians call themselves "Christians from Palestine." Peasants and aristocracy have practically nothing in common, and their respective residences contrast picturesquely. Port-au-Prince with its many wooden houses on stilts, looks as if it were in the middle of a jungle or a lake infested with snakes.

Draw an imaginary line through the island and go ten hours by motor or much less by airplane to the Dominican Republic, on the western side of the island. It might be said that the strata of human society missing in Haiti have settled in Santo Domingo. Here the population is largely of the lower middle class, living in small towns of Spanish type, and supported by moderately wealthy peasants and landowners. The capital, with its stone houses and grated windows, its parks, and its old, massive public buildings might be a provincial capital in Spain. Education is much more general and the national language, Spanish, is spoken by peasant and bourgeois with equal correctness. Though the upper levels are usually lighter, all shades of color are represented among city dwellers and peasantry alike. While Haiti is overpopulated, the Dominican Republic, which has twice as much territory, has only one-third as many inhabitants. The peasants have much more land than the Haitians and their larger purchasing ability is the basis of the moderate prosperity of the middle classes. The peasants here wear shoes. They do not carry their bundles and parcels on their heads, as do the Haitians. They are neither black nor white, nor, indeed, are they the color of mulattoes in the United States. They are bronze brown, and represent a new race formed by the amalgamation of Spanish-Indian mestizos with Spanish-Negro mulattoes and quadroons. Most Dominicans have Spanish features, brown complexion, and straight or wavy but not kinky hair. They consider themselves white, since they have no outstanding Negro features. For this reason, although they desire immigrants, they want Spanish migrants, and are hostile to black newcomers.

I was Surprised to find The ART OF THINKING justify its title

Wondering at the sensational sales of the volume on Thinking, I took it home (intending only to borrow) and found myself impelled to keep it as an endless stimulation and delight. To others I say, with JOHN DEWEY, "Try and see." In this best-seller I found a memorable adventure for the mind. This is

A Book for the Years

86th Thousand

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers · 37 West 57th Street · New York

DAY SCHOOL

OAK LANE Country Day School

having been maintained as a successful progressive COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL since 1916, last year added

A Residence House for Boys 10 to 17 Years

in response to frequent requests from parents. All the advantages of a modern school and expert teachers plus resident opportunities in a small group.

For catalog address

WILLIAM B. CURRY (formerly Master at Bedales School, England), OAK LANE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

Is your street safe for the woman alone in the house?

AN evening conference, an unexpected business trip—perhaps your wife's frightened voice over the telephone expresses a terror quite unwarranted. Why not summon Policeman Light to banish fear—and definitely reduce the chances of burglary? Isn't it time your community gave serious consideration to street lighting as a tried and proved investment, yielding rich returns both in civic progress and in public safety?

General Electric lighting specialists, working with your local power company, are ready at all times to aid in solving your community's lighting problems, and the G-E monogram is your assurance of quality in the materials and equipment installed. This same monogram appears on a multitude of electric appliances for home, office, and factory. It is an unfailing guide to electrical correctness and dependability.

JOIN US IN THE GENERAL ELECTRIC HOUR, BROADCAST EVERY SATURDAY AT 8 P.M., E.S.T. ON A NATION-WIDE N.B.C. NETWORK

GENERAL ELECTRIC

NURSERY SCHOOL

Announcing

A Nursery School at
Oak Lane Country Day School

Oak Lane, Philadelphia. Through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Stokowski. Beginning September, 1929.

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Headmaster

LANGUAGES

FRENCH, SPANISH, ITALIAN, GERMAN Short courses. Conversational methods. Experienced native teachers. Daily 9 to 9.
FISHER'S SCHOOL OF LANGUAGES
75c a lesson 1264 LEXINGTON AVE., Bet. 85th and 86th Sts., N. Y.

RUSSIAN taught by professional teacher, Imperial University graduate, instructor in Russian at the Berlitz School of Languages. MICHAEL JERLITZYN, 2013 Fifth Ave., New York City. Tel. Harlem 5560.

But foreign capital is arriving in Santo Domingo. With it, inevitably, will come the establishment of large concessions for agricultural plantations on a large scale, followed by imported immigrant labor. This labor will be black, for Negro labor is cheaper and more plentiful. The process of Africanization with its attendant race friction to be observed in Cuba, where the sugar companies import every year tens of thousands of Jamaican or Haitian Negroes, will be duplicated in Santo Domingo.

In the American-owned island of Porto Rico, the population is more than 70 per cent white, 23 per cent mulatto, and about 4 per cent pure black. The whole island is one immense American plantation. While Haitian peasants lead an incredibly miserable life according to our standards, yet they live in their own way and satisfy their modest wants. Porto Ricans earn more but peasant proprietorship, which prevailed in the island before its annexation by the United States, has practically disappeared. The hustling, busy cities boast of modern industries, labor organizations and a large foreign population. The port of San Juan is very lively.

But only 15 per cent of Porto Rico's wealth is in Porto Rican hands. The island is overpopulated, yet almost all the land belongs to American companies. An unbelievable proportion of the population is reported unemployed most of the time. Of the 1,300,000 inhabitants one-fourth or 300,000 go barefoot, and are continuously on the verge of starvation. Many Porto Ricans see their only salvation in migration, and there are probably 100,000 in New York City alone. The Dominican government invites the white Porto Ricans, but the more numerous and prolific blacks and dark mulattoes migrate more often. They go wherever industry and agriculture call for labor.

To the south of Cuba and Haiti lies the British colony of Jamaica with its English-speaking Negroes of a cultural level not much higher than that of the Haitians. Jamaica, also very densely populated, is a great source of labor for the large American sugar and fruit plantations in and around the Caribbean. Jamaicans are imported not only to countries where labor is scarce, but even to overpopulated Haiti with its many thousands of landed peasants and unemployed workers. Many sugar-mill and plantation owners find that it is easier to deal with Jamaicans who speak English, than with Haitians, who know only Creole. Furthermore they can be used against the natives whenever these show signs of dissatisfaction. Last year's bloodily repressed strike in the banana district of Colombia, which is about 65 per cent white, caused the United Fruit Company to replace unruly Colombians with imported blacks from Haiti and Jamaica, and the company applied recently to the Colombian government for permission to import ten thousand Negro laborers.

Fears for the future of Costa Rica, the "whitest" of Central American nations, are expressed in a late issue of the well-known Costa Rica magazine, Repertorio Americano. The forthcoming construction of the Nicaragua Canal, part of which will run along the San José river, which is on the frontier between Nicaragua and Costa Rica, will bring thousands of foreign workers and sudden prosperity to Costa Rica. The workers who will be required on the Costa Rican side of the canal, for erection of buildings and fortifications, will most probably be Negroes brought from the Antilles. The lands around and near the canal district will be bought up at good prices. More and more land will be bought by American sugar and fruit companies and finally the country, which at present with its 600,000 inhabitants counts 125,000 landowners, will be changed into a nation of landless proletarians of no definable race or nationality, not even with a language in common. They will be mixed with the thousands of Negroes, Chinese, and mulattoes who will immigrate in the wake of the new and temporary prosperity. A small nation of 600,000 may easily be denationalized and absorbed thus into the one great Caribbean colony.

In Panama, where, before the construction of the canal, only Spanish could be heard, as much English is spoken now as Spanish, and these English-speaking inhabitants who form a large part of the population are Negroes from the West Indies who necessarily are making an imprint on the social and racial structure of this heretofore Latin American republic. Negro laborers in Panama are paid as many Panamanian silver dollars, worth half the gold dollar, as the whites receive in American gold, for the same work.

This shifting of races and language groups in the Caribbean will have far reaching results. The Caribbean republics will tend to be de-nationalized. The Negro strain, inherited from Spanish colonial slave days, of which these countries hoped to free themselves by the absorption of white immigrants, will be strengthened.

Differences will be wiped out and the Caribbean countries may become, in effect, a series of large-scale plantations, the darker inhabitants forming a semi-slave or peon labor class.

Contributors to This Issue

George Britt is a member of the staff of the New York Telegram.

Merryle Stanley Rukeyser writes a daily financial column for the New York American and associated newspapers.

T. Swann Harding contributes frequently to The Nation and other periodicals.

Hal Saunders White is in the Department of English at New York University.

Evelyn Scott is author of "The Wave."

Henry W. Nevinson's latest book is "Last Changes, Last Chances."

Joshua Kunitz is author of "Russian Literature and the Jew" and editor of "Azure Cities," a collection of post-revolutionary Russian stories.

James B. Wharton is author of "Squad."

Roland A. Gibson is a contributor to current periodicals.

James Rorty is author of "Children of the Sun."

Lewis S. Gannett is contributing editor of The Nation.

Signe Toksvig is author of "Last Devil."

Elisabeth Irwin is psychologist in one of the New York public schools.

William L. Nunn was formerly instructor in economics at the University of Pittsburgh.

Harriet V. Wishnieff is an authority on Latin American literature.

Arnold Roller is a writer on Latin American subjects.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 21, 1929 No. 3346

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 181
EDITORIALS:
The Decline of Massachusetts 184
Baby Motor Cars 185
The Muzzle in China 185
Enter Cupid 186
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 187
FORGETTING SACCO AND VANZETTI. By Waldo L. Cook 188
THE POWER OF TWO GHOSTS. By Gardner Jackson 190
A GREAT EDITOR. By John A. Hobson 192
AMERICAN OR FOREIGNER? By J. Mark Jacobson 193
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 195
CORRESPONDENCE 196
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 197
BOOKS AND FILMS:
There Yet Survived A God. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin 198
Beginnings of Empire. By Robert Livingston Schuyler 198
Underworld. By Dudley Nichols 199
Meddling Through. By Clarence Britten 199
The Poems of Malcolm Cowley. By Morton Dauwen Zabel 200
Labor and Internationalism. By J. A. Hobson 201
A Boswell to Foch. By William MacDonald 201
Books in Brief 202
Films: There Are Silent Pictures. By Alexander Bakshy 203
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Reparations: The Young and Dawes Plans. By William MacDonald 205

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor Literary Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

MR. SNOWDEN'S OUTSPOKEN ATTACK upon the Young plan, in the conference at The Hague, was both unexpected and disconcerting, the more so because he spoke with the full approval of the MacDonald Government. Unfortunately, the complete text of Mr. Snowden's speech on August 6 was not cabled to this country, and the public could not know fully upon what facts or claims he based his severe criticism of the plan. Nor have we as yet the correspondence that was exchanged between the governments when the Young committee was appointed, and so cannot tell whether, as Mr. Snowden is reported to have alleged, the committee was debarred from changing the percentages agreed upon at Spa in July, 1920, for distributing reparation payments, or was subjected to any other restrictions. The New York World remarked the other day that if France had been the one to raise objections it would probably have been taken as a matter of course, but that a vigorous dissent voiced by Great Britain was promptly greeted as something surprising. As this issue of The Nation went to press the situation seemed to be one calling for a suspension of judgment until all the facts were known. It might at least have occurred to the correspondents who filled their dispatches with hostile criticism of Great Britain that the MacDonald Government was not likely to kick the Young scheme to one side and condemn Germany and Europe to an indefinite continuance of the Dawes plan without reasons. At the same time the correspondents only expressed the general feeling of disappointment, shared by The Nation, at the possibility of the wreck of the Young plan, a scheme which had been accepted by representatives of all the nations concerned and embodied a definite settlement of the ten-year dispute over the war debts and reparations.

SEVEN YEARS AGO the British proclaimed Egypt "an independent sovereign state," but they simultaneously informed the Powers that nothing was changed by this form of words, that they would continue the "special relations" with Egypt "long recognized by other governments" and, in particular, would continue to police Egypt and to protect foreign interests there. In other words, Egypt was sovereign and independent except as concerned her internal and external affairs. Since that declaration British troops have on sundry occasions seized the Egyptian customs, marched up to the parliament house, taken over control of the Sudan, and forced dissolution of Parliament. These facts are important to recall as the background of the new Anglo-Egyptian proposals. The new agreement begins with another fine phrase: "The military occupation of Egypt by forces of His Britannic Majesty is terminated." It continues by explaining that this does not apply to the shores of the Red Sea and the banks of the Suez Canal, that Egypt must be Britain's ally in peace and in war, and in the event of war or the menace of war must furnish England all assistance and facilities within its power. It makes a definite change in entrusting the protection of foreigners in Egypt to Egypt; and it appears to restore the Sudan to its legal status as before the British ultimatum of November 22, 1924. These are real concessions by the British, but they are far from what the Nationalist Party has long demanded; and the Egyptian premier who signed them is a puppet representing a party which has never been able to control more than a third of the Egyptian Parliament. Hitherto he has been maintained in power by the very British troops which dissolved the Parliament. It remains to be seen whether with these concessions, and with control of the governmental machinery, he can elect a parliament which will ratify the agreement.

WHILE THE NEGOTIATIONS for the settlement of the Russo-Chinese quarrel over the Chinese Eastern Railway were deadlocked at Manchuli, Moscow was thrown into an anti-imperialist frenzy by a report from the Tass (Russian) news agency that Secretary Stimson had made "a confidential proposal to Britain, France, Japan, Germany, and Italy that they, with the United States, should institute a six-power control over the railroad and nominate a foreign manager with full authority, who should be a national of a country not directly interested in the railroad." Later dispatches declared that all the Powers ignored or repudiated the suggestion. Whatever may be the truth of the report, there is no prospect of such a project being carried through. We have learned by past experience that the intervention of Western Powers is not welcomed in Manchuria, even if it is designed to prevent a war. Philander C. Knox proposed in 1909 that international bankers should advance the money to China for redeeming the Manchurian railways, but Russia and Japan blocked the plan, and they are likely to block any similar plan in the future. Japan insists upon maintaining her dominant economic position in Manchuria, and Russia refuses to trust her interests to any coalition of Powers that are hostile to her fundamental purposes. Since there is no international body impartial enough to satisfy both China and Russia, the hope of peace seems to rest entirely in the good sense and reasonableness of the negotiators of these two nations.

ACTING ON THE ADVICE of a majority of his committee, Senator Smoot has withdrawn his plan for a sliding scale of sugar duties, whereby the duty would increase as the world price of refined sugar fell. The storm of protests stirred up by the increase of sugar rates in the House bill gave the Utah Senator a good chance to put forward his scheme, which was designed, we were told, to stabilize the price of sugar (needless to say, at a high point). Both theory and experience indicate clearly enough that the prices of agricultural products cannot be stabilized by any such device, but that made no difference. The producers who were to be benefited by the plan would have none of it, however, so it was sorrowfully abandoned, and Senator Smoot appeared once more in his familiar role of advocate of flat duties on sugar, though up to the time of going to press he had not stated what they were to be. Nobody, in Congress or out of it, is giving much attention, apparently, to the really important question, namely, is it worth while to shove up the price of sugar and thus encourage the development here of an uneconomical beet industry to the point where it will supply most of our consumption at high prices, or do we prefer to take advantage of the warm sunshine of the tropics and have cheap sugar? One might think that those arch opponents of sweets, the cigarette manufacturers, were directing our sugar-tariff policy.

VIRGINIA, the mother of Presidents and sugar-cured ham, will achieve another distinction next November in holding an election for governor which will be an actual contest. Heretofore the Democratic primary has been the real election and the voting in November a mere ratification. But the fight of Bishop Cannon of the Methodist Episcopal Church South against Al Smith and Raskobism in the Democratic Party has upset the old tradition. Bishop Cannon some time ago induced the anti-Raskob Democrats and the Republicans to nominate a single candidate for governor in William Moseley Brown, professor of education and psychology at Washington and Lee University. The regular Democrats have now nominated John Garland Pollard, dean of the school of government and citizenship at William and Mary College. Had the primary vote reached 175,000, the figure four years ago, the election in November would have been conceded to Mr. Pollard, but only about 150,000 ballots were cast, which in the opinion of the experts means a real fight at the polls next autumn. "Who's Who" says that Mr. Brown is a Democrat, a Presbyterian, and a Mason, while his opponent is a Democrat, a Baptist, and a Mason. It might have added that they are both Drys. So whatever happens the next governor of the Old Dominion will be a Democrat, a Protestant, a Mason, a Dry, and a college professor—which is a good deal. And doubtless Virginia will continue to supply us with sugar-cured ham—which is more.

SIGNS CONTINUE TO MULTIPLY that the South is at last awake to the social disgrace of labor conditions in its cotton mills. All the chief mill owners of Gaston County, North Carolina, made famous by the Communist-led strike, have recently reduced their hours from sixty to fifty-five a week without a proportionate reduction in wages. The eleven-hour day will continue in the mills, but workers will have two days of rest each week. This is an indirect victory for the strikers, who, even in defeat, advertised their grievances so well that public opinion brought pressure upon the mill owners. That new public opinion was evident at the Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia, where Southern speakers led the attack upon Southern labor standards. Bruce Crawford, editor of Crawford's Weekly of Norton, Virginia, declared:

> The Elizabethton disorders revealed that the paramount issue in the South is recognition of the right to organize. The mill owners will grant appreciable wage increases and make certain improvements in working conditions, but they stubbornly refuse to recognize labor unions. In a day when everybody from the manufacturer to the bootlegger belongs to an organization, how gullible the workers would be to repudiate their leaders, the detested organizers, and undertake to fight their battles alone!

WE NOTE WITH PLEASURE the presidential address delivered on July 31 by Sir Thomas Holland, rector of the Imperial College of Science in London, before the British Association for the Advancement of Science in session at Johannesburg, South Africa. Sir Thomas calls attention to the striking fact that the British Empire and the United States between them produce more than two-thirds of the minerals annually consumed by the world, and goes on to suggest an agreement between these two countries not to export mineral products to any nation violating the Kellogg pact. Under these conditions, he suggests, no war could last long. It is not the proposed extension of the Capper resolution, interesting and suggestive though it is, that we wish to commend, but the attitude of responsibility toward public affairs disclosed in Sir Thomas's suggestion. Natural scientists in recent years have been too prone to assume that they have no particular concern as to what is done with their discoveries. Our chemists, for example, devise more and more deadly poison gases and turn them over to governments, apparently with a clear conscience. The scientist as pure scientist perhaps is not concerned with the application of his findings, but the scientist, like the rest of us, is a citizen and a member of the state, and he has no more business than anyone else to help his state do wrong or to shirk responsibility for helping it do right. Natural scientists have more than once gone sadly astray in their excursions into economics and politics, but it is a wholesome sign when they accept their full responsibility and do not attempt to shirk their duty as citizens by pleading their immunity as scientists.

A CENTURY AGO the first steam locomotive to be put into actual service in this country went puffing and snorting out of Honesdale, Pennsylvania, over the sixteen-mile railway of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company to Carbondale. It was the Stourbridge Lion, imported from England. The steam locomotive has been the greatest single factor in the industrial evolution of the United States, and it has been more important to us than to any other nation in history. It arrived just at the moment when we had subdued the Atlantic seaboard and were looking for means to press westward over a stretch of 3,000 miles traversed by only one east and west river of any consequence—the Ohio. Yet progress has been so amazingly swift in transportation that three new kinds—of major importance—have come to us since the steam locomotive: the electric car, the gasoline automobile, and the airplane. And the centenary of our first steam locomotive finds us occupied not with it but with the fact that every family in the United States—statistically regarded—has an automobile and is hoping one day to have an airplane. Yet the railroad is far from demoded. Beside it the airplane is still only groping after passenger traffic and makes no pretense of handling freight. The motor bus, the privately-owned automobile, and the truck have cut deeply into the short-haul passenger business, and to a lesser degree into freight traffic, but for long distances and large shipments the railroad seems likely to hold its own for an indefinite time. Not so much can be said for the steam locomotive. Electrification of our railroads is one of the strong probabilities of the power age which we are entering. The second centenary of the steam locomotive may find it only in museums.

TRAGEDY AT SEA comes in many ways, but the way which is the most awful (in the word's original sense of inspiring awe), and at the same time the most agonizing to those who have loved ones on board, is that which receives the least attention in the press and therefore makes the smallest ripple on the surface of the world's emotions. We are thinking of the ship which simply disappears. The newspapers write nothing of her because there is nothing to write. There is no fire, no wreck, no collision to chronicle. The ship leaves port, is spoken once or twice, perhaps, and then . . . After a while she is reported as overdue and friends of those aboard become anxious. Then anxiety turns to fear, and finally to despair. There is little or no newspaper comment because there is no crisis, no event to record. A day comes finally when the ship is posted as missing, but long before that, hope has faded and even memory has begun to blur. Who in this country, for instance, knows that the Danish training ship Köbenhavn, the world's largest sailing vessel, cleared from Buenos Aires last December, was spoken a week later, and then disappeared from human ken with her company of sixty-seven men and boys. Had we had news of the loss in some definite way it would have gone on the first pages of the newspapers all over the world. As it was, the tragedy just slipped by unnoticed. The last news we saw was an inconspicuous dispatch on June 26 saying that a searching vessel had visited the island of Tristan da Cunha, had shown the inhabitants photographs of the Köbenhavn, and had been told that the ship had been seen drifting by, deep in the water and apparently abandoned. Probably there will never be anything else to tell.

HERE IS SOMETHING NEW in sales resistance. In looking over the August issue of the magazine Chile, which has just come to our desk, we chance upon the following significant information:

> The Government of Chile is not looking with favor on proposals of American companies to introduce the use of chewing gum on a wide scale into Chile. The Government's views have found support in the press, which recently has published articles attacking the chewing-gum vice. It is also known that higher duties on the article are contemplated to offset any efforts of manufacturers to popularize the use of gum through advertising campaigns. In the opinion of Chileans not every American custom is a desirable one to imitate, and Chileans prefer to continue a moderate indulgence in their famous wines and abstain from chewing gum than to become dry and chew gum.

In the name of an imperiled chewing-gum industry, what does all this mean? We have already sent the Federal Trade Commission a complaint against the Chilean Government, asking the issuance of a "cease and desist" order. If this move is unsuccessful, we shall next apply to the Prohibition Unit for a padlock order. It is not merely the business aspects of this affair, however, bad as they are, that exercise us, but the lack of Pan-American cultural unity. "In the opinion of Chileans, not every American custom is a desirable one to imitate." And pray why not? Time will bring them to reason, however. They are dealing with a $60,000,000 industry which without thought of selfish gain has already set every American jaw in motion. It now seeks to extend its service even to the remotest lands, and we would remind recalcitrant Chileans that Holy Writ itself predicts the trade's ultimate triumph; for in the outer darkness where the stiff-necked will finally reside "there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

VICTOR L. BERGER, dead at the age of sixty-nine in consequence of injuries sustained when a street car ran into him several weeks ago, was an eminently useful and high-minded citizen whose loss The Nation keenly regrets. He was so integral a part of the German-American Socialist movement centering in Milwaukee that it is difficult to conceive of it apart from him. Born in the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, he came to this country at the age of eighteen and earned his living in a variety of ways until 1892, when he became the editor of a German-language weekly in Milwaukee. In 1911 he started the Milwaukee Leader as a daily, and continued as its editor up to the time of his death. It is the only Socialist and labor daily newspaper now printed in English in the United States. Mr. Berger was elected to the House of Representatives in 1910—the first Socialist to go to Washington. He was reelected in 1918, but before he could take his seat he was convicted under the espionage law for opposing the war, and when the House met in the autumn of 1919 he was ousted. In 1921 the United States Supreme Court reversed the verdict against him, so he never actually went to jail. Mr. Berger will be remembered rather as an able expounder and defender of accepted Socialist doctrine than as a creator of it. He was a good-natured and humorous fighter, but uncompromising in his principles when a serious issue was at stake. He will be missed among those who are working for a better America.

The Decline of Massachusetts

WHAT has happened to Massachusetts since the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti on August 23, 1927? Has retribution been visited upon the State more swiftly and surely than any one would have predicted? Is the fear of the last two years, the mental and moral bankruptcy of her leadership, the result of the shocking injustice which she perpetrated in the face of enlightened world opinion? Or was it the previous existence of this decay that made the tragedy possible?

As usual it is difficult to disentangle cause and effect. No doubt there is a mixture, and while we may not be able to separate it we can take note of it. For it is a striking phenomenon. Since 1927, at least, observers cannot have failed to notice the flabby mental and moral fiber of a State which was once the great source of much that was most vital in American thought and action. Massachusetts, there she stands! Stands for what? Once she stood for liberty, enlightenment, humanity. Today—obsessed with timidity, incapacity, and obscurantism—she stands for a censorship of books and plays which has made her a joke in the rest of the United States; for restrictions upon freedom of speech and assemblage which would have turned the Minute Men against her; for opposition to progressive movements within her borders while at the same time she complains of the palsy that has attacked her industrial life.

Whatever may have been the decadence of Massachusetts in 1927, it had not been much observed or commented upon. If the State has not been in the process of spectacular deterioration in the last two years, it has at least acted so as to reveal its weakness to the world in an unprecedentedly open and rapid fashion. In an article elsewhere in this issue Waldo L. Cook relates some of the fumbling and fatuous attempts within the space of a year to seal up and cause to be forgotten the tragedy of Sacco and Vanzetti. It was part of a deliberate campaign decreed immediately after the executions. At that time the Boston Herald wrote editorially:

> The chapter is closed. The die is cast. The arrow has flown. Now let us go forward to the duties and responsibilities of the common day with a renewed determination to maintain our present system of government and our existing social order.

In other words the attitude of Massachusetts was that right or wrong she would not reexamine or repent. She adopted the policy of the Closed Mind. And having closed her mind in one direction she began naturally to close it in others, denying herself the vitalizing aid of progressive ideas of other sorts. It is not merely of Sacco and Vanzetti that Massachusetts has refused to hear in the last two years. The ridiculous Watch and Ward Society of Boston has returned to activity after a long period of comparative quiet, and the list of books which it has been able to ban from public sale has been a cause of wonder and mirth in more civilized parts of the globe. A praiseworthy effort was made in the Massachusetts legislature last winter by a group of intelligent editors and other persons to change the law whereby a book may be barred as obscene because of a single word apart from its context. The effort failed. The absurd law still stands which makes it impossible to plead the general tone or purpose of a book in its behalf—the statute which brought about the suppression of so important a work as Theodore Dreiser's "An American Tragedy."

We told last year something of the difficulties of the committee in Boston which set out to get a hall for a Sacco-Vanzetti memorial meeting. The owners of halls generally were unwilling or afraid to hire their facilities to the committee, but after many fruitless efforts Mr. Furash finally opened his Scenic Auditorium for the meeting, and it was held without interference, although later there was a threat —never put into effect—to prosecute Professor Horace M. Kallen for blasphemy because of certain of his remarks. This year the committee again engaged the Scenic Auditorium, but it was so damaged by fire recently as to make a change of plan necessary. The committee has applied to all the halls, theaters, and hotels in Boston, capable of seating 1,000 persons—more than thirty-five in all—and its applications have either been denied or ignored. Faneuil Hall and the Old South Meeting House—the latter supposedly a sanctuary of free speech—have both been refused. Advertisements have been placed—after difficulties in obtaining their insertion—in several Boston newspapers, all without result. The committee has decided, therefore, to shift the meeting to New York City, and it will take place at the Town Hall at 8.30 p. m. on August 23. We urge our readers to give the meeting their fullest support.

William Sloane Kennedy, a stalwart Massachusetts liberal and the author of a long shelf of books, who was drowned on August 4 when in his seventy-ninth year, wrote an article for the Lantern just before his death from which we quote the following:

> The legal murder of these poor gentle-souled Italians, against whom all kinds of trumpery and ridiculous evidence was admitted to court, was like an earthquake leaving a deep zig-zag crevice running through society. On which side of the new line do you now belong? That is the important question for every soul in the world. I shouldn't wonder if this lurid beacon fire, this auto-da-fè on Beacon Hill, should be the rallying banner, the pistol shots of Boston policemen the detonator to initiate eventually a world-wide revolution. These poor trembling cowards of tyrannical Brahmins, the broadcloth mobs, may find they have set the world afire; in their folly thrown their match into an infinite mass of inflammable material.

Massachusetts as yet shows no realization of the crime she has committed against humanity. But retribution is at work nevertheless. Massachusetts is not what she once was. Her greatness is on the decline, but her only defensive action so far is to stop up her eyes, ears, and mind against her fate. It is a pitiable spectacle, but we can see only one way to escape further decadence and disaster. If there is still enough intelligent leadership in the State to count, it must attack the cowardly and hopeless policy of the Closed Mind. Massachusetts must again begin to listen to truth—even when it hurts. That is the only way to check her decline and to prevent the necessity of chronicling some day her fall.

Baby Motor Cars

THE announcement in the New York Times of the invention of a new baby motor car that will retail for $200 has aroused much interest and some horror. Into the troubled sleep of traffic officers such an invention will bring nightmares reminiscent of the plague of locusts; and city planners who have dreamed of ridding our streets of congestion during this generation will throw up their hands in despair. But if the car fulfills its introductory promises, America will buy it and let the consequences take care of themselves.

Psychologically the coming of a $200 motor car to the American market may be a good thing for us; it may be a healthful antidote to our expensive habits of emulation. As a people we have been oversold on costly cars in recent years until the automobile has become as much a means of economic display as a vehicle to transport human beings. In fact, conventional attitudes toward the automobile have gone through a complete cycle until in a sense we are back where we started from in the early years of this century. In those days, when the first cars were being marketed, common folks leaned out their front windows and stared with undisguised envy at the socially elite as they chugged by in high horseless carriages, dusters, and goggles. For a long time it was distinctly dangerous for any politician who sought labor votes to own a limousine. Then, when motor cars became relatively cheap, snobbishness and conspicuous waste declined, and for a time it was entirely honorable to own a Ford.

But the automobile ad writers were not content. They made raids upon our vanity and told us how desirable it was to keep up with the Joneses. "Own a car worthy of yourself and your position in life," ran the legend. The vaudeville wise-crack, "That isn't a car, that's a Ford," did its deadly work by a million repetitions. When Henry Ford changed his old model he surrendered to the new urge toward luxury by making better cars for more money instead of equally good cars for less money. Now we have reached the point where literally millions of Americans scorn all the cheap models and buy "real cars" on the instalment plan when they have no financial reserve for sickness and old age, and often no funds for good books, good music, and vacations.

Perhaps a $200 car will bring us back to saner standards of expenditure. The new baby car, which is the invention of James V. Martin, has several features which may revolutionize automobile manufacture and eventually force down the price of larger cars. It has no chassis and no chassis frame. Each wheel is suspended separately in such a way that it can absorb the shock of rough jolting without affecting the other wheels. With a wheelbase only slightly longer than half that of the smallest Ford, this car, if present plans are carried through, can be shipped from mail-order houses to customers in a packing case, and housed permanently in the case as a garage. Any burly male can lift a corner of it and insert the jack. Its capacity to travel fifty miles an hour over rough roads without discomfort to the passengers is vouched for by the automobile editor of the New York Times.

Whatever may be the effect upon the American market of the perfection of such an automobile, there can be no doubt that the advent of the tiny underslung car is long overdue in this country. American travellers in Europe have noted the awkwardness of the high-built American machines when compared with the graceful, beetle-like cars which run about the British and Continental countryside. The essential reason for the difference in design no longer exists. The height of our cars was originally determined by the depth of mud-holes in Arkansas and the size of obstructing boulders in Arizona, but with the advent of a network of hard-surfaced roads such hazards are now so rare that designers can well afford to ignore them. Already, in fact, a tiny British car, the Austin, with a wheelbase considerably smaller than the smallest Ford, is scheduled to invade the American market.

In the present stage of traffic development cheap motor cars are much more important for Europe, South America, and the Orient than for the United States. Americans can and will continue to buy high-priced automobiles, but in most foreign nations the level of income will not permit the common citizens to buy even our cheapest models. A Chinese farmer could scarcely buy a Ford roadster with the cash income of a lifetime. Russia has only one automobile to every 6,980 people; Great Britain's ratio is one to thirty-two, and ours is one to five. The difference is largely due to differences in wealth. A $200 motor car, by touching the common man's pocketbook, may bring to foreign countries that revolution in road building and community living for which the Model-T Ford was largely responsible in this country. If this revolution comes to foreign countries, it is to be hoped that they will teach us how to keep motorists from living together in big cities and all going downtown at the rush hour by the same route.

The Muzzle in China

THE treaty-port press of the Far East is a phenomenon unique in the history of journalism, and the foreign correspondents in China today occupy a position utterly unlike that of their colleagues in Western Europe. These newspapers and these correspondents are not subject to the ordinary domestic laws of China. Because the outworn system of extraterritoriality persists, they are subject only to the laws of foreign countries. Indeed, many Chinese newspapers have in the past taken advantage of this anachronism, reorganized themselves under dummy foreign corporations, and in political crises have claimed the foreign protection accorded to foreign business. That system was so flagrantly unjust that it no longer works, but the vice of extraterritoriality persists. Up and down the coast of Asia these citadels of foreign pride continue to flout native sensibilities.

The North China Daily News, for instance, the leading British newspaper in China, is published on the Bund in the International Settlement of Shanghai. Its editor is a cultured Englishman who lived twenty years in China before he began to cultivate social relations even with the most distinguished members of what he regarded as a decadent and inferior race. On the day after the Shanghai shootings of May 30, 1925, he had the audacity to demand—from the Chinese, who had been shot down by British police!—"Unconditional Surrender." He belittled the Nationalist movement as long as possible, and called for British troops to invade China to stop it when it became formidable. It is utterly inconceivable that the Paris editions of the New York Herald, the Chicago Tribune, or the London Daily Mail should criticize the French Government with such persistence or acidity, and it is doubtful whether a foreign-language newspaper in America which printed such criticism would be permitted to pass through the mails.

Recently the Chinese Government ordered the Post Office to refuse to accept copies of the North China Daily News and of its weekly edition, the North China Herald, and instructed the customs service to prevent copies from leaving Shanghai on ships of all nationalities. The North China, thereupon, set up a loud shout for the freedom of the press and circulated throughout the world what it called "An Account of the Endeavors of Nanking to Suppress the Truth About Affairs in China." In the end, apparently, it promised to be good and was restored to the mails.

The Peking Leader, an American-owned and edited paper, is in a somewhat different position. Its editor, Grover Clark, has aspired to be a sort of foreign conscience for China. He has sympathized, in general, with the Nationalist movement; he has at times trenchantly criticized his own Government; he has also criticized the Nationalists. For that, apparently, he is to be punished. It is reported that a censor has been planted in the Leader's office. That seems to us silly; but we cannot share the passionate indignation of those who feel it a peculiar insult to subject an American newspaper in China to a measure of the rigid control exercised over all its Chinese colleagues.

The Chinese Government has attacked along another line, asking the American Minister to deport four American newspapermen whom it regards as persistently and unfairly unfriendly. One of these is Hallett Abend of the New York Times, whose acumen in analyzing Chinese politics has been blunted by a pathological hate of the Nationalists which has repeatedly led him into mistaken dismal prophecies. Another is Charles Dailey of the Chicago Tribune; a third is Rodney Gilbert, dispenser of gloom to various British papers. These three men all write from Peking; and it is difficult for any newspaperman, visiting daily the legations in the lovely abandoned capital, to have anything but a distorted and jaundiced view of China. The fourth of the "unfriendly" correspondents, the versatile George Sokolsky, is a familiar figure in Shanghai, editor of the Far Eastern Review—which in its advertising and in its editorial columns seems to reflect Japanese rather than Chinese interests—and author of vitriolically illuminating articles in the North China upon the Chinese politics in which he dabbles.

None of these men, of course, was or will be deported. The American minister, much as he may sometimes have wished to do so, has no power to order Americans out of China. And the Chinese Government, under the extraterritorial laws, is also powerless to deport them, or even to punish them should they openly violate China's laws. Italy, Spain, France, Russia, Mexico, and Rumania can deport, and in recent years have deported, American newspapermen. In China alone foreign newspapers and newspapermen retain a privileged status, superior to the Chinese themselves.

Enter Cupid

LOVE, we hear, can conquer even a Japanese nako-odo—love and a flood of Hollywood motion pictures. Once the nako-odo was the most dignified functionary of the Japanese marriage system, the man who brought together the family with a surplus maiden and the family with a surplus male and ultimately sealed the bargain. Now he is suffering from technological unemployment. Who wants a nako-odo when he (she) can do the job himself (herself)?

The decay of the nako-odo has been gradual. In the orthodox book of Japanese marriage it was written: "In choosing your nako-odo you must be as careful as you are in choosing your wife or husband; he must be a person of respected social standing whom you may treat all your life as your counsellor, guide, superior, and friend." That is what the book said. In real life the picture was a trifle more shabby; the taint of high-pressure salesmanship crept in. A correspondent who writes under the name of Santoro in the Tokyo Trans-Pacific describes the decline of the nako-odo as follows:

> There are many things in life of which we should beware; the hands of a pickpocket, the horns of a bull, the hind legs of a horse, the eyes of a widow, the promises of a statesman, and many others. Not the least ticklish thing about them is the lying tongue of the nako-odo, or the match-maker in marriage. The office of the nako-odo, once held in great respect, is somewhat at a discount in these days of increasing love marriages. Time was once when marriage without nako-odo was regarded as disreputable as fornication, and when it was thought that every person, to be a full-fledged respectable unit of the nation, must perform the office of nako-odo at least three times in his life.

Sometimes the work of the nako-odo was arduous. Proverbially, says Mr. Santoro, he wears out a thousand sandals "walking to and fro between the homes of the bride-to-be and the groom-to-be, telling ten thousand little lies to make the two parties glad of the coming event." And then, if they are not glad of the event and the marriage ends in disaster, the poor, harassed nako-odo is dragged into the family quarrel as arbiter, and in case of failure reproached as villain. Occasionally through shinju (double suicide) a young couple repudiate the marriage-maker so directly as to bring lasting shame upon him.

Now the waves of our aphrodisiacal culture have beaten upon Japan for a generation. Clara Bow and Greta Garbo have illustrated what the Western missionaries have ceremonially sanctified; sex attraction is out in the open and marriage by personal choice is known to be the established system in the most "advanced" nations of the earth. Perhaps, says the younger generation of Japan, this thing called love isn't all mutual hypnotism; perhaps it is as sound a basis of satisfactory marriage as the studied wisdom of the family.

So Japan is in for an era when she will sample love as a social value. In the dim distance one can see the Japo-Victorians, the Nagasaki Cabells, and the Tokyo Neo-Freudians. Can it be that the Japanese in the days of their troubled liberty will look back longingly to the golden era of the nako-odo?

It Seems to Heywood Broun

MABEL WALKER WILLEBRANDT has contributed some interesting factual information upon the subject of prohibition, but when she ventures into surmise and interpretation her findings seem to me less sound. For instance, Mrs. Willebrandt has picked up one favorite belief of the reformers without stopping to weigh its validity. I refer to her assertion in a recent article that most violators of the Volstead Act are inspired largely by a desire to show off. This we have heard before. It is a favorite cry of the crusaders against the cigarette and more particularly of those propagandists who would discourage women smokers. Again and again the country has been assured that women puffed and blew rings for no reason save a desire to attract attention to themselves.

By now this argument should have lost all force. Surely it is no longer news if a woman smokes a cigarette. In the New York community, at any rate, such a performance has completely lost all shock value. I am willing to waive the question of whether the habit is good or bad. My insistence at the moment centers merely upon the assertion that by now woman has definitely proved that she smokes from precisely the same impulse which animates the male—she happens to like it.

It must be that reformers grow restive under the accusation that they are prone to fly at all things which are pleasant. They meet that charge by insisting that the joys supposedly associated with the minor vices are wholly spurious. Here, for instance, is Mrs. Willebrandt trying to convince me and others that the friendly cocktail is merely a device for the propagation of exhibitionism.

People who see the drink habit so insecurely rooted live, I believe, in a fool's paradise. Perhaps there was some extra added kick once upon a time in the fact that the stuff was contraband. I will not deny that I thrilled eight or ten years ago at such times as I stood before some fast-barred door and knocked to say, "It's all right, let me in, I'm a friend of Bob Beasley's." Possibly each drinker, then, did have a sense of being devilish and daring. But, Lord bless you, Mabel, that psychology went out these many years ago. Illicit drinking is by now more than ten years old. Such of us as have known prohibition man and boy for a decade cannot be expected to feel romantic about things which have become so utterly familiar.

Nor do I believe at all that cocktails are merely a fashion established by the idle rich. There is hardly a home in all the land so humble that it will not afford synthetic gin when guests arrive. From the dry point of view the tragic thing about prohibition enforcement is not so much the fact that an articulate minority is in revolt against the law as that very many millions have managed to forget that it exists at all. It is my guess that America is politically dry. The Anti-Saloon Leaguers are probably correct in declaring that no wet can be elected president of the United States. One takes a risk in making this prediction for all time but it seems a good bet for the immediate future at least. But many false generalizations can be reared upon this apparent condition. Mr. Hoover's vast majorities cannot justly be attributed to the sincere and sweeping desire of the American public for a bone-dry nation. Al Smith was in a most unfortunate position. He could hardly lead a political revolution against aridity since no such thing existed. Millions of voters calmly endorsed the advocate of the experiment noble in purpose because they had complete confidence that nothing which Mr. Hoover had to say about liquor would have any actual effect upon prevalent conditions. Indeed, the attitude of wet Republicans was not wholly without logic and even sportsmanship. It seemed to them that there was no particular point in kicking a law when it was down.

It is foolish to call the Volstead Act oppressive when it touches the lives of most of us with such exceeding dimness. The man who sits in a comfortable speakeasy and slowly drinks his Tom Collins can hardly be expected to rush out and man a barricade in the cause of personal liberty. It is naturally difficult to convince him that he has lost any inalienable right. To be sure, gin costs more than in the days before the country went dry. Mr. Wickersham's Commission can save itself a great deal of time and trouble by taking the current price of this liquor as an index of the efficiency of enforcement. In communities where gin is high it is fair to admit that the agents are actually on the job. When the price falls prohibition is not working. As the result of some self-sacrificing researches of my own I am prepared to state that post-prohibition gin costs just a shade more than double the pre-Volsteadian beverage. This is not a very important rise in a country where the standard of living is constantly on the upgrade. Wages have practically kept pace with gin, so the suffering is not acute.

Of course, the quality of the fluid has fallen off, but it is nonsense to assume that nothing but the finest was served in the days before the government stepped in to poison the wells. There is not much to choose between the cocktail of today and that which our fathers knew. Beer, however, is in rather a bad way. To this extent Volstead and his followers have succeeded almost up to their hopes. Indeed, the act might well have been labeled, "A bill to discourage the drinking of good beer in favor of indifferent gin."

Nevertheless, I quite agree with the boast of the prohibitionists that the country is better off. The saloon was generally a dull and humdrum place. And its facilities for coeducation were limited. The modern speakeasy is brighter, gayer, and far more stimulating. Who, I should like to know, wants to put his foot on a brass rail when it is his present privilege to sit in a wide chair before a spotless table? Mrs. Willebrandt lacks sufficient personal contacts. A well-wisher would much enjoy escorting her to some of the better places in New York. If she still insists at the end of such a tour that all the smiling people round about are only trying to be smart I will agree to eat the entire edition of the newspaper in which her article appeared. That is if I may be permitted to remove the comic section.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Forgetting Sacco and Vanzetti

By WALDO L. COOK

THE desire to forget Sacco and Vanzetti, after their execution two years ago this month, gripped Massachusetts. The men were dead. Nothing that could be spoken or written or done would make them live again, even if, as a minority firmly believed, they had been victims of an appalling misadventure in our criminal courts.

But events have not permitted us to forget.

* * * * *

The extreme sensitiveness of the Boston authorities concerning the "good shoemaker and poor fish peddler" has been betrayed more than once within a year. In view of the general desire to forget, it was surprising to read one August morning a year ago that the police had initiated a prosecution of Dr. Horace M. Kallen of New York City for blasphemy, or some such crime, in his address the previous evening at the Sacco-Vanzetti memorial meeting. That gentle philosopher, who would gladly have faced his accusers, was quickly absolved at police headquarters, and the prosecution was dropped. Yet Police Superintendent Crowley's literary censorship of the Boston book and magazine trade has seldom served us with a more appetizing sensation.

* * * * *

When autumn had followed summer, the literary consequences of the deaths of Sacco and Vanzetti were more than ever in evidence.[1] Nothing could prevent the authorities from taking action calculated to bring some of these works to the attention of the Massachusetts public. When a copy of the "Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti" was unexpectedly presented without ceremony to Governor Fuller in front of the State House, immediately after the inauguration of his successor in office, he angrily threw the volume to the sidewalk; and none of us could help reading about so dramatic an incident in the newspapers. Upton Sinclair must have suffered the keenest disappointment of his life in the failure of Superintendent Crowley to ban the sale of his novel. For already "Gods of the Lightning," which ran for weeks at the Little Theatre in New York, without being stopped or even noticed by the New York authorities, had been condemned by the corporation counsel as unfit for presentation on any Boston stage.. Why this discrimination?

In view of the special sensitiveness of South Boston as well as Back Bay Boston, of the Boston of Mr. Curley and Mr. Fitzgerald as well as the Boston of the Harvard and Union clubs, of Suffolk county as well as Norfolk county, to the least provocation in this matter, Mr. Deland's condemnation would have had some justification in the danger of rioting on account of the play's volcanic emotional appeal. "Gods" gives no standing room to a coldly detached neutrality. But the reasons advanced and elaborated by the corporation counsel were mere pretexts for the play's suppression. Boston, unlike New York, was not equal to the strain of the play's presentation, and liberty was sacrificed.

So we have been forgetting Sacco and Vanzetti by having "Gods" barred from our State capital while Mr. Sinclair's novel, an onslaught on the Commonwealth no less savage, if not so wild, and surely much more direct, can be freely bought at our bookstores and taken for a cent a day from at least some of our public libraries.

* * * * *

Harry J. Canter of East Boston was the candidate of the Workers' Party for secretary of state. On November 3, 1928, just before the elections, the Boston branch of the party staged a street demonstration. Canter himself carried a conspicuous placard bearing the defiant words: "FULLER —MURDERER OF SACCO AND VANZETTI." Twenty-four paraders walked back and forth several times in front of the State House after a policeman had ordered them to "beat it," whereupon they were arrested for sauntering and loitering. Six weeks later the twenty-four were fined $20 each for that violation of the statutes.

But Canter was held on the charge of criminal libel for carrying the placard. It was not a civil prosecution for damages brought by the man libeled. The Commonwealth was the accuser on the assumption that Canter was not exercising legitimate political rights but was focussing his activities on the commission of a crime. The Canter trial came in May of this year before a Boston jury. He was convicted and sentenced to serve one year in jail.

It was impossible to feel any rush of sympathy for Canter. Sympathy for persons who abuse others, even in politics, has never seemed to be required according to a reasonable interpretation of the principle of free speech. To placard Governer Fuller as a murderer was excessive abuse. Yet why the police arrested these paraders was a puzzle, if our Massachusetts people were ever to forget the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

It became necessary to follow Canter's fortunes for six solid months. We read in the papers early in November about the arrest of the paraders. In December we read about the fining of them $20 each. At intervals we were reminded of the coming Canter trial by the postponements of it until Governor Fuller's return from Europe. In May, finally, we read the headlines and the reports of the jury trial, covering a period of at least three days; while, at the very end in imposing punishment, the Boston judge delivered a speech. For that six months of public advertising of Sacco and Vanzetti we could thank the Boston police and the district attorney of Suffolk county.

Canter's attorneys at the trial were unable, under the court's ruling, to introduce the record of the Sacco-Vanzetti case. Thereupon, the defense was concentrated upon the contention that he did not mean literally that [1] "America Arraigned," an anthology of 61 poems, edited by Ralph Cheyney and Lucia Trent.

"Letters of Sacco and Vanzetti," edited by Marion Denman Frankfurter and Gardner Jackson.
"Thirteen Days," by Jeannette Marks, an account of the last days of Sacco and Vanzetti.
"Gods of the Lightning," a play by Maxwell Anderson and Harold Hickerson.
"Boston," a two-volume novel by Upton Sinclair.
A section in Edna St. Vincent Millay's "Buck in the Snow."
Several poems in Kathleen Millay's "Hermit Thrush."

Governor Fuller was a murderer. He had meant simply that the Governor was "morally responsible" for the executions. In a sense, the Governor was responsible, but the executive council shared the responsibility; for together the Governor and council could have prevented the execution by commuting the death sentences to life imprisonment. But the court would make no allowances in Canter's case for political license in campaigning for a radical party.

Are we to have in Massachusetts a severer curb on political violence because Canter is in jail? It is too much to expect. There will be no general softening of epithets, in Boston at least, because of this episode.

* * * * *

As the months passed in this second year since the executions, the effort to forget was again and again frustrated. When "Gods" was making its New York audience cry "Shame," the Outlook magazine published a paid-for confession by Frank Silva that he was one of the bandit gang who staged the unsuccessful Bridgewater holdup on December 24, 1919, for which Vanzetti was tried and sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. Silva's story exonerated Vanzetti of the least participation in that vicious crime. Massachusetts was not impressed by the Outlook articles—"impressed" being the word used in official circles at the State House. As for the public that had accepted without reservations the report of the Lowell committee, it seemed almost sacrilegious to heed the confession of a bandit as against the assurances of Vanzetti's guilt from the Lowell committee. Still there were some who could not help observing that even a crook might for once tell the truth, but that a searching check-up of his story for purposes of independent verification was essential before it could be accepted in whole or in part.

Out of the Silva confession came a little complication to keep one's interest alive. Silva had said that one of the Bridgewater bandits was Joseph San Marco, now a "lifer" at the State prison in Charlestown. San Marco denied Silva's accusation in a letter, signed by himself, sent to the State commissioner of correction and then forwarded to Governor Fuller. To support his denial of participation in the Bridgewater holdup, San Marco declared that on the day of the holdup he was working "up to 12 o'clock noon for one of the largest firms in Boston, whose books will show this to be true." But the name of that firm was not given in the letter.

Silva was a liar if San Marco told the truth. If one were interested in establishing the truth beyond dispute, the next step was to learn the name of San Marco's employer and test the claim that San Marco had worked up to 12 o'clock noon on December 24, 1919. But no one in authority moved; no one in authority was interested. So far as this Commonwealth is officially concerned, there is no longer a Sacco-Vanzetti case.

It was eventually learned that San Marco claimed to have worked on December 24, 1919, for a Boston concern that, unfortunately for this story, went out of business some time ago, and, in going out of business, destroyed all its books, payrolls, and shop records. Under these circumstances, it would be rash to say that a convincing test of San Marco's denial of Silva's confession would ever be possible. Yet this mystery has a place in the year's record.

* * * * *

In the spring came Henry Holt and Company's publication of the official transcript of the trial of Sacco and Vanzetti and the subsequent proceedings.* This massive publication of 6,000 pages contained some important new material concerning President Lowell's undercover treatment of Bosco and Guadagni, alibi witnesses for Sacco. It soon developed that President Lowell had been stirred out of his ordinary reticence and calm. Efforts to forget Sacco and Vanzetti were again neutralized about May Day by the letter which the head of Harvard wrote to Mr. Cohen, a student and the editor of the Harvard Progressive, published fortnightly by the Harvard Socialist Club.

Mr. Cohen had printed severely critical articles on President Lowell's handling of the Bosco and Guadagni affair, and had invited the president to reply in the columns of the Harvard Progressive. It was a notable journalistic achievement for Mr. Cohen to elicit a letter containing Mr. Lowell's first public expression on the celebrated case since the executions. Especially challenging, one might say revealing, is the last word in the second sentence (the remainder of the letter being irrelevant): "Dear Mr. Cohen: I do not care to enter into any public controversy on the subject of Sacco and Vanzetti. I have done my duty as a citizen with honesty and courage."

* * * * *

The legislature of Massachusetts meets annually, just after New Year's. There is a judicial council, a competent official board of jurists appointed to study the State's system of jurisprudence and to make recommendations to the legislature of desirable changes in the laws. In this eminent body's first report, after the executions of Sacco and Vanzetti, it recommended that power be vested in the supreme judicial court to review the evidence as well as the law points in appeals from the superior courts for new trials in murder cases. The legislature of 1928 ignored the recommendation. In its second report last winter the council returned to the subject, the nation-wide discussion of which had brought upon the Commonwealth much disagreeable criticism because of the grave doubts raised as to Judge Webster Thayer's impartiality:

> The council renews, with emphasis, its recommendation of last year that the scope of the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme judicial court in murder cases be extended to include the unrestricted consideration of every judicial act of the trial judge. This was a recommendation that followed the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

The recommendation was supported by the attorney general of the State and by the Massachusetts Bar Association. The joint judiciary committee of the legislature gave a public hearing on the bill proposed, in February. That was the last heard of it.

The legislature's evasive conduct is not mysterious. Friends of Judge Thayer would bitterly oppose such legislation on the ground that it reflected on his record in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. Others would denounce it as a surrender to the detested Sacco-Vanzetti "cult" and the anarchists. Still others honestly think that the present limitation on the supreme court's jurisdiction is desirable in order to shorten "the law's delays," regardless of deplorable consequences in a particular case. So, in order to avoid an embittered legislative conflict tearing open the whole Sacco-Vanzetti case, for which most of the honorable members have no stomach, the legislature does nothing. Yet the judicial council may renew its wise recommendation.

* Reviewed by the writer in the August number of the Survey Graphic.

* * * * *

One day in mid-spring the newspapers reported Governor Allen's curt refusal to hear argument from the lawyer of the murderer Knowlton in favor of the appointment of an advisory committee of eminent citizens to conduct an independent inquiry into his client's trial, conviction, and sentence to death. In an annoying way that memorable precedent had come home to roost.

* * * * *

Then, on another day in the springtime, came news that two new ships of the Russian government had been christened, respectively, the Sacco and the Vanzetti.

One laughed.

* * * * *

Even now, so the newspapers tell us, the respectable, law-abiding promoters of a Sacco and Vanzetti memorial meeting, for August 23, find every hall in Boston closed, following the arbitrary refusal of the city authorities to open Faneuil hall to them.

For none of us, from the greatest to the humblest, has forgetting Sacco and Vanzetti become easy.

The Power of Two Ghosts

By GARDNER JACKSON

IF ever there was a man subjected to unbelievably trying and torturing handicaps while doing what he conceived to be his duty, that man was William G. Thompson, senior counsel for Sacco and Vanzetti, in the summer of 1927. Now for the first time there is a public document available setting forth in considerable detail the indignities and denials of common fairness which Mr. Thompson and his associate, Herbert B. Ehrmann, had to face during the investigation of the Sacco-Vanzetti case by ex-Governor Fuller of Massachusetts and the advisory committee headed by President Lowell of Harvard.

That document is the court record of the trial and conviction of Harry Canter on the charge of criminally libeling ex-Governor Fuller by reason of carrying a placard in front of the State House last October bearing the words, "Fuller—Murderer of Sacco and Vanzetti." Canter was found guilty by a Boston jury in the Superior Court May 25. The jury was charged by the late Judge Robert F. Raymond in such a manner that it could do nothing else but find Canter guilty. Judge Raymond sentenced him to a year's incarceration at the penal institution on Deer Island and refused to stay the sentence pending appeal to the Supreme Court of the State.

Mr. Thompson was summoned as chief witness for the defense and was on the stand under examination by Attorney Arthur Garfield Hays for more than two hours. He told of his unavailing attempts to induce ex-Governor Fuller to uphold the basic principle of the Anglo-Saxon theory of justice—namely, that no man shall be accused without an opportunity of hearing and answering his accusers.

Unsuccessful in his effort during his first interview with ex-Governor Fuller to make the latter see the primary importance of investigating first the question of the fairness of the Dedham trial of Sacco and Vanzetti and of Judge Webster Thayer's attitude then and during the subsequent seven motions for a new trial, Mr. Thompson testified that he "turned the discussion into an entirely different channel."

> I said [he testified]: "If you are determined to act here as a judge and jury and determine the entire question of innocence or guilt then I take it for granted that you will permit Mr. Ehrmann and myself to be present to hear the evidence against our clients, to cross-examine the witnesses, and if we see fit to do so, and are able to do so, to introduce evidence in contradiction of anything that may be said against them." To which he replied: "I will not," and Mr. Wiggin [the ex-Governor's counsel who sat with him throughout the investigation] said: "That would be to make a bear garden out of the hearing."
>
> I asked him what he meant by that and he said that he meant that it would create confusion or an undesirable situation at the State House. I said in reply to that: "If you mean to imply that I am incapable of conducting a proceeding of this kind with a reasonable amount of dignity you are mistaken and Mr. Wiggin knows you are mistaken. You have at your command a force of State police and various other functionaries who are perfectly able to keep order at any proceeding that may be conducted by you at the State House." I said: "Is that your real reason?" To which he said: "Well, there is another reason." I said: "I would be very glad if Your Excellency would tell me what it is." He said: "I am afraid if I should tell you or permit you to know the names of the people who come up here and testify against your clients some harm might come to them."
>
> I said: "Well, no harm has yet come to those who testified against them in Dedham [seven years previous]." I said: "That apprehension is absolutely without foundation." . . . I said to him: "Governor, even if it were true that there is danger that the sympathizers might do some harm, yet, nevertheless, you should not break down the tradition of a thousand years. You are undertaking to pass upon the question of the guilt or innocence of two men, and upon your decision depend two lives. Now, the thing that I am speaking of was not because of something that happened in court, but rather something that goes to the very foundation of judgment and of laws, the idea that no man should be condemned without hearing what is said against him and having an opportunity to meet it." I said: "It was true in Roman times and it has been true in Anglo-Saxon times since and it is true now." I said: "If you undertake to pass upon that general question and do it in secret, you can never do justice and you never can satisfy the conscience of mankind with that sort of proceeding."
>
> He said he did not agree with me, that he found that if people came to him privately and quietly, he as a business man was able to get the truth out of them a great deal more effectively than it could be got publicly or in court. I said: "That is an illusion characteristic of a certain type of business man, but it is a dangerous illusion, and it is an extremely bad precedent for you to introduce into the judicial history of Massachusetts."

And I said to him: "I want you to understand that if you take testimony against my clients secretly, behind closed doors, and do not let me know what is said, and you are going to reach a conclusion upon that basis, my protest must be recorded now and it will be repeated as often as I have an opportunity to do so."

But protest as he would, Mr. Thompson could not budge the Governor. It was literally true that Mr. Thompson had no way of knowing what witnesses went before the Governor except those defense witnesses who went at Mr. Thompson's suggestion. It was a thorough-going inquisitional procedure.

After elaborating at great length on the evidence he presented to the Governor, Mr. Thompson turned to the question of Judge Thayer.

I said to him [the Governor]: "How are you going in the future to justify letting these men go to their death when you have got affidavits from George Crocker and Professor Richardson of Dartmouth College, perfectly reputable men, men of high standing, without the slightest taint of radicalism, substantial citizens, when you have got a man holding the position of judge in this State asking one of those men whether he does not think the charge which he intends to give the next morning will hold the defendants, tells how the community is in great danger of radicalism and all that sort of thing, and when Professor Richardson writes a letter to the Governor and says that on the football field at Dartmouth College in the presence of a large number of men, some students and some instructors, this man voluntarily steps up to them and says, 'Did you see what I did to those anarchistic bastards yesterday?' "

I said: "Do you think, Governor, when that thing comes to be appreciated that that has been said by a judge of the Superior Court about two men on trial for their lives, one of them a married man with two little children, do you think you will get away with it, when you do not even tell me whether Judge Thayer admitted or denied saying that and when your own Advisory Committee refused to say whether Judge Thayer admitted or denied that, and when I do not know how to argue it, and I said so to President Lowell and President Lowell said to me: 'You may argue on the theory that he admitted it and then you may argue on the assumption that he denied it.'?"

I said: "If this matter was not so serious it would be a farce." I said: "You will bring a disgrace on this Commonwealth that will not be overcome in a century." I said: "Do not imagine that you will be protected when this thing is all printed and when disinterested, scholarly men get hold of it, do not think you can shield yourself under t[illegible] of Mr. Lowell or anybody else. You will stand stark alone for having permitted a disgrace to be perpetrated in this Commonwealth of Massachusetts, because at the moment a great mass of public opinion, not knowing the danger of it, is urging you to do it, and is filling the papers and public places with denunciation of Sacco and Vanzetti and everybody connected with it."

I said: "I have lost about twenty-five thousand dollars in this case through my activities, in office salaries, business falling off, and one thing and another. I thought when I started off that these men were guilty, and I took it for granted, like everybody else, that a radical must be guilty. But I came to know these men, and when I came to know these men—I have been at it for seven years—I find that the public has a total misconception of what these men are. If Vanzetti had an education he would have been a professor in Harvard College. He is one of the most gifted men that I know of. I have heard him give a most enlightening talk on Ralph Waldo Emerson, he has discussed Shelley's poems with me and I have heard him use words that I have had to go home and look in the Century Dictionary to find the meaning of. He is a dreamer and an idealist.

"He is as incapable of going out and committing murder for profit or gain as Phillips Brooks was. All this talk that you are dealing with a bomb thrower and a violent, dangerous criminal, is all nonsense. A horrible blunder is being made, and all this hue and cry that this man is a murderer is simply due to the slowness of the general public to catch on to something out of the ordinary course. I am here trying to protect the general community from making a most horrible mistake, and there is a most horrible mistake being made. I do not care anything about Vanzetti's beliefs. He knows I do not believe in them at all. You are making ten radicals for every one that there is now. You are hurting the people of this Commonwealth by letting this thing go through."

Of all the illuminating material Mr. Thompson gave on the stand, none is perhaps more indicative of ex-Governor Fuller's attitude of mind during the investigation than this bit relating to Mr. Fuller's interview with Madeiros who while under sentence for another killing confessed to being in the murder car.

Madeiros said [Mr. Thompson testified] that the Governor had come down to see him and that the Governor began the interview by saying that he understood that Madeiros said that he thought he had been given—I think the expression was "a raw deal," or something indicating double dealing or improper dealing by the government, and that Madeiros said that Officer Ferrari of the State police had given him promise of second-degree murder if he confessed the murder (a Wrentham bank murder), and that was given to Mr. Brooks at the State House who had a good deal to do with criminal cases (on the parole board). The Governor said if he was satisfied that any such promise had been made he would do something for Madeiros. The Governor then said, before waiting for any reply from Madeiros, according to Madeiros's statement to me: "You do not know anything about the Sacco-Vanzetti case, do you?" And Madeiros said he did and the Governor asked him if he was in the car with the other men who committed the murder in South Braintree, the South Braintree murder, and Madeiros said he was, and the Governor then said, "So you are a double murderer: I will do nothing for you."

Mr. Thompson's testimony, which was submitted as offer of proof for the Canter defense with the jury excused, was supplemented by significant testimony from John F. Moors, Boston banker, who testified that during one of his interviews with the Governor on the case the latter clearly showed that he did not even know that the Pinkerton detective reports exonerating Vanzetti had been submitted to him by Mr. Thompson. When Mr. Moors asked the Governor about them, the Governor turned to his secretary and said: "Do you know anything about some Pinkerton reports?" And this was far along in the investigation.

All in all the Canter trial record is a rich mine of material for the student of the Sacco-Vanzetti case. The record may get a wider airing if a Canter appeal is pushed in the Supreme Court in the fall. In any event the record will stand to plague Massachusetts for years to come.

A Great Editor

By JOHN A. HOBSON

THE retirement of Mr. C. P. Scott from the editorship of his paper, the Manchester Guardian, has been the occasion of a testimonial of regret, admiration, and good-will, from the press of his own and other countries, that is unique in the history of journalism. When he entered upon the editorship in 1872 it was a newspaper of the second rank in a large provincial English city. Today an impartial panel of international journalists would probably pronounce it the best newspaper in the world. By such a verdict they would not signify that its direct influence upon politics and trade, or in the sphere of intellectual culture, exceeds that of several other journals in its own and other lands. Indeed, it is no longer true today that Lancashire holds the place it did a century ago, either in commerce or in political initiative, when it could be said that "what Lancashire thinks today, England will think tomorrow." Though the steady strength of the Manchester Guardian is still drawn from the keen-minded, sober, energetic character of the most thickly peopled area of industrial England, its wider reputation must be imputed to the wisdom, courage, and ceaseless energy of its great editor. The central skill of his achievement lay in utilizing the needs and opportunities of the population and trade of Lancashire as the business basis of an organ of general human culture. Steadily he kept in mind his duty to his provincial readers, but he strove unceasingly to make them less provincial, widening their horizon, stimulating their minds with information and interpretations of significant events in the larger world. Perhaps his chief wisdom was seen in the selection and training of an editorial staff of able young men capable of entering into this tradition. Many of the most famous men in our journalism and letters have at one time or another served upon this staff. In earlier days we may mention Sir Arthur Evans and Mr. W. T. Arnold, among recent writers the brilliant novelist and essayist Mr. C. E. Montague and the great sociologist Professor L. T. Hobhouse, whose untimely death we are now deploring. Mr. Scott succeeded in the difficult task of reconciling personal liberty of thought in his writers with a common purpose, to a quite unusual extent. He recognized always that the former was as essential to the character of his paper as the latter. At a time when journalism was steadily drifting from a profession into a trade or business, he took a firm stand for the higher calling. Not merely to print "what the public wants," but to mold the public mind and supply its real needs, was the task he undertook. It is sometimes said that the continued performance of this task is impracticable, seeing that no newspaper can live without a large advertisement income, that advertising depends on circulation, and people will not buy a paper to have their minds improved. Perhaps the chief service of the Manchester Guardian is its practical refutation of this cynical judgment. Though its regular readers may be what Matthew Arnold called "the remnant," the size and influence of that remnant are sufficient. Supported also by a wider outer circle of readers intelligent enough to prefer reliable to highly spiced news, the Guardian has for over a century had a substantial, though not a highly lucrative, business career.

This has not been achieved without incurring risks and sacrifices impossible for a "grocery press." Mr. Scott has been almost the only survivor of the old tradition of owner-editor, who himself lives by the living word he writes and sells. While this position has its dangers, where ownership comes first, and there are personal axes to grind or interests to serve, it has the inestimable advantage of securing absolute freedom for the current conduct of the paper, and a continuity of policy deriving from the personality of its responsible head. This is of peculiar importance in the case of a journal which has always taken for its foremost duty the direction of political thought along the highroad of principle, without that constant deference to passing opportunity which the lighter-minded journals cultivate. For there are occasions when such an editor will espouse a policy which may be so unpopular as to inflict a serious damage on his paper as a property, even to threaten its very existence. No hired journalist can undertake such risks. He must either yield to the fears and remonstrances of the owner, or he must quit. Several instances in the recent history of English journalism serve to illustrate the perils of this vacillation and unfreedom. The Manchester Guardian under its great editor has never felt the necessity of walking delicately when a firm step was required. It has been strong enough to challenge a popular misjudgment, and by patient reasoning to convert public opinion. Its attitude of persistent opposition to the Boer War was a most striking example of the courage and success of this conduct. Though the jingo boycott, to which the paper was subjected in the passionate heat of that conflict, threatened it with ruin, it emerged with a heightened respect and confidence due, partly, to a sense of sportsmanship in its Lancashire public, partly, to the dawning recognition that the Guardian had been right in denouncing the South African war as a disastrous and costly blunder. Thus it has come to pass that the courage and integrity of this great newspaper have gained wide recognition outside the ranks of its political adherents. This was demonstrated most impressively a few years ago, when the Conservative Lord Derby presided at a great banquet to celebrate Mr. Scott's jubilee as editor.

The great political service rendered by Mr. Scott has been what may be termed the making of a new liberalism in Manchester, the Mecca of the old. For half a century, while steadily adhering to the Victorian principles of peace, economy, and electoral reform, the editorial policy of the Guardian has steadily moved on from a laissez-faire conception of the duties of the state to a large constructive conception of the part which government must play in securing and developing economic and personal liberties. It is no mere coincidence that a large part of the initiative in the recent Liberal Yellow Book, the gospel of new Liberalism, should have come from a little group of politicians, publicists, and business men in Lancashire. To Mr. Scott and his fellow-workers political liberty was never a merely, or mainly, negative conception. While freedom of trade and of business enterprise continued to be fundamental conditions of a sound society, while pacific internationalism and economy of defense were objects of vital importance, there was a growing sense that these foundations of policy existed to be built upon, and that a positive edifice of liberty involved a new conception of government and the part it must take in the cooperative processes of social progress. Thus stated, this may sound a vague generalization. But, in point of fact, our political life has been absorbing more and more of this conscious policy of political institutions for the support of life whose freedom consists in opportunities for the larger and more various realization of human personality. In recent years rapid economic evolution has gone far to dispel the illusions of absolute self-reliance and competing private enterprise in the economic sphere. Combination, cooperation, rationalization, terms pressing the business world, are visibly changing the functions of government. Politics and economics are meeting and even merging at many points. Not only national, but especially international, high politics are seen to be suffused with business considerations. Thus governments are compelled to undertake new functions of industrial control, of finance, of labor legislation, and of international cooperation, which are transforming the art of politics. In the liberal press of Europe no paper has been so active in the conscious formation of this new social-economic policy as the Manchester Guardian, and the recent rapprochement between Liberalism and Labor, which in spite of difficulties, party and personal, is steadily advancing, is in no small measure due to this more liberal interpretation of Liberalism in a party which, left to the obsolescent policies of the Gladstonian or Asquithian schools, was doomed to early extinction. The actual fate of the Liberal Party and its press is an interesting topic for speculation. But it is no rash prophecy to state that the English Liberalism of the future can survive only by an effective cooperation with Labor, helping, as it would, to moderate and rationalize the socialism which modern life requires and to which all progressive sections of our political parties are virtually committed. To have been a pioneer in this great political work will be a legitimate source of pride to the great editor in his well-earned retirement.

American or Foreigner?

By J. MARK JACOBSON

I

A FEW days ago the police of Budapest prevented a nineteen-year-old shoemaker from jumping off the Elizabeth bridge into the Danube. This hapless young man, born of a Polish father and a Hungarian mother in the town of Munkach, which is now in Czecho-Slovakia, had been deported by the Hungarian authorities to Czecho-Slovakia, only to be sent on to Poland as a Pole, and by the Poles deported back to Hungary. Three times he made this round, and then, unable, in consequence of the conflict of laws, to find any foothold in this world, wearily determined to try his chances in the next.

Americans of American origin have been unaware of the perplexing problem of nationality confronting the newer American—and utterly indifferent to it; but a World War followed by a quota immigration act has forcibly impressed on thousands of our first and second-generation Americans the disastrous clash of varying nationality laws, which deny to some men all nationality and burden others with double citizenship. This conflict of laws arises from the clash of two diametrically opposite rules of nationality, ius sanguinis (law of blood) and ius soli (law of the soil). Italy, for example, holding to the first of these principles, claims jurisdiction over the children of Italian parents no matter if they are born in New Zealand or Kamchatka. Other nations, on the other hand, claim as their own citizens all who are born within their territory, regardless of the nationality of their parents.

The United States holds to both the law of the soil and the law of the blood, and mixes with these the principle of naturalization; the result is unparalleled complexity and confusion. Fundamentally, we approach the problem of nationality from the English common-law viewpoint, attaching nationality to the soil; but gradually we have approached the law of the blood and have also permitted the naturalization of nationals of other states, while continental European countries, starting from the law of the blood, have incorporated certain aspects of the law of the soil. The nationality laws of the United States may accordingly be classified into three groups, based upon the law of the soil, the law of the blood, and the naturalization of aliens. In examining our nationality laws, we must bear in mind that wherever we hold to the law of the blood some other state may have adopted the law of the soil, that where we adopt the latter principle Romance nations usually employ the law of the blood, and that while we permit the naturalization of aliens many countries refuse to recognize American naturalization of their nationals.

II

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution clearly establishes the law of the soil as the basic principle for the determination of American nationality. It provides that "All persons born in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

This simple rule of nationality, however, fails to solve the problem for the millions of American-born children and grandchildren of immigrants. Although the Fourteenth Amendment makes them all American citizens, under the nationality laws of some Romance and eastern European nations they belong to the countries from which their fathers or grandfathers had emigrated. Several countries, notably Italy, Greece, and Turkey, believe in an indelible, perpetual allegiance. Italy claims as her own the children of Italians born in any corner of the world, not merely the children of recent emigrants, but even the children of seventh-generation emigrants.

The Ghiloni case illustrates the sort of controversy that arises in consequence. Ghiloni was born in the United States in 1885 while his father, an Italian immigrant, was not yet naturalized. At the outbreak of the war Ghiloni was visiting in Italy. Under the Fourteenth Amendment he was a native-born American citizen; under the Italian code, however, he was an Italian subject, and despite the protests of our State Department, he was forced into the Italian army. The Da Prato case went even further. Though Da Prato's father, a naturalized American, had taken out his papers before his son was born, the young man, who had been studying architecture in Italy for two years, was seized for military service at the oubreak of the war.

III

Though we protest against the application of the law of the blood by foreign states to individuals born on American soil, yet we enforce this same law of the blood in our own nationality rules. According to our law, children born "out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States, whose fathers were or may be at the time of their birth, citizens thereof" are American citizens. Such a child continuing to reside outside of the United States, may at the age of eighteen record at an American consulate his intention of remaining a citizen of the United States and of becoming a resident of this country. Upon attaining his majority he must confirm his affirmation by taking an oath of allegiance to the United States.

Contrast with this arrangement Section 2172 of our Revised Statutes, under which foreign-born minor children living in the United States at the time their father is naturalized automatically become American citizens. In fact, a foreign-born child, though still living in his native land when his parent is naturalized, becomes a citizen of the United States if, while still a minor, he begins to reside permanently in the United States.

Not all children, however, acquire citizenship through the naturalization of their fathers. Foreign-born children of naturalized American citizens who do not come to this country to live until they are twenty-one or more years of age, and foreign-born children who are no longer minors at the time their fathers become American citizens remain foreigners. In addition, the status of step-children and adopted children is not affected by the citizenship of their new fathers.

IV

The American rules of nationality were sufficiently complex before 1922. Prior to that year we had accepted the common-law, unilateral system of nationality; the nationality of a wife and her children followed that of her husband, and the family was thus treated as a unit. But the insistence of twentieth-century American feminists resulted in the passage of the Cable Act of September 22, 1922. This legislation substituted a bilateral system of nationality for the previous unilateral system, and destroyed the family as a unit in the naturalization process.

The important provisions of this act are four in number. First, the naturalization of a husband does not ipso facto give his wife American citizenship; she herself must now go through the naturalization process. Second, the marriage of an alien woman to an American citizen does not secure for her American nationality; she must be naturalized the same as any other foreign-born woman. Third, an American woman upon marriage to an alien may elect to retain her American nationality. And fourth, a woman who has lost her American nationality through marriage to an alien may, upon the dissolution of the marriage, elect to reacquire her American citizenship.

The Cable Act has thrown the nationality status of married women into chaos, and has resulted in denying to many women all nationality, either American or foreign. For example, an official in the United States consular service stationed abroad was in 1922 married in England to a British woman, and they afterwards sought to come to the United States. The wife was discovered to be ineligible to an American passport, since under the Cable Act she had not by her marriage acquired American nationality. On the other hand, under the British Act of 1914 she had lost her British nationality on her marriage to a non-British subject, so she was denied a British passport. Under section 2 of the Cable Act she could have been naturalized after only one year's residence in the United States, if she came to this country; but she could not get a passport to come.

Yet again, an American woman marries an Italian; she goes with her husband to live in Italy and gives up her American citizenship. Her husband dies or divorces her, and she decides to reacquire her surrendered American nationality. Under the laws both of the United States and of Italy, her children, no matter how young, remain subjects of Italy. She can return to the United States, but must leave her children behind to await their turn under the overcrowded Italian quota.

To summarize the situation, while a foreign woman marrying an American citizen does not in any case acquire American nationality, she does lose her original nationality in twenty countries,* under the rule that the nationality of a wife follows that of her husband. Twenty-seven countries,† however, make exceptions to this rule, and permit a wife under varying conditions and restrictions to retain her original nationality in case her husband's country refuses to let her assume his citizenship. In Sweden, for example, a woman who marries a foreigner may retain her Swedish nationality unless she leaves Sweden permanently. In Denmark she may remain a Dane only if she continues to live in Denmark. In Belgium she has six months after her marriage in which to ask to keep her nationality; otherwise she loses it. In Esthonia the period of grace is only two weeks. In only six countries—Argentina, Chile, Panama, Russia, Uruguay, and the United States—may a woman by her own right keep her own nationality upon her marriage to an alien.

V

The Fourteenth Amendment, in addition to establishing the law of the soil as the test for American nationality, provides for the acquisition of American citizenship by naturalization. After a residence of five years in this country, nationals of foreign states are permitted to abandon their former allegiance and to become citizens of the United

* Afghanistan, Albania, Australia, Bolivia, British India, Canada, Cuba, Czecho-Slovakia, Germany, Great Britain, Hungary, Latvia, Haiti, the Netherlands, Palestine, Persia, Spain, Switzerland, Venezuela, Iraq.

† Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, China, Esthonia, France, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Monaco, Portugal, Rumania, Sweden, Costa Rica, Egypt, Salvador, Jugoslavia, Danzig, Dominican Republic, Finland, Greece, Guatemala, Latvia, Nicaragua, Poland, Syria, Iceland.

States. Immediately, the problem of dual allegiance arises. Up to sixty years ago European nations refused to recognize our right to naturalize their subjects, and they endeavored to hold naturalized American citizens as nationals of their home countries. Some few foreign states, notably Italy, Greece, and Turkey, believing, as previously stated, in an indelible, perpetual allegiance, still refuse to recognize American naturalization; while most European countries permit only a limited naturalization of their nationals.

The problem of dual nationality, accordingly, has always been a troublesome one in our diplomatic history. It was one of the many grievances that led to the War of 1812 against England. Ever since 1845, when Buchanan as Secretary of State first enunciated our general policy, we have considered the right of nationals to change their allegiance as natural and inalienable. Congress in 1868 instructed the executive to extend the same protection abroad to naturalized as to native-born citizens. The Bancroft-Bismarck treaty of that same year with the North German Confederation marks the first international agreement permitting even a limited expatriation. Since then we have succeeded in concluding such treaties with several nations: England, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Austria-Hungary, Ecuador, Denmark, and Haiti.

While we have thus made progress in securing recognition of American naturalization, nevertheless a number of states have nationality laws which raise the question of dual nationality for hundreds of thousands of naturalized and even native-born American citizens. Twelve countries —Austria, Ecuador, Monaco, Norway, Persia, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, Sweden, Japan, Belgium-Congo, and Danzig—permit the naturalization of their nationals only if the persons desiring naturalization have first secured the consent of their home governments. Twelve other states—Bulgaria, China, Esthonia, Finland, France, Greece, Hungary, Madagascar, Persia, Poland, Jugoslavia, and Turkey —permit the expatriation of their nationals only after they have performed their required military training. A national of one of these states acquires American citizenship by naturalization, but is denied by his own home country release from his original allegiance; he is thus burdened with a dual nationality.

VI

The clash of nationality results in double taxation, loss of diplomatic protection, and liability to military service. In consequence, as Frances Kellor points out in her book, "Immigration and the Future":

> Aliens in America see very little advantage in acquiring a citizenship which makes them and their sons born in America liable to foreign military service; and naturalized citizens point out that in some countries little respect is paid to American citizenship. The native-born American has been indifferent and has allowed this matter to drift, largely because he has never realized its tremendous importance to foreign-born people in America and to their standing abroad.

Since the problem of nationality is both international and domestic, a satisfactory solution demands international as well as national consideration. The League of Nations through its Committee of Experts for the Progressive Codification of International Law in January, 1926, drew up a preliminary draft convention that embodied practical answers to a few of the many questions involved. The failure of our government to cooperate with this committee prevented the ripening of this fruitful movement. This question is now being studied by a group of experts at the Harvard Law School in preparation for the coming Hague Convention for the codification of international law.

Commissioner of Naturalization Raymond F. Crist, in his 1926 report to Congress, said:

> The elimination of all methods of conferring citizenship upon persons of foreign birth except the one of direct petition for naturalization would go far toward paving the way for a uniform recognition of citizenship by nations throughout the world. . . . It is recommended that citizenship be recognized as acquired only by birth within the United States, or, in all future naturalizations, by direct petition for naturalization in cases of birth outside the United States.

Should legislation of this nature be adopted, it would be necessary to repeal our laws granting American citizenship to minor children born abroad, whether now resident in the United States or abroad, upon the naturalization of their fathers.

However, the major problems of the conflict of nationality result from the duality of nationality through naturalization, from the nationality laws for women, and from the clash of the diametrically opposed law of the soil and law of the blood. Such basic conflicts can be eliminated only through international conference and action that harmonizes the rules of the several countries. It is an international, not a purely national, task.

In the Driftway

CLARENCE K. STREIT typewrites from Geneva (Switzerland, not New York) to cast doubt upon the theory which the Drifter advanced in the issue of July 10 that the Young Men's Christian Association gave the cigarette its greatest boost toward respectability and popularity. The Drifter said (as his readers will not recall) that by tacitly removing its ban from cigarette smoking during the World War the Y. M. C. A. made "coffin nails" respectable for men, a necessary preliminary to becoming respectable among women. Characterizing this idea as a "theory in fact's clothing," Mr. Streit endeavors to deflate it as follows:

> My own driftings once washed me ashore at Samsoun, Turkey. There I found three veteran American tobacco buyers engaged in the philanthropic task of selecting the best of the gorgeous leaf that honors that region for export to America. I learned about cigarettes from them.
>
> Loath as all ex-soldiers of my acquaintance are to remove any wreath—be it even a wreath of cigarette smoke —from the brow of the Y. M. C. A., I must inform you that the reasons these men who had grown up in the trade gave for the cigarette's rise in popularity did not include a faint allusion to the Y. They told me that the greatest boost the American cigarette ever got came when some anonymous tobacco man hit upon the idea of blending with the American leaf the more aromatic and easier burning one of Turkey. They showed me with figures how our importations of Turkish tobacco had grown from year to year since then, and how cigarette sales had followed the same upward curve.

They reminded me that all the popular American cigarette brands contained some Turkish leaf. They would take such cigarettes, break them open, roll the contents in their hands and, after a quick eye-open test which I fear none of the makers for whom they buy would advertise, they would tell me all that was in them and would contemptuously toss them away.

"If you want a real smoke," they told me, "try one of these." And they gave me a box of a thousand of the cigarettes that they have made for their own enjoyment. They were made of the pure Samsoun leaf. Don't blow that smoke away!

Honest-to-godly,

CLARENCE K. STREIT

* * * * *

THE Drifter has no desire to "blow that smoke away." On the contrary, he wishes some of it might blow his way. But all aroma aside, and with that denseness that is always so useful in an argument, he doesn't see how Mr. Streit's delightful experience demolishes the theory of the benefit of clergy derived by the cigarette from the Y. M. C. A. Doubtless it is true that the blending of native tobacco with Turkish was a long step in the progress of the cigarette. At the same time the cigarette has become enormously popular in England, although the most favored brands there have had no admixture of Turkish leaf. It might be observed in rebuttal that neither have they had any admixture of Y. M. C. A. But the Drifter has a further argument in reserve. The blending of native tobacco with Turkish in the making of cigarettes was common in this country more than a quarter of a century ago. In fact the Drifter cannot recall definitely from the mists of time the pre-Turkish era. He believes that the first cigarettes he knew were Sweet Caporals, made entirely of native tobacco. But he never smoked them. That was before his fair, young lips had been stained by the weed. The first cigarettes which the Drifter recalls through smoking them contained an admixture of Turkish tobacco. Turkish Trophies and Egyptian Deities were well-known brands in the early years of this century. The Drifter recalls Trophies better than Deities; they were cheaper.

* * * * *

BUT though the blending of native tobacco with Turkish in the making of cigarettes in America goes back at least to the early years of this century, the product was still dubbed "coffin nails" for a long time after. The popularity of the cigarette grew steadily (and perhaps Turkish tobacco had much to do with its rise), but right up to the World War it was still frowned upon as noxious by large numbers of Americans (including most mothers), and the Y. M. C. A. forbade smoking in its buildings. Its change of heart during the war, and its transmission of thousands of cigarettes to our troops overseas, took the curse off the "coffin nail" and would seem to be the great boost which put it over the top as our most popular kind of smoke—a permissible pastime for men, and soon after for women.

* * * * *

ANYHOW Mr. Streit's theory was made in Switzerland. It is a product of the pauper labor of Europe and should not be admitted to this country.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Einstein and Science

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I do not recollect ever having read anything touching on a scientific or engineering subject in a popular daily or weekly or monthly, which did not contain some absolute nonsense. "Einstein is right" and "Einstein is wrong" have become nauseating headlines, and the number of other sensational statements in connection with the Einstein theories is legion. "Walking on Air," "Light is Curved," "The End of Universe," "Split Atoms Can Destroy the World," etc., recur now and then even in papers and magazines that do not otherwise cater to the sensational. This is not altogether the fault of the editors or the poor reporters who are forced by the nature of their profession to do a great amount of uninformed writing on more subjects than it is possible for any human being to master. They have to take the words of "experts" for granted, and since it is very difficult for them to reach the real experts, the modest scientists who are not very anxious to see their names in newspaper headlines, they have to depend on the pseudo-experts who are every ready to take advantage of the work of other men to get their own names in front of the public.

Is it possible that The Nation has joined the ranks of the "science baiters"? I refer to your editorial article, Science and Certitude. Every scientific theory, in the course of its development, calls for some corrections and modifications, principally through the serious efforts and investigations of other scientists. Is this a sufficient reason for you to give your readers the impression that scientists don't know what they are talking about? Your remark about the "validity of purely mathematical inferences" is quite nonsensical. Don't you know that mathematics is an empirical science, that it is only used for the purpose of simplifying human reasoning, as a mechanic uses his tools to simplify and speed up his work? The use of higher mathematics in physics is no more "purely mathematical inference" than is your own use of simple arithmetic, instead of taking off your shoes to allow you to add up to twenty with the aid of your toes. If there is one thing which can be checked and found either right or wrong it is a mathematical formula. A purely mathematical inference once checked is never wrong. What is often found to require a correction is a physical constant or variable, which is obtained purely by observation. The whole progress of science is made up of just such corrections.

New York, July 23 M. M. SAMUELS

[The author of this letter can hardly accuse us of having asserted either that "Einstein is right" or that "Einstein is wrong." Our attitude was simply one of complete skepticism, and we implied a belief that neither the proponents nor the opponents of the Einstein theory had any conclusive evidence to support their side of the argument. We wholly agree with Mr. Samuels that the physical scientist should use mathematics "as a mechanic uses his tools to simplify and speed up his work." But we contended that Einstein's Field Theory appeared to be the result of a piece of pure mathematical reasoning which has as yet little or no empirical evidence in its favor. As to the statement that "mathematics is an empirical science," we are surprised to hear it made and we must confess that we are not yet able to understand the statement that it is. Surely Mr. Samuels's assertion is quite unorthodox and not likely to be accepted by the many mathematicians who regard their science as being, on the contrary, the highest possible development of pure logic and as such quite independent of experience.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

The Marion Strike

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The strike at Marion, N. C., ought to interest your readers. Seven hundred men and women on July 11 left their places in a cotton mill when R. W. Baldwin, president of the Marion Manufacturing Company, who has boasted throughout the country of his "garden" mill village, refused to decrease their hours from 12 hours and 20 minutes to 10 hours a day, and refused to reinstate twenty-two workers discharged for joining the United Textile Workers of America.

I am happy to say that the leadership in the strike has been of high calibre. Alfred Hoffman, graduate of Brookwood, and active in the early stages of the Elizabethton strike, has been an intelligent leader; Tom Tippett has been working and talking untiringly; A. J. Muste, dean of Brookwood, delivered a series of inspiring talks to the strikers; and William Ross of Baltimore Labor College has started regular workers' classes.

The men and women of Marion are devoted, sef-sacrificing, and in spite of injunctions, their picket line is as strong as steel. They are fighting in this strike for modest demands and they are determined to get them. In the meantime, they and fifteen hundred dependents, the sick, the young, and the old, must be fed. The Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief, Norman Thomas, chairman, has been the great sustaining force. We hope that your readers will send what they can to the new office of the committee at 112 East 19th Street, New York City.

New York, August 1 Jack Herling

Denmark's National Anthem

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is not quite correct, as Katharine Arthur states in the July 10 issue of The Nation, that the former Minister of Education in Denmark, Madame Nina Bang, had a law passed "forbidding audiences to rise during the national anthem as not good for the common people." No such law was passed, but the Socialist Cabinet of which Nina Bang was a member refused to pay its respects to the national anthem, "King Christian stood by the lofty mast . . . " because of its warlike contents. I would like to inform the readers of The Nation that the present Socialist Government in Denmark has substituted a more peaceful national hymn for the bombastic "King Christian" as the closing song of the State Radio Broadcasting programs, and that less blood-dripping songs are now being used at patriotic gatherings in Denmark.

Berkeley, California, July 10 Peter Guldbrandsen

Our Successor?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Recently out of college, I am now looking for a job on your magazine. I am twenty, presentable, considerably above average in intelligence, and particularly interested in magazine work. I can write. I have written largely for school and college publications, have done a little newspaper work, and have earned my living through college thus far in most part by doing research work and writing. For this reason I have had little time until the present to concern myself with magazine work. Now, however, I am in quest of a permanent position.

I am not precocious merely: permit me to assure you that I am confident of being entirely capable of carrying through satisfactorily anything you may have to offer me. I can do anything from editing your magazine to hauling a load of copies down Fifth Avenue in a wheelbarrow—and I can be hired to do it. In case there is at the moment no one in your offices dead or dying, if you will give me any other kind of assistance, I will be very highly gratified.

New York, August 2 C. H.

For Debs's Biography

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: McAlister Coleman is completing a full-length biography of the late Eugene V. Debs which Greenberg: Publisher will issue early in the spring. Mr. Coleman will welcome any letters from or to Debs, authoritative anecdotes, and any other interesting information concerning the great labor leader. He will copy and return promptly all material sent to him at 103 East 10th Street, New York City.

New York, August 6 Greenberg: Publisher

Sacco-Vanzetti Meeting

The Sacco-Vanzetti Memorial Committee, unable to obtain a hall in Boston, will hold its Second Anniversary Meeting in the Town Hall, 113 West 43rd Street, New York City, on Friday, August 23, at 8.30 P. M.

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
August 19—Mr. Warner
August 26—Mr. Mussey

Contributors to This Issue

Waldo L. Cook, editor of the Springfield Republican, has been a careful student of the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

Gardner Jackson was a leading member of the Sacco-Vanzetti Defense Committee.

John A. Hobson is a foremost British economist and a contributing editor of The Nation.

J. Mark Jacobson is instructor in political science at the University of Wisconsin.

Robert P. Tristram Coffin is professor of English at Wells College.

Robert Livingston Schuyler is professor of history at Columbia University.

Dudley Nichols is on the staff of the New York World.

Clarence Britten contributed the essay "School and College Life" to the volume "Civilization in the United States."

Morton Dauwen Zabel is professor of English literature at Loyola University and one of the editors of Poetry: a Magazine of Verse.

William MacDonald is a regular contributor to The Nation.

Alexander Bakshy, author of several books on the theater, writes frequently on motion pictures for The Nation.

Books and Films

There Yet Survived a God

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

They lived together in a house
Too big for women growing old;
One after one, they closed the doors
On rooms surrendered to the cold.

They had too many things to keep
Against the stealthy moth and sun,
Too many keepsakes to protect
Ever to think of using one.

Their lives contracted till at last
Their orbit was the kitchen fire;
They sat to think where they had cooked,
Empty of comment and desire.

Keen ways they learned to keep their souls
From filling one another's need;
They found each other's tender spots
And knew best how to make them bleed.

The sparrows and the robins made
Their love each year around their gate;
Inside the house two women aged
And sat together in their hate.

Heaven lit the appletrees
Beyond the kerbing of their well;
Inside four walls, in one small room,
There was room enough for hell.

Yet there was something holy, too,
In their fine art of giving pain;
They moved like ancient tragedy,
Single as martyrs in old Spain.

In these years of aimlessness,
Among our lives without design,
It was as if there yet survived
A god to offer poisoned wine.

Beginnings of Empire

The Cambridge History of the British Empire. General Editors: J. Holland Rose, A. P. Newton, and E. A. Benians. Vol. I: The Old Empire from the Beginnings to 1783. The Macmillan Company. $9.50.

THE Cambridge History of the British Empire, of which the long-awaited first volume has at length appeared, promises to be true to type. Like the other monumental histories which bear the name of Cambridge it is to be a comprehensive and voluminous work of cooperative scholarship, consisting of contributions by many specialists, intended for the use of students and for reference rather than for the general reader. It has been planned, the editors tell us, upon the lines of the Cambridge Modern History. Of the eight volumes which it is to include the first three will relate to British expansion and imperial policy from the sixteenth to the early twentieth century; the next two, specially edited by Professor H. H. Dodwell, will deal with the history of British India; and the last three, the Dominion volumes, will be concerned respectively with Canada and Newfoundland, Australia and New Zealand, and South Africa. The history of the most recent of the Dominions, the Irish Free State, falls outside the scope of the enterprise, of which the terminus ad quem is the year 1921. The fortunes of the crown colonies and other parts of the dependent empire are to receive consideration in the first three volumes in connection with the general history of imperial development. It is the hope of the editors that the work as a whole "will exhibit the present state of knowledge of the subject and lay a foundation on which future generations of students may build." There can be little doubt that it will take its place as the most authoritative, as it will certainly be the most complete, general history of the British Empire.

The first volume, consisting of twenty-six chapters, an elaborate bibliography, and an index, runs to well over nine hundred large and closely printed pages. It brings the history of the empire from its beginnings to the close of the American Revolution, and nowhere else within the covers of a single volume can so adequate and scholarly a treatment of the subject be found. Though the local history of the English colonies in North America and the West Indies is not wholly neglected, the general point of view is imperial, not colonial, British, not American. To emphasize the course of imperial development was the main object of the editors in planning the volume. With the exception of Professor Andrews of Yale all of the fifteen contributors are British, the list including such competent and well-known scholars as Sir Charles Lucas, J. Holland Rose, J. A. Williamson, A. P. Newton, W. F. Reddaway, Cecil Headlam, H. W. Temperley, A. Pearce Higgins, and the late H. E. Egerton. The work is thus prevailingly British in authorship, but the note of British patriotism is rarely sounded. The tone is scientific and the treatment objective. The chapters on the American Revolution would not pass muster with Mayor Thompson and the D. A. R., but informed persons will find in them no evidence of anti-American bias. Patriotic American myths are not, of course, accepted, but there is no disposition to minimize or palliate blunders of British imperial statesmanship.

Some literary historian—Mr. Philip Guedalla, I think—has asserted that histories of the Cambridge type are unreadable. This is an exaggeration, but it is not to be expected that a work of the scope and character of this volume will be read from cover to cover by very many people. Even by historical students it will be read in rather than through. It is fortunate, therefore, that in addition to the chronologically articulated chapters there are several which are self-contained essays. Such are the excellent discussion of Mercantilism and the Colonies by Professor Rees of the University of Birmingham, the thoughtful study of The Constitution and the Empire by Professor Ewing of Rhodes University College, South Africa, and the interesting appraisal of The Literature and Social Life of the Old Empire by the late Professor Egerton.

The bibliography, which is based upon materials furnished by contributors and edited by Miss Lillian Penson, deserves special mention and commendation. It contains a general bibliography, in which all the more important documentary sources, printed and unprinted, official and non-official, are listed, with select special bibliographies on exploration and sea power, colonial policy, the history of the colonies, and the American Revolution. The former should prove of service to research students, and the latter to any readers who may desire further information on subjects dealt with in the text.

ROBERT LIVINGSTON SCHUYLER

Underworld

In the Reign of Rothstein. By Donald Henderson Clarke. Vanguard Press. $2.50.

DONALD HENDERSON CLARKE knew Rothstein. I did not know him, but once I saw him. The telephone had called me out of bed and presently the closed car stopped below my window in Charles Street and, muffled into my overcoat, I joined the two men on the rear seat. We went to Lindy's and it was 2 a. m. . . . The business in hand is not pertinent here, but while we sat and discussed a story which was later to break in the newspaper I was working for, my eyes went round the room, only my eyes let it be noted, for one did not turn one's head in Lindy's at 2 a. m. People had an admirable habit of attending their own affairs, ostensibly. Over the shoulder of the man who was talking to me I perceived Little Augie who had just succeeded to leadership of the Kid Dropper gang, an undersized, quiet youth who appeared about as dangerous as a rabbit in a coop until you saw his eyes, with which he seemed not to be looking at all but listening everywhere, contemptuously. Here were the night-hawks of Broadway, race-track men, pickpockets, confidence men, book-makers, gangsters, gamblers, and the respectable sports, so my two habitues told them off.

All at once the eyes of the man who was speaking to me shifted by the breadth of a hair and without changing tone or inserting a comma he said: "There's A R coming in the door don't turn your head for Christ's sake but take a look to your left easy-like after a while the good-looking fellow who shows his teeth as he smiles now as I was saying about this here." . . . And business went on as usual.

After a while I saw Arnold Rothstein. A handsome man of middle height, so I guessed, whose Fifth Avenue clothing set off a lithe, muscular figure beginning to take on weight but keeping a panther-like grace for all that. He had the balance and quick shifting grace of a welterweight prize-fighter, white skilful hands, black hair, and a pale, smooth, mobile face distinguished by beautiful gleaming teeth and amazingly vital, sparkling, brown eyes which hardly moved yet incessantly raked the restaurant from end to end, so that I knew that he was even aware of my unimportant but unaccustomed presence.

Beyond question this was an unusual man, an extraordinary man, handsome and debonair, with a humming brain under it all. You liked him. One gathers that Mr. Clarke, who tells us those beautiful teeth were artificial, liked him.

Here was Broadway's biggest big-money gambler. The type awakened a mingled sense of glamor and disgust, the latter very likely because of some unacknowledged identity in oneself. He pitted himself against all owning males and the weapon was the ringing, clinking one all men could wield, the blade more insidiously sharp at the hilt than at the point. The big-money gambler keeps close to his love; not even the one remove of the stock market will satisfy him, even though as a man of sense he must realize that money, like electric voltage, needs to be handled at a distance if great values are to be attained. He burns for the sweaty touch and clinch. The body of his love must be next to him always, a great roll of crisp, papery flesh secreted against his breast. Like a debased counterpart of the tragic saint in O'Neill's "Dynamo," who adores the vast, blind, godlike, dynamic power of the universe, he worships the vast static power of money which can buy of men and women everything except that which can only be given; and there is the dismal joke. For he does not die tragically in the arms of any dynamo, but meanly, insignificantly, untragically, with a bullet in his bowels. He is only removed.

Not that one means to say the joker is only dealt around in the underworld. How different is the dried-up, heaven-bent old man who hands out dimes to every stranger as a reminder to them and a reassurance to himself of the reality of his power over life? . . . But we shall not wander out of the underworld here, for Mr. Clarke's book is of that underworld, a New York newspaperman's passing knowledge of Broadway. Rothstein showed where he stood at the last, when detectives bent over the hospital bed to ask who shot him and he laid an index-finger against his dying lips. His business was cheating cheaters, but there was one partner he would not have. Mr. Clarke may well hazard that nobody will ever burn for the gambler's murder.

A R has been removed. Little Augie has met his bullet and been removed. The line is always forming on the wrong. . . . Mr. Clarke's book is rather a wax gallery of the Broadway he knows than a study of Arnold Rothstein, and character is only incidentally revealed through brief and unarticulated actions in the same way as it is now and then made clear in newspaper accounts. However, it will supplement the memories of New York newspapermen and give to outsiders a remarkable surface-cinema of a strange group of the type which constantly flares across Broadway and the tabloids.

DUDLEY NICHOLS

Meddling Through

The Mighty Medicine. By Franklin Henry Giddings. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Beyond Agnosticism. By Bernard Iddings Bell. Harper and Brothers. $2.

A Social Interpretation of Education. By Joseph Kinmont Hart. Henry Holt and Company. $4.50.

AS the religion of our time, our panacea for ills social and political, education has become about as difficult to define as liberty, which preceded it as mankind's hope of salvation. Here are three attempts at definition—by the Columbia sociologist, by the warden of St. Stephen's College, and by the expert who is a professor of the subject at Wisconsin. Each is dismayed by an alleged complacency with the educational establishment, though the simultaneous appearance of three such criticisms is an index to our actual discontent.

For Professor Giddings, speculative thought, which is a single-entry accounting of reality, is the way of belief; the way of knowledge is the double-entry accountancy of science, in which ideas are checked against sense data through the trial balance of repeated experiment. The one way is traditional and authoritarian, deriving from magic and fiatism as transmitted by an occult succession of medicine men for whom teaching is still largely a matter of incantation and of "imparting" an immaterial culture. This absolutist education fails in the application of intelligence and knowledge to the improvement of life; its fruits are passive sophistication or downright superstition, dogmatic environmentalism or the obscurantism of the "anti-evolution" laws.

It is not to weaken, rather to strengthen, this pithy putting of the liberal case against the schools that I interpolate a caution. The very ardor of the champion exhales an aroma of counter-obscurantism. "The solid realism of material culture" is of course indispensable, but must ordinary education therefore dispense with the immaterial culture bequeathed by introspection? And if it must, how shall it teach our literature, upon which the critic equally insists? Moreover, we had better avoid even the appearance of counter-dogmatism, at least until such time as science can develop a consolidated audit for her conflicting balance-sheets.

At four years, says Professor Giddings, children betray their inferior and imitative and conformist, or else their superior and initiative and creative, inheritance. For the former, efficiency. Among the latter we must distinguish between those who win their selfish way by cajolery or coercion and those who "lead" by virtue of their native vitality, mental energy, and character. College, finally, must bar out the unfit by an "infallible test," that of the self-important inferiority which would reach heaven by a single bound. In other words, the self-regarding inferiority complex of genius will no longer fare badly in our routinized college: it will not have got in! Yet if we are not to educate our artists, whom under heaven shall we educate? And this simple, two-block division and subdivision of natural endowments, isn't it quite as superstitious as the old two-block notion of insanity? Does inferiority invariably follow, superiority invariably lead? Or are men complicated bundles of inferiorities and superiorities, for whom education should provide the opportunity to discover their proper capacities?

Warden Bell walks in the way of belief. Not that he does not know and accept the material universe portrayed by science. Yet who, he asks, "would live in a world so petty as to be understandable by the human mind?" Well, as the heckler said to Lady Astor, who wouldn't? Having declined to sacrifice to scientific instruction the introspective heritage of the ages, shall we now sacrifice common sense to religious instruction? Especially when we discover its exponent recognizing the same two-block theory of the educable: "it is only the few with brains who justify keeping school." We really keep school, do we not, to discover the few with brains? Whereas Warden Bell would keep school because in it "the thought of the future is being powerfully influenced by the thought of the present." For leadership, that is.

Professor Hart's book is a competent, thorough if repetitious, technical yet humane social criticism of schools past, present, and future. There was a time when education met the needs of the community so closely that the pupil was unconscious of any distinction between schooling and living: his initiation was less a graduation or commencement than a change of pattern in the seamless garment of life. The fundamental trouble with all our present attempts to train the youth for life is that what actually trains for life is living itself. Somehow the schools of the future must "provide those factors of experience which are not already provided by the community," so that education shall be again an integration of living into experience, an interpretation of all of life, instead of a curriculum of historic integrations (the humanities) taught as programs for contemporary living.

I wonder whether this utopianly broad definition has after all accomplished much more than a new name, integration, for an old thing, wisdom—which only fools expect education to communicate. And whether the historic integrations are not perhaps the only important factors of experience not provided by the modern community, as well as the most important things education can present—although that fact in no way justifies their presentation as contemporary programs. The schools, Professor Hart concludes, are themselves helpless, being the political expression of an economic order which prefers arresting development at the 100 per cent American point to producing integrated persons to direct the "community drift." Consequently we lack even educational leadership.

No doubt! Of all the myths of our magic-mindedness this myth of leadership is the most widespread—and (let us be candid) more widespread among liberals than among others. Perhaps no people has ever made such an uncritical din about leaders as the very people who, by the unanimous verdict of these three critics, lack and need them most. Mr. Ayres in his "Holier Than Thou" has, indeed, raised amid the hubbub an almost solo voice to inquire whether leaders really start the waves they ride, but none of these authors has paused to examine the relation between the alleged leader and the led. And if they are unanimous in demanding of education what may be no more than an illusion, that fact betrays their essential unanimity in what must be, for any freedom-loving democracy, an anachronistic hankering after control. The sociologist wants leaders to exorcize superstition. The mystic wants leaders to mysticize the future. The expert wants leaders to meddle with the community drift.

If meddling is not to be the end set education, what is? Well, it seems to me that these critics rather overdo the stressing of ends and the slighting of mere means. Not, of course, that we can do without ends, or ever will. But how much of all that is fine, disinterested, and jolly in the world is a matter of means for their own sake! Indeed, it is almost by definition that a community drifts. There are the myriad ends of its members, and when enough of these lie close together it has a direction. But its one end is continued existence, and its heart beats in the means to that end. The good member will know his own end, appraise his own freedom, and finally by trial and error arrive at his own values. That is what it is to be free. Education should expose him, in the degree of his capacity, to what is thought to be known and, without suppression or distortion by meddlers, to what has been recorded as knowledge.

Professor Hart says children have no thirst for knowledge, but every parent knows that all of them thirst after some of it—and a few seem to thirst after all of it. That is how we discover "the few with brains." Any good school will turn the others out as soon as they are no longer learning their way. At another point he says, rather inconsistently, that the best thing about our bad schools is that curiosity survives their habit of answering questions not asked, which usually means answering at the wrong time. Curiosity suffereth long, but survives. It was ever the beginning of wisdom. And as yet we have no good substitute for unfettered knowledge as a path to wisdom.

CLARENCE BRITTEN

The Poems of Malcolm Cowley

Blue Juniata. By Malcolm Cowley. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

LITERARY generations rise and pass rapidly. To each we allocate as an average lifetime ten or fifteen years. The post-war generation, consequently, is now finishing its course, and critics are already regarding most of the writers whose fame has appeared since 1918 with that mixture of the casual and the respectful which signifies establishment. It would be difficult to find a single book of poems more symptomatic of the experiences of the post-war writers of America than Malcolm Cowley's. In his first collection of verse he has given us a diagram of the sensations and disillusioning conflicts through which the second file of twentieth-century young intellectuals passed. "Blue Juniata" is important not only because it gives us the assembled verse of a new and definitely interesting poet, but because it sets itself up as a self-confessed logbook of literary youth in America during the ten years which followed the war and which came just after the first fruits of our modern literary revival had been harvested. Until a representative of this literary generation produces a book as the sequel to Alfred Kreymborg's record in "Troubadour," this sizable volume will serve as a guidebook to an exciting interval of intellectual and aesthetic adventure.

The poetry in which Mr. Cowley has written this "testament de sa jeunesse" has its ups and downs. It reveals all the variety and unexpectedness of experiment. The inconstancy of its various inspirations is patent on every page. The record of his childhood carries references to Masters (in The Hill Above the Mine), Sandburg (in Blue Juniata), and the other men who first defined those factors in American experience which revealed to younger poets the forces governing their own development. The European episodes are done now in the manner of German movie expressionism, now in the elliptical style of the transition school. The mark of Dos Passos and Lawson is on the later American episodes, while Tumbling Mustard and Memphis Johnny recreate with much commemorative charm the tawdry ballad sentiment of old barn-storming days. But Mr. Cowley is not always writing in reminiscent or satirical mood. He has kept his own voice among the discordant chorus of voices in which the lyric ambitions of so many youthful poets have been drowned. Laurel Mountain and Day Coach are trenchant with a penetrating and original insight. Mediterranean Beach and Two Swans are as clean-cut and alive as anything MacLeish has done, even though they do not depend on his particular devices. The melodies have a lucid beauty which rises out of their cluttered and ruinous impressions, and in one magnificent sonnet, Towers of Song, the volume reaches its climax and gives us one of the finest poems that has been written on New York.

Unlike many poets who at the present moment are being read and quoted with high favor, Mr. Cowley is not devising his tunes with gymnastic agility on a single string. He has obviously submitted to the charms of many influences, and he has managed to go through a period of high excitement in our cultural experience and yet realized a significance in the manifold distractions and vogues that crowded it. He artfully divides his book into six sections, providing them with dates and notes which reveal—along with certain traits of self-consciousness in the poems themselves—a sharp awareness of the characteristic quality of his experiences. A quarter-century of national life is pretty well preserved here: the transition from country to town, war fever, jazz-age, trans-Atlantic wanderlust, rediscovery of the American spirit.

Upon this rich substance we may expect him to draw in his future work. His stature as a poet—observant, alive, and sharply sensitive—is already revealed. He will undoubtedly make use of his equipment by writing somewhat more independently of his generation's peculiar ordeal (not, we hope, by losing his enthusiasm and engaging candor), and so become a poet eloquent and strong enough to succeed our present declining worthies.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Labor and Internationalism

Labor and Internationalism. By Lewis L. Lorwin. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS is one of the most valuable books produced by the Institute of Economics. Dr. Lorwin has put into it immense knowledge and great skill of exposition. Most laborers are still local in their personal attachments. Nationalism means little to them, internationalism less. But in the more advanced industrial nations a common consciousness has been slowly emerging during the past century which has taken shape in various fumbling contacts. Until comparatively recent times this consciousness was little more than a dim ideal in the souls of small groups of men, mostly in the great cities of Western Europe. The councils and congresses of the First International and their political-economic activities were almost negligible as judged from the standpoint of achievement. The close study Dr. Lorwin gives to this period is chiefly serviceable in showing the rifts in the trade unionist, syndicalist, socialist, communist, anarchist contributions to a workers' conscious will to power. The attempts to weld these diverse forces into effective solidarity are described in considerable detail, making the history difficult to follow from its sheer complexity. Splits, adjustments, alliances, "united fronts" are numerous, and Dr. Lorwin's minute studies will chiefly be of use for purposes of consultation by specialists in this historical field.

It is quite otherwise with the latter half of his volume. While still intricate and fluid, the internationalism of labor assumes both a clearer consciousness and a stronger reality. Though the immediate sequel of the Great War was a closer, keener nationalism, with tariff barriers and obstructions to migration of workers, internationalism has been greatly enhanced as a practical goal of world-progress both in politics and economics, while the union of political and industrial movements in this direction has made notable advances. Dr. Lorwin in his later chapters gives exceedingly valuable accounts of the relations between "Amsterdam" and the labor institutions of Geneva, on the one hand, Russian Communism upon the other. His analysis of what is termed Marx-Leninism is an exceedingly fine performance. The general result is to show the enormous difficulties in the way of any common, consistent, energetic cooperation on a world-scale. Even in Britain, trade and local sectionalism usually cripples national solidarity. In the United States close nationalism is fortified by a rooted distrust of European revolutionary notions, and an unwillingness to attempt to utilize the state and its political machinery for economic ends. Race, religion, class, and industrial cleavages of aim and interest in each country still consume so much of the energy of working-class movements that, except for brief emergencies, international cooperation still remains a feeble force for the achievement of a great world society.

J. A. HOBSON

A Boswell to Foch

Foch Speaks. By Major Charles Bugnet. Lincoln MacVeagh. The Dial Press. $3.

MAJOR BUGNET became aide-de-camp to Foch in 1921, after the World War, and remained in that capacity until Foch's death. From the time when his personal association with the Marshal began, he seems to have made himself a kind of Boswell to his chief, extracting from Foch, by discreet questioning or suggestion, whatever Foch was willing to divulge about his military training, his theories of warfare, his opinions about the great war and those who took part in it, and his general philosophy of life. Eventually, if not at first, Foch come to know what was going on, and there is abundant indication that he consciously aided in the undertaking, but he refused to allow any part of what was set down to be published during his lifetime, "to avoid the possible suggestion that it had been dictated."

The material which Major Bugnet offers falls roughly into three parts. The first and longest comprises Foch's remarks about the theory or practice of war and the intellectual or moral principles of life to which he had endeavored to adhere. Such headings as "one must see things as they are," "whatever you do, you must do well, no matter how unimportant it is," "it is not I, but necessity, that commands," "when one knows what one wills, everything becomes easy," "one's value consists only in what one does," indicate pretty well the character of the man. Foch, to use the popular phrase, was as hard as nails. He won his way to supreme command solely by merit. "What distinguished him were his long preparation, his dogged labor, his coolness and his judgment, his 'active tenacity,' his unprejudiced and flexible intelligence, his mastery of himself, his practice of simplification and his wide view of a situation as a whole, the application of method by energy, and, above all, his determination to achieve his aims, which was stronger than all the thousands of wills opposed to his own."

The second part of the book offers a brief sketch of Foch's career previous to the World War, while in the third the author takes him on an imaginary tour of the war area as a device for recording his comments upon campaigns and leaders and his general conclusions about the great struggle. The most interesting parts of this latter section are those in which Foch explains the circumstances which led to his selection for the supreme command, and the references to his intimate friendship with General Weygand. The work of translation, by Russell Green, has been admirably done.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

What Is Socialism? By Jessie Wallace Hughan. Vanguard Press. 50 cents.

We commend this little book to Herbert Hoover and to all others who ought to know what socialism is but don't. Dr. Hughan has summarized in lucid fashion the Socialist case against capitalism and the remedies which the Socialists propose. She defines socialism as "the political movement of the working class which aims to abolish exploitation by means of the collective ownership and democratic management of the basic instruments of production and distribution." Then she proceeds to sketch in detail just how the American Socialist Party would accomplish its purpose, beginning with the revision of the Constitution and ending with the socialization of basic industries. While her treatment is not so brilliant as the Webbs's "Constitution for the Socialist Commonwealth of Great Britain" it should be equally useful for Americans because of its American approach. An interesting chapter is included which sketches the recent history of the Socialist movement in European countries.

Die Kunst des 20. Jahrhunderts. Von Dr. Carl Einstein. Berlin. Propyläen-Verlag. 48 R. M.

This Propyläen-Kunstgeschichte series, to be complete in sixteen volumes of which eleven are now ready, is probably the finest thing of the sort ever published. The first volume contained the pictorial records of prehistoric man. The present volume, covering the quarter-century just past, carries more than four hundred reproductions, of which forty are colored inserts. Dr. Einstein's introduction, which would make a bulky volume in itself, is a praiseworthy effort to make clear even to the lay intelligence the whence, why, and whither of the modern artistic experiments which began with impressionism. Dr. Einstein is extremely cautious in his judgments, and assumes that his function is for the most part only that of a cicerone. An admirable guide he is, and the book will prove uniquely useful.

Mortal Men. By Burnham Carter. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

This book is typical of the pleasant inconsequential entertainment that is offered by the general run of contemporary American novels. Wise, witty, and modern-minded, Mr. Carter's fictional excursus on the sons of the wealthy seldom rises above readability. He manages his characters with professional skill. His attitude is wholesome, constructive, and always intelligent. Through the cultured, if somewhat bored, eyes of Allan Levering the spirit of the plutocrat is reflected. His father, the most detestable person in the novel, is the only one who achieves the dimension of artistic reality. The others are pompous and stiff.

INTERNATIONAL RIVALRIES IN MANCHURIA
By Paul H. Clyde
A timely book on the Manchurian question—a thorough study since the year 1689.

". . . and I must say that I find it the best work on the subject that has yet been done."—George E. Sokolsky, Far Eastern Review.

"The first book which deals with the subject in a scientific manner—narrative, critical, and conclusive in character." — China Weekly Review.

FINLAND
THE REPUBLIC
FARTHEST NORTH
By Eugene Van Cleef
Second Edition Revised
$3.00

"In its sweep of the country and its interpretation of the people the book is a miracle of completeness . . . providing a real story for those who admire the heroic struggle for nationality of a small but vigorous race."—Robert McBride, Editor of Travel.

It is . . . "the result of investigation by scientific methods, and is far more interesting and more satisfactory than the usual superficial travel book."— The New York Times. $2.50

THE OHIO STATE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Columbus, Ohio

A Cultural Vagabondage
Thru
Soviet Russia
with MICHAEL GOLD
via
LONDON · COPENHAGEN · HELSINFORS
and 10 days in LENINGRAD and MOSCOW

To study the new theatres in the Soviet Union—Interviews and talks with Eisenstein, Mayakowsky, Lunacharsky and other noted writers, producers and directors.

SAILING—SEPT. 28—on the S.S. ROTTERDAM $488

Inquire:
175 Fifth Ave.
Flatiron Bldg.
NEW YORK
WORLD TOURISTS INC.
Telephone ALGONQUIN 6656
CHICAGO · MOSCOW · TOKIO

Films

There Are Silent Pictures

THE sense of physical discomfort—the jarring of rasping sounds on one's ear—is still one of the things we have to put up with in witnessing the slow progress of the talking picture. In this respect the silent picture can proudly point to its freedom of anything that "hurts the eyes"—a freedom of not more than ten years' standing, but today absolute and taken for granted. And yet, in spite of this great advantage over the talking picture, it is enough to see a few silent specimens of Hollywood's most ambitious efforts to understand the failure of the silent picture to stem the advancing tide of its noisy rival.

There are on Broadway at present three silent "specials" of Hollywood manufacture: "Four Feathers," "Evangeline," and "The Single Standard." Conventional and stereotyped as they are, they have the quality of their defect—the characteristic Hollywood workmanship which reveals itself in smoothness of action, skilful casting of character parts, and splendid photography. The defect itself, however, is too fundamental to be neutralized or even disguised by its superficial attractions. The standardization of form and the resulting moronization of content rob the Hollywood picture of that flexibility of treatment which is essential to effective dramatic statement. Just at the moment when the situation would seem to call for some striking, directly impressive effect, the Hollywood producer, chained to his conventions, calls in the orchestra and the sound machine and thinks he has done his duty. The three pictures mentioned above are no exception to this rule. Not only do they expound stories which are puerile (the heroics of "Four Feathers" are simply inept) but they fail to produce even the crude thrill of a dramatic climax. "Evangeline," though a little more advanced in its technique, is dramatically the least convincing of the three. "Four Feathers" has a few minor thrills supplied by scenes of wild animal life in Africa; but they are rather artificially connected with the main theme of the story and contribute but very little to its dramatic development. As for "The Single Standard," it is largely Miss Greta Garbo—take it or leave it. For our part we are inclined to leave it.

But Hollywood does not hold a monopoly on cinematic ineffectiveness as we are reminded by frequent foreign importations which find refuge in the so-called little cinema theaters. There is "Nana," for instance, which, we are informed, was "produced in France by Jean Renoir, son of the distinguished French impressionist painter, with the cooperation of members of Emile Zola's family." Shades of Renoir père and Emile Zola! Are they to be held responsible for this talentless concoction undistinguished by a single cinematic quality and marred by terrible overacting in the part of Nana, who is made not merely vulgar, as well she should be, but singularly unattractive to boot?

As a specimen of the cinematic sterility of English producers there was recently "The Constant Nymph"—acclaimed as a masterpiece in England but more accurately described as a Hollywood average of ten years ago—insensitive, flat, and amateurish. It was a relief after this to see "Piccadilly," another picture made in England though directed by A. E. Dupont, the famous German director of "Variety." Here was genuine workmanship and unmistakable sense of cinematic values. Dupont's tempo is sometimes too slow, he lingers too fondly over details of small dramatic significance, but he does produce a flow of images which merge imperceptibly into one another—a dynamic quality best illustrated in Eisenstein's "Potemkin"—

DODSWORTH
Sinclair Lewis $2.50

THE MAGIC ISLAND
William B. Seabrook $3.50

MIDDLETOWN
R. S. and H. M. Lynd $5.00

THE MODERN TEMPER
Joseph Wood Krutch $2.50

SLAVES OF THE GODS
Katherine Mayo $2.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

CAIN, or The Future of Crime
By G. Godwin

WHAT lay behind the recent prison riots? What is wrong with our system of punishment? Four escape from Dannemora—prisoners riot and burn Clinton storehouse—Leavenworth in uproar. Find out why the "eye for an eye" theory has never worked; find out the only cure that will work. A new and stimulating addition to the Today and Tomorrow series of deepest significance to every man and woman interested in human society. $1.00

THE BOY PROPHET
By Edmond Fleg

WHEN Claude Levy is five years old, a priest glances at him and murmurs, "What a pity." "Is it a pity to be a Jew?" he asks himself. Here is a book of bitter truths, of beauty, of inner struggle, written with disarming frankness. $2.00

SHORT STORIES OUT OF SOVIET RUSSIA
Compiled and translated by John Cournos

SIXTEEN dramatically interesting short stories of life in the new Russia, by twelve of the new revolutionary writers. $2.50 and he does convey the sense of cinematic unity and balance. Unfortunately the cheap "mystery" ending of the story utterly spoils the dramatic movement of the film, coming almost as an anti-climax. The acting in "Piccadilly" is also above the average English standard, particularly that of King Ho-Chang, who plays "Jim," and of Anna May Wong, impersonating the Chinese dancer.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., Inc.

Of other current silent pictures "The Fight for Matterhorn," at the Little Carnegie Playhouse, deserves notice for striking photography and interesting natural scenery. Its drama does not come to much, but at any rate it is unobjectionable.

The most interesting silent picture, however, that has reached Broadway for some time is "In Old Siberia," at the Cameo. It is a strange film with many obvious faults. The contrast between the brutal tyrannies of prison officials toward their prisoners and the petty diversions of these prison officials against the background of provincial society—an excellent idea in itself—somehow is never translated into dramatic unity; the two themes remain separate. The characters are exaggeratedly grotesque types and their make-up is frequently crude. But in spite of these deficiencies, "In Old Siberia" is a fresh and stimulating picture. It has remarkable atmospheric effects secured with a moving camera (considerably cut, apparently, in the present version) and it shows originality in dramatic treatment. As the first work of a young director, Reisman, it is distinctly promising.

It is rather curious that the defects and qualities of this film should be completely reversed in another remarkable Russian picture not previously noticed here. "The Village of Sin" is the work of a young woman director, Preobrazhenskaya. Compared with Reisman's picture, it shows a rather conventional choice of characters, but unlike the other it succeeds in welding its material into a dramatic unity by means of a treatment which has the quality of sober and somewhat detached factuality, resembling the natural flow of the modern vèrs libre. "The Village of Sin" is also distinguished by the remarkable pictorial beauty of some of its scenes, notably of a wind-swept wheat-field.

This occasion is as good as any for referring to a film which, though shown a few months ago, is still eagerly discussed among the movie enthusiasts. There is no denying the fact that "The Passion of Joan of Arc," directed by Carl Dreier and produced in France, is a picture of outstanding originality. Dreier's emphasis on the facial expressions of his characters, who are shown mostly in monumentally sculpturesque close-ups, represents a technique which is decidedly fresh and unconventional, as is his use of the camera, which is made to follow the characters as if it were the eyes of a seated spectator watching the trial. Thus the whole drama is unfolded before us as if we were actually present in the court. The result of this peculiar use of the camera can hardly be described as cinematically, as well as dramatically, successful. The restricted camera movement retards the action and gives the picture a decided static quality. The method of conveying dramatic development by means of changes in facial expression lends further emphasis to this static quality. Thus, instead of finding an adequate cinematic form in which to show the mental tortures of Joan and the reactions of her prosecutors, Dreier has reduced the drama of the situation to rather obvious facial mimics illustrating the dialogue titles which are thus made to bear the whole burden of dramatic movement. Clearly, the picture should have been made as a talkie. Dreier deserves, however, all credit for his extraordinary photography and must be complimented on the daring with which he has flouted the Holywood formulas. Few producers seem to have the courage and originality to do so.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Starting this Saturday, Aug. 17
FIRST SHOWING IN AMERICA

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 WEST 8th STREET, Bet. 5th and 6th Aves.
Continuous—Noon to Midnight. Spring 5090-5095
Last 3 Days—Wed., Thurs., Fri., Aug. 14-15-16
"At the South Pole" and "6½ x 11"

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

★ ★ SOON SEPTEMBER ★ ★

and if you, a landlord, have an apartment or house to lease, this is the time to tell those readers of The Nation who are house-or-apartment-hunting, what you have to offer.

We have a folder of letters, unsolicited testimony, of the results gotten from advertising in The Nation (comparative results—better in The Nation than in leading newspapers).

Rates on request

THE NATION
Advertising Department
20 VESEY STREET, N. Y. FITZROY 9074

International Relations Section

Reparations: The Young and Dawes Plans

By WILLIAM MacDONALD

THE controversy which has developed in the international conference at The Hague over the so-called Young plan of reparations settlement makes opportune a summary review of the reparations issue, and in particular a comparison of the provisions of the Young plan and those of the Dawes plan which it would supersede.

Until the Young plan was drawn up, no agreement had been reached by representatives of the Allied Powers and Germany regarding the total amount of reparations which Germany should pay. The treaty of Versailles directed the Reparations Commission to accept from Germany, in acknowledgment of Germany's obligations and as security for their discharge, three issues of bonds: one of 20,000,000,000 gold marks, payable without interest not later than May, 1921; a second of 40,000,000,000 gold marks, bearing interest at 2½ per cent from 1921 to 1926, and thereafter at 5 per cent, and a third of 40,000,000,000 gold marks to be issued whenever the Commission was satisfied that the interest and sinking-fund payments could be met. Further issues might also be provided for, in the discretion of the Commission, in accordance with the amount of damages to be made good and the ability of Germany to pay.

In April, 1921, the Commission made public what is known as the London schedule, providing for the issuance, subject to interest and sinking-fund requirements, of 12,000,000,000 gold marks of "A" bonds, 38,000,000,000 gold marks of "B" bonds, and 82,000,000,000 gold marks of "C" bonds; the "C" bonds, however, to be issued only when the Commission should be satisfied that the interest and sinking-fund requirements could be met. Annual payments of 2,000,000,000 gold marks, together with 26 per cent of the value of German exports, were required. It was not the intention of the Commission that the three bond issues should represent the total of reparations to be exacted from Germany, but there is still a general impression that the total had been fixed at 132,000,000,000 gold marks.

In the meantime the Allies, at the Spa conference in July, 1920, had agreed that France should receive 52 per cent of the receipts from reparations, Great Britain 22 per cent, Italy 10 per cent, Belgium 8 per cent, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Rumania together 6½ per cent, and Portugal and Japan each ¾ of one per cent. The total of 132,000,000,000 gold marks set out in the London schedule was promptly rejected by Germany as impossible, and was generally so regarded elsewhere, but a voluminous exchange of notes among the governments concerned failed to bring agreement upon any other figure.

On November 30, 1923, the Reparations Commission decided to appoint two commissions of experts, one to consider the means of balancing the German budget and stabilizing the currency, the other to consider "the means of estimating the amount of exported capital and of bringing it back to Germany." The underlying purpose of the inquiries was to enable the Commission to gauge the resources of Germany and its capacity to pay. The outcome of the deliberations of these commissions was the Dawes report, submitted to the Reparations Commission on April 9, 1924, accepted by all the interested governments at the London Conference on August 16, and put into effect on September 1.

The Dawes plan did not undertake to determine the total of reparations that Germany should pay, and expressly avoided any consideration of political interests or factors. Instead, the Commission confined itself to estimating, on the basis of a detailed study of the German economic situation, the maximum annuities that Germany could fairly be expected to pay over a series of years, indicating the sources of revenue from which the annuities should be drawn, drafting plans for stabilizing the currency and balancing the budget, and providing an organization for the administration of the plan.

Under the Dawes plan, three sources of revenue were levied upon for the payment of reparations. The ordinary budget, supplied from the usual sources of taxation, was to furnish after the first year (1924-25) various sums, the contribution from this source in the fifth or normal year (1928-29) being fixed at 1,250,000,000 gold marks. This amount was regarded as a "standard payment," to be increased in subsequent years in accordance with an "index of prosperity" which the plan provided. The German railways were to be reorganized and 11,000,000,000 gold marks of first-mortgage railway bonds were to be issued for reparations purposes, the interest, which was fixed at 5 per cent with one per cent for amortization, rising from 330,000,000 gold marks in 1924-25 to 660,000,000 gold marks in 1927-28 and thereafter. A transport tax of 290,000,000 gold marks, partly for reparations and partly for the German government, was to be paid after 1925-26. The third source of revenue was industrial debentures, to be issued to the amount of 5,000,000,000 gold marks, and bearing interest in the fourth and subsequent years to the amount of 300,000,000 gold marks. To aid in stabilizing the currency and balancing the budget, a foreign loan of $200,000,000, to become available in the first year of the plan, was also provided.

The total annual payments under the Dawes plan began with 1,000,000,000 gold marks in the first year, rose to 2,500,000,000 gold marks in the fifth or normal year, and were to continue at that figure, plus a supplement computed on the index of prosperity, indefinitely thereafter. A transfer committee to supervise the transfer of payments from Germany to the creditor countries, a trustee for railway and industrial bonds, commissioners for the railways, for the reorganized bank, and for the "controlled revenues" specially pledged as collateral security for budget contributions and other payments, and an agent for reparation payments in general charge of the operation of the plan, were also created.

The fifth or normal year of the Dawes plan will end next September. In the five years that have elapsed since the plan was put into operation, the payments called for have been fully and punctually met by Germany, and the machinery of the plan has, in general, worked smoothly. On the other hand, the insistence of the German Government that the maximum annuity of 2,500,000,000 gold marks was greater than Germany could continue to pay, together with resentment at the prospect of paying that sum or any other for an indefinite number of years while the aggregate amount of the annuities remained undetermined, turned the attention of the creditor governments increasingly towards the necessity of re-examining the Dawes plan and agreeing with Germany upon a reparations total.

On September 16, 1928, accordingly, the British, French, Belgian, Italian, German, and Japanese Governments agreed at Geneva to intrust to "a committee of independent financial experts" the "task of drawing up proposals for complete and final settlement of the reparation problem," the proposals to include "settlement of the obligations resulting from existing treaties and agreements between Germany and the creditor Powers." The committee as finally constituted consisted of fourteen members (a delegate and an alternate from each country), the representatives of Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, and Japan being appointed by the Reparations Commission on the nomination of their respective governments, those of Germany by the German Government, and those of the United States by the Reparations Commission and the German Government jointly. The committee met at Paris on February 11, 1929, and chose the American delegate, Owen D. Young, a member of the former Dawes committee, as chairman. The committee completed its labors on June 7.

The Young plan bears something of the same resemblance to the Dawes plan that the Constitution of the United States bears to the older Articles of Confederation. The Dawes plan has been, in a sense, revised, but the revision embodies new principles and important changes in details. The cardinal feature of the Young plan is the replacement of the administrative and controlling machinery of the Dawes plan by a Bank for International Settlements, with powers so comprehensive as to make it not merely an elaborately organized agency for handling reparations, but also, in its potential operations at least, a super-bank. In addition to the usual banking functions (except, apparently, that of doing business with private depositors), and those connected with the receipt, accounting, and transfer of reparation payments, the management of bond issues for the commercialization of a part of the payments, and similar matters, the expectation of the experts' committee is that "in the natural course of development" the bank "will, in time, become an organization not simply or even predominantly concerned with the handling of reparations, but also with furnishing to the world of international commerce and finance important facilities hitherto lacking." To this end the bank, whose directors are to be designated by the central banks of issue of the countries represented on the committee, or by other banks if the central banks cannot or do not act, is authorized to buy and sell gold, conduct intermediate credit operations "in the interest of world trade to the extent that the directors of the bank approve," and be prepared, in so far as the transfer of reparation payments into foreign currencies involves either a restriction of imports or an extension of the German export trade, "to promote the increase of world trade by financing projects, particularly in undeveloped countries, which might otherwise not be attempted through the ordinary existing channels."

The Young plan calls for the payment by Germany, for the thirty-seven years ending March 31, 1966, of annuities aggregating 79,483,300,000 marks. The lowest annuity after March 31, 1930, is 1,685,000,000 marks; the highest and last is 2,428,800,000 marks; the average, inclusive of the service of the Dawes loan, is 2,050,800,000 marks, or 449,200,000 marks less than the present "normal" annuity under the Dawes plan. After 1966, and for the twenty-two years ending March 31, 1988, the annuities correspond to the Allied outpayments on their war debts to the United States, the aggregate of these annuities being 34,422,100,000 marks. The grand total of the annuities is 113,905,400,000 marks, representing an estimated "present value," computing interest at 5½ per cent, of 36,996,000,000 marks.

Of the annuities for the first thirty-seven years, 660,000,000 marks are to be paid unconditionally, without the privilege of postponement, and of this amount 500,000,000 marks is allocated, under certain conditions, to France. The unconditional payments, accordingly, represent the part of the annuities that may be "mobilized" or commercialized by the issuance of bonds. The unconditional part of the annuities is to be secured by a tax on the German railways of 660,000,000 marks, the balance of payments being derived from the German budget. With the approval of an advisory committee of the Bank for International Settlements, payment of the conditional annuities may be postponed for not exceeding two years. The annuities of the last twenty-two years are to be met from a sinking fund created by allocating to the fund 80 per cent of the profits of the bank. In a special memorandum attached to the report, but not forming a part of it, the experts of "the four chief creditor countries and of Germany" recommend an agreement by which, in case the war-debt requirements are reduced, two-thirds of the relief shall be credited to Germany and one-third to the creditor countries.

Deliveries in kind are to continue for ten years, but with a progressive reduction from 750,000,000 marks in the first year to 300,000,000 marks in the tenth, the committee having recognized "the necessity for maintaining a transitional period so that all shock to existing economic conditions in Germany should be avoided." The proceeds of reparation recovery acts, under which special duties have been imposed upon imports from Germany, or of any systems that have been substituted for the acts by agreement with Germany, are to be reckoned as deliveries in kind.

Upon the approval and inauguration of the Young plan the machinery of the Dawes plan will cease to operate. The "index of prosperity" will disappear, the duties of the Reparations Commission, the Agent for Reparation Payments, and all other foreign officials engaged in administering the Dawes plan will end, and all foreign control of the economic life of Germany will be withdrawn. The committee recommend that a general liquidation of all financial questions raised by the war be undertaken by the creditor governments and Germany "in a broad spirit of mutual concession," that no further seizure, retention, or liquidation of German property be made, and that the creditor Powers "abstain from recovering the credits of Germany against her former allies referred to in Article 261 of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany for her part renouncing any net balance which might be due to her as a result of these credits."

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28, 1929 No. 3347

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 207

EDITORIALS:

Posts and Profits 210
Unionism in Filmland 211
Book-Conscious 211
Power Poison 212

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 213
JUSTICE AND CHIVALRY IN CAROLINA. By Paul Porter 214
NEW YORK'S JIMMIE. By Craig F. Thompson 216
FOREST DEVASTATION MUST STOP. By Robert Marshall 218
GENEVA. By Ivy Litvinov 219
SUMMER SCHOOL IS OVER. By A Schoolma'am 220
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 222
CORRESPONDENCE 223
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 224

BOOKS:

Testament. By Witter Bynner 225
Karnak. By Harold Lewis Cook 225
Follies of Middle Age. By Clifton P. Fadiman 225
Ousâma Ibn Mounkidh. By R. F. Dibble 226
An Honest Record. By Oswald Garrison Villard 226
A Dutch Pacifist. By Raymond Leslie Buell 227
Music in America. By Blanche Bloch 227
Popular Morals. By Eliseo Vivas 228
Doleful Matters Merrily Set Down. By A. Paul J. Dessauer 229
Italo-Vatican Agreement. By Hiram Motherwell 230
Farm Counsels of Perfection. By Nelson Antrim Crawford 230
Fiction Briefs 231

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Gomez Still Rules. By Anita Brenner 232
Natives and the Land. By John H. Harris 232

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

WITH THE REASSEMBLING of the Senate and the publication of the rates of the tariff bill as made over by the Republican majority of the Senate Committee on Finance, the fight enters a new phase. The Senate will take three-day recesses until September 4, when the bill is expected to be laid formally before it. Friends of the measure are reported to be in no too hopeful frame of mind. The action of the Senate committee in boosting the effective rate on sugar from the 1.76 cents of the present law to 2.20 cents has satisfied nobody, even though the rate is less extreme than that carried by the House bill. In addition to the usual dissatisfaction with particular schedules and a rather unusual amount of objection from foreign countries, there is bitter hostility to the proposed administrative provisions, which would make of a protectionist President a little high-tariff czar. What the protectionists fear is a combination of Democrats and progressive Republicans against the measure, and Mark Sullivan in a dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune says that the bill is gravitating downward and backward toward a mostly agricultural measure. It is agreed that there will be a long fight on the Senate floor and that the special session is likely to run over into the regular one in December. An active and determined minority could probably defeat the measure in anything like its present form, but the Democrats hunger for loaves and fishes for their constituents no less than the Republicans. Senator Trammell of Florida, for example, has agreed to support the whole bill if Florida products get protection. And Senator Fletcher is reported to be practically in the same boat. It is an old story. Meanwhile the Senate leaders are anxious not to have their program upset by extraneous matters like the Vare case, which Senator King threatens to bring forward.

TARIFF MAKING took a delightful turn recently when the Senate Committee on Finance put manganese ores on the free list. The Fordney-McCumber Act carried a duty of a cent a pound on the manganese content of such ores, provided they contained at least 30 per cent manganese. The House bill let this duty stand, and the Republicans of the Senate committee decided, 7 to 4, to extend this rate even to lean ores containing but 10 per cent of manganese, thus making a slight concession to our producers, who had asked for a rate of a cent and a half a pound because they were being injured by the cheap labor of Russia. On a Monday the Russian Government announced that the United States Steel Corporation had signed a contract with the Georgian manganese trust to buy from 80,000 to 150,000 tons of manganese annually for five years. On Wednesday the Republicans of the committee put manganese ore on the free list. On Thursday, according to a dispatch to the New York World, Senator Bingham, one of the committee acrobats, said he had changed his vote because the White House advised it. How we all do love American labor, and with what tender care we protect it! Manganese ores ought to be free—so ought some 1,557 other items in the bill, but we doubt whether many of them will have the good luck of manganese.

REFUSING TO SURRENDER our extraterritorial rights in China, the Administration has returned to the sweeping demands of the ill-fated Extraterritoriality Commission of 1926, which asked China to revise her judicial practice before the Powers gave up their privileged position. In spite of China's troubled state we think that Secretary Stimson's flat refusal of Nanking's request to abolish extraterritoriality was unjustified. Surely a little compromise and negotiation would result in a plan for the protection of Americans in China without extraterritorial rights. Nanking would be delighted to make protective concessions to us; it is the principle of the thing that concerns Chinese pride most. If the Nationalists carry out their threat to abolish extraterritoriality on January 1 regardless of the Powers, we shall be forced to accept with bad grace an action which could be brought about with more good-will and more satisfaction to our interests by voluntary cooperation. It should be said in behalf of Secretary Stimson's refusal that the Nanking Government has done little in recent months to justify the faith of its friends or the belief that its powers should be extended.

One by one many of its best leaders have dropped away, leaving Chiang Kai-shek and his military coterie in complete control. T. V. Soong, discouraged, resigned as Finance Minister but was persuaded to return to his post for a time. Hu Shih, leading intellectual of the Nationalist movement, is attacking Chiang Kai-shek for jailing his political opponents. All things considered, these are dark days for the idealists who sought to build a new China through the Kuomintang.

THE CHINESE MILITARY SITUATION is undoubtedly grave, notwithstanding the reported insistence of the Nationalist Government that the mobilization of troops in Manchuria is not an act of war but only a proper and necessary measure of national defense. Diplomatically, of course, it makes a difference whether war has or has not been formally proclaimed, but airplane reconnoisances, Russian forays across the border, skirmishes on land and light bombardments by sea, and the movement of troops in large numbers are the inflammable stuff of which war is made. In notifying the signatories of the Briand-Kellogg anti-war pact, as the Chinese Minister at Washington was reported on August 16 to have been directed to do, that Russia had invaded Chinese territory in Manchuria, the Nationalist Government merely followed precedent in trying to put the blame on the other side, and its appeal to the world is one which the other Powers will probably scrutinize with care. C. T. Wang, the Nationalist Foreign Minister, issued a statement on August 19 which suggested that he was still chasing the communist bogey. "The Government is compelled to take a firm stand," he said, "lest communism again play havoc in China." The peril of the situation, as we see it, is not that China may fall a prey to communism, but that the factional disorders of its government and a restless ambition to test its strength may provoke Russian retaliation on a larger scale.

ONE PIECE OF GOOD NEWS has come from The Hague in the announcement on August 19 that British troops will begin evacuating the Rhineland on September 1. For this the whole world as well as Germany ought to be grateful. Progress with the Young plan has been less gratifying. Mr. Snowden, after serving notice on the representatives of the other principal Powers that the British ultimatum still stood, and that proposed compromises under which Great Britain would have received smaller sums than it demanded were not acceptable, nevertheless agreed that a special committee of experts should examine the suggestions to see just how they would work. It is already clear, however, that the Young plan, with whatever modifications it may be approved, cannot go into effect on September 1, when the fifth or normal year of the Dawes plan expires. The British objections to the Bank for International Settlements, which Mr. Snowden has declared are weighty, have not yet been brought forward in detail, and the committee of organization which is to arrange for putting the bank and the rest of the plan in operation has not yet been appointed. Under the best of conditions, accordingly, the new scheme can hardly be set going until well into the autumn. The intimations that Germany will refuse to go on with the Dawes plan in case the Young plan fails are not to be taken too seriously. It is more probable that Germany will continue to make regular payments on reparations account, as it has been doing for the past five years, but on the reduced scale of the Young plan instead of the more burdensome scale of the Dawes plan.

A DISPATCH from Washington gives notice that the Union of South Africa is expected soon to announce the establishment of a legation in our capital and the appointment as its minister of Eric H. Louw, who has served the Union as trade commissioner both in New York and in London. In following the lead of Canada, which in 1926 established independent representation by sending Vincent Massey to Washington as its first minister, the Union of South Africa takes another step in that interesting process of devolution by which the self-governing British Dominions are gradually taking over increasing control of their foreign relations. It is doubtful whether any foreign office in the modern world ever faced just the problem that Downing Street continually has to solve, that of directing the foreign policy of an empire whose constituent members have the power to control so largely their own affairs. The situation appears almost as anomalous in constitutional theory as it looks unworkable in actual practice. Yet life has a strange way of doing impossible things. Not only does the arrangement seem to work, but the empire thrives under it, and Canada today is in some ways more British than Great Britain. At the same time, India, held in a regular and constitutionally respectable way by armed force, holds a sword of Damocles forever suspended over the empire. Can it be, after all, that voluntary choice is a stronger cement of empire than the force of arms? As far as the British commonwealth of nations really deserves its title, it seems to be teaching us new and useful lessons concerning the relations that should subsist among independent states.

OUR READERS ALREADY KNOW something of the attempt of Josephine Roche to introduce more humane and at the same time more business-like conditions in the mining industry of Colorado through the recognition of union labor, and friendly cooperation with it, in the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company. They will be glad, therefore, to learn of the progress made during the first six months of this year as set forth in a report to the Industrial Commission of the State by the president and general manager of the company, M. D. Vincent. Mr. Vincent says:

> Our sales tonnage increased 16 per cent over the first half of last year. The tonnage production shows an increase of 1.02 tons per man per day for the first six months of this year over the first six months of 1928. This represents an 18 per cent increase in production per man per day. In computing this increased production per man per day we included all outside and inside men.
>
> The men employed in and around the mines of the Rocky Mountain Fuel Company, including outside and inside men, received an average wage of $7.95 per day during the first quarter of 1929. While the wage contract increased the earnings of the men, as we desired it should, it has not resulted in increased production costs because of the cooperation and increased efficiency which have characterized the new relationship.
>
> The effective working of the contract is further shown by the fact that the pit committees and mine superintendents are satisfactorily settling complaints. Only two cases in eleven months have been appealed from the decisions of the pit committees and superintendents.

In the face of the bitter warfare in other mines of Colorado, and the nationally demoralized condition of the coal industry, this report is indeed encouraging.

FREIGHT DELIVERY by combined railroad and truck in the New York metropolitan area received a setback, although perhaps only a temporary one, in a recent decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission declaring itself without authority to approve the method by which such deliveries have been made by the New York Central and other railway companies. The decision, flanked as it is with concurring and dissenting opinions, is complicated, but the gist of it is that while the purpose of the railway companies in arranging for the delivery of freight from terminals to the doors of consignees was laudable, the plan that had been followed ran counter to the interstate commerce law because it discriminated among shippers and consignees and between different parts of the area served. In other words, truck delivery is a good thing and should be encouraged, but the service must be equitable and, apparently, universal. As far as the law of the matter goes the commission, which is a highly technical body, is doubtless right, but the decision does not settle the question. An investigation would probably show that New York City is not alone in the inordinately high charges which are made for truck delivery of freight, and from that burden commerce ought to be relieved. Door delivery and collection, on the other hand, are natural and proper developments of the use of motor trucks, and if the railways, which are ready to add trucks to their equipment, cannot devise a way of doing so without violating the interstate commerce acts, the acts ought to be shorn of their antiquity and receive the benefit of modern dress.

WORLDWIDE PROTECTION for intellectual property, irrespective of the country in which the property has been created, is not yet recognized by the United States, but it may be if the United States will join the International Copyright Union by July 1, 1931. At the present time, thanks to an absurd protective policy for which organized labor has been largely responsible, books by foreign authors, if they are written in English, must have the type set in this country and the other processes of manufacture carried out here if the book is to enjoy the privilege of American copyright. The illustrations also, if they happen to be lithographs or photo-engravings, must be reproduced by "a process wholly performed within the limits of the United States." As long as the American copyright continues, no copies of the foreign edition may be imported except single copies "for individual use and not for sale," or copies brought in for the use of certain societies, colleges, libraries, or similar institutions. This is a veritable tax on knowledge as well as an obstacle to its spread, unjust to authors, artists, and all producers of intellectual work, useless as a protection to American writers and scholars, and a negation of the international comity of which one hears so much nowadays. Thorvald Solberg, Register of Copyrights in the Library of Congress, who has long labored faithfully to bring about the adherence of the United States to the Copyright Union, has set forth the facts of the situation convincingly in one of the essays that were offered to Dr. Herbert Putnam last April on the thirtieth anniversary of his appointment as Librarian of Congress. Mr. Solberg's plea should be actively and earnestly supported by everybody in this country who cares for intellectual things.

OUR NEWSPAPERS are subjected to criticism for the inadequacy and inaccuracy of their foreign news. We are glad, therefore, to record the impressions of Otto H. Kahn, who said the other day, on returning after four months in Europe:

> I am glad to be back and have American newspapers again. I find that, when I leave America for Europe, I am better posted on what is happening in Europe than I am after I get there and have to depend on the European press. The diversity, accuracy, and multiplicity of the European items in the American papers, when you compare them with the European papers, is amazing. It is a real fact that I am better posted on European affairs by reading the newspapers in America than by going to Europe.

Without question there has been in recent years a distinct improvement in both the amount and the quality of the foreign news carried in both newspapers and magazines. When The Nation established its International Relations Section in 1918 there was practically no publication of important foreign documents in this country; now they are printed by a dozen different periodicals. If anything striking is happening in almost any part of the world, the careful reader is able to get a fairly good notion of it by following any one of a number of our best dailies. To be sure, our press has not yet attained to the breadth of knowledge shown by the best British newspapers in their interpretation of such events, and it is not always the most significant happenings that are are reported at greatest length. Yet the distinct gain that has been made is deserving of note.

ACCORDING TO an Associated Press report, the Department of Agriculture has enlisted the aid of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company in its war on the Mediterranean fruit fly. It occurred to some of the bright entomologists of the department that the larvae of this pestiferous creature must make some noise when they ate, and that by listening in on citrus fruits before shipment it might be possible to tell whether or not they were infected. So the telephone company's experimental laboratory was called in and devised an instrument, which is described as "a conglomeration of batteries, microphones, vacuum tube amplifiers, wires, and telephone receivers," for listening to the pesky beasts. In a subsequent test it is reported that "noisy" grapefruit were found to harbor the undesirable inhabitants while "silent" ones were discovered to be free of the pests. This may be scientifically all right, but we object to it on at least three grounds. Morally, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's decision in the prohibition case, we object to wire-tapping, even on a Mediterranean fruit fly. Religiously, we do not want the music of the spheres interfered with. Aesthetically, what we want is an instrument not to make it possible for us to hear more, but, on the other hand, to enable us not to hear most of the sounds that reach us now, especially the voice of Senator Smoot defending the new tariff bill, sweetened though it may be with the best beet sugar in Utah.

Posts and Profits

THE newspapers have been making something of a furore over the discovery that the deficit of the Post Office Department for the year ending with last June is estimated at $137,000,000. This is not the highest loss in its history. The peak was reached in 1921 when the loss for operating the postal service was recorded as $157,000,000, though we do not recall that the fact occasioned any stir in the press.

The high loss that year was attributed to special reasons—increased rates to the railways and higher pay for postal employees. Last year, also, the unusual deficit was partly due to a special cause, as the sum included $42,000,000 paid to railroads in back claims. But subtracting this from the total operating loss still leaves $95,000,000, which is more than three times as much as the deficit has been running in recent years. In 1927, for instance, it was $27,000,000 and in 1928 it was $32,000,000.

Just the same it is unlikely that the newspapers would have had anything to say about the postal deficit if Mr. Hoover had not stamped it as first-page news by making an issue of it. Doubtless Mr. Hoover's passion for efficiency is one reason for his expressed wish that the system as a whole shall pay its way. But it is hardly the only reason. We imagine there is some politics in the concern which the President has suddenly developed over postal losses, and there has been a great deal of propaganda in the way the newspapers have handled the situation. The Democrats are agitating for a cut in federal taxes. Mr. Hoover, probably wisely, isn't keen about it, and the unusual deficit in the Post Office Department—with a prospect of continuance—is a good argument for his position. Besides, Mr. Hoover is no friend of government operation of industry, and perhaps he is not displeased to throw a stone at what has long been considered our most important success in that field. Certainly a large number of newspapers have been only too eager to indulge in a general fusillade upon the postal system in response to Mr. Hoover's initiative. Not that they expect or want to upset federal operation of our posts, but any unfavorable happenings in the service make good propaganda against the demand that the government keep in its hands the development of water-power in the United States, particularly its manufacture and distribution at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam.

The first thing we want to say in answer to those who are suddenly so concerned about the deficit of the Post Office is that nobody should start with the assumption, as Mr. Hoover seems to have done, that the service ought to pay its way. Whether any specific government service ought to pay its way, or be carried partly or wholly by taxation, is a question to be decided in each case by the social value and character of the work performed. One of the great advantages of government control lies precisely there. By common consent public education in the United States is financed almost wholly through taxation rather than by assessments against the particular persons who make use of it. The same is true of the upkeep of the lighthouse service and the Coast Guard, the work of the departments of Agriculture and Commerce. Nor have we ever heard it insisted that the army and navy should earn enough to be self-supporting.

We do not believe that the Post Office was expected to pay its way when it was organized in this country. That eventually it came to do so, even with low postal rates, is a testimonial to its generally efficient administration. For about twenty years, however, it has been operating at something of a loss, due probably to the rapid expansion of the second-class and the parcel-post services and the introduction of the air mail. Officials of the Post Office Department apparently do not know exactly where or how last year's unusual deficit occurred. Certain newspapers have been quick to assume that a chief cause was higher salaries and allowances to employees, but as no major changes in this direction have been made since 1925 the argument seems a little tenuous. In any event, postal employees are still generally undercompensated rather than overpaid, and there would be instant condemnation of any attempt to reduce postal expenses through trimming the earnings of employees.

Mr. Hoover is certainly right in his demand for a system of accounting which will show in detail where and how the postal system is running behind. It will then be time to consider the kind of work performed by each service that is losing money and to decide whether it ought to be self-supporting or maintained in part out of other postal revenues or through taxation. It happens that the first-class mail—probably the most democratically used and socially useful function of the Post Office, and hence the one most surely entitled to be maintained by taxation—is believed to be amply self-supporting. The air mail is admittedly losing money, but Mr. Hoover is said to feel that as it is still in an experimental stage it ought not to be compelled to pay its way. We think there was more in this argument a few years ago than today. It was justifiable once for the Post Office to subsidize flying, but aviation has now become a commercial enterprise. Users of the air mail today could and should pay more nearly the cost of such transportation. The parcel post, introduced especially to benefit farmers, is losing money too, but an upward revision of rates there is more questionable. The greatest and least justifiable postal loss—said to be $90,000,000 a year—arises from the low second-class rates granted to newspapers and magazines. This was originally justified on the ground that such periodicals served the cause of public education and were not primarily commercial enterprises. We should hesitate to deny an educational aura to them still, but nine out of ten are now as frankly commercial as any drug store or power plant. Every time in recent years that an attempt has been made to make periodicals pay higher rates a powerful protest from them has defeated it.

We should like to have President Hoover attack this problem courageously and to see a few of the newspapers and magazines sufficiently fair-minded to support him.

Unionism in Filmland

THE Actors' Equity Association called off its ten weeks' strike to unionize the Hollywood movie studios on August 17. In announcing that Equity members might return to work, Frank Gillmore, the organization's head, laid the chief blame for the failure of his effort upon Ethel Barrymore, a member of the committee which carried on negotiations with the producers. Miss Barrymore contended that the producers had offered as much as was obtainable when they agreed to allow their workers to join Equity if they chose, although refusing to employ only members of the association. Her argument to that effect weakened the morale of the strikers, Mr. Gillmore said, and compelled him to abandon the strike for the present, but he promises another attempt at unionization later, when he hopes to have more support from organized labor.

The actors began by asking for a completely closed shop. No member of Equity was to sign any new contract except a standard one and no member was to form part of a cast containing any players who refused to join the organization. A little later, however, a compromise similar to that accepted by theatrical producers in 1919 was offered, and Equity expressed itself willing to enter into an arrangement which would permit 20 per cent each of the principals, small-part actors, and extras in any cast to be non-union. This proposal also was definitely rejected, and the producers would agree to nothing beyond a vague recognition of the right of Equity members to remain such. They offered no specific objections to any of the terms in the standard contract but simply refused to give up their privilege of hiring actors under whatever terms they can make the latter accept. And there for the moment the matter rests. Equity has gained many new members but it has, on the other hand, been compelled to suspend others—some quite prominent in their profession—who have signed contracts offered them either because they were distinguished enough to get all they wanted for themselves or obscure enough to feel the weight of economic pressure.

The motion-picture industry is almost completely dominated by a few powerful organizations. It has almost unlimited resources, and the supply of minor actors is so much greater than the demand that unionization is extremely difficult. But no one familiar with the abuses which Equity reformed when it established itself in the field of the legitimate stage can doubt for a moment that it ought eventually to win its motion-picture fight. None but the oldest and most threadbare arguments are used against it. Actors are again urged not to put themselves in the class with bricklayers and plumbers, and the Los Angeles Times expresses editorially its fear that their organization threatens the "industrial freedom of the greatest open-shop city in America." But "industrial freedom" in the motion-picture industry means about the same thing that it meant in the old days of the theatrical business, when needy actors could be rehearsed three or four weeks without pay and then dismissed because they were "not the type." Specifically it means, for example, that a minor actor can be hired at so much "for the part" and then held indefinitely for rehearsals and re-takes.

Equity will certainly win some day, but it is impossible to predict when. Obviously the obscurer players are not strong enough to fight their battle alone because the majority of them can easily be replaced, and, since open-shop conditions prevail in the technical departments of most studios, there is considerable doubt as to the effectiveness of a sympathetic strike of electricians and scene shifters, even if one should be called. Hence the real hope for victory rests largely upon the loyalty of the more successful and distinguished actors. The producers cannot get along without them, and if they will unite to demand for their humbler fellows the fair play which they can get without difficulty for themselves, then they can speedily obtain it.

This is exactly what they did when Equity won its definitive and lasting triumph in New York. The stars had comparatively little to gain and, temporarily at least, quite a little to lose. Yet they not only joined Equity but steadfastly refused to work in casts not at least 80 per cent unionized, with the result that they have been, for some years now, in a position to insist upon decent treatment for everybody. Unfortunately, however, the motion-picture world is newer, looser, and more extravagant. There must be at least ten times as many people to deal with as there were in New York, and the gap between the floating "extra" and the pampered favorite is wider than it was between the humblest professional of the old school and the greatest star.

Book-Conscious

THE publishers, the book clubs, and the booksellers, like the Chinese and the Russians, have been holding conferences, and while they are almost as secretive as the Orientals, some hints of their compromise proposals have leaked out.

The booksellers had complained that the book clubs were stealing their business, which is probably true, and that these vast organizations, buying books by the scores of thousands, had forced the publishers to grant them bigger discounts than were given the lowly bookstores—which is indubitably true. The ordinary bookstore gets a 30 to 40 per cent discount from the retail price of a book, while the Book-of-the-Month Club gets a reduction of 70 per cent. Futhermore, the publishers and the public alike complained that the book-club choices tended to concentrate attention upon a few books which might be excellent but certainly were not so much better than others as the difference in sales would indicate. As a result of these differences we had the much-advertised "book war" of last spring.

Now, apparently, everybody is to be made happy, including the public, which is to be made not only happy but cultured. The booksellers are to get an increased discount on books chosen by the book clubs, and part of this discount, together with a contribution from the book clubs, is to be set aside as a general fund for the promotion of book-buying in general. America, which has been made a two-car country, halitosis-conscious, apple-conscious, and sun-tan-conscious, is to be made book-conscious as well.

It is, indeed, about time that the mercantile genius of this nation of salesmen be turned to the problem of marketing books. It is a little startling to find so orthodox a publication as the World's Work informing its readers that in this land where every miner's son expects to go through high school, and every carpenter's daughter to college, only a third as many new titles were published last year as in Russia, only a third as many as in Germany, half as many as in Japan, and fewer than in either France or Great Britain. Apart from textbooks, we are informed, Americans last year bought on an average somewhat less than one book each.

Everyone familiar with the publishing business knows how hazardous a trade it is, and how much it depends upon the unpredictable success of some single title that "catches on" and, selling into the hundred thousands, carries the rest of a long list of books most of which may have a sale of fewer than 5,000 copies each. Our publishers have never discovered the Continental secret of persuading the public to buy books in quantities, to buy cheap editions at the railroad newsstands and throw them away at the end of the journey, to buy and buy and buy. Perhaps a publishers' advertising campaign might teach Americans to hesitate as little about buying a book as they do about buying a box of candy or a compact. But one of the obvious reasons why Americans buy so few books is that their magazines and newspapers feed them so much more heavily than European journals do. There, it seems to us, may lie one solution of the book and the book-club problem. The book clubs will have to teach us to regard books as we do magazines, and to do that they will have to make them as cheap. Therein lies the special interest of the newer book clubs—the Book League of America, and the Paper Books which Charles Boni is about to issue, one a month at no more than the cost of a magazine. In the long run, it seems to us, the book clubs will have to become more and more like the magazines. Instead of suggesting that they select the best books each month, they will have to create for themselves editorial reputations—to become as definitely distinguishable in character as, say the Atlantic Monthly and the American Mercury, the Saturday Evening Post, The Nation, and the Literary Digest.

Power Poison

THE opinion of Charles A. Russell, solicitor for the Federal Power Commission, instructing Chief Accountant William D. King to eliminate $500,000 from the proposed capital account of the Cumberland Electric Company, an Insull subsidiary, will, if sustained by the courts, represent an important victory for the government in the struggle with the power companies. Four Insull companies are involved. The particular one concerned, in applying for a license, asked permission to include in its capitalization $250,000 to be paid for alleged services and rights of two of the other companies, and $250,000 which it intended to donate to the State of Kentucky for a state park if the company got its license. In disallowing these items, Solicitor Russell points out that the four companies were acting essentially as one, and he declines to let them pad their capitalization by juggling accounts. At most, not more than $40,000 should be charged for the rights and services involved, he declares, and that amount only if proved. After considering the Water Power Act of 1920 and the legal decisions, he holds that "here is specific direction to the Federal Power Commission to insert in the capital account the actual legitimate cost of construction limited to the actual amount of money paid therefor." Of course this is what Congress intended and what everybody except financial highbinders wants. If the courts, as it seems not unreasonable to hope, will only sustain this principle and not wander off into the cloud of valuation fog in which they have enveloped the railroads, we may get a solid basis for regulation of power companies operating under federal license. The important public service of Messrs. Russell and King should not go unrecognized. Let us watch sharply to see what the power trust will do to them.

What it will try to do is easy enough to guess. At the end of July there fell into the hands of the Washington correspondents a confidential memorandum on "The Federal Water Power Act and Its Administration, a Summary with Suggestions." This memorandum was given large publicity in the columns of the Baltimore Sun, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and the Scripps-Howard press, but as far as we have noted was not handled elsewhere. According to that sterling correspondent, Drew Pearson, the report was prepared for circulation among the "higher ups" of the power industry, the text indicating that someone in the National Electric Light Association was responsible. It has been denied in behalf of that association that the document originated with it or represents its views, but officials of the Federal Power Commission meet the latter denial by showing from the records of the Commission that the lighting organization has previously expressed views identical with those outlined in the memorandum.

According to the document itself it was prepared in order to bring about "solidarity of action. . . by the entire electric power companies." It gets down to business by criticizing the appointment of Mr. King as chief accountant, objecting to his inducing the commission to introduce the Interstate Commerce Commission's system of accounting and depreciation requirements, which will prevent the companies from getting back more than the actual depreciated value of their plants at the end of the fifty-year license period; finding fault because the commission has got larger appropriations and so can make its accounting work more effective; and, finally, suggesting that that work be transferred from the commission's staff to the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture. "If this committee is successful in presenting this argument to the Secretaries who form the commission, and further direct enlargement of the accounting staff is prevented, it is believed that these departments will not have men specially trained for this work, at least they will be removed from the direct supervision of Mr. King." We have some respect for highway robbers, but men responsible for such suggestions seem fit to associate only with Harry F. Sinclair, Edward L. Doheny, and Albert B. Fall. The memorandum suggests that Mr. Merrill, the executive secretary of the Power Commission, "may be persuaded to accept some other more lucrative and less trying position . . . and it is hoped that discreet representations can be made to the Secretary Commissioners" concerning his successor. Since that time Mr. Merrill has resigned to become secretary of the American Committee of the World Power Conference, financed by the American electrical industry, and has been succeeded by Frank Bonner, his former assistant. Meanwhile Horatius King still stands guard at the bridge. Will the power trust somehow manage to get him? Wait and see.

find ourselves in the throes of a timber famine, terrible in direct proportion to the amount of our forest land which lies idle and devastated. The situation will be analogous to that which would obtain if we left our grain lands idle. In that event there would of course be a disastrous frumentary famine. But there would be this notable alleviation to the situation regarding unproductive grain lands: in the following year they could be replanted, and a full crop might be harvested within a few months. But in the raising of forest crops it will generally take a hundred years from the time we make up our minds that our lands should cease to be unproductive to the time when we can mature timber upon them.

That we actually are leaving a shockingly large share of our lands in such an unproductive condition is strikingly brought out by Major Ahern. He quotes the familiar United States Forest Service estimate that 81,000,000 acres out of 470,000,000 acres of potential forest land in the United States are completely devoid of any arboreal vegetation. A great share of the 251,000,000 acres of second growth is bearing only a small fraction of the amount of wood it could support. As a result we are removing 25,000,000,000 cubic feet of wood from our forests annually, while it is calculated that only 6,000,000,000 cubic feet are being returned in growth. Major Ahern amplifies these general statistics with some forty-eight pages devoted to fairly selected quotations from Federal, State, and private reports, and the bulk of them bear out emphatically the claim that a large share of the logged lands are restocking inadequately or not at all.

Then what's to be done about it? Sit by hopefully and pray that cooperation may bring better times? Or go militantly forward to procure those better times by compulsion? It is the latter course which Gifford Pinchot and Major Ahern propose.

In regard to the disappearance of the virgin stands all remedies are nugatory. We can only reserve a certain share of the remaining primeval forest for recreational purposes, and make up our minds that from a commercial standpoint the ancient woods will soon be a thing of the past.

In regard to the fire situation four steps seem essential. First, vastly increased expenditures are imperative in order to establish an adequate protective force. Second, there should be coercive regulation of private cutting operations to allay fire danger. This is already done by several States, such as Idaho, which obliges all operators to pile and burn logging slash, and New York, which stipulates that the branches on the tops of cut coniferous trees must be lopped. Third, there is still need of educating a large share of our match-using public concerning the dangerous and evil aspect of the gift of Prometheus. And fourth, further research into the factors affecting the initiation, spread, and control of fires is required.

But the most critical of the three problems is how to obtain satisfactory forests to replace the ones which are being cut at the rate of from 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 acres per year. There is no question that such new forests can be obtained. The United States Forest Service has given ample demonstration that it can cut forests and at the same time leave the land productive. A number of private concerns have done the same. But this result cannot be accomplished without effort. Forestry requires scientists to learn the underlying rules of nature which may be responsible for either devastation or regeneration of the forest; artists to take these rules and apply them in the actual conditions of the woods; and special labor to carry out the more complicated methods of cutting which are usually required to insure the reproduction of the forest.

All this means money, and money means a loss of profits. That is the crux of the whole situation. Cutting the forest for the future public welfare implies in almost all cases a sacrifice of present private profits. And the number of private operators who are willing to sacrifice their own immediate profits for the benefit of their unborn great-great-grandchildren runs to very few figures. There is only one way that the average lumberman under these circumstances can be made to respect what is unquestionably the public welfare, and that way is through government compulsion.

In this connection Gifford Pinchot has said: "Major Ahern's success in forest conservation in the Philippines was built on government control of lumbering. That is and always has been the foundation of such success throughout the world. And throughout the world the right of the government to exercise such control in the public interest is recognized. Without it forest devastation has never been stopped anywhere. Without it forest devastation cannot be stopped in the United States."

Somehow we must have timber fifty and a hundred years from now. We can have it, as has been repeatedly demonstrated on government cuttings. But unfortunately 80 per cent of our timber is in private ownership. And here, despite twenty-five years of excuses and promises, little forestry of any sort is being practised. The period for voluntary private forestry is over. The government must step in and compel the private timber owner to leave the forest which he exploits in a productive condition. If the operator protests that economic conditions make this impossible, then his lands should be taken over by the government, which can and does practise forestry.

Geneva

By IVY LITVINOV

IT is a pity that a little gray town on a blue lake should produce brown associations such as protocol-ratification-arbitration - safeguarding - moral - disarmament, and the rest of the bag of tricks. It is the old game of making jam horrid by associations of gray powders. A philosopher might claim that the opposite is true, and that the sight of gray powder in later years may call up the delicious scent of raspberry jam. Thus women infallibly remember the penny-worth-of-pear-drops-please, in a screw of paper, when they employ "liquid polish" upon their finger-nails, or if they do not they have never been little girls. . . . What then, about tear-bombs, which undeniably smell of tinned pears, you may ask, and the philosopher would have no answer. . . . And yet the law of compensation does work sometimes, for while the newspaper reader's reaction to the word "Geneva" may be "League of Nations"—mine to "League of Nations" will ever be a white sail watched from under the branches of a cedar tree, seen through a plate-glass window . . . and my glance has only to fall upon the long brown cover of the minutes-of-fourth-session-of-preparatory-commission-for-disarmament-conference-and-of-first-session-of-committee-on-arbitration-and-security-series-V-c-667-M-225-1927-IX, wherever I may be, and I am transported to those asphalt shores, where the sea-gulls range themselves like strings of pearls up and down the moorings of the steamers that rest all winter beside the promenade. They seem to know that the people in the hotel opposite like to look through the window at them, and though you are most unchivalrously requested, by an officious note in the lift, not to feed them, they kindly overlook the meanness, or else hope springs eternal in their soft gray breasts.

I am the worst tourist in the world, or I think so. At any rate I hate being led up to beauty-spots, and ten to one if I am I shall remember all the wrong things, from the orthodox point of view. Thus my only memory of Bozen is a wonderful dish of blue trout at the Laurien, eaten under the stars in a leafy garden, and the old shoemaker in Ober-Bolzen who so skilfully stuck a wrenched heel on to my shoe, while I waited, and charged me something that could scarcely be computed in farthings; and there is a renowned cathedral town in France of which my only distinct memory is something much, much worse than the pea which disturbed the slumbers of the real princess. And is not Chamonix forever associated in my mind with wistful memories of the "English Tea-Rooms," past which they dragged me, all unwilling, to go and see a glacier, although ice cream in a glass seemed infinitely more beautiful to me just then.

Pursuit—whether of beauty or anything else—is seldom successful, since most things worth pursuing are more swift than we. Perhaps that is why the modest charms of Geneva are so indelibly engraved upon my unconsciousness, and ever ready to flash upon the inward eye, that truest bliss of solitude, not, it is true, as on my couch I lie in vacant or in pensive mood, but whenever I see a newspaper headline about disarmament or read Senator Borah's opinion of the League of Nations. If Wordsworth had gone out specially to admire the daffodils, be sure we should never have had the poem. He didn't; he went out to get an appetite for dinner, or perhaps to walk off the effects of dinner, and "all at once" he saw a crowd, a host of golden daffodils. And that was something to write home about. And so if you go to a place to work, and are so busy all the time that you can hardly snatch a few hours to look at it, you may find when you get home that it is yours forever. It has told you all its secrets, because you did not try to force its confidence.

Almost all my walks abroad in Geneva have been made of necessity, and not just for pleasure, or to kill time. Often I could only leave the hotel late in the evening, to buy a cake of soap, or a tube of tooth-paste, and then it is that I have seen the tired but ever-affable shop-keeper, sitting out on a chair in front of his half-open shop, to enjoy the evening air and serve the chance customer. I have returned through discreet back streets, with pots of geraniums between the half-drawn curtains on the window-sills, and closed shop-fronts, where elastic-sided boots and carpet slippers will hang out in bunches tomorrow, and "Würsterei" where sausages still hang in fronds from a steel bar, or lie in neat coils on their frigid slab. And the little streets, with their humble dwellings, their rather one-horse hairdressers' shops, their shabby couturières and modistes, are as discreet and inviolate as if they didn't know perfectly well that they rubbed shoulders (or at any rate backsides) with the Hotel les Bergues, the Beau-Rivage, the Bellevue, and the rest of the notabilities, and as if every one of them didn't lead straight into a blaze of lights and hotel-fronts and asphalt paths, and orthodox Swiss "scenery," complete with Mont Blanc. Even the tall brown flats rising mysteriously aloof at odd corners are too discreet to boast of their nearness to all this splendor. They are reserved and decently prosperous, just as the little houses are reserved and decently penurious. And a step round any corner you like to take will bring you past the side of a garage, the back of a hotel, into the smug luxury of the Quai des Bergues. If you have the right-colored ticket, you may find your way to a long room, all windows, full of sober-looking gentlemen. It is very quiet and reassuring here, for it is quite obvious that nothing of any sort is going to happen. But the day I was there a tactless person got up and suggested that all these gentlemen should vote for immediate disarmament. A little bird on the tall cedar outside one of the windows fell from its branch as if it had been shot. It had been listening in at peace conferences for years and was not used to such wild talk.

Summer School Is Over

By A SCHOOLMA'AM

HAVING received the command from our superintendent, as usual, that we must attend summer school—"to get in touch with the latest developments in the field of education"—thousands of us flocked to the State universities this year, as usual, and enrolled in the school of education, where we are privileged annually to watch those developments spring full-armed from the Jovian minds of the professors of education and their disciples, the school administrators.

We are given a problem to investigate: the purpose of education in a democracy. "Scholarship is no longer the primary purpose of the public school," the lecturer informs us; and recalling our year's duties of supervising vaudeville shows and other "extra-curricular activities," we understand.

The textbook, written by another professor of education, supports our instructor:

> The best judgment of the present rates practical ability somewhat higher, and culture of the semi-selfish sort somewhat lower than has been the case in the past.

Just who these profound philosophers of the present may be whose judgment the professor rates as the best, he does not tell us, but scholarship and culture being taboo, we duly register our scorn for them in our report, and turn to the recognized purposes of education. First there is Character Building. Here is a whole book, "Golden Deeds in Character Building," written by a superintendent of schools to show how it is done in his town:

> In all their reading, in the study of history, in current events, in literature, and in their contact with life, the children are encouraged to treasure in their minds the good deeds and noble impulses which they may discover and tell them to their companions during the daily period devoted to this exercise. In a word, the children of ——— are continually on the lookout for deeds which illustrate neatness, politeness, gentleness, kindness, love, truthfulness, duty, fidelity, obedience, nobility, gratitude, forgiveness, honesty, confession, self-control, honor, courage, modesty, self-respect, prudence, good name, manners, health, success, labor, temperance, thrift, reverence, patriotism, and other desirable qualities.

* * *

They not only search for good deeds in their reading and among their associates, but they get their parents to assist them. Many parents have told me that they have themselves been helped and strengthened by assisting their children in this laudable search for the true, the beautiful, and the good. And teachers, too, have been made stronger, they inform me, by continually dwelling upon the good actions that are daily reported in their classrooms.

This is very encouraging to the superintendent, and he makes further suggestions:

It would be an excellent plan for every family to keep a Golden Deeds Book, and for each member of it, when at table or around the fireside, to report all the good and worthy things that they have seen, heard, or read about during the day. . . . When the neighborhood learned that such books were in existence, it might walk more circumspectly and grow an ambition to have some of its good deeds enrolled in the book.

The superintendent's book is so rich in observation that we are tempted to linger over it. He even traces the cause of the World War:

Learning without character is a vain and noxious thing. The great underlying cause of the world conflagration which Germany started, and the horrible deeds which her soldiers committed on sea and on land were largely the fruit of her highly efficient system of education. But though efficient, it was grossly material. . . . Juvenile books contained no subtle moral lesson that should influence youth to goodness and gentility.

The superintendent reveals what may be done for juvenile literature by writing verses for each of the virtues that the children are especially to cherish, in which the moral lesson is as subtly concealed as in the following:

POLITENESS

Above all else I'll be polite
And kind and never give a slight
To any person who may be
In station not quite up to me.
In fact, I'll be to everyone
Polite and kind like Jefferson.

TRUTHFULNESS

And I shall not prevaricate
Nor anything exaggerate
But speak the truth in all I say
And form that habit every day.
This habit when in youth begun
Will help me grow like Washington.

The superintendent's work, we fear, will live beyond him many a year.

Then there is Education for Democracy. "Are we practicing the democracy we preach?" ask the writers in the educational journals to which we are referred; "No. We have abolished the aristocracy of birth, but we still retain an aristocracy of intellect." Away with it. The schools must be "democratized." The subjects must be "democratized." Even the English language must be "democratized," as the head of a normal-school department of English tells us in urbanely hyphenated accents:

Do you know why English teachers are failing to teach English that gets across and carries over into life, that acts as a cementing and solidifying element in our democracy? It is partly because they teach and preach impossible ideals of a pure-bred and blue-blooded language, of a high-brow and "hifalutin" speech, patrician English, nasty-nice, top-lofty, schoolroom English. If we are to be common-minded, we must have a common speech—and that will never be the speech of scholars and pedants and prunes-and-prism-y rhetoricians. It must be a robust and vigorous American speech, full of snap and sparkle, of warmth and color, close to life, rooted in the soil. The reason the classical idea—in English or any other subject—is undemocratic is because it is a class idea.

Assuredly, with culture democracy can have nothing to do.

Well, the schools have been democratized. When the town bully and his gang rebel against studying, the high-school principal gives orders to the teachers: "Give easier lessons. The democratic school is for the many, not for the few." When the same bully finds English composition irksome, the principal issues another order: "More students will use English in talking than in writing. Teach Oral English. Teaching composition is undemocratic." Thus we follow the primrose path of democracy.

The really up-to-date school, we learn at last, is devoted to Education for Citizenship. Good citizenship—which no one defines—can be attained only through preliminary practice in good school citizenship. And does good school citizenship consist in doing one's daily duty? It does not. It means taking part in the "socialized activities" of the school, such as playing on the football team or in the jazz orchestra, distributing posters for the coming game, arranging decorations for the dance, or ordering tally cards for the school bridge party—in short, any of the things a reluctant schoolboy would rather do than study his lessons. "Scholarship is no longer the primary purpose of the public school."

That good citizenship might conceivably consist first of all in doing one's own work well, and second in bringing informed judgment to bear upon public questions, the good professors of education cannot agree for a moment. Some disagreeable realist might inquire just how much faith we shall be able to place in our lawyers, or physicians, or teachers, or engineers in the future if during their training they are told: "Scholarship is no longer the primary purpose of your school work." But that caustic comment we know better than to put into our report.

There are other equally evangelical purposes of education: Education for Leadership, Education for the Abundant Life, Education for Social Efficiency—education for everything except education. Every well-meaning superintendent of schools or professor of education with a utopian dream of his own sees in the schools the means of making it come true, and the subjects in the schools he controls must be made to conform to it.

"We are not justified in teaching anything for its own sake," says the author of a textbook on "Education for Citizenship."

> Art, history, economics, and Latin have no claims of their own upon the time of the pupil. They are valued only as they forward the educational purpose.

According to the same authority:

> Music might properly be classed with the social sciences, inasmuch as the teaching aims should be chiefly social and civic. . . . When children are allowed to choose records, it is noticeable that they often turn to patriotic selections.

So much for music. And for history, not more—or less:

> The history teacher [this from a committee of superintendents reporting through an educational journal] can, through suggestion and question, elicit the moral significance of each historical event in furthering the progress of the world.

A supervisor of social studies is quoted in a Western educational journal as follows:

> Many of the literary selections taught in the high schools are in certain parts contrary to the ideals that the school is trying to teach, as for example the tragedies of Shakespeare. Shakespeare pictures the indecisive and morbid Hamlet, the ambitious and bloody Macbeth, the impractical Brutus; and always in the background hovers the shadow of uncertainty, of fear, of conflict with unmasterful forces. He points out that the wages of sin is death, and depicts vividly and beautifully a study in failure. We hold that the wages of righteousness is life and are trying to teach a philosophy of success.

The writer therefore recommends a study of "our current environment"; for "the personal achievement of today is more vivid than the wildest flights of yesterday's imagination."

* * * * *

Summer school is over.

Was it not Goethe who once remarked, "Nothing is so terrible as active ignorance"?

In the Driftway

AMERICA needs more sleep. It is a need even more insistent than that for a good five-cent cigar, which Ex-Vice-President Marshall once said was the supreme requirement of the country. Everywhere the Drifter goes he encounters sleepy people. At times he is even slightly somnolent himself. It is argued in certain quarters that the apparently increasing prevalence of sleepiness among Americans is due to the noise and hurry of modern existence, which use up one's energies rapidly. Doubtless there is reason in the theory, but the Drifter is old-fashioned enough to believe that the primary cause of sleepiness among Americans is lack of sufficient sleep.

* * * * *

OF course the immediate retort to the Drifter's campaign for more sleep is, Try and get it. Obviously there is no hope of increasing the amount of sleeping we do at night. There is too much else to do then. What with dancing and bridge, theaters and movies, the automobile, the radio, the phonograph, necking, and other diversions, we cannot encroach any further upon the hours of the night for sleep. Time then is too precious. What the Drifter advocates is more sleep by day, when there is practically nothing else to do but work. The Drifter has no hope of introducing the siesta—that excellent custom of a regular snooze at midday—into America, but he would have every office equipped with a couch upon which the tired business man might lie down for forty winks from time to time. In fact the Drifter would provide not only for the tired business man but for all his weary slaves. Our building and factory laws should not stop with requirements for fire escapes and wash rooms; they should provide that bunks be erected around every wall, in the manner of a ship's forecastle, into which the heavy-eyed worker, who no longer has time to sleep by night, might crawl for a nap. The Drifter advocates this not as a humanitarian measure but purely in the interest of efficiency. How much better to sleep half an hour and then work energetically for the next three or four than to dissipate the energy of a whole afternoon in a fight to keep one's eyelids apart! Americans are urged nowadays to relax. But for Pete's sake where? We need a nation-wide chain of relaxing stations.

* * * * *

THE Drifter thinks there is a future in this country for hotels that charge by the hour instead of by the day. Of course he anticipates the ribald grin with which this suggestion will be received. No, he is not thinking of that kind of patronage, so stop your laughing. He is thinking of workers who would be as glad to pay for half an hour's nap at noontime as for a lunch; of commuters and others who must go from work to evening engagements and would like the chance of a bath and a snooze at something less than the cost of a hotel room for twenty-four hours. The Drifter has even conceived a plan for sleeping booths, operated automatically like those now used for telephones. Railway stations and other public places might provide booths where by dropping a quarter or fifty cents in a slot a shelf would pop out, upon which one could curl oneself for a rest. A time meter would make it possible to pay in advance for just the amount of sleep that a patron wished to take, registered by quarter hours instead of by quarter miles as distance is registered in a taxicab. When the allotted period was up a little bell would tinkle for two minutes, at the end of which time the shelf would drop down and, if he had not already removed himself, the sleeper would be dumped on the floor from a sufficient height to render him almost instantly alert and probably a little hot under the collar, which is a good antidote for somnolence. Of course a cold bath might be provided into which to drop, but this would be impractical without undressing, and the Drifter's scheme does not contemplate either time or room for that process.

* * * * *

ARCHIBALD CRAIG of Jersey City writes in regard to the Drifter's remarks on steamboats in the issue of August 14:

> Twice I have seen, and both times, I believe, by you, the statement hazarded that the Betsy Ann is a side-wheeler. Allow me to assure you that the Betsy Ann, like all Ohio River boats that I remember seeing, is a sterna sense be said to be voluntary, though of course determined by a complex of definable causes. Yet the book goes beyond its own thesis in many respects, and is of interest, if for nothing else, for its radical and malicious treatment of contemporary folkways. Mr. Ayres's method is not that of the scholar. He does not prove his assertions; he rivets them with an epigram or tacks them on with an epithet, but so effectively that his words do break bones. Smart he is, and sharp, but not superficial. His aim is large, his concern philosophic, and his subject matter not the transient stupidities of the Americana but something which is a permanent phenomenon of the human animal in a social group.

ELISEO VIVAS

Doleful Matters Merrily Set Down

A Pepsyan Garland; Black-letter Ballads of the Years 1595-1639, chiefly from the Collection of Samuel Pepys. Edited by Hyder E. Rollins. The Macmillan Company. $8.

The Pack of Autolycus, or Strange and Terrible News of Ghosts, Apparitions, Monstrous Births, Showers of Wheat, Judgements of God, and Other Prodigious and Fearful Happenings, as Told in the Broadside Ballads of the Years 1624-1693. Edited by Hyder Edward Rollins. Harvard University Press. $5.

THESE are capital books. Mr. Ripley's "Believe It or Not" could scarcely furnish forth a hundred-odd stranger occurrences than are here recorded in the quaint terminology—and sometimes extraordinarily misplaced piety—of the Broadside Ballads. Here the reader will discover a faithful account of the poor lady who bore as many children as there are days in the year—182 boys, 182 girls, and one hermaphrodite—and all at one burden! As the ballad-maker remarks:

> The Lord we see his blessings sends > to many women poore,
> As well as to the noble sort,
> that have aboundant store.

Here also are accounts of the Maid Who Would Give Ten Shillings for a Kiss, of the Damnable Practices of Three Lancashire Witches, of the Monster in Kent, of the Admirable Stomach of Nicholas Wood, of the Prophetic Fish, and of the Italian who had a brother growing out of his side, concerning whom an old pamphlet—quoted in Professor Rollins's notes—remarks:

> I will onely remember unto you a very handsome young man, late (if not now) in Towne, whose picture hath bin publickely set out to the common view, and himselfe to bee seene for money; who from one of his sides hath a twin brother growing, which was borne with him, and living still; though having sence and feeling, yet destitute of understanding: whence me thinkes a disputable question might arise, whether as they have distinct lives, so they are possessed of two soules; or have but one imparted betwixt them both: but of this let the Philosophers, or rather the Divines, argue and Define, bein, I must ingeniously confesse, an Argument much above my element.

Although he has drawn upon the Rawlinson and Douce Collections, and has reprinted five ballads from the Ewing Collection, Professor Rollins has reprinted most of his excellent selections from Pepys and Anthony Wood, edited the whole with scrupulous scholarship and much sly humor, and reproduced the curious wood-cuts which originally adorned them. Of the two collections "The Pepsyan Garland" is the more Important Additions to the

MODERN LIBRARY

at 95¢ a copy

The Red and the Black
By Stendhal 157

Humphrey Clinker
By Tobias Smollett 159

Four Famous Greek Plays
The Medea of Euripides
The Oedipus Rex of Sophocles
The Frogs of Aristophanes
The Agammemnon of Aeschylus
Edited by Prof. Paul Landis 158

Other Modern Library books

The Brothers Karamazov
By Dostoyevsky 151

The Death of the Gods
By Merejkowski 153

An Outline of Abnormal Psychology
Ed. by Gardner Murphy 152

Swann's Way
By Marcel Proust 59

Every new book added to the Modern Library series deserves a place in your library. Attractively bound, carefully printed, each volume complete and unabridged, Modern Library books represent the best literature of the past and of the present.

Send for a new descriptive catalog

To YOUR BOOKSELLER or THE MODERN LIBRARY, INC.
20 East 57th Street, New York N

Please mail me MODERN LIBRARY books

Nos. _____

☐ I enclose $1.00 for each vol. (95c for the book, 5c for postage)
☐ Send books C. O. D.
☐ Please send me free of charge your descriptive catalog.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

general (the word "garland," by the way, at one time regularly meant a collection of ballads) and therefore is perhaps to be recommended to readers making their first acquaintance with the Broadside Ballad literature. On the other hand "The Pack of Autolycus", containing as it does only the strangest and most wonderful relations, may have a greater appeal for contemporary sophisticates.

A. Paul J. Dessauer

Italo-Vatican Agreement

Pope or Mussolini. By John Hearley. With a Foreword by Gaetano Salvemini. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

MR. HEARLEY, newspaper correspondent in Italy during the war and later assistant to Ambassador Thomas Nelson Page in Rome, has written the first book to be published on the recent Italo-Vatican agreement. It is no documented study of the terms of the dispute and its settlement, and of the detailed effect which it may be expected to have on Italian society but frankly a denunciation. The writer temperamentally fears that the union of two autocracies can only produce bigger and wider autocracy. And he adduces all the evidence which he can derive from his knowledge of the Italian situation, or from documents readily available, to prove that the fruits will be evil.

But his ardor betrays him. Most of the points of his indictment are not sustained either by his text or by the known conditions surrounding the Treaty and the Concordat. There is no "union" between church and state in Italy. Canon law has not been made the civil law of Italy (although Italy has informally agreed to do what it can to avert conflict between the two in their separate realms). Civil marriage is not forbidden. Non-Catholic worship is not hampered, nor is Catholic religious education forced upon non-Catholic children. Nor is there going to be any legal difficulty here in America over the fact that cardinals of American citizenship will help elect the ruler of a "foreign state," or over the fact that such a cardinal might some day become such a ruler.

The truth is that the Treaty and Concordat do not change much of anything in present-day Italy. The profound changes which may conceivably flow from the new relationship in the future will be the result of a long historic process. Mr. Hearley is not able, within the scheme of his book, to discuss in detail the potentialities of the new situation.

He writes in a tart manner, aiming many a winged and barbed word at the Vatican and the clergy. He gives lively character sketches of the two protagonists. But his phraseology is usually too fervid to convey precise information.

Hiram Motherwell

Farm Counsels of Perfection

What the Farmer Needs. By Isaac Lippincott. D. Appleton and Company. $2.

IT would seem as if we had had almost enough plans for solving the farm problem, particularly since we have not tried any of them to any conspicuous extent, but just a short time ago Professors Mead and Ostrolenk came along, in "Harvey Baum," with the suggestion that the federal government train the young people on the farms for useful life in town. Now another professor, Dr. Isaac Lippincott of Washington University, St. Louis, attempts to analyze the causes of agricultural difficulty and to prescribe remedies. He does not believe that lack of good marketing facilities is the main thing wrong with farming. On the contrary, he holds that the difficulties are chiefly with production—in short, these: (1) The great differences in cost of production from farm to farm and from farmers to farmers; (2) inability of many farmers to make effective improvements in technique, organization, and management; (3) differences in experience among farmers; (4) lack of diversified income to absorb the shock of dull times; (5) failure to develop agricultural by-product industries; (6) inequalities of distribution in technical and managerial progress over the farming population. All of these points are sound enough, though I am convinced that agricultural marketing difficulties are more important than Dr. Lippincott holds.

Dr. Lippincott's remedy for the difficulties that he discusses is equally sound. It involves the adoption of the financial and production policies of progressive manufacturers, such as the building up of a reserve to stand the shock of dull times, the diversification of products, and the use of waste materials. Also he advocates dissemination of information among the less-favored farmers.

Obviously, the professor's scheme is fine. Under it the farmers ought—in most years, at least—to be cats in catnip. Unfortunately, he omits to tell precisely how his plan is to be put into effect. What is needed is somebody to persuade the six and a quarter million individualistic farmers to adopt it. In fact, right there is the crux of most plans for farm relief. They do not consider the human element, and any one who knows farmers knows that the human element is the biggest element of all. I wish that somebody would write a book not telling what farm relief ought to be, but explaining how to put it into operation. Until that date, which I fear is still a few years off, such works as "What the Farmer Needs" will be counsels of perfection.

Nelson Antrim Crawford

A Cultural Vagabondage

Thru

Soviet Russia

with MICHAEL GOLD

via

LONDON · COPENHAGEN · HELSINFORS

and 10 days in LENINGRAD and MOSCOW

To study the new theatres in the Soviet Union—Interviews and talks with Eisenstein, Mayakowsky, Lunacharsky and other noted writers, producers and directors.

SAILING, MIDNIGHT, SEPT. 27, on S. S. ROTTERDAM $488

Inquire:

175 Fifth Ave. Flatiron Bldg. NEW YORK

WORLD TOURISTS INC.

Telephone ALGONQUIN 6656

CHICAGO · MOSCOW · TOKIO

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1929 No. 3348

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 235
EDITORIALS:
- Smash It! 238
- Sanity and Sex 239
- First Steps in Farm Aid 239
- New Saws for Old 240

IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 241
RUM RUNNING ON THE DETROIT RIVER. By Morrow Mayo 242
AND NOW THE FRUIT FLY. By Henry S. Villard 244
CLEVELAND'S CITY MANAGER SURVIVES. By Louis Browdy .. 246
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 248
CORRESPONDENCE 249
BOOKS AND VAUDEVILLE:
- Abandoned Mill: New Bedford. By James Rorty 250
- Repulse. By Marie de L. Welch 250
- Spying Out the Land. By Henry Raymond Mussey 250
- Citizens Grown and Made. By William MacDonald 252
- The Biggest Ranch in America. By J. Frank Dobie 254
- Personalities and Platitudes. By J. Dana Tasker 254
- Hunger Strike. By Norah Meade 256
- Coal and Oil. By Charles H. Behre, Jr. 256
- Travel Briefs 256
- Vaudeville: Vaudeville Prestige. By Alexander Bakshy 258

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- Life and Property in the Caribbean—I. Protection of Life. By Jonathan Wickwire 259

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 260

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE SPLENDID FLIGHT of the Graf Zeppelin across the Pacific, following the equally successful passage of the nearly 7,000 miles lying between Germany and Japan, brings a thrill even to us blasé moderns, jaded with a long succession of scientific wonders. The German airship averaged about sixty-six miles an hour from Friedrichshafen to Tokio and a little less than that on her 5,000 mile run from Japan to Los Angeles. In spite of unfavorable weather, the speed across the Pacific would have been better than that across Russia and Siberia had it not been for a delay of some five hours at Los Angeles waiting for dawn in order to make a landing. Even as it was, the Graf Zeppelin took less than a third of the time required by the fastest transpacific liners for the shorter course between Japan and Seattle. For a good many years travel in lighter-than-air machines has been rather eclipsed by the progress of the airplane, but the cruise of the Graf Zeppelin brings the airship back into the competition. Yet while mentally soaring among the clouds it is well actually to keep our feet on the ground. In the process of becoming air-minded we are likely otherwise to become muddle-headed; to forget that the airship is still fragile as china and unable to cope with the fiercer winds, while travel by airplane must become a great deal safer, cheaper, and more reliable before it will be accepted by the masses. It is wise to recall that airplanes and airships made their appearance about the same time as the gasoline automobile, yet have hardly outgrown the experimental stage in the quarter century during which the motor car has not only established itself but remolded the life of mankind in its image.

MR. HOOVER'S PUBLIC LAND policy, as set out in a long letter read to a conference of the governors of the public-land States at Salt Lake City on August 26, does not strike us favorably. Mr. Hoover proposes that the United States shall turn over to the States upwards of 190,000,000 acres of public lands that never belonged to them, and allow the States to manage the lands and ultimately sell them for the benefit of their school funds. The control of oil, coal, or other mineral deposits would be retained by the United States and the deposits worked on a royalty basis. The main reasons for Mr. Hoover's proposal appear to be that the transfer of the lands to the States would lessen the activities of federal bureaucracy, that the Reclamation Service would best be restricted to the development of water storage and supply, and that local conditions affecting the use or sale of the lands are best dealt with by the States themselves. As most of the land is fit only for grazing, Mr. Hoover does not anticipate that agriculture will be affected by an increased supply of arable land for at least twenty years, by which time new areas may be needed. What all this means in practice, of course, is that the federal public-land policy, built up over many years in the face of great opposition, would be knocked in the head, conservation would get a serious setback, and the land speculators would be left to deal only with individual States. We are all for magnifying States' rights when it is a question of distinct federal encroachment, but we have little confidence that the public lands, once they were handed over to the States, would be handled for genuine public benefit. Mr. Hoover's proposal should be critically examined by Congress before any steps are taken to give effect to it.

THE WAILING-WALL DISPUTE in Jerusalem is only the immediate cause of the ghastly riots which up to August 27 had cost more than a hundred lives in Palestine. Behind it lies the fundamental fact that the overwhelming majority of the population of Palestine is Arab, and that no considerable group of Arabs has ever accepted the theory that Palestine is to be the "Jewish National Home." Arab groups protested against it at the time of the Balfour declaration in 1917; they were still protesting when the Churchill memorandum reaffirmed and clarified the terms of that declaration in 1922; they refused, in 1922 and 1923, to cooperate in a British-supervised election which would have given them the right to elect eight members of a Legislative Council which would also have included two elected Jews and ten official, appointed members; they have consistently sent protesting delegations to the successive sessions of the Mandates Commission of the League of Nations. They declared a general strike when Lord Balfour, author of the British declaration which is the foundation-stone of the Jewish structure in Palestine, went to Jerusalem in 1925 to open the Hebrew University. There were anti-Jewish riots in Jerusalem at Easter, 1920, and in and near Jaffa in May, 1921, in which 104 persons were killed and more than 400 injured. And while the Jewish population has increased—it was 10 per cent of the total at the time of the armistice, and may be 18 per cent today—these fanatical Arabs, with a bitter sense of dispossession, still constitute four-fifths of the country's population.

RELIGION, BY DEFINITION, lies beyond the borders of rationalism; and nationalism is a modern form of religion. With Arab nationalism allied with Moslem fanaticism, on one side, and Zionism, inspired by the millennial hopes of Jewry, on the other, more trouble was almost inevitable. There have been British officials in Palestine who have not helped matters; Arab nationalism has had at least occasional official encouragement. Some of the Zionist groups have not been overblessed with tact; and those who have organized what is called the "Jewish Fascisti" have apparently preferred not to let time heal the wounds. Yet it remains true, as Horace M. Kallen pointed out in his "Frontiers of Hope," that

> To date . . . the only section of the population of Palestine to whom the Balfour Declaration has been an unmixed good is the Arab. The fellah has a greater market for his produce, more money, more things; on the whole, a better life. The town worker has more employment and rising standards. The effendi—the landlord, the "intellectual," the white-collar worker . . . —has benefited from his artificial nationalism, often manufactured by British officials, in the same way. A good many have been placed in government posts; others have made unexpected fortunes in real-estate deals.

"Their anti-Semitism will fade out," Mr. Kallen hopefully concluded, "once it ceases to be the thing among British administrative officials and high churchmen." That, it seems, was an over-optimistic judgment. But there can be no doubt whatever that the carefully regulated Jewish immigration has been a boon to the Arab population as well as to the Jews themselves; and it is a bitter tragedy that the ardent groups of lonely pioneers who have broken the hard soil of the uncultivated hillsides, these heroic bands which have done most for all Palestine, should today be those most exposed to the fury of religious passions which recall the bloody, senseless days of the Crusades.

CHINA AND RUSSIA have been sticking out their tongues at each other like a pair of peculiarly childish small boys, but on the whole the Russians have been the more silent and more dignified. The fountains of propaganda which Nanking has been throwing up do not wash away the fundamental fact that the Chinese, in violation of the treaty status of the Chinese Eastern Railway, seized control of the line and ousted its Russian officials. They assert that this is not necessarily permanent, but they have taken no steps to restore the railway to its legal status of joint Russo-Chinese ownership and operation. The documents which they claim to have discovered in the Russian consulate in Harbin are, in the first place, irrelevant—for even if the Russians had violated the no-propaganda clause of the treaty that would not have justified the Chinese in their unilateral assumption of control—and, in the second place, suspect. The United States Department of State has just published a report exposing the professional forgery of anti-Bolshevik documents in Berlin, among others the ridiculous papers supposed to show that the Russians had paid money to Senators Borah and Norris. Furthermore, previous "Russian documents" published by the Chinese have been proved to be White Russian fabrications; and they will have to submit their new crop of papers to expert examination before the world will take them at anything like face value. The energy devoted to preparing them might better be devoted to exploring the possible channels to peace. Meanwhile, the Russians, somewhat less loudly, have been complaining of White Russian forces organized on Chinese territory, and seem ready to use their presumed existence as justification for minor cavalry raids across the Manchurian frontier. That is an excuse which comes with poor grace from lips which have been proclaiming, apropos of the Chinese Eastern Railway, that one supposed wrong did not justify another.

IT IS HARD to make out exactly what has been going on behind the scenes at The Hague. During the three weeks after Philip Snowden first set forth the British demands for modifications of the Young Plan, negotiations went on continuously, and as we went to press it was reported that France, Italy, Belgium, and Japan had reached an agreement to make one more "final" offer, Mr. Snowden having rejected their latest one, which according to their calculation met 60 per cent of the British financial demands, while Mr. Snowden figured it at only 57 per cent. Practically all public discussion has centered on the division of reparations, but it seems unlikely that a settlement of such importance as this would be jeopardized for the sake of a few million dollars annually if nothing more were involved. Practically nothing has been printed by the American newspapers, at least, concerning the many important questions involved in the proposed Bank for International Settlement, and the principals in the negotiations have naturally given no publicity to the important political problems that lie in the background.

WE ARE SORRY that France has backed down even temporarily in its tariff controversy with the United States. The Fordney-McCumber tariff act, it will be remembered, provided that foreign goods might be denied admission to this country unless American Treasury agents were allowed to examine the books of the exporters in order to ascertain the costs of production. The indignant protests of French firms, backed by the French Government, against this arrogant policy resulted, after a somewhat heated correspondence, in an agreement in 1927 by which the Treasury agents were withdrawn, but the French exporters were then confronted with another provision of the tariff act which decreed that American instead of foreign valuations should be imposed if the foreigners' books were not opened. A Washington dispatch of August 15 announced that the dispute had been patched up. The Treasury agents, who will now be required to know French, are to be allowed to return, but will not nose about in business offices unless they are "invited." As even this concession on our part is to be canceled if the new tariff act continues the present prohibition (it is not in the bill as yet), there was no apparent necessity for France's action. We shall probably have a new tariff act before many weeks, and France, if it had had the nerve to hold out, might have won its contention and taught the tariff-makers a needed lesson.

BETWEEN HIS JOB as Vice-President of the United States and that of Ambassador to Great Britain, Charles G. Dawes found time, as our readers will remember, to make a flying visit to Santo Domingo, and while there he managed not only to sit down at the piano and play "Ramona" for music-loving Dominicans but also to draft a plan for the reorganization of the country's finances. It is true that the figures compiled by Mr. Dawes and his experts contained some pretty serious errors, as pointed out by Roy Veatch in The Nation of July 31, but quantity rather than quality is the rule among high-pressure executives, and some commoner mortals are usually available to clean up the messes left behind. So the errors of the Dawes commission's figures disturb us less than some of the suggestions in regard to policy, especially the recommendation to sell all the government-owned public utilities. The argument for this course was that the enterprises were losing money, but Mr. Veatch noted in his article that two of them, at least—the light and water system of the city of Santiago and the electric-light plant of Puerta Plata—were operating at a profit. Naturally, therefore, we were not surprised to see the announcement on August 22 that precisely these two enterprises had been acquired by our own Southern Cities Utilities Company. This is the course which opposition to public ownership invariably pursues: it takes away from the government all the money-making enterprises and leaves it the white elephants. This has the twofold advantage of piling up dividends for private ownership and at the same time maintaining for exhibition purposes some glaring examples of the inability of public ownership to operate at a profit.

AUGUSTO LEGUIA, the Peruvian President for life, has been confirmed in that position for the third time, with no opposing candidate. President Leguia and a few of his ministers labor under an uneasy fear of bolshevism, chiefly Russian—occasionally, they hint, Mexican. Perhaps to counteract the dread possibility that the descendants of the Incas might be roused by some stray eloquent student or poet to call a strike or so in the copper mines (owned by two large American companies) or to emulate the Mexican peasants, once almost as hopelessly sinned against as the Peruvians, President Leguia has offered citizenship and colonization expenses to immigrant White Russians, particularly those whose anti-Soviet credentials are irreproachable. Five thousand, it is reported, have accepted the Peruvian invitation, and two hundred have already arrived in Lima, led by General Pavlichenko, whose military record against the present Russian regime makes him highly desirable to the Peruvian administration. Until this novel garrison lays the dictator's fears, no doubt he will continue to jail, expel, or make disappear other students and poets who like Haya de la Torre or Magda Portal take his name in vain too loudly. The only "revolutionary" allowed to remain in his native land at present is José Carlos Mariátegui, a hopeless cripple. President Leguia has many admirers, especially outside of Peru, though perhaps none so enthusiastic as the American ambassador, Alexander P. Moore, who declares that Leguia "is a greater man than Mussolini. Hardly five feet high, he possesses the energy of Caesar, the skill of Napoleon, and the diplomacy of Richelieu."

THE TRIAL of sixteen Gastonia strikers charged with murder in connection with the killing of Chief of Police Aderholt on June 7 opened in Charlotte, North Carolina, on August 26. The change of venue and the lapse of an additional month, during which passion has had time to cool further, lead to greater hopes than could be entertained at first for a fair trial; and the admirably judicial conduct of Judge Barnhill in the preliminary proceedings gives assurance that so far as lies in his power this will be a trial for murder, not for Communism, which is as it should be. We are also glad to note that the International Labor Defense, which is conducting the case for the strikers, has retained Arthur Garfield Hays of New York as "consultant counsel." On reaching Charlotte Mr. Hays said:

> Those really believing in American institutions should be particularly solicitous that those whose doctrines they hate have a fair trial before the law. That this is the intention of North Carolina in this case is abundantly clear in view of the impartial jurist who will sit upon the bench and who has already indicated his insistence that the case be free from extraneous issues.

At the very best it is extremely difficult in a case of this character, with a technical charge of conspiracy resulting in murder, to avoid laying great stress on the political views of the defendants. We are glad that the presiding judge is awake to the dangers of the situation; for American justice as well as the defendants are on trial.

To an Exclusive FEW
this announcement is directed

A LOFTY triplex of fifteen rooms designed for the discriminating person who desires a perfect and complete town house high up among the clouds. This unusual suite occupies the entire 30th, 31st, and 32nd topmost floors of the Hotel Delmonico, New York's newest and smartest apartment hotel. No other apartment suite in New York has its spacious grandeur, equalled only in the larger private home.

Rental: $45,000

THIS ANNOUNCEMENT appeared in the advertising columns of the New Yorker—paid for, no doubt—but we reproduce it free in The Nation as we feel that a chance at this cosy cottage in cloudland should not be confined to the readers of any one periodical. First come, first served, we say, in housing, with no special favors for the "exclusive few." We wish, though, that before spreading the tidings we had thought to ask the agents one question: Is the rental of $45,000 by the day or by the hour?

Smash It!

THE publication of the tariff rates finally agreed on by the perspiring majority of the Republican members of the Senate Committee on Finance leads us once more to set forth briefly our fundamental grounds of objection to the measure now under consideration.

First, under existing conditions, the principle of protection is economically unsound, politically disastrous, and morally indefensible. Second, even if we admit protection to be defensible in economic theory, no one can maintain that the present hodge-podge of unrelated special rates constitutes a system consistent with any such theory. Third, abandoning all rational theory and agreeing that the tariff shall be simply a system of plundering all the people for the benefit of part of them—which is about all that present American tariff "ideas" really come down to—the present bill is not what it pretends to be and what the President asked for, namely, an instrument that equalizes conditions between manufacturers, on the one hand, and farmers on the other. The Smoot bill, like the Hawley bill, is vicious in its theory, so far as it has any theory; indefensible, not to say absurd, in its proposed operation; and thoroughly dishonest in its execution.

The world's great need today is the chance to work and trade; the Economic Conference of the League of Nations in 1927 categorically declared: "The time has come to move in the direction of lower tariffs." Tariff students point out that the proposed American action is likely to make European reductions immensely more difficult, not to say impossible. The exaggerated and aggravated protectionism embodied in the Hawley and Smoot bills is strengthening every nationalistic, imperialistic, and divisive force in the world today. It is evoking ill-feeling and threats of retaliation. It is helping on powerfully the evil cause of British imperial protection and preference, whose development would be one of the greatest disasters that could befall the world. It is causing more and more talk about a United States of Europe, which is conceived not as a means of uniting Europe, but as an agency for fighting America.

If there were any national interest to be attained at the cost of such world loss, a narrow nationalist might conceivably prefer the national to the international interest; but there is not. The United States has become a great exporter of manufactured goods and the world's leading creditor nation. Its people in general, as contrasted with special groups of them, cannot possibly gain by hampering trade—which is frankly what our tariff makers are trying to do—and even intended beneficiaries are often indifferent. Despite Senator Smoot's manful efforts to rally the automobile manufacturers, for example, to his standard, and their dutifully parrot-like response that of course "Polly wants a cracker," it is plain that what they really want is foreign markets, not picayune protection against the possible importation of a handful of foreign cars. The same thing is true of iron and steel, machinery, petroleum products, and dozens of other manufactures whose exports have come to constitute more than two-fifths of our total export trade. The infant-industry theory, which represents the only defense of protection that ever claimed any respectable economic support, has no more application to the United States today than it has to the moon. The Hawley-Smoot measure, a grab-bag of politically powerful special interests and nothing else, does not seriously pretend to embody any respectable theory or to represent any comprehensible general interest. Take labor and employment, for example. An investigation by the Labor Bureau, published in the August issue of Facts for Workers, shows that only a little over 2 per cent of the organized workers could possibly benefit from increases in duties. Vague talk of prosperity and solicitude for labor are all bosh; they are simply blinds under cover of which the men who footed the bills march up to the pie counter under the leadership of Mr. Grundy.

But that is not all. Mr. Hoover, whose spinelessness in tariff matters seems to be matched only by his ignorance, in order to carry out a preelection pledge wrung from him in the stress of the campaign, reluctantly summoned Congress for the express purpose of a limited revision, designed only to help the farmer and nobody else. The idea of really helping the farmer by a tariff on farm products in a country whose farmers are habitually enormous exporters is silly, but common decency would have required Mr. Hoover's present party to go through the motions.

And then what? Did the House give us an honest general revision? It did not. Has the Republican majority of the Senate committee done any better? It has not. Mr. Hoover, instead of sticking to his agricultural defenses, as any honest man ought to have done, decamped, and with an intellectual feebleness reminiscent of some of his most recent predecessors suggested that revision be limited to industries that have shown weakness, as manifested by extensive unemployment and other signs of ill-health. Did Hawley, Smoot and Co. follow out this feeble "principle"? They did not. They invited all the beggars to come to town, and the most plausible beggar with the biggest bank roll available for campaign purposes got the most, provided some other beggar did not trip him up. Logs, lumber, shingles, hides, leather, shoes, wool and wool rags, pig iron, steel beams, manganese, aluminum utensils, sugar, gypsum, and so on and on through hundreds of items; then the fraud of United States valuation; but nowhere any evidence of consistent, comprehensible theory, or even of any attempt to carry out the feeble recommendations of a President who had made to the country certain definite pledges of what was and was not to be expected.

The rates of the Hawley bill have been riddled by criticism, and the Smoot rates will suffer the same fate. Nobody pretends, for anything except public consumption, that the measure which is scheduled to go to the Senate on September 4 represents either an honest attempt to help the farmer or an honest attempt to make a general revision of the tariff so as to bring it more nearly into accord with the economic needs of the country today. Senator Borah has come out flatly for its defeat. It is so stupid, so vicious, so dishonest that it can be beaten. Smash it!

Sanity and Sex

IT has been often pointed out that the taboos of sex are the last to crumble before the shouts of liberalism. Many men and women who in the fields of politics and religion are fearless exponents of the most advanced thought are reactionaries, sometimes even in theory, whenever sex raises its provocative head. Thus all too often we have the incongruous spectacle of liberal magazines and newspapers advocating or condoning censorship when that censorship involves any sex matter, at such times forgetting their often-paraded and sacred obligation as liberals to defend to the death a man's right to say anything he pleases, or, rather, print anything he pleases. And this recalls another peculiarly American aspect of censorship illustrated just at present by the silly spectacle of a serious novel, such as D. H. Lawrence's "Lady Chatterley's Lover," legally banned, and relegated, without even an attempt to print it openly, to the expensive "suppressed" shelf in every bookstore, because it contains words which are familiar to every adult but which throw him into a panic when he sees them in print.

This phenomenon—of men and women who are liberal in their attitude toward everything except sex—is inevitable in a civilization whose dominant religion has had for one of its main tenets the doctrine that sex is evil, though occasionally, for populative purposes, a necessary evil. And sex is so terribly bound up with the emotions that even if one no longer has an intellectual panic when it is mentioned, one may still be, for all practical purposes, the victim of this hoary old taboo.

All this is prelude to a warm welcome to the World League for Sexual Reform—which takes care to put up the sign that is so far the only effective defense against obscenity hounds, "on a scientific basis." The aims of the league, which will hold its third international congress in London this September, are expressed in the following resolution which was passed at the last session:

> The second International Congress for Sexual Reform on a Scientific Basis appeals to the legislatures, the press, and the peoples of all countries, to help to create a new legal and social attitude (based on the knowledge which has been acquired from scientific research in sexual biology, psychology, and sociology) toward the sexual life of men and women.

The World League for Sexual Reform has as its presidents August Forel, Havelock Ellis, and Magnus Hirschfeld, and its International Committee includes the names of the foremost advocates throughout the civilized world of intelligence in sex—Dora Russell, Margaret Sanger, Dr. Helene Stöcker, Dr. Norman Haire, and many others. The program of the league is worth quoting in full:

1. Political, economic, and sexual equality of men and women.
2. The liberation of marriage (and especially divorce) from the present church and state tyranny.
3. Control of conception, so that procreation may be undertaken only deliberately and with a due sense of responsibility.
4. Race betterment by the application of the knowledge of eugenics.
5. Protection of the unmarried mother and the illegitimate child.
6. A rational attitude toward sexually abnormal persons, and especially toward homosexuals, both male and female.
7. Prevention of prostitution and venereal disease.
8. Disturbances of the sexual impulse to be regarded as more or less pathological phenomena, and not, as in the past, as crimes, vices, or sins.
9. Only those sexual acts to be considered criminal which infringe the sexual rights of another person. Sexual acts between responsible adults, undertaken by mutual consent, to be regarded as the private concern of those adults.
10. Systematic sexual education.

The league emphasizes the fact that it will not confine itself merely to the study of sexual problems. Its primary object is to attain practical reforms—and to do this by appeal not to the emotions but to the intellect. The league's aims are to be accomplished through publishing, or encouraging the publication of, both technical and popular scientific works which aim at sexual reform on a scientific basis; the production of an international journal of sexual reform; the holding of congresses; propaganda by lectures; collection of laws and statistics relating to sex in all countries; the giving of information to the legislatures of all countries and drafting of statutes and general assistance in sexual legislation. Membership is open to all persons who are working for sexual reform on a scientific, that is, decent, basis.

If mathematics had been surrounded with as much mystery as sex has been, it would probably be the object of the same disproportionate amount of curiosity. Let us hope that the World League for Sexual Reform will make sex as clear as Euclid.

First Steps in Farm Aid

WE have never been enamored of the proposal to grant government subsidies to agriculture, and we confess to some uneasiness when big business sets out to take agriculture under its wing. At the present moment both big business and the government are undertaking to make the American farmer prosperous. Since the first meeting of the Federal Farm Board, on July 15, the Florida Citrus Fruit Growers have been granted by the board a loan of $300,000 to enable them to combat the fruit fly, the raisin producers of California have been assured of help to the amount of $4,500,000, a tentative advance of from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 has been authorized to aid the cotton cooperative associations in the South, and a loan to the wool growers hovers in the offing. The National Cooperative Council, with an initial membership of one million farmers, has been formed under the inspiration of the board, and the Farmers' National Grain Cooperative, with a capital of $20,000,000, has been launched.

The board is not the only factor in the great uplift, however. The banks appear to have gone ahead with their proposals for financing the cotton crop pretty much as if the Federal Farm Board had not been created. The New York Times stated on August 4 that "it is estimated by bankers that between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000 of Wall Street credit, altogether, will be involved in the fall movement."

The Federal Intermediate Credit Bank of Omaha, it was announced on August 9, was preparing to advance $350,000 to the Cooperative Wool Growers of South Dakota to enable them to pool and sell their wool, and about $1,000,000 to the Wyoming Wool Cooperative Marketing Association for the same purpose. All these, it appears, are regular financial operations. The latest novelty is the United Growers of America, a $50,000,000 Delaware corporation organized under the federal marketing acts without consultation with the Federal Farm Board, and intended to serve the interests of fruit and vegetable producers and handlers in sixty subsidiary cooperatives in twenty-five States.

It is at least to be said for the Federal Farm Board that it appears to have made a good beginning. It has indulged in no hysterics over the farm situation, and it apparently does not propose that its funds should be raided for spoils. Its policy, as far as can be gathered from official pronouncements, appears to be to draw into cooperative organizations the large number of producers and distributors of farm products who still remain outside, and compel the organizations, which are numbered by the hundred, to pull together under the direction of the board. Moreover, the board seems disposed to withhold financial aid if such aid can be had elsewhere. The wheat cooperatives of the Northwest were told on August 23 that they could expect no credit from the board. As far as the export of wheat was concerned it seemed to the board that the worst was over; and it pointed out not only that ample storage for wheat was available, but also that the intermediate credit banks stood ready to make advances up to 65 per cent of the value of the grain. The cotton growers, on the other hand, who are already able to borrow from the intermediate credit banks 65 per cent of the value of their crops, may now raise their borrowings to 90 per cent with the aid of the advance granted by the board. Is this because the cotton growers are better organized than their brethren of the wheat section and hence more fit to be intrusted with a loan, or because there is some difference in the character or supply or handling of the two products?

The United Growers of America, of which Julius H. Barnes, chairman of the board of the United States Chamber of Commerce, is the head, proposes to offer to the farmers, wholly independent of the government, "a complete organization program comparable with big business." The federal laws will look out for monopoly, so "there need be no fear of a so-called food trust." Once the corporation gets to work, the farmer may take his choice between private and government aid; he may even, it would seem, make no choice at all but take both. There is no doubt that cooperative marketing can be a good deal improved, and Mr. Barnes's corporation can doubtless find many opportunities for injecting business principles into the handling of fruits and vegetables. Both public and private finance, however, have still to face the fundamental problem of overproduction. Meantime the consumer of foodstuffs and other farm products will watch with some anxiety the effect of government subsidies on the one hand and corporate business methods on the other upon the price of what he is to eat, wear, or use. The Federal Farm Board has repudiated the idea of raising prices. But will the farmers be satisfied if prices do not rise, and will the gains of the United Growers of America be derived solely from saving waste?

New Saws for Old

IN this age of rapid obsolescence and merciless scrapping in the industrial world it is remarkable that our literary factories are still equipped with the most outmoded tools and their operatives content with machinery some of which goes back to the Stone Age. The pressure upon modern writers is intense. No kind of worker is expected to show more speed and pep. The old-time novelist was allowed six pages in which to describe the weather on the day when his story opened and the first two chapters in which to introduce his characters. The essayist of other days was considered precipitate if he indicated the subject of his discourse before he was a third of the way into it. Nowadays the fiction writer who fails to get either a bedroom scene or a murder into the opening chapter is out of the running, and unless an editor discovers at least two wisecracks in the first paragraph of an essay, he tosses it scornfully into the waste-basket. And yet writers are obliged to work with a vocabulary which has probably lost as many words as it has gained since Elizabeth, and with a grammar no better adapted to speed-up methods than it was under Victoria. Such vocabulary as we have added is mostly in the direction of technology and ephemeral slang, therefore of limited use; we have developed a large field of wisecrackery, but little of it has sufficient universality to be worth stealing, and unless one author can steal from another he is lost. In the matter of metaphors, similes, adages, and allusions—the edged tools of the literary operative—we are still back in the agricultural, not to say the pastoral age.

For example, we started to say something the other day about putting the cart before the horse, but suddenly thought better of it. What rot to talk of horses and carts when both are headed toward the scrap pile! How much more intelligible to introduce a phrase about putting the rumble seat before the radiator! And then there is that good old standby about beating swords into plowshares. Who in this cockeyed world any longer uses either one or the other? If we writers were modern we would beat explosive shells . . . On second thought it might be better not to beat explosive shells. Rather let us convert shells into, say, utility shares.

Then there is that old saw about being on one's last legs. What of it? Who cares whether one is on his last, his first, his fore, his hind, or any legs at all? We might say something to the reader, though, if we remarked that a man was on his last gallon of gas. Also we are tired of that wheeze "a sop to Cerberus." It would be more effective to talk about greasing the cop on the corner.

"Strike while the iron is hot" is a famous old axiom, but it has mighty little to do with the lives of most of us today. "Strike while the boss has a bunch of unfilled orders" would mean a lot more to the worker in the machine age in which we exist. And as a final example we want to point out what a dull old tool is the saying, "Make hay while the sun shines." That was all well enough before the farmer had become a problem; but we hate to be reminded of our problems. As a snappier and more up-to-the-minute substitute we would suggest, "Make rye while the moon shines."

It Seems to Heywood Broun

THERE seems to be a current belief that the world may find an airway to salvation. Orators urge us to become plane-conscious. Fervent appeals are made to the women of the land to take up flying. People who refuse to avail themselves of the new means of transportation are looked upon as not only craven but in some way seditious. Possibly I am merely echoing the old prejudice which went down fighting under the wheels of the locomotives, but I think that aviation must still prove itself a boon to man. At the moment the score stands against the new invention. There is blood upon the fuselage.

At present the airplane's chief importance is that of a new engine of war. It was the plane which carried death and destruction behind the lines to the non-combatant. This, to be sure, may prove a factor in the establishment of peace. Possibly nations will kindle less quickly under the realization that neutral zones have been abolished and that another conflict would find even the most secluded hamlet a city of the front. But it seems to me that time must wipe out the memory of the young dead in shattered cities before we all begin to worship the flying machine as a beneficent thing. And there must be considered, too, the toll of those swallowed up in the sea and broken in lonely forests. These men and women have given their lives that the airplane might survive and flourish. What price aviation? No one can fairly answer that question unless he is able to foretell the kind of world in which he will be living fifty years hence.

If the plane is to exist chiefly as a device for making war more widespread and terrible then I say it were better if the Wrights had never risen on that first hop at Kitty-hawk. Such barriers to conflict as the wide oceans have now been obliterated by the potential radius of the bomber. And if an American vaults the broad expanse from here to Rome or Paris his journey cannot be set down as a good-will flight without certain reservations. Each new exploit sets the men in the war colleges to preparing fresh figures and shaping plans to meet the practicality of world-wide war.

It would be silly to deny that the airplane may serve to enrich life and living. It can wipe out boundaries and mountain chains for warlike purposes, but this same conquest of the wide spaces could serve to emphasize a feeling of international solidarity. The vision of a united world is no longer fantastic. Even within our time it may be possible to span the globe between sunrise and sunset. In another century there will remain no such thing as an isolated people. But I think that it is very essential that political thought should keep pace with development in flying. As yet it lags. There are cornfed statesmen who still speak as if Europe were a remote continent and no concern of ours in spite of the flying visits of the Byrds and Chamberlains and Lindberghs. When next some gentleman from Kansas speaks of Washington's farewell address and his counsel against entangling alliances I think it might be well for some one in the audience to remind the orator that our great founder could not possibly have known of the Zeppelin and the airplane and the new conception of geography which they make imperative.

Until good-will and a disposition to cooperate become a little keener I would be content to see aviation mark time and wait for the statesmen to catch up with new developments. It is inevitable that flying should go on to new triumphs and new glories, but for the life of me I cannot see the need of haste. Just what is served by new risks and new fatalities in transatlantic ventures I do not comprehend. Each missing plane seems to me a sacrifice in vain. As yet developments in flying are a shade one-sided. Speed is being increased with great rapidity. We know that machines may be built to travel more than three hundred miles an hour. Somewhat less attention has been paid to stability. The news columns chronicle all too often the death of veteran pilots who have crashed for reasons unexplained. A little less haste and more safety would be welcomed.

To me the most interesting experiments are those conducted on the gyroscopic principle. In time we must have a machine which does not need a broad expanse of level ground to make a landing. I have no doubt that the day will come when every roof may serve as an airport. Fast and easy communication can possibly do away with the overcrowding in our cities. To the American of a hundred years hence the Adirondacks may serve the same function as Central Park. There will be in reality neither North nor South when planes are fast enough.

Yet the conception of a United States about the size of Manhattan Island for transportation purposes does not in every way suffice to meet utopian dreams. There is, for instance, the not unimportant detail of racket. Already certain sylvan retreats have become almost as full of din as metropolitan areas. Along the once quiet shores of Long Island Sound the motors roar by day and night. There should be no great difficulty in muffling the bickering of the engines, but a nice problem presents itself to those mechanical geniuses who must find some way to still the whirr of the propellers. Privacy, already gravely wounded by the telephone, may yet receive its death blow at the hands of the ubiquitous airplane. I shudder still at the memory of a plane which circled New York City and spread a vastly amplified voice exhorting all and sundry to use the cigarette which contains not a cough in any carload. Fortunately the promoters of this advertising scheme were quick to see that there was too much nuisance risk in the campaign.

Moreover, a land which is already sick with standardization may not precisely benefit by having its expanses still more radically minified. If our distances become those of a village street it is not inconceivable that our thinking may be of the same temper. The automobile has destroyed the eye for scenery possessed by the old-time walker. The limousine has done little to develop nature lovers. And from a plane one sees even less than is visible from a fast motor car. States are rolled out under the aviator like colored patches on a map. When the plane comes into its own it may be that the poet must take to a parachute. I am not eager to see America become air-conscious immediately. There are still too many things on the ground which need attention.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Rum Running on the Detroit River

By MORROW MAYO

I

THE Government, we learn officially, is now making its "greatest drive" to prevent liquor from being smuggled from Windsor, Ontario, into Detroit, Michigan. The two cities face each other across the Detroit River. This stream, which is owned jointly by the United States and Canada, is eighteen miles long and a mile wide. It is one of the busiest pieces of water in the world; at this time of the year an average of 1,500 craft operate in it every hour of the day. Liquor has been crossing in every conceivable manner. Until recently about 4,000 cases were landed on the United States side every twenty-four hours. Bear in mind, first, that importation of liquor from Canada to the United States is prohibited by the United States; and, second, that exportation of liquor from Canada to the United States is permitted by Canada.

It will assist the reader if I describe briefly one rum-running system. The racketeers order from a Windsor distillery 400 cases of liquor for delivery into rum-running boats at a Windsor export dock. The liquor is delivered in wooden cases. Each case contains two handy packages of six quarts each, packed between heavy cardboard in square burlap bags. Each bag weighs about eighteen pounds, has a couple of "ears," and is easy to carry. The runners uncrate it, burn the boxes, and load the bags of liquor into their boats. From the United States side of the river it is a common sight to see bonfires of liquor cases burning on the Canadian beach.

When the rum-running boats are loaded and ready to go, they are formally cleared by Canadian customs officials. The documents give the names of the distillery, transporter, consignee, boats, port of debarkation, port of destination, exact cargo, and time of departure. Copies are mailed to the customs office at port of destination. Having cleared from Windsor, the boats run out into the river, remaining on the Canadian side until they get an opportunity to make the dash to the United States shore. Part of this shore is occupied by private boat-wells, one after another, built on private property. Along the river's edge there are whole blocks of houses, built close together, boarded between, and surrounded by high fences. The view from both the river and the land is completely obstructed. Doors that extend beneath the surface of the water lift up and descend to emit and admit the rum-running boats. Search warrants are required to enter these private houses. They have private automobile entrances and garages. Innumerable streets lead down to the river's edge. The boats usually shoot across at night. Running in pitch darkness without lights, it takes a rum-running boat from one to three minutes to make the half-mile dash from Canadian waters to the United States shore.

Directed and guarded by speed boats operated by gangsters armed with machine-guns, a cargo is run across. A large force of workers is waiting to unload it quickly. The liquor may be stored, or it may be loaded at once into automobiles (a Ford sedan carries thirty cases) which depart immediately, each perhaps for a different destination—Detroit, Cleveland, Toledo, or Chicago. The whole operation, from the time the liquor boats leave Canadian waters until the automobiles are on their way, requires considerably less than ten minutes. The work is efficient; the technique is finished. I could follow the process on through the cutting plants to the bootlegger and the ultimate consumer, but that part of it is not germane to this article. The hazards are great; huge profits demand a quick turnover. When business is good, however, there is enough for all.

II

Engaged in the present "greatest drive" to suppress this smuggling, the United States Government has in the Detroit area 100 prohibition agents, twenty-five special prohibition agents, fifty regular customs officers, twenty special customs agents, 200 customs border patrolmen, 100 immigration officers, fifty coast guardsmen—and fourteen small boats. Of these seven government agencies, the personnel of three wear civilian clothes, the others wear four different kinds of uniforms. The average salary of these men is $43.54 a week. Each force has certain restricted duties and varying limited authority. Each is governed by its own regulations. Each is responsible to a different active boss. There is a coordinator in the area. He is a customs man and is practically unknown to the other agencies. There is very little coordination, and less cooperation. On the contrary, there is jealousy and open hostility. Each force is trying to make the best showing. The two prohibition forces do not pull together or get along with the customs men. The three customs forces do not work together, or with the prohibition men. The Coast Guard and immigration forces work independently, and "high hat" the other five. Andrew Mellon is the official head of all seven agencies.

The Coast Guard has two seventy-five-foot patrol boats and four speed boats. On July 27 these boats received orders to remove their machine-guns and rifles. The patrol boats are now armed with one-pounders; the speed boats carry no guns. The coast guardsmen carry pistols. I do not know the speed of all these boats. The skipper of the patrol boat I was on told me it had a speed of thirteen knots, and his speed boat a speed of twelve knots. The 200 customs border patrolmen have eight speed boats. Since these men work in three eight-hour shifts, there are about sixty-five of them on duty at one time. Sixteen are in their boats on the river, among the other 1,500 craft. They carry pistols, their riot guns and rifles having been taken away from them recently. Their boats are not armed. The other forty-nine men patrol such portions of the United States shore as are accessible to them without invading private property.

There has been much shooting on the river, and there have been a number of deaths. Patrolmen have disappeared and rum runners have drowned. Both Canadian and United States owners of pleasure craft have protested against the shooting, and against the running of boats on the river without lights. Private craft are halted and boarded every day by patrolmen over the vigorous protests of owners. Coming alongside trim yachts, the patrol boats scrape their paint, bend their stanchions, and frighten and discommode guests. As a result there are damage suits and criticism against the Government. The Government is seriously handicapped here by public opinion; for the people of Detroit are opposed to prohibition. The four English-language newspapers and all the foreign-language newspapers are wet. The Detroit Saturday Night, mouthpiece of the financial interests, is wet. The Governor of Michigan is wet. The papers carry columns of stuff every day ridiculing, attacking, and opposing enforcement efforts.

United States authorities are not permitted to chase rum boats in Canadian waters. Theoretically, a rum runner could run up and down the Detroit River a few feet from a United States patrol boat, and be immune from arrest. That is exactly what the boats often do, shooting at each other, the rum runners aware that they may get shot but cannot be arrested, the patrolmen aware that they may get shot but cannot make an arrest. The situation amounts to a river war, with engagements of one kind or another every day. Here is the first paragraph of a story from the front page of the Detroit News of August 9:

> Rum runners and coast guardsmen fought a pitched battle on the Detroit River off Ecourse shore early today, racing along the middle of the river less than 100 feet apart and exchanging rifle and pistol shots. No one was injured, although two of the Coast Guard agents narrowly escaped. The runners escaped to Canada with their cargo.

III

The United States has asked Canada to refuse clearance to liquor-laden boats destined for the United States. Thus far Canada has flatly refused. In an interview at Ottawa on July 17, Hon. W. D. Euler, Minister of National Revenue, stated that Canada could not refuse clearance except by Act of Parliament, and that he felt that the sense of the House of last session was not favorable to such a course.

What are the official positions of the two countries on this touchy subject? Here is the basis of the argument of the United States, put in plain words: Canada is aiding and abetting the smuggling of contraband into the United States. The exportation of liquor to this country against this country's wishes is not a neighborly act. When prohibition was young the Canadian distilleries did not have export docks on the river. Racketeers bought liquor at the distilleries and ran it through Canada to the water's edge. They were violating Canadian law, and many were arrested and prosecuted. Canadian distilleries now aid the racketeers by delivering the liquor to them at the river. These rum-running boats do not constitute respectable transportation lines. A respectable transportation line transports only legitimate merchandise from the designated ports of one country to the designated ports of another. Canada knows when it clears these boats that they are carrying contraband to be smuggled into the United States.

And here is the Canadian reply: Canada is preventing gunmen from handling liquor illegally in Canada. The rum-running boats are legitimate carriers in Canadian waters. Canada cannot assume to govern their conduct in foreign waters. The boats are respectable carriers so far as Canada is concerned. Ninety-nine per cent of the rum runners are United States citizens. They would no more hesitate to break Canadian laws than they do United States laws. If Canada refused to export liquor to the United States, the former country would be flooded with law-breakers, and the burden of enforcing United States prohibition on the United States border would devolve largely on Canada. All motor boats must clear officially when they leave Canada. On the other hand, boats of less than five tons displacement are not required to clear from the United States. By permitting these small boats to come and go at will, the United States is actually encouraging rum running. It permits these small rum-running boats to leave the United States side, but asks Canada to refuse to permit them to return. If the United States will make these small boats clear, it will go a long way toward solving the liquor-smuggling problem. Here is a dispatch from Ottawa, dated July 31:

> The Canadian Government still stands ready to consider the barring of liquor exports to the United States if the United States Government will cooperate by regulating their own boats engaged in the rum traffic by requiring them to secure clearances from that country as they do from Canada.

IV

The Province of Ontario favors granting the demand of the United States. The less liquor exported to the United States from the Windsor docks, the more sold at retail in Windsor. Ontario last year made $9,000,000 on retail liquor sales. Every month thousands of United States citizens, fed up on bootleg gin, find it convenient to go to Detroit to get their new automobiles. They can turn in their old cars to their local dealers in Atlanta or Los Angeles, go to Detroit by train and pick up their new cars, and save money. The saving in freight on a $1,500 car to the Pacific Coast is $240, almost the price of three railroad tickets. Ontario reasons logically that if Canada refuses to export liquor to the United States, more United States citizens will come to Windsor to drink it.

Politics of course is as weighty in Canada as it is in the United States. The Canadian liquor interests make large political contributions, and the influence of money is just as great in Canada as it is in the United States. Canada levies a tax of $9 a gallon on all liquors. This tax is refunded upon presentation of customs receipts from the country to which the liquor is exported. The tax is never refunded on exports to the United States, since the rum runners do not get receipts from United States customs officers. Exportation of liquor to the United States last year netted the Canadian Government $30,000,000. This, of course, did not include the huge profits reaped by the Canadian commercial liquor interests. The liquor industry is one of Canada's largest, and its exportation constitutes one of Canada's main sources of revenue.

I have wondered what would happen if this situation existed along the Rhine River, between Germany and France. I have asked many Canadians what Canada would do if the situation were reversed. Some say Canada would do nothing; others that Canada would prevent such brazen smuggling into Canada if it had to call upon the British navy to do it. "The dignity of Canada would demand it," one Canadian told me; "if Canada were in the same position as the United States you would see half a dozen British cruisers anchored in the lakes and river, a blockade of destroyers, submarines, airplanes, and small craft, and possibly nets protecting the Canadian shore. There would be no question about it. Canada would stop it."

Both wet and dry propagandists are working overtime in Canada. Here is one paragraph from a dry editorial in the Toronto Globe of July 28:

> The situation simply boils down to this: The Canadian Government is operating in collusion with outlaw American citizens to break United States laws. It is a blunt way of putting it; but is it not the fact?

Dry extremists in both countries have demanded that the United States inform Canada that its policy is an "unfriendly act" toward the United States. For more than a hundred years the two countries have faced each other, without fortifications or show of armed forces, living as neighbors in peace and harmony, but this condition can no longer be said to exist. Hundreds of diplomatic notes have been exchanged, and scores of conferences, public and secret, have been held. Extremists believe that if the situation is not cleared up in some way, it will inevitably lead to war.

The Coast Guard, particularly, feels that it is being embarrassed and degraded by prohibition work. This service has a proud tradition. It was created in 1790 by an Act of Congress signed by George Washington. The Coast Guard officers here, as well as elsewhere, feel that the Government should do either one thing or the other: either release it from its odious task, or give it sufficient equipment and personnel to prevent liquor smuggling. In a recent issue, the magazine Coast Guard, official journal of the service, commented as follows upon the testimony of Admiral F. C. Billard, Commandant of the Coast Guard, before the House sub-committee on Treasury Appropriations: "The Commandant expressed belief that, given sufficient equipment, the Coast Guard could entirely plug up the holes through which foreign liquors come into the United States over the coast lines."

V

It may be stated without fear of contradiction that the United States has never made a sincere, determined effort to stop liquor smuggling from Canada, and is not making one now. To put it most charitably, its effort has been half-hearted. If anyone doubts this, let him ask himself the question: What would the United States do if the commodity being so openly and notoriously smuggled into the country were an article upon which there is a high tariff?

The little spot at Detroit, at this moment, is fairly tight. Probably not more than two or three thousand cases are crossing a week. I have made the Government's "greatest drive" look its best by including only the Detroit River in the Detroit area. On one side of it is Lake Erie and on the other side Lake St. Clair, the St. Clair River, Lake Huron, and so on through all the Great Lakes district. The St. Clair River, which is only 300 yards wide at places, is logically a part of the Detroit area; its farthest point, Port Huron, is only a two-hour drive from Detroit. While the Government is concentrating on this tiny spot—the Detroit River—the rum runners are running wild on the St. Clair River, twenty miles away, where the coast is practically unguarded. What ostrich-like folly!

A comparison would be an effort to prevent liquor from crossing Broadway by blockading the street between Madison Square and Times Square, and leaving it unguarded between Madison Square and the Battery, and from Times Square to Albany.

It is also silly for the press to make Messrs. Lowman and Doran "the goats." Criticism of those two figure-heads is superficial criticism. With all the pressure that is being put upon the Administration by drys, is it possible to believe that Secretary Mellon and President Hoover are not acutely aware of the exact situation?

And Now the Fruit Fly

By HENRY S. VILLARD

ONE might have thought that the string of calamities which has been Florida's lot since the Great Gold Trek of '25 would by now constitute expiation in plenty for her orgy of frenzied finance. But—to mix one's metaphors—at the slightest indication that Babylon may be rebuilt, Nemesis gets on the job.

Last winter, it seems to be agreed, was the most successful for the tourist industry since the collapse of the boom. In Miami, the crowds and the cars that swarmed on Flagler Street were reminiscent of the summer of '25. For the first time since those days of get-rich-quick, the stores, the restaurants, and the hotels made money. Proprietors shut up shop and went north in June for their first vacation in four years. Miami Beach is afraid to say it aloud for fear of starting another boom, but real-estate transactions actually provided a fat living for more than one office force. Building permits ran into the millions, and the dozens of houses now under construction give substantial proof that Florida is already the permanent winter home of as many Americans as can possibly afford to make it so. Until the last few months, in short, the Florida picture was tinted with all kinds of pleasing roseate hues. And now—another chapter in chastisement: the Mediterranean fruit fly.

Just how this detestable little insect, toward which Floridians are at present concentrating all their surplus animosity, got into the State, has as many explanations as there used to be reasons for buying lots in Coral Gables. Some maintain that it was blown over from foreign shores in the last hurricane; others that it was a stowaway in a sack of Bacardi rum, the supply of which from certain neighboring isles has never failed to keep pace with the lively demand. Still others have a different theory. "Why," scoffed an old "cracker," "we've always had the fruit fly in Florida. Only somebody up North has jest discovered it." This last analysis appears to be based on a strange philosophy of governmental interference, pork-barrel appropriations, insidious California propaganda, the oil trust (which manufactures germicides), and the fundamental complaint that someone is always taking the joy out of Florida anyway.

But whatever its source, the fruit fly has added another episode to Florida's lessons in discipline. Statisticians declare that nearly three-fourths of all the bearing citrus trees in the State are more or less involved in the infestation. According to Department of Agriculture figures, the capital investment threatened by the fly is close to $300,000,000. Furthermore, the danger of the infestation's spreading to other sections of the country, as well as the likelihood of damage to various industries dependent on the Florida citrus crop, presents possibilities of uncalculated harm. In the case of Florida itself, a successful season for the State is invariably contingent upon a goodly percentage of its fruit crop being released for movement north.

Despite the assertion of more than one farmer that he has yet to see a bona fide fruit fly, the state and federal authorities are not minimizing the gravity of the situation as it appears to them. Ample funds have been forthcoming by congressional decree, and the National Guard has been called to the front-line defenses. Armed to the teeth with flit guns, the boys in khaki are stationed at strategic points in the battle sector, intercepting all vehicles and subjecting the owners, their baggage, and the vehicles themselves to a withering fire of disinfectants. Just what the penalty is for bootlegging an orange or a grapefruit in the bottom of a suitcase was not disclosed to us, though we were stopped no less than four times on a recent motor journey between the Georgia State line and Miami. Any fruit fly caught lurking in the rumble seat would, no doubt, be summarily court-martialed and shot at sunrise, since he is held responsible not only for the menace to Florida's staple product but for the epidemic of bank failures that has followed his advent. Scattered in various parts of the State, some thirty-odd institutions have very recently closed their doors, for the fly destroys business confidence as well as fruit.

Thus the sins of the "binder boys" who raised the ante too high just four summers ago continue to be visited upon the unoffending members of the current generation. The immediate future is a bit uncertain. Will the credit stringency, the fruit fly, the failure of the racing bill, and the annual fall hurricane nervousness combine to make the next season a flop? Or will those clouds disappear in another mirage of stability and safety—with the thunderbolt of additional retribution following close behind?

There would seem to be some truth in the plaint of Florida's people that whenever the lightest touch of adversity brushes their State, it receives notice out of all proportion to its significance. While admitting the possibility of ruin, and busily taking measures to forestall it, Floridians cannot resist pointing out that plant pests are nothing new on this continent, and that in some of their fair sister States of the Southland various insidious bugs are even now unwelcome visitors. But it's only Florida that gets the write-up, they complain, and it's only Florida that bears the brunt of unfavorable attention. Ever since 1926 Florida has been trying vainly to dodge the limelight.

As a matter of fact, Florida appears economically sounder today than before the boom. In the more important financial centers—Jacksonville, Miami, Tampa, and St. Petersburg—the principal banks are standing firm in the present hysteria; the liquid assets within the State provide every assurance of being ample to weather the squall. The heroic measures taken to eradicate the fruit fly have led to the lifting of the quarantine on September 1 to such an extent that a large share of the citrus-fruit market will still be saved next year for Florida. The pernicious pyramiding of real-estate values has—temporarily at least—disappeared. Agricultural industries are flourishing. In spite of such passing ills as fruit flies and bank closings the impression one gets is nevertheless that of a fundamentally healthy State.

There may be, in time, as the boosters maintain, industries of real importance in Florida—such as may flourish through the advantages of a reduced overhead made possible by a favorable climate and the accessibility of rapidly developing ocean ports. The present business of fruit and vegetable growing, dairying, lumbering, and the production of naval stores and phosphate rock, may expand to unexpected proportions, and the permanent population of the State may yet vastly increase. But when all is said and done, there seem to be at the moment two main fields in which Florida may look to the future with definite conviction as to growth. One deals with the tourist, and the other with aviation.

The tourist needs only careful cultivation to yield large returns, and indications are that the secret of fostering this crop is already well known to the inhabitants. The judicious care bestowed on this occupation, pursued not too covetously, should supply an ever more profitable source of revenue. Judging by the multitudes that flocked to both east and west coasts last winter and the amount of cash they parted with in the short season of a few weeks, this industry will grow of its own accord.

The second possibility, aviation, soared into prominence in January of 1929 with the inauguration of the Pan-American Airways service to Cuba and the West Indies. The larger cities of Florida are already linked with the rest of the continent in the air-mail system, and if present plans are carried out, not many months hence it will be feasible to fly all the way from Montreal to Buenos Aires. Miami is the logical jumping-off place for Central and South America, and it is surprising to see how fully alive that city is to the enviable chance of becoming an air terminus of the foremost rank and importance. Flying for pleasure is particularly adaptable to that region; schools are springing up, and an airplane factory has commenced operations. If commerce continues to sprout wings it may not be entirely fantastic to suggest that Florida is on the verge of working out her salvation in the air.

One thing Floridians have in their favor. They are incurable optimists. Booms may come and booms may go, and so may hurricanes, fruit flies, bank failures, and any other form of impediment to progress that the Fates may devise—but the stubborn faith of Floridians in the future of their State goes on forever. It must be the climate that induces this frame of mind, for climate is still Florida's one unchangeable asset. Nor is it difficult to understand that where one has abundant health, where the effort of living is reduced to the lowest terms, where the sun smiles tolerantly day by day and the moon makes one forget that tomorrow is coming—there it is wholly impossible to stifle a certain permanent satisfaction in living.

The present period may not mark the end of Florida's atonement, but as long as the same sun and moon continue to shine and the Gulf Stream refrains from altering its course, there will be cheerful optimism among the dwellers on the palm-fringed shores of America's semi-tropics.

Cleveland's City Manager Survives

By LOUIS BROWDY

CLEVELAND is no ordinary American city. Its industries, heavy, light, and medium, metal and textile, are amazingly diversified. So is its population. Its more than a million people are in the main the second and third generation of good immigrant stock, much of it from the now dismembered empires of Central Europe. Notably, there is a substantial leaven of Teutonic stock, including many children and grandchildren of German forty-eighters who possess by social heredity something of that idealism and love of liberty which forced the rebellious Weltverbesserer to quit the fatherland. In 1924 Cleveland voted for La Follette for President. In 1928 it gave a large majority to Smith. During the war it gave Charles Ruthenberg, outspoken and jail-worn Communist, an enormous vote for mayor. Six years ago it scrapped its time-honored and conventional municipal government, adopted a new and advanced charter written by a college professor, and soon afterward installed the first city manager of a truly metropolitan city.

As I sat in an office on Cleveland's public square discussing the election which has just reaffirmed the city's adherence to the manager system, my eye fell upon a conspicuous statue just below us, a squatty effigy in bronze of Tom L. Johnson, Cleveland's famous mayor of twenty years ago; and I was reminded that all political experiments in Cleveland stem from this singular civic leader on the one hand and from the German-bred liberals on the other. No one can understand the incurable penchant for progress in this city without going back to the opening decade of this century when Tom Johnson—ardent single taxer, advocate of public ownership, uncompromising foe of "predatory privilege"—was creating a new kind of political atmosphere for an American city. Something of his influence still persists.

In the public square, athwart the rotund simulacrum of the sainted mayor, the fifty-story tower of the Van Sweringens' new railway terminal casts its prodigious shadow. The street railways which Johnson's three-cent fare made famous—strange symbol of a sincere idealism—are now controlled by the Van Sweringens, those fabulous brothers whose interests ramify throughout the city and its hinterland and spread out into the world, bound up with other railroad interests, on endless lines of steel. From the City Hall on the shore of Lake Erie the terminal tower looms up colossal and dominant, inescapable reminder of the power of the railroads in those dealings with City Hall which are necessary for the realization of huge projects. From within the seat of government the city council and the city manager can see the beginnings of the immense public stadium which the city is erecting on the margin of the lake where the New York Central has secured from the city, and now holds, an option on the riparian rights.

When the new charter was about to go into effect and William R. Hopkins, a Cleveland business man (brother of Arthur Hopkins, the theatrical producer), was announced as the new city manager, he was confronted by the fiery Peter Witt, leader of the independents in the newly elected council, who announced his conviction that Hopkins was going into office as the servant of the railroads. Hopkins had dabbled in railroads along with many other business ventures; he had had a main hand in building the Belt Line Railway, which he later sold to the New York Central. He had been designated as city manager as the result of an amicable arrangement between Maurice Maschke, Republican national committeeman and generalissimo of Cleveland's dominant political machine, and Burr Gongwer, the local Democratic boss. "Both of them," said Hopkins, "told me I could run the city as I pleased, so I took the job." It is the common and much too plausible belief that the understanding between these two gentlemen and their henchmen was to the effect that all city jobs under the new regime were to be dealt out to good Republicans and Democrats in the ratio of six to four. The many offices in the gift of the manager have, it now appears, been so apportioned with something like scrupulous care.

Hopkins has been an able administrator and an executive of force and leadership. That he has been incomparably more competent than the series of nonentities who succeeded Johnson and his disciple, Newton D. Baker, in the office of mayor, no one seriously doubts. Diligently and resourcefully he has carried through numerous important civic projects and public improvements. He has developed one of the finest airports in the country; he has completed and successfully operated one of the largest public auditoriums and made Cleveland one of the country's biggest convention cities; he has nourished and forwarded the project for a great civic mall in the Continental style on the lake shore; he has been the prime mover behind the great public stadium—perhaps a questionable honor since there are those who hold that it is being built largely for the benefit of the local baseball club, which is owned largely by Cleveland's biggest bank. He has spent, consequently, mountains of money, but he has dealt with budgets and finances with no little skill and resource.

As city manager Hopkins has been an ever-prominent public figure with an enviable gift for keeping his stocky person and chubby face in the limelight. The burden of banqueting, dedicating, welcoming, and posing in behalf of the collective citizenry he has accepted with apparent alacrity. The shadowy and unobtrusive personage who, as the presiding officer of the city council, holds the title of mayor has been deftly deprived of all the ornamental and rotogravure duties which commonly appertain to that office and which afford invaluable publicity. When the Republican national convention met in Cleveland in 1924 the delegates found in front of the city hall a huge banner which read: "Welcome to Cleveland—W. R. Hopkins, Manager."

There has inevitably been an amount of give and take between a city manager with a political flair and the thoroughly political members of the council. These gentry, all good Republicans or tolerable Democrats, the former a solid majority generally obedient to Boss Maschke, number twenty-five in all, elected from four city districts under the Hare system of proportional representation. The council is the manager's employer, or, to use the customary business parallel, his board of directors; it is the good-will of the councilmen which assures him the continued and untroubled tenure of his $25,000-a-year job as well as the legislative acceptance of his pet measures. On the other hand, the manager has many jobs and favors at his command which are invaluable to practical ward politicians with many little fences to keep mended and precinct workers to keep happy. That a quiet and decent traffic in these favors has taken place no one questions or denies.

There have been flagrant scandals, however, in the last little while which have moved a kindly and oblivious public to raise an inquiring eyebrow. Within the past year the city purchased several pieces of land for park and playground purposes at prices which, it transpired in good time, were patently and grossly in excess of their value. Repeated operation of this simple and profitable trick by political insiders with the help of a compliant council finally caused a resounding and malodorous explosion. As the result of the purchase of one playground site at three or four times its worth, a prominent Republican member of the council and close friend of the city manager is now serving a five-to-fifteen-year term in prison. But Hopkins emerged from the extreme unpleasantness of the land scandals with a fairly whole skin. If a cloud has appeared about the figure of the manager and the office that he has somewhat more than filled, it has been visible chiefly to his political opponents and the chronic foes of the new system.

These, however, have been diligently at work and have come within a hairbreadth of accomplishing something. If in the newspapers the city manager remained sans peur et sans reproche, in the byways of the city doubt and suspicion were turned upon him. Almost since the inception of the manager system a coterie of energetic politicians led by Harry L. Davis, sometime mayor and governor, a passé Republican leader, have made repeated efforts to overthrow the new order. Twice before in the last two years they have staged an unsuccessful referendum for the abolition of the managerial office. Pertinacious as only disgruntled politicians can be and spurred by the notoriety of the land scandals, they succeeded again a short time ago in attaching the requisite number of names to a petition for a referendum to amend the city charter. In the framing of the proposed amendment ex-Mayor and Governor Davis was associated with two obscure Democrats whose names have the inestimable virtue of alliteration with his, so that their proposal could be popularized as the "Three D" plan and could be promulgated as thoroughly non-partisan. It provided for a complete return to the old order, the restoration of the office of mayor to its pristine glory as an elective office, and the abolition of proportional representation in the election of the council.

The advocates of the "Three D" plan professed to believe—and doubtless some of them were sincere about it—that the appointment of the chief executive of the city by a handful of councilmen is scandalously undemocratic. In the name of American democracy they organized a crusade to return the government of the city to the people. They pointed out that the city manager has all the powers of a mayor but that he is not directly responsible to the people and that his tenure of office is virtually unlimited. They asserted that if a mayor had been at the head of the municipal government during the recent scandals the opposition party would have moved him out at the next election as fast as a cat can eat sardines. With perfect cogency they made the further point that in the absence of the stir and interest of an election for mayor there is now a general apathy at the municipal elections, and that consequently important reforms are almost impossible of achievement.

The Democratic organization of the city came out in support of the retention of the manager system. Mr. Maschke and the Republican organization aligned themselves with the "Three D" amendment, deserting the manager plan for the first time since its adoption. Presumably Mr. Maschke, an astute, straight-shooting politician if ever there was one, has found the manager system a nuisance. Hopkins is probably too firmly in the saddle to suit his shrewd idea of good government. No political machine can expect to function perfectly when the biggest office cannot be properly rotated.

The defenders of the manager plan organized a Progressive Government Committee of 150 prominent citizens which bore an imposing aura of respectability. It included such personages as John H. Clarke, former associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver, and Cleveland's justly famed philanthropist, Samuel Mather. Even Bishop Joseph Schrembs of the Cleveland Catholic diocese added his earnest voice in behalf of the manager system. A score of colored ministers came out against the "Three D" amendment because the abolition of proportional representation would deprive the colored community of its representative in the city council. The three newspapers of the city, Republican, Democratic, and Scripps-Howard, vigorously supported the manager plan.

At the polls on August 20 the people of Cleveland voted by a scant majority of 3,000 in a total vote of 97,000 to continue the city-manager system. The Progressive Government Committee, waging a vigorous house-to-house campaign to save the city from political retrogression, defeated the Maschke organization by a not too comfortable margin. The committee succeeded, in a city where civic consciousness runs unusually high, in rallying the support of independent voters who, though sensible that new "manager" often looks like old "mayor" writ large, saw nothing to gain in returning to the old order. The mass of the liberal German vote undoubtedly upheld the new system. That the vaunted Maschke machine failed to "deliver" has this happy purport for the immediate future: that the city manager can cease to take orders from the Republican national committeemen who put him into office.

But the fight over the city-manager system is by no means over. After so close a vote in the charter plebiscite the opponents of the new policy will be encouraged to make renewed efforts to overthrow it. Moreover, in the background of city politics in Cleveland looms a figure, unique in the American political scene, who will yet stir unpredictable developments in the government of the city. Peter Witt, sometime ironmolder, later city traction commissioner, and more recently chief dissenter in the city council, has a large and enthusiastic following who are bent on making him, sooner or later, chief executive of the city. Last fall he swept the county in the contest for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. It was he who led the triumphant campaign for La Follette in 1924 and the campaign for Al Smith in 1928. He is an old and ardent follower of Tom Johnson and the present outstanding representative of the Johnsonian tradition. Once every year he holds a "town meeting" at which he ventilates with merciless candor any subject which arises for discussion, from local political thimblerigging to the apostasy of Woodrow Wilson in entering the war. Everybody knows that, were the managership abolished, Witt would make an eminently able and honest mayor and that his accession to office would make every cheap politician in the town squirm with discomfort. The more venturesome, they say, would incontinently migrate to Pittsburgh. Witt is the man who, when he was city traction commissioner, turned back a check for several thousand dollars sent him by the railway company as royalty for a new car he had invented, refusing the money on the ground that he had devised the car in his public capacity as traction commissioner. It was not a pose; that is just the kind of person he is. His presence in the city as an available mayor of the Johnsonian cast is, and will continue to be, a curious embarrassment to the stability of the manager system. Obviously he cannot be made city manager; no set of councilmen would imperil their political comfort by the appointment of such an executive.

In its broader aspects it is well that the Cleveland plebiscite has turned out as it has. The abandonment of the manager system by the largest of American cities which has yet adopted it would plainly and very gravely have discredited the whole movement for the progressive and less political forms of municipal government.

In the Driftway

ACROSS the street from the editorial offices of The Nation lies old St. Paul's churchyard, a sward of quiet green among glaring skyscrapers. In the churchyard are graves some of which were dug back in the eighteenth century. Weather-worn upright stones mark most of those graves; some have horizontal slabs laid prone upon them. The eastern boundary of the churchyard is Broadway, and right beside that highway is St. Paul's Chapel, put up in 1766, the only pre-Revolution church building still standing in New York City. When St. Paul's was built, Broadway at that point was little more than a lane to the country, and the building was faced west toward the churchyard—which then ran all the way to the Hudson River—while the back of the church was turned frigidly upon what has since become the most famous thoroughfare in the three Americas. So the church stands today, its fine old colonial steeple looking down on the churchyard and its clockface telling the editors of The Nation when to go out to luncheon, while under its rear eaves Broadway roars and rumbles and rushes on its way.

* * * * *

CHAPEL and churchyard are beautiful as well as historic, and never more so than in early spring. Then the grass shines in a new coat of emerald green and the sprangling boughs of the locust trees put out their feathery network of swaying leaves. Then the sun, long lost behind winter's grimy haze, shines warmly inviting, and the office girls of the neighborhood come with their luncheon—or after they've had it—to sit among the tombstones and revel in the vigor of life that beats in their young arteries. There, over sepulchers a century or more old, they talk of their work and their pleasures, their loves and their hopes, their successes and their disappointments—a fabric of life so continuous with that which a hundred years ago occupied the now quiet sleepers underground that there seems no incongruity between the two groups. Time ceases to exist, and changes in dress, the substitution of motor cars for horse-drawn carriages, the displacement of buildings a few stories high by steel projectiles piercing the canopy of the sky, become meaningless trifles.

* * * * *

THE building which contains the offices of The Nation was put up for the New York Evening Post more than twenty years ago. The saying of some wag was then current that the reason why New York City was so wicked was that the Sun, coming out in the morning (it did then), made vice attractive, while the Post, coming out in the evening, made virtue repulsive. Somebody else unkindly suggested that the reason why the Evening Post was moving over opposite St. Paul's churchyard was to be close to its readers. Chapel and churchyard have changed hardly at all outwardly in the years that have followed. But time seems to have been gnawing all unseen at St. Paul's steeple, and now they are about to take it down and replace the wood with metal, it is announced, though preserving intact the present design. Also they are going to clean and repair the entire outside of the church. To accomplish this double job the walls and steeple have been shrouded in scaffolding. A kind of scaffolding has been used which to the Drifter, at least, is new. Hollow iron piping about two inches in diameter and fifteen or twenty feet in length has been employed. The piping is bolted piece upon piece, and looks both neater and more secure than the usual scaffolding of irregular old timbers. Boards are used only as flooring over the successive tiers of piping. The Drifter has watched the erection of this scaffolding with a fascinated eye. It has been a thorough job and a slow one; probably also it has been an expensive one. But as to that who should worry, for St. Paul's is a chapel of Trinity parish, which, as everybody knows, has an income bigger even than that of a movie star or staress of the first magnitude. The last item of construction consisted in covering the outside of the scaffolding with wire screen. This makes it hard to see through the scaffolding, and perhaps the idea is to protect the workmen from the prying eyes of the street. Or perhaps to shield them from flies or mosquitoes. Trinity parish is philanthropic as well as rich.

* * * * *

THE only question is whether Trinity is as wise as it is rich and philanthropic. Will the new steeple look just like the old one? We ought to be able to trust an organization as rich and philanthropic as Trinity, but when we recall that it allowed the most beautiful of all its chapels —St. John's—to be demolished because of a dwindling congregation, there is ground for some uneasiness. If the famous old steeple is materially altered in appearance, many New Yorkers will wish that it had been allowed to tumble down instead—preferably when the trustees of Trinity were assembled underneath.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Classical Foreshadowing

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Now that Mr. Dole, in The Nation of August 14, has so delightfully conjured from the word volemus in Catullus's poem an "immortal reference to aviation," it may be of further interest to note that the graceful Roman poet flew in a hydroplane. This supposedly modern means of travel is easily identified, by anyone who reads his Latin with genial understanding, in the opening lines of the poem (IV) that Catullus wrote at the end of his flight:

> Phaselus ille, quem videtis, hospites, > ait fuisse navium celerrimus,
> neque ullius natantis impetum trabis > nequisse praeterire, sive palmulis > opus foret volare sive linteo.
>
> Behold, my friends, this little boat
> That brags she once could fly so fast
> There was no speedier ship afloat.
> Them all, ON OARS OR WINGS, she passed.

The traveler in these classic realms of gold has many another "wild surmise" coming to him if he journey under the proper auspices. Thus, in the previously cited poem of aviation fame, caeli furor aequinoctialis—the equinoctial roar—clearly indicates static, the bane of radio. From laeti studio pedes we may deduce the prototype of the bunion derby; and who cannot see in comitum coetus—bands of fellow-travelers—the Cook tourists of those days?

Homer's and Vergil's famous "winged words" undoubtedly constitute an equally immortal reference to the radiophone!

Harold Whitman Reed

Reading, Massachusetts, August 15

Are the Films Ungrateful?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The movies have long since passed the billion-dollar mark as an industry. Wall Street reports that profits for the leading film companies ran into many millions for the last half year; but it is a melancholy fact that many of the men whose inventive and creative genius produced the means to establish and develop this billion-dollar industry are in actual want.

Among such men are Jean Acme LeRoy and Eugene Augustin Lauste. It is no exaggeration to say that but for their inventions the great industry which they helped to father would not today exist. Jean LeRoy designed and invented the first motion-picture projection machine, the cinematograph, which antedated by more than a year the better advertised projector of Jenkins and Armat, the Edison vitascope. Lauste's invention of recording and reproducing sound photographically, originally patented in Great Britain in 1906, forms the basis for all the photographic processes used to make the talking picture today. Lauste also designed and built the eidoloscope, recorded in screen history as the second projection machine to be invented. The modern motion-picture booth for fire protection was originally conceived and designed by LeRoy.

Today both LeRoy and Lauste, now in their middle seventies, enfeebled by age and broken in health, are practically without resources and dependent upon the uncertain help of a few friends. LeRoy is partially paralyzed and unable to work. Lauste has unsuccessfully sought employment on the research or engineering staffs of the larger film companies, yet he doubtless has a greater knowledge of the mysteries and mechanics of recording and reproducing sound photographed on film than any man living. The need of these men is real, and they deserve far better of the industry which they helped to make possible.

New York, August 7 Merritt Crawford

Nothing to Write

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your note about the Köbenhavn came as a relief. I had given up all hopes of ever seeing her name or fate mentioned after the brief inconspicuous paragraph of June 26.

You say: "There is nothing to write. There is no fire, no wreck, no collision to chronicle." Yet, think of the space given by the newspapers to the Cyclops, which disappeared during war time, when there were possibilities of being torpedoed or ramming a floating mine.

A year or so ago I had the pleasure of seeing the Köbenhavn under full sail off Easter Island. Later I saw her tied up in Adelaide, Australia. What a beauty she was! I managed while in Adelaide to get a snapshot of her—she dwarfs a good-sized steam trading vessel tied alongside. And what a fine crew—all young boys. And yet nothing to write!

East Orange, New Jersey, August 16 S. E. Cross

More Light on the Light Stamp

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In The Nation for August 14 you attribute the issuance of the Edison postage stamp to some secret machination on the part of the power trust. You may therefore be interested in the following facts:

I had for years been attempting to secure the issuance of an Edison stamp, on the ground that our government did wrong to limit the list of those honored by places on its stamps to politicians and soldiers only. About three years ago the Exchange Club of Duluth joined me in applying to the Postal Department for the issuance of the Edison stamp, and we appealed also to President Coolidge, himself an Exchangeite. It has been the understanding of the Exchange Club that the stamp was issued because of their insistence.

Duluth, August 17 Thomas Hall Shastid

Paying for Petroleum

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Professor Chafee, in his interesting Prosperity, in The Nation of July 24, reiterates the oft-repeated legend that "petroleum bids fair to be exhausted within a century from the opening of the first oil-well." It is calculated that North Carolina alone has enough shale oil to supply us at the present rate of consumption for a thousand years—and water-power or electricity may supplant it within a few years.

Of course, it is not practicable, at the present cost of roasting it out, to compete with the present oil, which certainly costs little or nothing, being paid for in by-products. Science could and would soon reduce those costs if the product could be sold. But there are "interests" which find their account in reiterating the cry that our oil is on the point of exhaustion. This makes us content to pay 25 cents per gallon, which is profitable to some corporations.

New York, August 2 Bolton Hall

Books and Vaudeville

Abandoned Mill: New Bedford

By JAMES RORTY

Ten million yards of calico should be Enough, he thought; so when the old man died
The sudden silence of those idiot looms
Bloomed like a flower on his grave; there was
No need of more; the windows of the mill
Stared blear-eyed like a brothel at a world
Gone mad and lustless; twice a day the tide
Clawed at the concrete, sucked and sniffed
Beneath the rotten planking; children came
And stoned the old mill blind, and that was good.
It cannot sail; it cannot even see
The ships, the living ships go grandly out
At dawn and twilight, wooing with vague sails
The winds of ocean, weaving with bright prows
Ten million leagues of silver spray.

Repulse

By MARIE DE L. WELCH

There is disheartening secrecy in these woods
That blot the autumn brass of the hill-side.
Climb to them, enter; you will find them cool
And hostile and unwilling to confide
In you by so much as a shadow quickening
To life; by so much as a squeak. The floor
Of the woods is muffled in leaves to cover riches
Of fur and of beady eye and of delicate claw,
And flash of feather or whistle the branches' thickening
Keeps from you. The sullen woods will send you back
To the open hay fields, without showing you
Even the small courtesy of a raccoon's track!

Spying Out the Land

Recent Economic Changes in the United States. Two volumes. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $7.50.

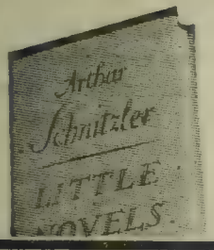
WHEN Moses sent his spies into the land of Canaan, they returned after forty days, it will be remembered, bearing upon a staff between two of them a great cluster of grapes, and reporting a land flowing with milk and honey. "Nevertheless," they informed the Hebrew lawgiver, "the people be strong that dwell in the land and the cities are walled and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there." Mr. Hoover's spies set out on their search of the American economic Canaan early in 1928. The first public account of their expedition last spring suggested that they had seen almost nothing but milk and honey but their full report to our contemporary Moses discloses the existence of various great walled cities, and even gives us a glimpse of an occasional son of Anak wandering in our promised land.

Mr. Hoover fortunately intrusted his survey to the National Bureau of Economic Research, to which students have come to look for fair and reliable studies of fact, intelligently interpreted. The bureau enlisted the cooperation of more than two dozen other private organizations, of the Federal and State governments, the universities, and scores of specially qualified individuals. Their findings, despite some avowed defects, constitute probably as good a picture of the economic position of the United States as it is possible to draw in our present state of knowledge. What do they show?

One cannot do better than quote Professor Mitchell's summary:

> This record presents striking contrasts. Consumption as a whole has increased, but the consumption of certain great staples has shrunk. While trade at large has flourished, certain branches have languished—notably ship-building, the railway-equipment industry, and agriculture; in less measure the textile, coal, and shoe trades. Pay-roll disbursements of factories have expanded, but manufacturing employment has diminished. Business profits have been large, but so also have been the number of bankruptcies. Great quantities of gold have flowed into the country, but wholesale prices have sagged much of the time. Income as a whole has grown larger, but important sections of the country have made little gain, and important occupations have suffered loss. . . . What has been happening in the United States is the latest phase of cumulative processes which have dominated western life since the industrial revolution got under way.

As Professor Gay points out in his thoughtful introduction, most foreign observers of our recent economic changes are inclined to lay emphasis on our unrivaled natural resources, our scarce labor and high wages and the consequent development of labor-supplementing machinery, our enormous free-trade market, our more or less scientific and open-minded business management, and finally our spirit of indomitable hopefulness. Mostly, these features of life are as old as America. But Professor Gay finds something new in our growing concern with the costs of economic progress, in our recognition that our natural resources are not limitless, in our restrictive attitude toward foreign labor, in the strength and stability of our finance, and in our increasing tolerance of the control of our national life by great business corporations.



As Dr. Wolman shows, the years since the war have seen a notable advance in our standards of living. There have been unprecedented increases in per capita expenditures for health, amusement, and education, and in the numbers of students in our higher institutions. We have diversified our diet, our clothes, and our houses, and have brought about a bewildering multiplication of manufactured goods, notably new ones like automobiles and radios, often at the cost of old staples. The great majority of us have "raised" our living standards by becoming dependent on a thousand new things; yet during the seven years under review more than two-fifths of our farm population, instead of developing new standards, have maintained their old ones only by creating a huge mortgage debt.

Reversing old trends, industry during these years has been growing less concentrated in highly developed areas and in the historical centers, and has been moving from city to country. Industrial mergers have proceeded rapidly, owing their success not to cheaper production but to more efficient marketing; and the big concerns seem to be achieving stability of prices and abundant profits to some extent at the cost of irregular operation, with all that that means for unemployment. These same years, of course, have seen an extraordinary development in marketing, with great changes in demand and the rise of new commodities, increase of advertising, growth of the chains, and increase in cooperative marketing of farm products. Whether, on the other hand, instalment sales have increased faster than total retail sales since 1923 is doubtful.

Labor, tamed and interested in new measure in production,

DRAWING from Words such Beauty as Kreisler draws from Strings

ARTHUR SCHNITZLER and the SOUL of VIENNA

IN a memorable tribute to the author of Little Novels, Ludwig Lewisohn says: "The chill winds of the harsh dawn of a new world blow angrily about the aging master. He remembers his youth . . . Nothing can exceed the smooth, firm beauty of Schnitzler's style and technique . . . This is the Vienna, this the Salzburg of the days of the Empire. Life had a neo-Pagan elegance, an autumnal charm. . ."

It is customary indeed to characterize Arthur Schnitzler as the quintessence of Vienna. He evokes not only the glow and tragedy of love in Vienna . . . but the music of Vienna in the nuances of his prose . . . the science of Vienna in his researches into the sub-conscious . . . the craftsmanship of Vienna in his skill . . .

For more than three decades Arthur Schnitzler's short stories, novelettes and dramas have been acclaimed by critics and readers for their tenderness, their wit, their compassion, their melancholy splendor. In the last few years, the American success of Fräulein Else, Rhapsody, Beatrice, Daybreak and Therese have consolidated a growing fame and brought to many readers the unduplicable glamour of his art.

WHO can weave the pattern of Viennese life with such magic as Arthur Schnitzler . . . drawing from words the same haunting beauty that Kreisler draws from strings? Who can so effectively blend the enchantment and disenchantment, the arrogance and humility, the tragedy and high comedy of love on the shores of the song-laden Danube?

In Little Novels, the author of Fräulein Else, Rhapsody, Daybreak, Beatrice and Anatol, again peers into the sub-conscious with the eye of genius—the eye that illuminates and holds spell-bound.

Most of these ten tales, employing that gravely ironical manner which is Schnitzler's own, deal with the relations between men and women. One or two, such as The Prophecy, treat startlingly of the workings of Fate, and the finest of the collection, a masterpiece among masterpieces, is a tenderly beautiful study of the love between a blind man and his brother.

Anyone who begins the Fate of the Baron, which opens this collection of Little Novels, will not put down these pages until the last paragraph of the final story, The Death of a Bachelor.

In these ten Little Novels (for their compactness surely entitles them to this term), the publishers believe that they are offering to Schnitzler's eager and growing American audience the perfect flower of the genius of the Viennese master. The book has just been published and is on sale at your own bookstore for $2.50.

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers · 37 West 57th Street · New York

"LITTLE NOVELS"

a new book by ARTHUR SCHNITZLER and now protected by our immigration laws from a great influx of foreign competitors, has seen the nominal work-week reduced by five hours since 1914, and there have been striking wage advances. As productivity has risen yet faster, however, labor costs, broadly, have continued to fall. Contrary to the popular impression (and, it may be added, to much informed opinion), Dr. Wolman can find no marked changes in the stability of employment as compared with the pre-war period. Unemployment is a veritable son of Anak. From 1921 to 1927 the number of unemployed, on the lowest estimate, was above a million and a half in the best year, 1923, and nearly three times as great in 1921. Yet labor on the whole was probably never so well off, materially speaking, as it has been during these recent years.

Agriculture, according to Dr. Nourse, has been suffering severely since the war because of the disruption of demand both at home and abroad, high expenses not yet adjusted to lowered prices, and extraordinary supply in many lines, due to war stimulation, to the unregulated use of land, and especially to power farming. Fewer farmers can now produce more food and materials. We have therefore got to see, as we are now seeing, a large shift of population and a sound business reorganization with heavier capitalization. The situation means great difficulty for the individual farmer, and Dr. Nourse sees no prospect of "swift or comprehensive relief of the situation," though individuals are making profits and some localities are prosperous.

Professor Mills notes the steadily continued increase in the production and distribution of goods during the years 1922-1927, accompanying a gentle downward movement of prices—an uncommon phenomenon in American economic experience; while Professor Sprague and Dr. Burgess call attention to the effects of abundant capital supply, great gold reserves, and foreign loans, and suggest a certain influence of the Federal Reserve system in lessening business fluctuations. Professor Copeland's useful study of income and its distribution indicates that our widely touted prosperity has been confined to the Middle Atlantic, East North Central, and Pacific States, which include less than half the population and receive somewhat more than half the national income. The study also indicates that prosperity is as yet a long way off from making everybody rich, though Professor Copeland finds little to show that employees have been getting any decreased share of the national income during recent years, and he finds no evidence that the richer people have been getting either a larger or a smaller proportion than usual.

To undertake once more the difficult task of summary, we may quote Professor Mitchell's conclusion that basically it is by "applying intelligence to the day's work more effectively" that we have succeeded in raising per capita income (expressed in 1925 dollars) from the $621 of 1913 and the $656 of 1917 to $625 in 1922 and $733 in 1926. "Good times" for a majority of the people—yes; but the gain, like the income of the earlier period, has been spread most unequally among different classes, different industries, and different sections of the country, and some of them have not shared in it at all. No continuance of the gain is assured, and in any case it is to be had only by bold and intelligent work. There is no ground in this whole study, then, for complacency, no real foundation for prosperity "blah" of the Coolidge variety. The committee are clear, however, that "to maintain the dynamic equilibrium of recent years is, indeed, a problem of leadership which more and more demands deliberate public attention and control. Research and study, the orderly classification of knowledge, joined to increasing skill, well may make complete control of the economic system a possibility."

What more could intelligent critics of competitive capital ask? During the past half century we have been learning much of the necessity of finding substitutes or supplements for profit-grabbing private "leadership" in getting effective control of the economic system. We have devised non-profit-making public agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Power Commission, and other much-criticized but absolutely essential public agencies. We shall go farther, and here is the Hoover committee blessing the movement. But to what end? As far as the document before us indicates, just that we may have more "prosperity." And why more prosperity? Apparently Mr. Hoover and his associates might fairly reply: "Why, we never thought about that." If the public attention that they invoke should be devoted to a preliminary consideration of the real relation between wealth and well-being, the new possibilities of wealth production might really come to mean more and better life.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Citizens Grown and Made

Civic Training in Soviet Russia. By Samuel Northrup Harper. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

Great Britain: A Study of Civic Loyalty. By John Merriman Gaus. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

THESE two volumes introduce a series of studies whose purpose, as announced by the editor, Professor Charles E. Merriam of the University of Chicago, is that of "examining objectively the systems of civic cohesion in a group of states, of determining the broad trends of civic training in these modern states, and of indicating possibilities in the further development and control of civic education." A mere turning of the pages is enough to show that the books are entirely different from the manuals of "civics" or government which abound in this country, and that they have no apparent didactic or pedagogical purpose whatever. They are scholarly studies, planned on broad lines, of the influences, some of them direct and others remote, which a state brings to bear upon its people to make them the kind of citizens they are.

As between Great Britain and Russia, of course, the contrast is striking. Where one expects development, the other offers revolution. The British citizen is what he is as a result of a long process of growth, and it is unlikely that he will be, in any near future, very different from what he has been in the past. The Russian, on the other hand, has broken violently with his past, and is being urged deliberately, and on a grand scale, toward a future whose ultimate characteristics cannot with precision be foretold. The very term "civic training" seems almost a misnomer in Britain, so indirect and informal is much of the process; while organization, discipline, the systematic inculcation of theory, and comprehensive and minute supervision of practice are of the essence of the elaborate and aggressive Russian program. The British citizen, in short, largely grows; the Russian citizen is actually being made.

The extraordinary wealth of material which Professor Harper assembles is not easily summarized. In Russia, civic training is one of the "fronts" of a struggle which is making a new nation out of an old one. Civic obligation rests upon a foundation of labor and economic policy. The citizen must be a producer, and his "productive qualification" looks to the upbuilding of a Communist state "by the road of socialism." This idea of a new social order, accordingly, is offered to the Russian as "in practice a substitute for the idea of patriotism in a national state, and has tended to nationalize the revolution as well as glorify civic activity." Moreover, the Soviet system "aims to retrain a whole people along new lines," and "the politics of the revolution are made to penetrate all institutions, organizations, and fields of activity."

Borzoi Books for "Nation" Readers

SOME DAY you will read the Borzoi Books listed below. Out of the thousands of books published every year, these are indeed the work of immortals—men and women of our own time whose names will surely appear in the literary histories of tomorrow. These are books that a well read person cannot overlook—hardy perennials from the gardens of great literature—the sort of books that your children's children will some day read. Add them to your library now.

Alfred A. Knopf

GREEN MANSIONS
by W. H. Hudson
$2.50 in the regular edition
$3.50 in the Borzoi Classics
$1.00 in the Borzoi Pocket Books

THE THREE BLACK PENNYS
by Joseph Hergesheimer $2.50

GROWTH OF THE SOIL
by Knut Hamsun
$5.00 2 volumes boxed
$2.50 Lofoten edition, 1 volume
$5.00 Holiday edition, morocco, 1 vol.
$2.00 in a Pocket Edition

PETER WHIFFLE
by Carl Van Vechten $4.00
Illustrated, Gift Edition

ANGELS AND EARTHLY CREATURES
by Elinor Wylie $2.50

THE PEASANTS
by Ladilas Reymont
Vol. 1 Summer Vol. 3 Winter
Vol. 2 Autumn Vol. 4 Spring
$2.50 each 4 volumes boxed, $10.00

THE DECLINE OF THE WEST
by Oswald Spengler
$13.50 2 volumes boxed

THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN
by Thomas Mann
$6.00 2 vols. boxed $3.50 1 vol.

THE COUNTERFEITERS
by Andr´ Gide $3.00

DEATH COMES FOR THE ARCHBISHOP by Willa Cather $2.50

THE CHILD IN AMERICA
Behavior Problems and Programs by William E. Thomas and Dorothy Swaine Thomas

A most important discussion of the behavior difficulties of children and the various programs of experimentation and treatment now in use. $6.00

RECONSTRUCTING BEHAVIOR IN YOUTH
A Study of Problem Children in Foster Homes by William Healy, Edith M. Baylor, Augusta F. Bronner and J. Prentice Murphy

An unusual study of attempts to modify undesirable behaviour tendencies in children by placing them in foster homes. Based on 500 actual cases. $4.00

THE MOST ANCIENT EAST
by V. Gordon Childe

The development of Eastern civilization from the earliest known life of prehistoric man to 3000 B. C. With many illustrations. $5.00

LYSISTRATA
by Maurice Donnay

A brilliant modern adaptation of Aristophanes' classic. Edited with a preface by George Jean Nathan. $2.00

THE A. B. C. OF NERVES
by D. F. Fraser-Harris, M.D.

A simple and authoritative description of the nervous system in its relation to such phenomena as pain, sleep and dreams. $2.50

KRISTIN LAVRANSDATTER
by Sigrid Undset

Winner of the Nobel Prize for 1928 ". . . The best-liked book our judges have ever chosen."—The Book-of-the-Month Club. $3.50

THE MODERN FAMILY
by Ruth Reed

The evolution of the family and its readjustment to such modern conditions as the rise of the individual, the independence of woman and the modern view of divorce. $3.00

THE REBELS
by Alfred Neumann
Author of The Devil

Italy in the days of the Carbonari. The greatest novel of its kind since Gide's The Counterfeiters. $2.50

RED CAVALRY
by Isaac Babel

Gripping realistic sketches of Cossack life told by the only Jew in the regiment. A great book from Soviet Russia. $2.50

ORIGIN THROUGH EVOLUTION
by Nathan Fasten

A popular survey of evolution and natural selection which brings Darwin's theories up-to-date. Illustrated. $4.00

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES
by Hugh L. Keenleyside

The first adequate description of the unique relations between us and our best customer. With maps. $4.00

FAREWELL TO PARADISE
by Frank Thiess
Author of Interlude

How a childhood romance secretly bore to Wolf and Suzanne their first realization of love. $2.00

ALFRED · A · KNOPF 730 FIFTH AVE., N. Y.

The "personality factor" in a system which assumes the existence of classes and a class struggle finds recognition in the Communist Party, with its Union of Youth for young men and women and its Pioneers for the children, of each of which organizations Professor Harper gives a detailed description. With the landlord abolished and the bourgeoisie and rich peasantry merely tolerated, "the interests of workmen and peasants are the only ones considered and as between these two the interests of the workmen are given priority," although a third group made up of wage-earning office workers is also found. The trade unions, now embracing "the overwhelming majority of wage-earners," are looked upon as "a school of communism," while the cooperative societies "are considered steps toward socialism." A long list of civic organizations, as well as schools of all grades and the universities, have their places in this system of state-controlled and Communist-directed education, and newspapers and periodicals, museums and excursions, celebrations and processions, literature, art, music, the radio, and the cinema are parts of the educational technique. From infancy to old age, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, the Russian has held out to him the conception of a Soviet form of state, rigorously kept in hand by the Communist Party with its carefully guarded conditions of membership, but at the same time of a state whose leaders appear to be watchfully critical of its performance, and ready to drop one method and try another in order to get the results they desire.

Professor Gaus, naturally, has nothing so spectacular or novel as the Russian experiment to record, notwithstanding that he, too, examines the practical as well as the inferential obligations of British citizenship, the procedure of elections and campaigns, the pervasive influence of social classes in a society which is still a good deal stratified, and the parts played by the schools, the older and new universities, the church, and the press in political life. In Britain, civic loyalty is molded by the king as the personification of the state, by the recognition of law as the expressed will of the majority, by the relegation of great areas of administration to a permanent civil service, by openings for careers in the colonies and other overseas possessions, and by the position which the nation holds in international affairs. Both Professor Gaus and Professor Harper, indeed, have swept so wide a field that their books are not only extremely valuable examinations of contrasted methods of civic training, but admirable surveys of contemporary political and social conditions as well.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Biggest Ranch in America

The X I T Ranch of Texas. By J. Evetts Haley. Chicago: The Lakeside Press.

IN 1882 the State of Texas contracted to deliver 3,000,000 acres of land in exchange for a capitol building. The land lay out in the Panhandle on the edge of the world, as the world then extended toward the west, and the company that took it soon saw that the time was not yet ripe for cutting it up and selling it out; they decided to develop it into a ranch. The result was the famous X I T ranch—the largest single ranch that the United States has yet known or ever can know. The history of that ranch has now been written, and written with a sense of relative values, a realization of backgrounds, a soundness coupled with charm lacking in a majority of the best histories of the nation's States. How the cattle were bought and then how cow thieves were fought, how lobo wolves were chased, how windmills were put up—to be burned down by rustlers—how prairie fires swept the plains and were controlled, how the cowboys felt "when the grass began to grow" and the trail to another X I T ranch in Montana a thousand miles away became strung with herds, how old Tascosa on the Canadian River reared its Boot Hill graveyard, and then, finally how nesters came in, buying up the land and plowing the trails under—all this and much more is told by Mr. Haley in a style swift, packed, concrete, and exceedingly readable. The book transcends by far the purely local nature that its subject might imply.

J. FRANK DOBIE

Personalities and Platitudes

Mountain Against Mountain. By Arthur Davison Ficke. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $1.50.

Bitter Sweet Poems. By Rebecca McCann. Covici, Friede. $2.

Noah's Dove. By Laura Benét. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

Poems of the Chinese Revolution. By Hsi-Tseng Tsiang. Published privately. $.25.

SUCH dissimilar and uneven verse as this calls for neither the perfect word of praise nor the final term of disparagement. Except for two unexpected and excellent poems by Mr. Ficke, these four recent books are of slight individual importance. Considered collectively, the group is interesting for its different motives, its various treatments, and its diverse effects.

In "Mountain Against Mountain" there are two short narratives which reveal a peculiarly poetic temperament. Paris 1917 is a series of emotional realizations, beginning with "the flaunt of the bands and banners . . . as our long gray ship swept out of the harbor," and ending on Armistice Day when "all this has been a dream, too dark for telling." With incidental humor, the best passages describe Paris as "still the old and sacred wanton," enveloped now in gray mists of doubtful hopes and fears. In its unending search for revealing experiences we see the mystic personality of the poet looking beyond the dim realities of the moment. There is much of this same quality in The Return of Christ (a theme suggested by Witter Bynner and on which he, too, will publish a poem). This more sustained narrative is a story of the second crucifixion: from Tai Shan, the Most Sacred Mountain, comes a Stranger, teaching that men should marvel and live, neither worship nor pray; but this idea is so foreign to missionary doctrine that Christ is mistaken for Satan and stoned. Although they fall far short of greatness, the lyrics which fill out the volume are seldom trivial or commonplace. Each one gives evidence of Mr. Ficke's unusual imaginative faculty. For example, Two Score Years and Ten, which develops the thought of these opening lines:

> Not with a futile wrath but with composure
> The wiser mortals learn their certain fate,
> Youth ends in a cold twilight of disclosure;
> And for youth's follies it is then too late.

The vast newspaper audience that knew her as the creator of "The Cheerful Cherub" will find in Rebecca McCann's posthumous collection of verse much that is closely akin to the delightful nonsense which characterized that earlier work. In these poems, however, there is a sophisticated and often cynical humor, sometimes an entirely serious lyricism. Apparently her work was turning in the latter direction when it was brought suddenly to a close. Thus, unrepresentatively but irresistibly, we quote:

> The silver birch is so refined,
> White virgin thoughts are in her mind:
> Yet to the wind, when night was dim,
> I saw her wave a moonlit limb.

Although many different things are attempted in the slen-

Never Before a Book Club offer like this

12 BOOKS FOR $5

To see how fine they are clip the coupon. It brings you

ONE BOOK FREE!

THE cost of good new books has now been reduced to a figure lower than ever before—42c each!

Think what it means! Important new books for 1/5 or 1/6 the usual trade edition prices . . . for 1/3 what you would pay even under the ordinary book-club plan.

Books never before published for only 42c each

Briefly, here is how this astonishing innovation was accomplished.

The Paper Books have combined the European idea of binding books in paper with the economies of the American book-club plan. These economies permit even lower prices than are possible in Europe, and we pass them on to readers of Paper Books in the form of ■ big cash saving. And the Paper Books are even more beautiful than most new books published at from $2.50 to $5.00 each.

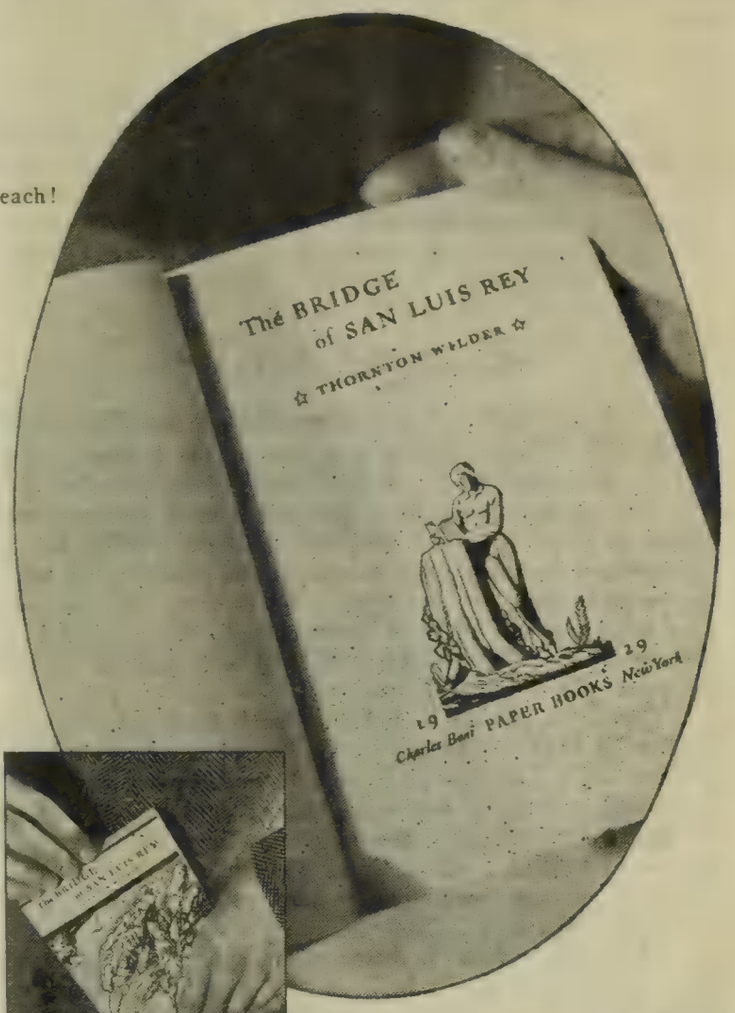
How to obtain Paper Books

Send us the coupon below. So that you may see for yourself how fine the Paper Books are, we send "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," by Thornton Wilder, free. This book has been published before, of course. Perhaps you have read it. But you have never seen it in the Paper Books format and we urge you to send for it. If you like this Paper Book, send us $5.00. Then, in addition to this free book, for a whole year you receive ■ new and worthwhile book every month. Twelve books for $5.00. Less than 42c each!

Other advantages

In spite of the low cost at which we are bringing Paper Books to the American public, we have made these books even more attractive than ordinary editions of the new novels, works or history, biography, or travel.

Paper Books are exquisitely beautiful. They are sturdily made, conveniently portable. The cover design, end papers, and decorations, were especially designed for The Paper Books by Rockwell Kent, internationally famous artist. The type pages were designed by Elmer Adler, eminent among book designers.



The Paper Books are as strong as they are beautiful. They are printed on attractive antique finish paper with strong, durable reinforced covers.

The books you receive will be both fiction and non-fiction, by both American and European authors. They will be important books. And they will be standard in size.

To assure the literary quality of the Paper Books the distinguished group, pictured below, will select ■ Paper Book each month from the most vivid and significant work being done today.

The names of the Board of Editors are sufficient guarantee of the rare quality of the books to be included in this remarkable series.

Yet the cost of the twelve Paper Books is only $5.00, ■ modest sum that leaves your book budget practically untouched. This feature has appealed strongly to many readers.

The Paper Books are all full length volumes but we have made them small enough to be conveniently carried in your pocket.

Only a short time ago the Paper Books were first announced. And already thousands of book lovers have greeted the Paper Books with enthusiasm. Libraries . . . professional literary men and women . . . scholars and teachers . . . all who are interested in the cultural aspects of American life have seen in the Paper Books an idea of immense value to all who care for good books.

PLEASE ACCEPT THIS BOOK FREE

Send us this coupon. By return mail we will send you, postpaid, in the Paper Books format, "The Bridge of San Luis Rey," by Thornton Wilder.

After you have examined this book, send us $5.00 within 5 days—or return the book. Do not wait—send coupon now!

THE BOARD OF EDITORS OF THE PAPER BOOKS

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN

PADRAIC COLUM

HORACE M. KALLEN

LOUIS UNTERMEYER

LINCOLN COLCORD

PAPER BOOKS N 4

Charles Boni, Publisher, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Please send me, free, "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" by Thornton Wilder. Within 5 days after receiving the book I will send you $5.00 for a charter subscription for the Paper Books, or return the book. Send check with coupon if you prefer.

Name .....

Street ..... City .....

($5.50 in Canada, $6.00 abroad)

Charles Boni* PAPER BOOKS 66 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK

der volume called "Noah's Dove," the charm of Miss Benét's poetry is to be found, if anywhere, in her imagery. Whether such an imaginative quality is unnatural and forced, or whether it is uniquely vivid, must be left to the reader to decide. Let him consider these lines:

> Down the wide-eyed street
> Spring, like a young woman who has borne her child
> Goes with a halting walk.

and

> Day comes like silver water
> On sod of purple sleep.

Upton Sinclair's preface to Hsi-Tseng Tsiang's brochure adequately, and somewhat optimistically, explains that "what he has written is not perfect poetry, but it is the perfect voice of Young China, protesting against the lot of the under-dog."

J. Dana Tasker

Hunger Strike

Days of Fear. By Frank Gallagher. Harper and Brothers. $2.

FRANK GALLAGHER was one of the hunger strikers in Mountjoy Prison in 1920, and he kept this diary during his nine days' fast. He and a man, referred to in "Days of Fear" as Philip, accepted full responsibility for the starvation of one hundred men and for the conditions on which they would consent to eat again. Apart from its value as a piece of literature, which is great enough, this journal is an amazing record of what force of will and faith in a cause can do in face of physical suffering.

"The souls of men," declares Frank Gallagher, "are the weapons of God." In this case God chose a weapon of well-tempered steel. It endured violent fluctuations between sweet, even-running thoughts and ugly, leaping doubts and imagined horrors. A great deal of the book must have been written in a state of delirium, when Frank Gallagher was the battle-ground of internal revolutions, a kind of "personal Mexico," as he calls himself.

"Death," he wrote, "is the proof a skeptical world demands of a man's love of justice." It is good to think that men can face it, as he did, in the eye-aching dark of wakeful nights and have the mental strength to record and survive the experience.

Norah Meade

Coal and Oil

Petroleum and Coal: The Keys to the Future. By W. T. Thom, Jr. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

IT is a familiar bromide that fashions in literature change. The remark applies especially to the trend in the preparation of what might be called discursive books for the lay reader. Biography, history, and especially books of travel have already won their place. Purely instructional texts—the Mechanic's Handbook, Book-Binding Made Easy, and the like—have long been in demand. When Russell, Huntington, and Osborn write about their sciences and are read, the public's intellectual gastronomy may be described as having reached the stage of solid nutriment—at least, of fruit salad with dressing.

There remains only one field, still mainly unessayed—a description of knowledge and work in those applied sciences which, sufficiently "practical" to lack much contemplative or philosophical content, do yet not enter daily life enough to occupy space on the five-foot shelf of the housewife or her husband.

This is the kind of matter with which Professor Thom's book deals—the origin, conditions of occurrence, manner of recovery, and use of our two important fuels, coal and petroleum. It does hold food for purely abstract thought as well but the latter is not thrust upon the reader. For instance, inquiring minds may well ask, why the spasmodic distribution in time of those epochs when plants were so abundant that they formed immense peat swamps, later to be changed into coal. Is a periodic return of such prolific growth consistent with the pictures we used to hold, of a progressively chilling earth? The answer to ruminations of this scope must, of course, lie beyond the 200 pages of this book, already crowded by the more immediate subject.

But, even omitting the stimulus of such suggestions, the book is worth while. Few who use them know much about the origin of these two minerals, which together represent more than half of the annual mineral output of the United States, water alone omitted. Most of us think of an oil "dome" as a hill filled with oil and cannot understand why the term should be applied where the "dome" is a surface depression instead of an elevation. Exploration and development of oil fields is largely misunderstood, except in southern California and in Oklahoma and the surrounding region of the mid-continent field. By the layman the highly interesting and important innovations used in searching for buried mineral wealth by various physical tests—electrical, magnetic, gravimetric, and seismic—would be callously dismissed as comparable to the witch-hazel divining-rod formerly used in looking for water. From a conservational as well as a more immediately utilitarian viewpoint the competition between coal and oil is not to be lightly passed over and Professor Thom faces it clearly.

Charles H. Behre, Jr.

Travel Briefs

The Last Home of Mystery. By E. Alexander Powell. The Century Company. $4.

Mr. Powell is an experienced voyager and an entertaining writer. His later travel books are much superior to those he was turning out at the end of the war. There are, indeed, few Americans who know their way about the world better than he. It is therefore all the more to be regretted that he should have gone through India looking upon the people with a mind perverted by "Mother India." He has fallen into the worst of Miss Mayo's faults—the gross misuse of documentary authorities. Like Miss Mayo he goes back to the Abbé Dubois, speaking of his long-familiar book on Hindu customs as a little-known work, and quoting it, like his exemplar, without a word to warn the uninstructed reader that it was published 120 years ago, and written by a French Jesuit who, loathing India, described the country as he saw it before a single modern influence had begun to play upon its ancient society. It would be difficult to think of a meaner literary device than this. When Mr. Powell gets into his hidden land, Nepal, he is lively and appreciative; and he has the great advantage of describing a country which almost no Americans have had a chance of seeing.

The Outpost of the Lost. An Arctic Adventure. By General David L. Brainard. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.

General Brainard, a sergeant of the ill-fated Lady Franklin Bay expedition in 1881, is the only survivor, except for the commander, Major General A. W. Greely, who is still well and vigorous at an advanced age. No one whose memory carries back to this tragic Arctic expedition can forget the thrill of horror which went through the nation when it appeared at all but seven of Greely's men had perished by starvation, rgely through inexcusable blundering on the part of at least ıe relief expedition. Had succor been delayed another forty-ght hours there would probably not have been one man left ive to tell the tale of what it means to die by inches of arvation and be reduced to eating parts of shoes and leather ats. When the seven survivors were found (one of them died the return voyage) their tent had fallen down upon them and ey were too weak to set it up again. They lay alongside the dy of a comrade who had died four days previously. Gen-al Brainard, who is an excellent soldier—he was given a com-ssion as Second Lieutenant for his gallantry in the Arctic—d also an admirable man, tells this grisly story in the diary set rth in this book. On the whole the record of heroism of ese inexperienced American soldiers on Arctic exploration ty is one to compel admiration. One man had to be shot r stealing food. Brainard was one of the three who must ve executed him, but he does not reveal the secret of the tal shot, nor does his book throw any light on the charges a resort for food to human flesh, freely made at the time, d never wholly allayed.

he Land of Gods and Earthquakes. By Douglas Haring. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

Civilized, sympathetic, and sometimes humorous essays owing out of years of life in Japan.

ıshwhacking, and Other Asiatic Tales and Memories. By Sir Hugh Clifford. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

These are panting yarns of elephant-hunting, python-hunt-g, and man-hunting—chiefly man-hunting—in Ceylon and in e Malay lands. Sir Hugh is the stuff of which the British npire has been made. One moment he sheds a tear for a alay maid; the next, when his guns have broken into a Malay lage full of women and children, when his rockets have set e to Malay houses, and he, pistol in hand, is leading his mur-rous Sikhs across the intervening bog, he shouts: "This is a ıment worth living for." "Our experience in Asia," he says, ındly, "has taught us that it is impossible to avoid making a tle war of our own before we can hope to teach an unimagi-tive people the blessings of peace." His stories of his service, ıching the blessings of peace with modern ammunition, are netimes worthy of Kipling.

avijo: Embassy to Tamerlane, 1403-1406. Translated, with an Introduction, by Guy LeStrange. Harper and Brothers. $10.

Clavijo set out as emissary from the king of Spain in the ys when Timur, lord of Asia by his conquest of the Turks, d relieved the pressure on Christian Constantinople. Like arco Polo a century earlier, Clavijo found Mongol rule ıgnificent beyond European dreams. The vast tent city of markand, where he found the old ruler, was as novel to him the elephants Timur had brought from India and the giraffe ıt as a present from the Sultan of Egypt. Clavijo is less h, but his descriptions of Constantinople fifty years before its l, and of Tabriz and Samarkand, are more accurate than arco Palo's records of medieval Asia. Timur died before envoys were out of his realm, and the swift relays of post-rses carried the news ahead, so that the Europeans were ıght in the collapse of an Oriental dictatorship, when all the rs jealously fought one another. The present volume is sub-ntially a reissue of the 1859 translation with geographical ta corrected by modern notes.

The Nation* Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—570 K.
September 2—Mr. Norman Thomas
September 9—Mr. Paul Blanshard

JUST OUT

Shmarya Levin

CHILDHOOD IN EXILE

The life-story of the brilliant leader of the political life of the Jewish people, an almost legendary figure in Europe and America. Emerging suddenly from a world of mediaeval scholarship into the kaleidoscopic new Russia, his career as orator, scholar, political leader, man of action has made him the symbol of an age and of a people. $3.50

Count Hermann Keyserling

THE TRAVEL DIARY OF A PHILOSOPHER

A one-volume edition of his biggest work. $5.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York

$1.50 Subscribed NOW to the RATIONALIST PRESS ASSOCIATION Ltd.
will enable you to receive:

THE RATIONALIST ANNUAL for 1930. Contributions from Prof. Sir Arthur Keith, the Hon. Bertrand Russell, J. B. S. Haldane, Prof. H. J. Laski, C. E. M. Joad, etc.

CHARLES DARWIN'S ORIGIN OF SPECIES. Unabridged, 448 pages, bound.

WINWOOD READE'S MARTYRDOM OF MAN. 507 pp., cloth bound.

And four issues of The LITERARY GUIDE, the leading Rationalist monthly in the English-speaking world.

The R. P. A. Ld., 4 Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, LONDON, E. C. 4, (England).

Apartments

Let The Nation help solve your apartment problem. We are doing it all the time for others.

This* advertiser had an apartment to rent

"My apartment advertised in The Nation was rented the day the magazine appeared on the stands."

This* advertiser was looking for an apartment

"We've rented a delightful apartment through the ad we ran in your publication."

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08.
Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance, to

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York City

Telephone, Fitz Roy 9074

Vaudeville

Vaudeville's Prestige

IT is an acknowledged axiom that there are fashions in art—fashions which make one particular form of expression popular today and unpopular tomorrow. Less familiar, it seems, is the fact that there are arts in fashion, as well as arts not in fashion. Lithography, for instance, since its discovery by Senefelder one hundred and thirty years ago, has passed through alternating periods of popularity and neglect on the part both of the public and of the artists. Etching and water color have also had a rather checkered career. But the most remarkable instance of the influence of fashion we find in the recent history of the ballet. In the first decade of this century the stage ballet was regarded as a routine-ruled form of art, compounded mostly of acrobatics and entirely deficient in the creative spirit. The romantic revolution in the dance started by Isadora Duncan, Ruth Dennis, and a few others voiced the resentment of the cultured sections of the public with this state of the classical ballet, but the latter remained unaffected and continued to hold its position somewhere on the fringe of the aesthetic consciousness of the period. Then, in 1909, Serge Diaghileff, whose lamented death has just been recorded, opened his first season of Russian ballet in Paris, and the startled world suddenly realized that ballet, even classical Italian ballet, was not at all dead but merely slumbering, and that higher artistic standards and inspired leadership were enough to awaken it to a new life.

One recalls these facts in speaking of vaudeville, since today vaudeville is not in fashion. It is blighted by artistic decay to a degree that threatens its popularity even with its not very exacting patrons of today. In spite of the fifty thousand vaudeville artists in this country, the programs even in the leading American theaters seldom contain more than one or two really satisfying numbers. The rest are the veriest junk which only the utter degradation of vaudeville standards has permitted to be performed. The criticism will doubtless seem harsh to those who regard the situation from the point of view of the immediate interests of the profession. The trouble is that vaudeville has lost "class" as an art form, and this is only one step removed from ultimately losing itself.

The situation in which vaudeville is found today is not devoid of irony. Here is, by the standards it maintains, the lowliest form of stage entertainment, and yet fundamentally it is the highest of them all—a form of theatrical art richly fragrant with the glorious aroma of the theater, and, moreover, the only one that is capable of withstanding the onslaught of the talking picture. The rivalry between the stage and the screen may bring about certain commercial developments favoring the former or the latter, probably within the next few years. The artistic rivalry, however, the competition of quality, of merit, is certain to take a much longer time to reach the critical phase; and then the choice will lie not between the actor in the flesh and the actor in the shadow, but between the art of direct and personal appeal to the audience and the art of indirect and non-personal appeal. It will be realized that the modern dramatic stage, dominated largely by the desire to create a picture of life on the stage boards which carries the imagination into a world beyond the theater, will find in the improved talking picture (perfect speech, stereoscopic and color effects, and so on) an antagonist endowed with incomparably greater technical resources for creating that very illusion of a life existing outside the theater. There will be one weapon, however, which will never be found in the armory of the talking picture—the power of direct and personal appeal to the audience which today distinguishes the art of vaudeville more than any other form of stage entertainment. It will be, therefore, as the protagonist of this personal dramatic art, as against the impersonal art of the legitimate stage, that vaudeville is destined to play the decisive part in the final struggle between the stage and the screen.

There is still, then, the possibility of a great future for vaudeville, provided it can raise its standards to a level commonly accepted in other arts. Will it do so? The powers that be in the vaudeville world may well ponder over the fact that the policy of playing down to the uncultivated tastes of the audience is bound to defeat its own ends, for with a little more backsliding there will be finally no vaudeville left. On the other hand, they must overcome their fear of the so-called highbrow art. Surely, the devil is not as black as he is painted. One recalls again the Diaghileff ballet. It would be difficult to imagine anything more highbrow from the standpoint of democratic vaudeville than this old art of kings and princes decked out in the ultra modernistic trimmings of Montparnasse. And yet, just so embellished, the Diaghileff ballet drew the high and the low to the London Coliseum, as one of the acts of a vaudeville program, for two months every season during a period of several years.

So incredibly backward, so inert and self-complaisant has vaudeville been all these years that it was never for a moment disturbed by the stirring events in all the other arts which, since the beginning of this century, have revolutionized our very concept of beauty. The vaudeville stage platform today is the survival of the early nineteenth-century theater. Even more than the stage of the modern legitimate theater it betrays no effort to provide a physical foundation, a pedestal, a rostrum, for the frank display of the performer's talents. Vaudeville's attempts at pictorial effects are usually of the good old late-Victorian type, and, if modern, shriek with the vulgarity of the cheap magazine covers. In music it still clings to jazz and sentimental songs. The whole atmosphere of the American vaudeville today is compounded of routine effort and second-rate talent. It is time that vaudeville woke up. Otherwise it will share the fate of many another pastime that has been outlived and no longer satisfies.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

□ THEATERS □ CINEMA □

Coming—Saturday Sept. 7

First Showing in America! Direct from Moscow!
The Most Revolutionary Advance in the Motion Picture!

"LIVING RUSSIA or THE MAN WITH THE CAMERA"

Life in Russia — caught and revealed uncompromisingly with the naked lens.

A colossal cross-section of the pulsing existence in the Land of the Soviets.

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 W. 8th Street Spring 5095-5090
direction Symon Gould

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sherriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

Life and Property in the Caribbean

I. Protection of Life

By JONATHAN WICKWIRE

IT is unfortunate that our approaches to the Indian-Latin peoples to the south always have been and always are incidental or accidental and made in a spirit of tagonism. Ignorant alike of their resemblances and of eir differences, we have worked out in this country a vague ctrine of Pan-Americanism which assumes a non-existent ity of the entire American Continent.

Yet the term has a very real meaning at Washington, here Pan-Americanism has been defined by our highest litical authorities in memoranda intended for and hitherto aching only the select few. It is a policy of government nearly fixed as is possible in a republic; a policy more avily freighted with possibilities of good and evil for the ain citizen, his wife, his children, and his children's chil-en, than any of the stridently advertised domestic issues ith which he is more familiar.

Pan-Americanism is not a partisan policy, though it has oomed and yielded most prolifically under Republican ad-inistration. It was first clearly enunciated by Richard lney, Democratic Secretary of State under President rover Cleveland, who declared to Congress:[1] "The United ates is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition."

President Roosevelt carried on and developed this policy interventions in Panama, Cuba, and Santo Domingo. His mplete commitment to the policy of United States over-rdship in the Caribbean region, and to the theory of mas-r control of subject races in general, he clearly revealed in intimate personal letter written in 1904 to Cecil Spring-ice:[2]

> It was a good thing for Egypt and the Sudan, and for the world, when England took Egypt and the Sudan. It is a good thing for India that England should control it. And so it is a good thing, a very good thing, for Cuba and for Panama and for the world that the United States has acted as it actually has done during the past six years. The people of the United States and the people of the Isthmus and the rest of mankind will all be the better because we dig the canal and keep order in the neighborhood, and the politicians and revolutionists at Bogota [sic] are entitled to precisely the amount of sympathy we extend to other inefficient bandits.

President Taft was knee-deep in the Mexican and Nicaguan imbroglios when he turned over the reign of discord Woodrow Wilson in the spring of 1913. President Wil-n in his address that autumn to the Southern Commercial ongress at Mobile tried to redefine Pan-Americanism. He d succeed in rewording it magnificently, and the hall shook and the nations of Latin America rejoiced when he proclaimed:[3]

> What these states are going to see, therefore, is an emancipation from the subordination which has been inevitable to foreign enterprise and an assertion of the splendid character which, in spite of these difficulties, they have again and again been able to demonstrate. . . . We must prove ourselves their friends and champions upon terms of equality and honor. . . . I want to take this occasion to say that the United States will never again seek an additional foot of territory by conquest. She will devote herself to showing that she knows how to make honorable use of the territory she has, and she must regard it as one of the duties of friendship to see that from no quarter are material interests made superior to human liberty and national opportunity.

But circumstances of war and politics were too strong for Woodrow Wilson, and his struggles to put into practice what he had so gloriously proclaimed were pitiful and tragic. The stupid Bryan-Chamorro treaty establishing the marines in Nicaragua, interventions in Haiti and Santo Domingo, and almost continuous embroilments with Mexico attest the failure of his efforts to breathe life into Pan-Americanism.

With the return of the Republicans to power in 1921, words and deeds were quickly brought into conformity by immediate exertion of pressure upon Mexico to revise her constitution, especially as to lands and petroleum, in exchange for recognition of the Obregon Government by Washington. President Harding had foreshadowed his policy by reiterating with slight modification during his campaign his declaration made in 1915. In words curiously reminiscent of McKinley, he told the San Antonio, Texas, Chamber of Commerce:[4]

> There is a destiny in the affairs of nations. The magnificent resources of Mexico will never be given to mankind, and that country will never come into its own until it is brought under the civilizing influences of the American flag. How and when that condition will be brought about is not for me to say at this time, but it is coming.

That is Pan-Americanism as it is understood by those we have set up to establish our policies and direct our relationships with Latin America. It is the policy we have pursued for more than a generation, diffidently at first, but with increasing confidence and vigor, from Cleveland to Hoover. It is our duty, nay, our destiny to save Latin Americans from themselves; to develop their resources and scatter their bounties to a hungry, anxious world; to reform their morals, minister to their physical weaknesses, teach them politics and economics, and remodel them generally to an approximation of our North American standards.

So firmly fixed is this policy in this, the opening year of the Hoover Administration—so many have been our commitments, so deeply have we become involved under the Hughes-Kellogg-Coolidge guidance, and so tremendous is the economic and political pressure for the Caribbean adventure that it seems doubtful whether anything short of a specific and emphatic mandate from our people can permanently halt its consummation.

---

[1] House Document No. 54; 1-1, 1 p. 556, 1895.
[2] "Theodore Roosevelt and His Time." By Joseph Bucklin Bishop. 297.
[3] Senate Document No. 226, 1st session 63d Congress.
[4] New York Times, p. 4, col. 6, Jan. 20. 1925. Cf. Federated Press authorized interview at Marion, Ohio, Sept. 10, 1920.

P.S.L.I.D. LIB.

Always preceding, accompanying, and following our successive interventions in Latin-American countries, the stock excuse, given by sponsors, officials, and apologists for these interventions, has been that they were necessary for the "protection of American lives and property." Supplementary arguments might be advanced—our duty to Europe imposed under the Monroe Doctrine, our duty to uplift the downtrodden and enlighten the benighted—but always the first purpose was protection of lives and property—with the pedal hard down on "lives." What are the facts?

Of the 291 United States citizens officially listed as killed in the Caribbean region since the war with Spain, more than a generation ago, all but two were slain subsequent to and apparently consequent upon interventions. The two exceptions were citizens who bore commissions in a rebel army, were taken between the lines, and executed after a drumhead court-martial by the Nicaraguan dictator Zelaya.[5]

The only other United States citizens killed in Nicaragua in the seventy-year period between the notorious Walker filibuster and the Stimson pacification of the republic in 1927 were seven marines, during the Taft intervention in 1912. It is of a piece with the sardonic humor that seems to pervade our Caribbean relations that the Taft intervention, influenced indirectly by the Zelaya slaying, should have saddled on Nicaragua and supported in power there until the elections last fall enthusiastic disciples of the Zelaya cult in the persons of Emiliano Chamorro and his puppet Adolfo Diaz.

It was in support of Diaz that the United States intervened again two years ago, sent Henry L. Stimson on his mission of pacification, and in the succeeding half year sacrificed the lives of twenty-one marines, as Secretary of the Navy Curtis D. Wilbur reported to the Senate.[6] Several marines have been killed in Nicaragua since the Wilbur report, bringing the total since the conclusion of the Stimson mission to more than three times the toll for the preceding seventy years.

The record here, you will note, is 100 per cent in favor of native Nicaraguan protection, as against United States intervention for "protection of American lives." The record of Nicaragua in this respect is not unique.

The occasion for the Spanish-American War, with its blood-cry "Remember the Maine," is too well known to need reciting. Suffice it to say that the highest authorities at Washington have agreed that no shadow of proof has ever been adduced that Spaniards or Cubans were responsible for the blast that destroyed the warship. The war established our dominion over Porto Rico, where none of our citizens had been slain, and our protectorate over Cuba, where a number of our citizens have been killed during and since the war.

The life of no United States citizen was even reported in danger when President Roosevelt intervened to free Panama, taking the Canal Zone as guerdon. Many later gave their lives to the building of the canal, and, what is worse, thousands returned to this country to spread tropical diseases they had acquired there.

No United States citizen was ever killed in Haiti prior to the occupation in 1915, which cost the lives of two marines. Eighteen others were slain there before 1920.[7] Ju how many have been killed in Haiti since seems to be a dar deep military secret. At any rate, the death toll under th old disrupted native government was precisely none.

Prior to the military occupation of Santo Domingo 1916, although the country had been under a sort of financi suzerainty for a decade, no single citizen of the Unite States was reported killed. None was slain during the o cupation, but fourteen marines[8] and two sugar central em ployees were reported killed in the succeeding four year As in the case of Haiti, subsequent military losses, if an are kept secret.

Turning to Mexico, where a good many United Stat citizens have been slain, the rule holds that native protectio has been more effective than intervention for the protectio of lives.

The State Department at Washington, after ten yea of revolutionary slaughter in Mexico, had listed reports 218 deaths by violence of United States citizens.[9] A fe of these later proved false and some have never been cor pletely authenticated. Fifty-seven, or a little more than quarter of the total deaths, were among the military ar naval forces in the occupation of Vera Cruz, the Vil pursuit, and border fights.

Of the remainder, about 150, all occurred after th United States, by interventions at Tampico and Vera Cru had given emphatic notice of its intention to take over th duty of protecting its own citizens in Mexico.

Clearly, then, if interventions in the Caribbean regio have been for the purpose of protecting the lives of Unite States citizens, they have been a lamentable and comple failure.

Contributors to This Issue

MORROW MAYO is a journalist who is spending the summer in Detroit.

HENRY S. VILLARD reports on recent observations in Florida.

LOUIS BROWDY has made a recent first-hand study of the situation in Cleveland.

JAMES RORTY is the author of "Children of the Sun."

MARIE DE L. WELCH is a contributor of verse to many periodicals.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

J. FRANK DOBIE is the author of "Texas Legends."

J. DANA TASKER writes reviews for various magazines and periodicals.

NORAH MEADE writes with authority on Irish questions.

CHARLES H. BEHRE, JR., is assistant professor of geology at the University of Cincinnati.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY, author of several books on the theater, writes on motion pictures for The Nation.

JONATHAN WICKWIRE is a Washington journalist who has given special attention to Caribbean affairs.

[5] "Nicaragua and the United States, 1909-1927." By Isaac Joslin Cox.
[6] Official Report to United States Senate, April 17, 1928.
[7] Mexico and the Caribbean, 1920, p. 239; address at Clark Univ sity by Col. George O. Thorpe, U.S.M.C.
[8] Ibid., p. 231.
[9] Senate Report No. 645, 66th Congress, 2nd session, p. 8.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1929 No. 3349

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 261
EDITORIALS:
Lands of the Arabs 264
The People's Soil 265
Use No Hooks! 265
Art for Politics' Sake 266
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 267
SNOWDEN AT THE HAGUE. By S. K. Ratcliffe 268
FRUIT PEOPLE. By Charles Morrow Wilson 270
TAR HEEL JUSTICE. By Nell Battle Lewis 272
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 274
CORRESPONDENCE 274
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 275
BOOKS:
For the Nursery. By Hal Saunders White 276
Pseudo-Historical Fiction. By Clifton P. Fadiman 276
Consider the Ants. By George E. G. Catlin 276
Spying Out Zion. By Johan Smertenko 278
Social Criticism. By V. F. Calverton 279
Government by Professors. By Raymond Leslie Buell 280
An Uncertain Guide. By Richard McKeon 280
Knights-Errant. By Stuart Chase 281
Books in Brief 282
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Social Conditions in Iceland. By Halldór Kiljan Laxness 284

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor
Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD
Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN
DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THE WORLD'S SYMPATHY goes out to the Jews in the frontier communities of Palestine, crouching in terror before the threat of utter destruction at the hands of tribesmen armed with modern guns but inspired by passions of medieval cruelty. It is easy enough, thousands of miles away, to pick out mistakes in British administration and in Zionist policy; but to the men and women in the little Jewish settlements the immediate question is one of life and death—and for some hundreds of them the issue has been irrevocably settled. They are dead. Whatever ultimate solution may be found to the problem of Palestine, even the uncompromising anti-imperialist must confess a sense of relief at the reports of the arrival of reinforcements from the British army and navy. Time will bring a juster sifting of the causes of the ghastly outbreak, and doubtless there has been fault on both sides; but in the present the Arabs are unquestionably the aggressors. The statement of the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, usually a sober man, saying that the trouble is due to the Arab realization, after the Zurich Zionist Congress, of the meaning of the Zionist experiment, is almost a confession of guilt and responsibility. Presumably the British will have the immediate situation in hand before this issue of The Nation appears; but the need for relief for the Jewish settlers will be acute for a long time to come.

ULTIMATE APPROVAL of the Young plan as a whole seems clearly foreshadowed by the agreements reached by The Hague conference on August 28-29. After haggling for days over the concessions which it was certain that France, Belgium, Italy, and Japan would have to make, it was finally decided to offer Mr. Snowden somewhat more than four-fifths of what he had demanded, and the offer was accepted. Precisely how the figures of the Young plan are to be juggled is not clear, but the four Powers mentioned are to guarantee to Great Britain 40,000,000 marks out of their annuities, and also to relinquish to the British a large part of the unconditional German payments not already allocated to France. In addition, the Italian State Railways are pledged to buy a million tons of British coal annually for three years. In return for acquiescing in this program, Germany is to have the satisfaction of seeing foreign troops out of the Rhineland by June, 1930, at the latest, and will be relieved of part of the cost of the army of occupation in the interval. All this does not mean that the Young plan is shortly to go into operation, for the British objections to the Bank for International Settlements remain to be dealt with and the details of the plan are still to be worked out in committee. Moreover, the whole scheme has yet to run the gauntlet of the parliaments in the various countries concerned, except perhaps in Italy, where Mussolini is the state. It seems unlikely, however, that other hurdles as high as those which Mr. Snowden set up will again have to be surmounted.

FASCISM IN AUSTRIA may seem a small affair in comparison with fascism in Italy, but the possibility at the moment of a fascist rising in Austria, with consequences not limited to that country alone, cannot be dismissed as without foundation. For some time the Heimwehr, an organization openly sympathetic with fascist methods, bitterly hostile to the Socialists who now control the Austrian Government, and demanding a revision of the constitution, has been accumulating arms with no serious interference from the Government, preparatory, it is widely believed, to a "march on Vienna" or some other national demonstration late in September. The membership is estimated at from 100,000 to 200,000 men. At St. Lorenzen, where the Heimwehr and Socialists clashed on August 18, several persons were killed and some two hundred injured; another clash at the village of Mechtersen was narrowly averted on September 1. Rumor ascribes much of the inspiration of the movement to Dr. Seipel, the Catholic prelate who resigned the chancellorship, after carrying the country through a difficult period, in favor of the present Streruwitz Ministry. The situation has important international bearings aside from the danger of intervention if Austria were to be plunged into civil war. The Anschluss movement for the union of Austria and Germany finds support mainly among the Socialists of the two countries. Mussolini, on the other hand, has no love for Socialists, and has openly opposed the Anschluss, probably because he does not want a stronger German state as a neighbor.

WHEN A FRENCH UNIVERSITY appoints a German to one of its important professorships we are justified in concluding that the intellectual rapprochement of the two nations has made considerable progress. The university which has just distinguished itself by its international open-mindedness is the Sorbonne, and the appointee is a Düsseldorf architect who will occupy the chair of architecture and town planning. As the Manchester Guardian remarks in commenting upon the incident, a university is "essentially an international institution," and "with a German professor at the Sorbonne and German Rhodes scholars returning to Oxford, universities know each other once again as allies in the service of truth and learning." The World War played sad havoc with the minds and manners of American and European scholars, and a good deal of what was said and done in university circles while the war fever raged makes melancholy reading now. The evidences of returning sanity have multiplied rapidly in the past few years, however. Contrary to a common impression, the reestablishment of intellectual interchange with Germany has gone on rapidly in France, albeit more outside the universities than within. The action of the Sorbonne is thus in part a natural development of a movement already well under way, and still more an advance step in a quarter where open evidence of reconciliation was less to be expected.

THE TARIFF BILL which Senator Smoot has finally reported to the Senate differs in several important respects besides its rates of duty from the bill passed by the House of Representatives. The President will not be authorized to make over the Tariff Commission into a partisan body as the House thought he should, and the commission, after investigating costs of production and other matters preparatory to recommending an increase or decrease of duties, will have to report its findings to Congress instead of turning them over to the President to be made law by executive fiat. The Senate still cherishes the old-fashioned idea that laws, under the Constitution, are to be made by Congress and not by the President. In the matter of valuation of imported goods, the Senate bill provides for what is to be known as United States valuation where the foreign cost of production cannot be ascertained. The valuation in such cases will be based on the wholesale selling price of the article in this country, or, if the article is not sold at wholesale, then upon the price of some comparable domestic product. There is nothing in the rates of duty carried by the Senate bill that qualifies materially the adverse criticism which we have made of this whole tariff business from the beginning. Senator Harrison of Mississippi is sometimes given to extravagant speaking, but his declaration that "the whole bill reeks with discriminations, inequalities, inexcusable burdens, and injustices" has the merit of exact truth.

TWO PIECES OF NEWS of much possible significance for the future of transportation have appeared recently. One told of a remarkable performance on the Canadian National Railways of an oil-electric locomotive, the other of successful tests at Chicopee, Massachusetts, of a gasoline-electric automobile. In writing in our issue of August 21, page 183, in regard to the centenary of the first steam locomotive to be used in actual service in this country, we suggested that in view of the spread of electrification the second centenary of the steam locomotive might find it only in museums. The performance in Canada indicates that the steam locomotive may be menaced by electricity in a new way. The use of electricity through the installation of a third rail has already made considerable headway, but is retarded by certain immediate limitations, one of which is the expense of such a change, said to be practically equal to the cost of laying the original railroad. The oil-burning electrically driven locomotive, on the other hand, involves no considerable expense beyond the construction cost of the individual engines, although this is reported to be four times as great for the horse-power produced as a steam locomotive. The oil-electric engine on the Canadian National Railways kept pace from Montreal to Toronto, 334 miles, with the steam locomotive on the International Limited, doing seventy miles an hour mile after mile. More important, it burned $25 worth of oil compared with $80 worth of coal consumed by the steam locomotive.

ELECTRICITY MAY PROVE no less revolutionary for the automobile. Under a small head on an inside newspaper page we find a modest 100-word dispatch by the Associated Press describing successful tests of a gasoline electric-drive automobile by Raucht and Lang in collaboration with engineers of the General Electric Company. The electric drive has been used successfully in steamships for a number of years, and there would seem to be nothing to prevent a similar mechanism for automobiles, although the cost might be considerably higher and the bulk might also be increased. Unfortunately no information on those points is contained in the dispatch. What we are told is that a thirty-five horse-power, six-cylinder gasoline engine is used for producing power, and that this runs an electric generator where the gear-shaft assembly is ordinarily placed. The electric current is transferred to a motor which drives a shaft connecting with the rear axle. There is a throttle to regulate the speed and a switch on the dashboard, by which the car can be run either forward or backward. The great advantage in the car, of course, is that there are no gears to shift and the speed can be fixed at any rate instantly by the mere pressure of a finger. The car is said to be noiseless and capable of making forty-five miles an hour. Also, we assume, it would not be possible to stall the engine at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street.

EVERY BELIEVER in labor organization and the objects which it is seeking to attain would like to see the courts restricted, and their powers more carefully defined, in the issuance of injunctions. The Clayton Act, from which much was hoped, has been practically emasculated by the United States Supreme Court, and the bill introduced at the last session of Congress by Senator Shipstead of Minnesota was killed by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate not so much through unfriendliness toward the purposes sought as because of belief that it, too, in its essential features, would be declared unconstitutional. Subsequent to the action of the Judiciary Committee, Senators Walsh of Montana, Norris of Nebraska, and Blaine of Wisconsin drafted a substitute measure which has received the approval of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. Among the acts which would not be unlawful under the proposed measure would be ceasing work, becoming or remaining a member of a labor union or an employers' organization, paying or withholding strike or unemployment benefits, giving publicity to the facts in an industrial dispute, and assembling to act or organize. To the list of acts enumerated by Senators Walsh, Norris, and Blaine the A. F. of L. has added: ceasing to patronize any person in a labor dispute, whether employer or employee, and refusing to handle material produced by a non-union or rival labor organization. Prosecution for contempt because of any alleged infraction of an injunction would be possible only through trial by jury. Some changes may be needed, but we hope the bill may pass substantially as it is.

ACCORDING TO THE REPORT of a survey just completed by the Association of Life Insurance Presidents, total legal-reserve life insurance in force in the United States passed the one hundred billion mark late in July, while policy-holders number more than 65,000,000. American life insurance, according to George T. Wright, manager of the association, began eighty-six years ago, and it required seventy-three years to build up its business to $24,700,000,000. In the next six years the total of insurance in force rose to $50,000,000,000, and during the past six and one-half years it has doubled again. These huge figures represent an impressive triumph of American salesmanship; for sound life insurance is nothing but mathematics, investment, and salesmanship. In 1905, in the best job he ever did, Charles E. Hughes as investigator exposed the gross mismanagement, to say nothing worse, that characterized some of the greatest companies. The resulting legislation benefited the companies greatly, in consequence of increased public confidence. They have multiplied options to policy-holders astonishingly, and through group insurance have extended the benefits of death provision to great numbers of employees of the larger industrial concerns.

ONE IS ASSURED of both safety and a liberal interest on money deposited in the postal savings systems of most European governments, but in this country we are so tender toward the bankers that our arrangements are a farce, not to say an infamy. They are utilized chiefly by newly arrived foreigners, who distrust our banks—often with excellent reason—and continue the custom they learned at home of depositing with the government. The paltry interest paid on postal savings deters most persons from banking with the government, and deposits have been diminishing in recent years. In New York City, for example, deposits with the post office are now less than half what they were in 1921, the peak year. In that year Herbert Hoover, appearing before a Senate committee to argue for a more generous interest policy in the postal savings system, said that the government did not pay even the 2 per cent directed by law. Departmental regulations worked so as to cut down the interest actually paid to an average of about 1 per cent, he stated, while the government itself placed the money in banks at 2½ per cent and made about 100 per cent profit on the transaction. President Hoover may have forgotten those words by now, but nothing has been done to stop this outrageous profiteering upon the pennies of the poor. Recent bank failures in New York City and its vicinity have led to an appreciable increase in postal savings in the metropolis, according to the New York World, but Louis Fischman, superintendent in charge, is quoted as saying that "the chance of the government raising its interest is slight, as big business won't stand for it." The situation could hardly be summarized with greater accuracy and candor.

GLOUCESTER, for 300 years the salt-fish capital of the United States; Gloucester, where the whiff of drying cod is as sweet to the native as the fragrance of honeysuckle to the man born in Kentucky; Gloucester has had a race to prove which was the fastest among the fishing schooners of the New England fleet. Captain Ben Pine was at the wheel of the Arthur D. Story, Norman Ross piloted the Elsie, Wallace Parsons sailed the Thomas S. Gorton, while Manuel Domingos, who has been ashore for fifteen years as a fish dealer, let his office go hang and jumped aboard the Progress when he learned that Marty Welch wouldn't be able to sail her. And Captain Domingos won. We admit our love of the smell of drying cod and are delighted that Gloucester took time off to hold this race. At first it was hoped that the contest might be an international one—a revival of the competition for the Fishermen's Cup of the Halifax Herald. The last contest for the cup, at Halifax in 1923, ended in a row, as a result of which the trophy was awarded to the Columbia, but Captain Pine refused to take it, hoisted his mainsail, and headed for home. Since then the Columbia has been lost—foundered with all hands in 1927—while the Esperanto and the Henry Ford, contenders in earlier races for the Fishermen's Cup, are also gone. The work of a fisherman is always close to tragedy. It is well that he should forget it and play once a year.

SHADES OF POCAHONTAS! We've gone and done it again. We've insulted the sovereign State of Virginia by speaking of it as the home of sugar-cured ham. The Suffolk News-Herald, in an editorial entitled, Can't Stand for This, says it is evident that the editor of The Nation "never socked his tooth into a Virginia ham." He just doesn't know the "ham that am" or he wouldn't speak of Smithfield's masterpiece as sugar-cured. As to ham cured by the latter process the News-Herald snorts:

> Why, man alive, people down this way will not let one of these specimens of hog product come into their backyard if they know it. They would scorn anything so plebeian when mere shoulder meat cured the Virginia way would tickle the palate of the New York scribe so sweetly he would cry avaunt at the mere approach of his sugar-cured brands. . . .
>
> Our colaborer and fellow-slave is respectfully requested to correct his error and cordially invited to drop down into Old Virginia for a nibble at a slice of real ham. After that we should be willing to allow him to name it, and it wouldn't be "sugar-cured" either. It is an insult to such ambrosia to mention it in the same class. It is the food of kings and gods and sometimes of editors when the going is good.

We are in the position of the New York schoolgirl who said of her examination in English: "I only got B. I woulda got A, but I said Shelley wrote the piece on the nightingale and Keats the one about the skylark. I had the men right, but I got the boids twisted." We had the State right, but we got the meats twisted. Our remarks on ham were a lot of boloney.

Lands of the Arabs

FOR the moment there is peace in Jerusalem, but not good-will among men. There will be more riots and bloodshed in the Arab lands; and it will be well if the world—Jews, Christians, and Moslems alike—recalls that the fault lies not with any single official in Palestine, but with the World War itself. It was the perversion of all decency, of all standards of common good faith and honesty in that struggle, which led the war-time British cabinets, loyal to their belief that anything which might help win the war was good and justifiable, into the career of perfidy which lies behind the bloodshed in Palestine today, as it lay behind the even worse bloodshed in Syria a few years ago.

The Arab lands lie wrapped about the southeastern end of the Mediterranean. They reach, indeed, on the north shore of Africa, to Gibraltar and beyond. And though the Arabs are a conquered people today, they are still a proud and warlike people, with a keen recollection of the days of their national greatness, when Moslem armies threatened to conquer Europe. The Western domination of the Arab lands today seems to them no more inevitable and permanent than was the Eastern domination of Hungary, of Spain, of Sicily. Their agitators pass freely from one country to another; their papers are read eagerly throughout the Arab world; they all dream of a great Arab empire; and they all know that Britain promised them aid, and France seemed to do so, toward the realization of that dream. But Britain made other promises too; and when the end of the war came she found that Arabs, Jews, and French alike considered that the British Empire had promised Palestine to them. And it had.

No sooner had Turkey entered the war on the side of Germany than the British in Egypt sent emissaries to the emir of Mecca, Hussein, assuring him of their readiness to assist in the liberation of the Arabs. Hussein wanted specifications; the British gave them. Already they were conversing with the French, who had vague claims upon Syria, and they tempered their promises. In November, 1915, the British formally recognized the Arab title to the Arab lands, subject to reservations concerning French claims to Syria. Britain did not then reserve Palestine. Hussein explicitly disavowed even those reservations; in May, 1916, he began the Arab revolt which T. E. Lawrence has so classically described, with a pitiful trust in British good faith.

Almost simultaneously the British signed the famous Sykes-Picot Agreement of May 16, 1916, to which Russia was also a party, promising to support an eventual Arab national state in the interior of Syria, but also dividing the presumptive spoils among themselves. The terms were somewhat vague; the French understood that it left both Palestine and the oil wells of Mosul in their sphere of influence.

The Arab revolt spread up the coast into Transjordan, but it was not until the summer of 1918 that the British-Arab armies reached Palestine. Meanwhile matters were going badly for the Allies in the West; and the British were watching with perhaps unnecessary suspicion the Jewish participation in the Russian Revolution. On November 2, 1917, hoping thus to win the war support of world Jewry, Mr. Balfour made his famous proclamation of the Jewish National Home. In two years the British appear to have promised Palestine, which they did not yet possess, successively to the Arabs, the French, and the Jews.

The subsequent history is a familiar and tragic story. The Arabs, under Hussein's son Feisal, swept northward through Transjordan into Syria. Feisal's cavalry entered Damascus like their ancestors, charging sword in hand, while the Damascans cheered themselves hoarse, and proceeded to make it the capital of an Arab state. The British would have preferred to support the Arabs, but the French were more dangerous. They extracted from the French concessions for themselves, covering the oil region of Mosul and Palestine, important to them as the hinterland of the Suez Canal, but they won no substantial concessions for the Arabs.

In the end the pledges to the Arabs were shamelessly flouted. The terms of the inter-Allied secret treaties ruled. France got Syria north of Palestine; England got Mesopotamia and Palestine. The British armies evacuated inner Syria; and the French sent Feisal a series of humiliating ultimatums. Yielding to force, he accepted them, but that was not enough. The French armies moved on him, captured Damascus, conquered the country. It rose against them in a memorable series of rebellions; all crushed in blood at a cost of tens of thousands of lives. The Arabs in Palestine protested, not directly against British rule but against any program of making the 90 per cent Arab land of Palestine the homeland of an alien people.

These are facts, this is a history which one has no right to forget, however intense one's sympathy with the murdered Jews of Hebron, with the ruined farmlands of the pioneer communities between Dan and Beersheba. The British have failed to give the Jews the protection they promised; but the Arabs also have their prior grievances.

With Feisal's fall the Pan-Arab movement seemed in collapse. But a new power rose in the desert. Ibn Saud came out of the Nejd, drove Hussein out of the holy cities of Medina and Mecca, and today controls almost the entire Arabian peninsula, the greatest power in Islam. Like all Arab princes he has accepted British subsidies, but he has also negotiated with the British as an equal, and he has never accepted the boundary-line which leaves the head of the Gulf of Akaba a part of British Transjordan. Feisal has been made "king" of Mesopotamia, or Irak, which chafes at British control; his brother Abdullah is emir of Transjordan, under even more thorough British supervision. The British rule Palestine direct, and the rudimentary forms of democracy which the French have introduced in parts of Syria deceive no one.

Some time, somewhere, this Western domination of the Arab lands will cease. There will be no end to Arab agitation until it does. And there, far behind the recent events at the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem and the immediate trouble in Palestine, lies the tremendous responsibility and the tremendous danger of the Arab problem.

The People's Soil

WE approve heartily of President Hoover's courteous reference to the Western States as having long since outgrown their swaddling clothes. As indicated in our issue of last week, we disapprove no less heartily of his proposal to turn over to them for administration and ultimate sale the surface rights to the 190,000,000 acres of public lands that lie within their borders. This proposal, if adopted by Congress, will constitute a first step, almost certain to be followed by others, in a policy that we believe to be full of danger to our national economic development.

Mr. Hoover's proposal, which, happily, he puts forward only tentatively, is to transfer to the public-land States (of which Nevada, Utah, California, Wyoming, Arizona, New Mexico, Oregon, Idaho, Colorado, and Montana, in the order of their acreage of unreserved lands, are the most important ones) the surface rights to the lands within their borders, reserving to federal control all mineral rights, as well as power sites, national forests, parks, monuments, and Indian and other reservations. In other words, the immediate proposal apparently comes to little more than transferring to the States the management of grazing lands. If nothing more were actually involved, the States might possibly find it undesirable to examine too closely the teeth of this gift horse, lest he turn out to have the molars of a white elephant.

But much more is involved, as was made clear in the first discussion of the President's proposal. Senator Kendrick of Wyoming said straightway: "If these lands are to be transferred to the States, the mineral rights should be transferred to the States along with the lands." Senators Smoot and King of Utah were reported to be of the same opinion, and they are logically right. If the federal government is going to turn over anything, they say, let it turn over something valuable and not something worthless.

The trouble with the President's suggestion, as we see it, is that he proposes to turn over rights, apparently of comparatively small immediate value, for reasons which will straightway be urged in behalf of the cession of rights which the federal government, as guardian of the remaining natural heritage of all the people—not the people of the public-land States alone—ought never to yield to any other power, public or private. Aside from pious aspirations for "more constructive policies for conservation," Mr. Hoover's essential reason for turning over the surface rights is to "check the growth of federal bureaucracy, reduce federal interference in affairs of essential local interest, and thereby increase the opportunity of the States to govern themselves." Laudable purposes these, without doubt, and a reason that can be urged and has been urged over and over again against every single item of the present federal policy of public-land conservation. Once let the nose of Mr. Hoover's camel inside the tent, and how long will it be before we shall have to welcome his fore legs, his hump, his hind legs, and his tail? Secretary Wilbur, for example, in his reckless premonitory interview suggested the blessings of ultimate State control of the national forests.

This question is large and complex but the dominant issue is simple, and Mr. Hoover has put himself on the wrong side of it. From the beginning of the conservation movement a majority of the people of the Western States, naturally and properly as became people nearer than the rest of us to the frontier condition of unlimited free natural resources, favored more liberal land policies than those which, fortunately, were embodied in the law and its administration. Today, as Senator Borah points out, they have adapted themselves to those policies, but the frontier urge, thank God, is still in the blood. Present federal land policies, we want to say with all possible emphasis, are essential for an industrially mature country whose frontier is gone. Every student of the history of our public lands knows the long story of waste, graft, corruption, and fraud that almost inevitably marked their administration in accordance with the ideas of American pioneers. Some of us have not forgotten Richard Ballinger and Albert B. Fall. Every informed person knows the desperate battle that is being waged today with the power interests. Give the States the surface rights today, and tomorrow for the same reasons you may give them the mineral rights, the power rights, the forests. The land grabbers who would despoil the people will no longer be concentrated in Washington under scrutiny of the newspaper correspondents there, but will be scattered in a dozen State capitals to do their work in comparative quiet under conditions far less unfavorable.

Let the surface rights stay exactly where they are and let the helpful cooperation of federal and state governments be yet further developed. That, we believe, should be the reply of the people to the President's proposal.

Use No Hooks!

IT was E. W. Howe, if we remember rightly, who said that the only thing which a newspaper editor can safely abuse is the man-eating shark. Certainly every American editor learned years ago that practically the most dangerous thing to abuse is Christian Science or its founder, the thrice-married Mrs. Mary Baker Glover Patterson Eddy. Most of the important writings unfavorable to Mrs. Eddy have been suppressed through pressure upon the publishers, purchase of the copyright, or law suits, the most recent instance being the elimination of Professor Woodbridge Riley's attack on Mrs. Eddy from "The Cambridge History of American Literature" in 1921. The latest work on Mrs. Eddy,* by no means a flattering picture, has escaped official condemnation, although the New York Christian Science Committee on Publication has issued a statement that the volume is not authentic because the author did not consult the church authorities nor was their invitation to check the contents of the book with the publishers accepted.

Mr. Dakin explains why newspaper editors have found it embarrassing to criticize or make any slips in regard to Christian Science. Mrs. Eddy herself devised a publicity system consisting of a committee on publication—actually a single individual—in every State.

> It was really Mrs. Eddy, and not the modern leaders of American "big business," who invented corporation publicity and devised the methods to make it work. The idea of assisting newspaper editors and readers to formulate their opinions through correctly prepared publicity material came to her as she pondered the attacks directed upon herself and her announced discovery. . . .

* "Mrs. Eddy: The Biography of a Virginal Mind." By Edwin Franden Dakin. Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.

If any city editor ever dared ignore a communication sent out by the committee on publication, the managing editor would shortly receive a telephone call. He would not find the "committee" talking at the other end of the wire. Rather it would be one of his most valued advertisers.

Thus Christian Science has come to be labeled in every newspaper office with the warning: "Use No Hooks!"

Mr. Dakin got interested in Mrs. Eddy when he returned from the World War with his old beliefs shattered and, in the hope of finding something new, investigated Christian Science and its founder. His book is a story rather than either an attack or a panegyric, and is so well documented as to be difficult to dispute. Mr. Dakin writes of Mrs. Eddy with sympathy and some admiration. He admires her courage, will power, and shrewdness in raising herself in middle age from a useless life of neurotic invalidism to the dictatorship of a remarkably influential new religion; he says she "believed her doctrine with a belief that burned like fire." At the same time he recounts without mercy her lack of gratitude and loyalty in throwing overboard every individual who had ceased to be valuable to her or whom she sensed as a rival, culminating in the outrageous humiliation of Mrs. Stetson, and he shows proof which most persons will accept as adequate that Mrs. Eddy got all that is most valid in Christian Science from Phineas T. Quimby —and then denied it. From Quimby, that is, she got the philosophy and practice of mental healing, even deriving the title of her book, "Science and Health," from the Portland healer's manuscript "Science of Health." Mrs. Eddy herself was responsible for her obsession in regard to "malicious animal magnetism" and for the doctrine of the non-existence of matter. Also she made the enormously important contribution from the practical side of exalting mental healing into a religion. As Mr. Dakin says: "Had she sought merely to market a psychological discovery she would probably have gained only a small audience. What she had in her hand, however, was not psychology but religion—something which can be marketed on a much larger scale than any brand of psychology." And "Viewed in this light much of Eddyism now looms up not as consummate humbuggery, but as sincere belief that she had really harnessed a previously unknown Principle to serve man's needs."

Whatever we may think of Christian Science, Mrs. Eddy was one of the great powers of her generation, and her personality deserves more disinterested attention than it has received. "At forty she found herself alone, unloved even by her relatives and her own son, poverty-stricken, pain-racked, purposeless." She was sixty-one before she entered the road to fame and fortune by going to Boston and establishing her college; she was sixty-seven before she became a national figure as a result of the great demonstration accorded her in Chicago in 1888. Mr. Dakin has done a service in writing of Mrs. Eddy from a factual rather than from a controversial standpoint. And it is possibly an indication that the church which Mrs. Eddy founded has passed one cycle in its existence—grown somewhat beyond the fury and foibles of its founder—that finally it seems able to contemplate a figure hewn to the life without being too much outraged or insisting that it be banished to the coal cellar.

Art for Politics' Sake

AMERICANS sometimes regret that their government does not concern itself much with the arts. They point to the French Academy or the state theaters in Paris, and they ask (pointedly enough) whether it is possible to conceive any similar institutions in these United States. They recall with some bitterness how a Congressman once rose in high dudgeon to demand why the name of Edgar A. Guest had not been mentioned in connection with some proposal to honor our literary geniuses, and they wonder just what kind of play would be clean enough and patriotic enough to satisfy the requirements of all the various societies for the promotion or the suppression of this or that.

But the truth of the matter is that even the French have their difficulties, and the artistic activities of their government are most admirable when we wish to use them as a convenient stick with which to belabor our own officials. Thus the famous Comédie Française has been dying of dry rot for years. Léon Daudet has recently devoted a muck-raking article to a diagnosis of the many ills which afflict it, and few Parisians would deny the justice of his criticism.

The chief state theater is, as he says, primarily an institution for the subvention of plays which long ago lost whatever claims they may once have had upon the interest of the public. It is true that Molière, Racine, and Corneille are still played, and true also that the routine performances of these classics are perhaps better than no performances at all, but nearly all of the other pieces in the repertory are pompous examples of inferior and out-moded styles. Last year only one new play was produced, and it was said to be worthless. Augier, Dumas fils, and other dramatists of that ilk are responsible for the dramas which make up the bulk of the offerings, and the work of such people is certainly not good enough to merit the consideration of the state. They correspond roughly to the Robertsons, the Hearns, and the Clyde Fitches of the English and American drama, and no one can feel any very lively regret that there does not exist a Theater of the United States in which "Shore Acres" or "The Girl with the Green Eyes" is performed ten or twelve times a year at the expense of the taxpayers. Free copies of "Just Folks" distributed by the Department of Education, or a National Academy of Vaudeville composed chiefly of the performers whom President Wilson most admired, would be scarcely more absurd.

We are far from wishing to imply that we believe the now inevitable commercialism of the New York theater to be ideal. We do not think that the best play is the one which draws the largest crowds, and we are sure that the encouragement of art would be one of the functions of the perfect state. But we are inclined to suspect that the proposals sometimes made for a national or a civic theater are premature, and that they will continue to be so until the arrival of that apparently very distant day when Congress and boards of aldermen have come to be composed of the most cultivated and enlightened of our citizens. The taste of the general public is low, but there is an enlightened minority sufficient to support better plays than, let us say, his Honor Jimmie Walker might choose for New York City.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

WHEN Herbert Clark Hoover agreed to remain silent while his accredited managers raised the religious issue he must have realized that he was doing a wrong thing. Very probably the agreement was never formal and articulate. The Republican candidate merely looked the other way and said "What a pretty sunset," while his hired men paraded about with an effigy of the Pope. He himself did not read the speech of Mrs. Willebrandt before it was delivered. Perhaps he even refrained from acquainting himself with this phase of the campaign's activity after it had been launched. Mr. Hoover remained upon the mountain tops and never ventured to gaze into the valleys where the votes were being gathered. Mr. Harding owed his success to a conference in the tobacco mists of a Chicago hotel, and Mr. Hoover did not want to reflect upon the fact that his victory was likely to be decided up in Mabel's room.

Yet certain excuses can and should be made for Herbert Hoover. Although not authorized by anybody in his confidence I feel certain that he had not the slightest intention of establishing the religious test as a permanent factor in American political life. It was merely a convenient weapon for the moment. "We can break the South," they told him. This was a great temptation. No other Republican candidate had ever done as much. Under such circumstances the man's mind must have visioned the history books of the future. They would say: "The South was solid until 1928 when Herbert Clark Hoover broke the bloc." This would be a victory memorable in political annals. Such a result would make good the oft-repeated assertion that America was again an organic whole without North, or West, or East, or South. One flag, one constitution, one loyalty to President Herbert Clark Hoover. "The end justifies the means"—somewhere Mr. Hoover had read that.

No doubt he felt that out of a brief flare of religious prejudice good might come. Once in office he could make some strong and striking declaration. He could kick over the ladder by which he had climbed. After all, there was no reason why this sort of politics need become habitual. With the South won over, future campaigns could be put upon a higher level. But as in many another conquest, the victor found himself tightly clutching a bear's tail. The South was won and it was necessary to keep it won. If the secession was to be for one performance only, historians would be compelled to say that Florida, Virginia, Texas, and the rest voted against Al Smith and not for Herbert Hoover. The gains must be consolidated.

Yet since the South had been won on the religious issue it seemed difficult to hold it on any other basis. Indeed, practical consideration made it expedient to refine and augment the scope of the issue. And that is being done today by the Hoovercrats of Texas. The nomination is still a year away but already the Democrats who went Republican are sharpening their knives against the present lieutenant governor, who would normally be the logical candidate. I've said that by dint of practice the religious issue could be made to cover a wider territory. Against this candidate it can't be said that he would on his own initiative invite the Pope to come and live in Texas. His disability is more subtle. His wife is a Catholic.

Dr. Norris, the Baptist firebrand, who did so much for Hoover in the last campaign, is already on the warpath by means of pulpit and radio. He has announced the inspiring slogan: "No Catholic woman shall ever be the first lady of the State and sit in the Governor's mansion at Austin." The Klan, which was dead, is alive again. It was remarked in the South and elsewhere that though Mr. Hoover made one dim disavowal of the religious issue he never gave practical proof of his displeasure by removing a single one of the more violent propagandists from his campaign forces. And the belief that he was not entirely enraged by the undercover work done in his favor has been strengthened by the appointment of several leading Hoovercrats to federal offices.

Nobody is accusing the President of the United States of inspiring a primary fight centering around the religious affiliations of a candidate's wife. I mean that Mr. Hoover is not under the charge of ordering this attack. Nevertheless, I do not see how Herbert Clark Hoover can be acquitted of moral responsibility for the new style in American politics. Before Hoover there was religious prejudice. It crawled upon its belly and was to be found in scrub-oak patches in hilly country. But in the year 1928, Mabel Walker Willebrandt, who had been one of the leading workers for Hoover in the campaign and an important member of the Department of Justice, openly invited the evangelical Protestant clergy to carry on the fight from their pulpits. You may be sure they were not slow to accept this federal license, and before the fight was done America witnessed the edifying spectacle of John Roach Straton shaking hands with Herbert Hoover.

I do not remember any other campaign in which the personality of the candidate's wife became a political issue, but attacks were made on Mrs. Smith in the interests of the Republican Party. What is good enough for a national campaign will scarcely be thrown out of a primary as too despicable for use. Nor is there any reason why critics of the President should accept the explanation that Mr. Hoover never knew the things that were being done by the workers of his party. He should have known. He must have known. His partisans are unconvincing when they argue that he was just a fool.

In Virginia Bishop Cannon is trying to keep the State in the Republican column by a fight against Raskobism. Mr. Raskob is a leading Wall Street operator and a prominent Catholic. It can hardly be that the odd-lot Methodist leader is attacking him because of the first-mentioned affliction. The fires of religious prejudice are mounting higher. The glare reddens the political skies by night and day. No, Herbert Clark Hoover did not touch the match to this tindery stuff, but he did stand like a bump upon a burning deck and made no move to stamp out any spark. Maybe he isn't the father of the religious issue in American politics. But he is the godfather. He stood for it.

HEYWOOD BROUN

Philip Snowden at The Hague

By S. K. RATCLIFFE

London, August 23

WE have before us an astounding spectacle. The full wonder of it is not realized in England, so that we need not be surprised if the American public should have misunderstood its significance or failed to measure it merely as a phenomenon. At an international conference a British Minister has spoken as though he were the representative of a great Power, and not of a vassal state; he has put his foot down and kept it there; he has announced the British terms in ringing tones, and with a complete contempt for the evasions of diplomacy. When the envoys of the European Powers, once allies, have submitted pained remonstrances and proffered compromise terms, he has told them not to be absurd, but to use words with a precise meaning and to work out their sums again. And, in doing all this, he has gained for himself a position of unequaled honor and popularity with the British people, a position such as, quite literally, no British statesman has held since the days of the elder William Pitt. And because the minister in the case is Philip Snowden, the marvel is beyond description and almost beyond belief.

Consider, to begin with, the man Snowden himself. It should not be necessary for me to remind readers of The Nation that he is one of the most remarkable men in England. He comes from Yorkshire, and began life in the junior grade of the civil service, which he entered by the door of open competitive examination. In early manhood he suffered a bicycle accident, which broke him up and left him hopelessly crippled. For forty years he has walked with the aid of two sticks, unable to move his body without extreme difficulty. During the long convalescence after his casualty he read himself into a knowledge of economics and into a conviction of the truth of socialism. He is enormously informed, holds his knowledge with the tenacity and precision of steel, and gives it out in the clearest sentences built into a logical structure. He is a formidable controversialist and one of the finest public speakers in the English-speaking world. His long experience in the Labor movement is there to attest his political standing and his character.

He fought his way into English public life laden with all the handicaps. Without the backing of either money or friends he stood up in the market-place of a Lancashire cotton town, Blackburn, during the fury of the Boer War thirty years ago, defied the mob, and compelled them by force of reason and personality to elect him to Parliament. His opinions, his temper, and the cast of his mind kept him always with the remnant. You could not imagine Philip Snowden as a member of the majority. Along with Keir Hardie and Ramsay MacDonald he belonged to the governing group of the Independent Labor Party, from which he resigned (not, of course, from the Labor Party) a few years ago, declaring that the work of the I. L. P., as the evangelizing wing of the movement, was finished. To this wing Snowden gave at least thirty-five years of devoted service. Not only did we regard him as by birthright a member of the permanent minority: he was, and is, emphatically what we all mean when we call a public man a doctrinaire. That is to say, he knows what he believes, and always wants to apply it. His enemies have seen him at times as the St. Just of the English revolution. In 1914 he took the unpopular side on the policy of the war, and for four years he shared with Ramsay MacDonald and a half-dozen stalwarts of the I. L. P. the odium that attached to all men who, refusing to accept the popular illusions, bore witness to the necessity of a negotiated peace. In the armistice election he lost his seat in the Commons, and was therefore out in the wilderness during the crucial years of the treaty and the desolation. It is in England still that the ironies of politics and history are most startlingly displayed. The outcast of 1914 and 1918 was restored to his parliamentary place in 1922, by which time the press was learning to look upon him as a moderate; and in 1924 was the inevitable Chancellor of the Exchequer in that Labor Cabinet which historians will mark as the dividing line between the old England and the new.

Even so, however, Philip Snowden had yet not become in any sense a popular figure: the man of The Hague was not yet in sight. His first budget had been a notable success. He was gaining the confidence of the business community, which saw in him a champion of conservative finance. But the Labor movement now reckoned him a member of the right wing, and to the I. L. P. he was almost one of the lost. The revelation of the new Snowden, a truly surprising apparition, came early in the present year when, the Baldwin Government being still in office, he delivered in Parliament the famous attack upon the debt settlement and proclaimed that England would insist upon a fresh interpretation of the principles embodied in the Balfour Note. I was in the United States at the time, and I recall that the first effect of that speech was to lead the American press to infer that Snowden as chancellor in a new Labor Government would demand a revision of the debt settlement made in Washington six years ago. That, of course, was not so. Snowden was thinking of the European settlements. He was serving notice upon France and Italy that when next he was in power at the Exchequer they must expect a strict accounting and an end to the concessions made continuously, and as a matter of course, by British governments throughout the post-war decade. And it was in the full knowledge of this record and purpose that Ramsay MacDonald sent Snowden to The Hague in July, to fulfil the functions which hitherto have fallen to either the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. MacDonald knew his man; but I doubt whether he foresaw the extraordinary testing that was being prepared for Philip Snowden. His initial speech at the Reparations Conference was described as a thunderclap, or a rattle of machine-guns, through the capitals of Europe. For England and the British Dominions it sounded like a sudden return of the days of Pitt and Palmerston. Hardly for twenty years, people were saying, had any voice of British statesmanship been decisively heard in Europe. Grey had capitulated to the old continental system. Lloyd George, worsted by Clemenceau and Poincaré, had been enmeshed in an impossible game. Curzon could not be made to see that the problem of the hour was not advanced if the Foreign Secretary fired off a magniloquent speech. Stanley Baldwin and his colleagues had permitted England to sink lower in the counsels of the Powers than she had been for a hundred years. And Austen Chamberlain submitted to Paris as a regular thing, was subservient to Mussolini, and even allowed himself to be out-maneuvered at Geneva by Spain. And then came Philip Snowden, expressing himself in the plainest words, affirming and reaffirming two things: first, that Britain insisted upon a square deal in the reapportionment of reparations; and secondly, that, as between herself and her former allies, she could make no more sacrifices.

The effect in England was magical. Philip Snowden became, in a single day, the voice of all England and the wider British Commonwealth. Let me try to put down exactly what this means. The British cannot be accurately described as a united people more than once in a century, if that. England, says a journalist friend of mine, claims the right, even in great crises, to be nearly half wrong. Not one of the national leaders, since the time of George III, has ever found himself with the entire force of the nation at his back. Wellington and Peel were bitterly opposed at every stage. Palmerston, the most popular of prime ministers, seemed to the followers of Bright and Cobden a debased politician. Gladstone for fifty years aroused worship and reprobation in almost equal measure. Lloyd George in 1917-1918 probably came as near to standing for the collective mind of the nation as any British statesman of the modern age, but a considerable party was convinced that he was the enemy of England. In July and August, 1929, Philip Snowden has occupied an eminence unique in the history of the British nation. Excepting only a tiny minority, uttering itself through one or two voices in the press, all men would appear to be for him. Midway in the crisis of The Hague the Prime Minister sent him a telegraphic message of approval, saying that all parties supported him and the newspapers were unanimous in approval. This was true, and the fact is unparalleled. No journalist or politician now alive can remember anything like it. The chorus of praise is overwhelming. In all the annals of hero-worship as known to America, there is nothing to which we can liken the apotheosis of Philip Snowden.

So much for the man himself and the transformation of which he has become the center. It is much more difficult to sum up the policy for which he has stood, and to estimate the probable results of his action upon the European settlement, Anglo-American affairs, and the all-important matter of disarmament.

There is first the question of the Snowden stand in relation to the general policy of the Labor Government. It may, I think, be taken for granted that, while the Cabinet was apprised of the line to be taken at The Hague, it did not anticipate the major sensation or the alignment of the former allies as a unit, and an infuriated unit, against the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It must be remembered that when Snowden made his assault in the spring, it was necessary for Mr. MacDonald to compose the storm and was deemed expedient for Lord Birkenhead and the Tory leaders to restate the official position as to the Balfour Note. Shortly before going to The Hague, Snowden made known that Britain was not bound by the terms of the Young Plan, but this declaration was not taken as the prelude to an attitude of no compromise. I should be greatly surprised to learn that in advance of the conference the Government saw itself in the role of a great Power delivering an ultimatum, and it may well be true that the Prime Minister and his colleagues were not a little startled to discover the fervor and extent of the popularity that was Philip Snowden's reward for taking the high John Bull line. Having made the discovery, they would manifestly be ready to maintain that line. For a Labor Government so complete an indorsement by the press and the public is a piece of wonderful, and entirely unexpected, good fortune. Not the most adventurous of prophets could have predicted such a development; and at the time of writing it seems probable that the Government and the Labor Party must acquire a large measure of prestige thereby.

Mr. MacDonald's position in relation to it is a subject of much interest. His own presence at The Hague would have seemed to be appropriate, if not essential, and it was thought probable that he would attend the conference for the crucial sittings. Needless to say, he is a negotiator of a kind altogether different from Mr. Snowden: no one can envisage the Prime Minister enunciating no-compromise terms. The fact that he has left the problem to the Chancellor is significant; while, for myself, I am disposed to accept the view that Mr. MacDonald has been content with the arrangement because of his preoccupation with the naval conversations and his strong conviction that the making of an agreement with America on cruisers is the major concern of the present year for the head of the Government.

There remains the wider question of the effect of the Snowden policy and attitude upon Europe and the immense change wrought by them in the standing of Britain among the Powers. We have been accustomed, ever since the Lloyd George period, to a hostile French press, but our generation has known nothing comparable with the ferocity prevalent throughout France today—an exhibition that has its counterpart in Belgium and Italy. Liberal-minded Englishmen cannot be indifferent to this, nor can they fail to contrast it with the brief chapter of European good-will that synchronized with Mr. MacDonald's tenure of the Foreign Office in 1924.

Two accusations in particular, we understand, are brought against Philip Snowden in impartial quarters, and especially by Americans friendly to Britain. The first is that by stressing in his determined fashion the necessity for strict fairness to Britain in the annual percentages, he has diverted the attention of the Conference and the world from the greater business of the settlement to a matter relatively trivial. The difference between his figure and theirs is the difference of a few million dollars, a sum hardly discernible in the annual budget of four billion dollars which it is Mr. Snowden's privilege to administer. To this criticism, I confess, I do not know the answer. It is to me a powerful objection to Mr. Snowden's line of action and argument, for the danger of a break-up at The Hague has at every stage been very grave. The second charge is that Mr. Snowden, by his manner of standing upon British rights, has given a striking and painful exhibition of that very nationalism in European consultations of which England has accused France and Italy ever since the original treaties. But ever since the reparations came under debate Britain has followed a line of consistency and generosity. She has been willing to make concession after concession in the cause of the general settlement, and, as Mr. Snowden put it in his downright fashion, the others have apparently been unwilling to do anything for the peace of Europe unless they were paid for it. This process, obviously, had to stop, and the MacDonald Government was the one to stop it by a firm and courteous affirmation. But many of us in England today, against the great acclaim of Philip Snowden, are wondering whether the path of wisdom was not clearly marked by the Young Plan as it stood, and whether, after all, any further price, within reason, was too much to pay for the final dispersal of the war's vast economic illusion. Financial experts, like politicians, inhabit a world that is largely unreal. The road out of folly began at Spa and looks like reaching an end through the Young Committee. Everybody knows that in the end the reparations will not and cannot be paid. It might have been well not to trouble about the ten millions, when working for the greater end. And it may be that the example of a generous Britain, even an absurdly generous one, maintained for another short stage would outweigh all imaginable disadvantages of the plan. An irony indeed would it be if in the end a Government presided over by Ramsay MacDonald should be the one to revive the continental belief in Britain as a self-regarding Power. But one thing is certain: Snowden's generalship is leading to a positive result which the whole world will acclaim.

Fruit People

By CHARLES MORROW WILSON

WINTERS come and spring follows. So also do the fruit people, who trail along with the caravan of seasons. Seasons merge and the years congeal, but the pickers keep coming, in motley and deft-fingered armies, guided by the sun and stars, following down the infallible rainbow of bigger crops and better pickings.

Speaking relatively, the strawberry people are the most numerous and diverse of the outfit. This season the Department of Labor estimates that there are six hundred thousand transient berry pickers in the Gulf States and Middle West alone, and that the national total of fruit people would be twice that number. But strawberries, a major crop in twenty-nine of our States, obviously draw the greatest following of pickers. Strawberries are a first crop. Their season is long and verdant and generally happy. By early April the southernmost berries are showing first sour turnings of red and the "compleat berry tramp" may begin far south and follow northwards with the showers and sunshine and spring winds for a picking season of near two good months.

Now anybody can pick strawberries, young or old, fat or thin, stiff or nimble. The berry bed calls out strange conglomerations. There are school youngsters immersed in first openings of vacation; housewives out to gain surcease of potscrubbing and to turn an extra penny in the doing; there are young ones out for sunburns and barefootedness and devilment; there are backbrush courtesans, country girls grown restlessly romantic, disconsolates and jobless laborers. The berry bed has its Cleopatras and its Puck, its shysters and sots and hard cases.

In its easy rural way a strawberry field is a dramatic spot. It may have its murders and marriages and dynamic traditions, its berry fights and picking clans and row-boss rows. It can be a scene lyrically romantic, for there is a sheer joy to picking strawberries, a joy of May grass and bold young leaves and shadow-swept hills. Strawberries are a young crop. Picking them is springtime work, a first hardening for the months of sweat and dust and sunburn which fruit people must accept along with the pay and play of their profession. And strawberries are a youthful and rhapsodic sort of crop, fresh with first sunlight and glamorously undependable. Other berries are different. Raspberries ripen with heavy July heat and their spirit grows mature with the season. And blackberries do not have the shifty infantile qualities of the strawberry. They tell, rather, of hills wrapped in musty light, of slow vague shadows and August stillness, of sky-enfolded earth.

So the picking goes—six dry quarts to one tray, one tray one ticket, one ticket worth eighteen cents on pay-day, which is conventionally Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. The patch follower who is nimble of finger, strong of back, and resolute of spirit can usually reckon upon a 75 per cent quotient of working weather.

Strawberry picking, although about as hard work as any of the fruit trades, is generally the worst paid. At the prevailing rate, three cents a quart, a medium picker would probably not average more than two dollars a day. Of course, a good picker working in good berries may sometimes gather a hundred quarts in a twelve-hour day and there are stellar pickers who boast banner-day records of well toward two hundred quarts. But two dollars a day from first turning to last ripening will ordinarily hold as a lucky average.

* * * * *

But wages are better on the Pacific Coast. Considered financially, the Far Western fruit people are the gentry of the ilk—not that they are high-hat, but that they are, speaking relatively, high-paid. Moreover, in the Far West the fruit harvests mingle and interlap more nearly continuously, and among the half million or so conceded fruit tramps who follow the Western harvests, there are superlatively deft and nimble brethren who earn pay checks that would all but put to shame the wages of a Cabinet official. Far Western fruit imposes a higher premium upon skill; it offers money in startling abundance for those who can get it, and obviously the game lies in the getting. But trade requirements increase in close accord with wage rates. An all-around Pacific Coast fruitman needs to have a thorough working knowledge of apples, pears, prunes, grapes, cantaloupes, oranges, lemons, peaches, tomatoes, and lettuce; and of the various packs, receptacles, sortings, and price ranges. He needs dexterity, memory, iron nerves, and speed.

One possessed of all these prime requisites should be able to earn a presentable income—eight or ten dollars per picking day as a year's average. There are trade specialists, such as craters and exhibition packers, who can earn as much as thirty-five dollars in a single day, and average twenty-five dollars a day during the whole of a six-week run. The skilled members usually prefer to work by the piece. A flat wage is all right as far as it goes, but the fleet and tried fruitman relishes the opportunity to try and prove his fleetness. But along with the Damon of speed must go the Pythias of accuracy, for a pack is no better than its worst member; a misplaced orange or a bruised cantaloupe will cost the integrity of its crate, and excuses do not excuse after the lids are nailed.

* * * * *

In California, providing the calendar leaves keep to their places, the fruit year begins with winter olives. Now olives, although a relatively new industry, continue to be pickled in plants old and quaint and Mosaic. The majority of olive factories are rambling, burrowing structures, crowded with concrete pickling vats, each vat holding about a thousand pounds of the festive fruit. Complicated grading machines first sort the raw olives according to sizes: extra large, large, medium large, and fully a dozen more grades of bigness and littleness. Six girls sit at each grader, three at each spout. A keen-eyed and deft-fingered crew they must be, too, for their mission is an important one. They sort out the soft olives and culls, which are made up into oil or ground pickles, and separate the green olives from the ripe, for each kind requires a separate pickling brine and cooking process. The olive crop matures slowly, and the sorting process often continues for six or eight weeks.

* * * * *

The olives finished, there is the early spring lettuce, reachable by roads which stretch away like white silk ribbons. Now lettuce is a youthful and fickle and nerve-trying sort of crop, and its harvest is expensive and complicated. But if lettuce weather holds, so usually do lettuce wages.

Lettuce weather is cool dry weather. When warm rains come, jobs and profits vanish like dew under a summer sun. For half a day of wet earth and steamy sunshine will put a lettuce crop to the slime. Stricken by the dreaded fungi, a crop worth seven hundred dollars an acre will vanish in the time of an amateur chess game. The fresh green leaves fade into dull gray oblivion, and growers and weather clerks and California senators and State police are powerless to interrupt. There can be no compromising. When the slime comes the crop goes.

A lettuce crew is a diverse and colorful outfit. The trimmers are women—girls usually—fleet-fingered and accurate, working two trimmers to the packer. Armed with razor-sharp stub knives they clip off the roots and the soiled layer of outside leaves, and then pass the heads to the packer, who fills the crates, layer by layer, and roars for ever greater speed. Assisting the packer is the liner, a boy who spreads the crate with a protection of soft paper and covers down the top tier of lettuce; the lidder, a rat-tat artist who wields his thin-headed hammer at such speed that the casual onlooker can hardly make out head or tail of it; and the icer, who wields a shaving trident. Now the icer and the packer should always be in close affinity; for, considered professionally, each is as salt in the other's stew. The packer lays down a layer of lettuce heads, and the icer spreads them over with shaven ice; the packer lays three or four more layers of lettuce, and the icer shovels more ice. Then the lidder nails on the top, and the crate moves on rollers to the car, where the loader and truckster hold dominion. Three hundred and seventy-five crates of lettuce fill a car, and about a ton of ice must be thrown into the hold for additional refrigeration. A crew of twenty fast "greeners" should turn out three carloads of lettuce in a twelve-hour day, which theoretically stands for about ten dollars for each full-time worker, inasmuch as current job rates on lettuce allow each hand about three dollars and fifty cents per car. But lettuce seasons are short-lived and shifty. Even if the days are passing dry the season is likely not to hold for more than two weeks, which means that, taken as a practical matter, lettuce is but a whetter-up for oranges—the first Valencias of the protected valleys.

* * * * *

Of course oranges are the momentous crop. But from the viewpoint of picking and packing profits they are scarcely as advantageous as half a dozen others. The most skilful of orange packers rarely earns more than seven or eight dollars a day and the orange trades require a deal of expensive travel. Moreover, the interruptions and minor grievances are many. The ripenings are slow, irregular, and much subject to weather; and California weather is—just that. If a packer fills a crate just a scant bit too scantily or if a single hapless orange bellies out enough to become lid-bruised, then the press man who checks the pack and nails on the lids says what one might expect a ferociously busy press man to say, and puts the box aside, which means that the luckless packer gets nothing save condemnations. An old hand will probably have no more than half a dozen in a week's time, which is that many more than he wants, but a neophyte may make as many bad packs in a day. And foremen's teeth become worn away with gritting.

Most foremanships are acquired by virtue of skill and seniority. The pack boss is usually an experienced superfruit tramp and as a graduate of the school of firm packs he has a rating to make and a reputation to hold. Bad packs and bad prices are generally synonymous. On some jobs foreladies are employed to oversee the work of women packers. The expediency of this practice is still open to considerable doubt. A packing foreman for an outlying Del Monte plant assured me with emphasis that he had tried women pack bosses and found them wanting; that the phenomenon of having women about to tell other women what to do is precisely like home with a couple of mothers-in-law. But his decree may have been more a matter of domestic prejudice than of executive discretion. The fore-half of that gentleman's house is occupied by mothers-in-law.

The packing foreman is oftentimes a business man in his own right. He may accept and fill packing contracts, and by virtue of his entrepreneurship may stand a chance of making a medium fortune, or losing one, at a single job. I know a packer who cleared nine thousand dollars in the brief course of last October's orange rush, and then, because of an unfortunate time-guaranty clause, straightway lost seven thousand on a spring-lettuce enterprise.

* * * * *

After first oranges come cherries, which are harvested largely by Japanese, who pick for wages too scant to attract the run of self-sustaining and -respecting American fruit tramps. Peach thinning comes next—rough work, but profitable enough. Fifty cents a tree will probably provide a thinner's wage of ten or twelve dollars a day, no extra provision for peach fuzz and sunburns and toppling ladders and frequent tumbles.

Peach harvest and canning time dawn almost simultaneously. The first peerage of fruit people usually take the picking while the more conservative mediums will probably choose the canning. In theory, at least, the canner's lot is the easier. Certainly he is roofed in from wind and rain; his working hours are limited, but he is likely to be subject to unceasing rush. Canning factories are noisy, blaring, pell-mell institutions, where weak mortals must be forced into pace with strong impersonal machines. Yet by virtue of their stability of location and certainty of wages, the canneries bring a double gladness to the fruit people, who are glad to see them open and glad again to see them close. There are times in the fruit tramp's career when dependable jobs and wages are thrice welcome, even though the labor be hard and hurried. But there comes also an unction from earned leisure, a poetry of changing fields, a joy in the festive final shower bath.

But peaches serve as passage payers to greater things—apples and prunes, for example. The searcher after high adventure and topping wages usually goes for the apples—up in Washington and Oregon, where the pace is fast and the apples are high. But there is an uncompromising secrecy about the Great Coast apples. It would seem indeed that all paying orchards are bounded by high wild mountains and inaccessible sunless valleys. An apple man may tell you that he is going, but he never specifies just where he is going. And primitive propriety in some way prevents your asking.

For the medium, temperate, and easy-going fruit folks there is the quiet solitude of prune harvest, in protected and amiable California valleys. In turns the prunes give way gracefully to the hop yards and to the winter pear crop. And the autumnal "red" grapes are one of the happiest of the Far West fill-ins. The grape season is long, eight or nine weeks; the crop is not highly perishable, packing and shipping are reasonably deliberate, and the grape area is a large one, extending intermittently from northern Mexico to Oregon. The harvest provides fair wages and a multitude of jobs, and it serves as a restful tideover between autumn oranges and winter spinach. My own transient impression is that Western grapes are a very hazardous crop from the viewpoint of owners and marketers—indeed, that most grape growers lose money on most of their crops. But fruit is a precarious industry, and all fruit people from the mightiest grower to the meekest peeler stand to lose as gallantly as they win.

* * * * *

So fruit people must needs be versatile; their trade requires a lucky bag of alternatives. If the oranges flop, then there may perchance be lemons. If the strawberries be rained out, maybe the cherries will hold. If frost wipes out the budded peaches, maybe the more conservative apples will hold up. If all of them fail, there still remain farther stretches of earth and fruit; there are open road, a sun and stars to guide by, and, the fates smiling, a runable flivver and let us hope a couple of unpunctured tires. Accordingly the compleat fruit tramp may keep to the trail and gather life at its best ripened hours, and in the doing remain naive and agile and light-hearted.

Tar Heel Justice

By NELL BATTLE LEWIS

Charlotte, August 27

NORTH CAROLINA'S industrial cause celèbre reopened here on August 26 in the Mecklenburg County Courthouse, after a change of venue from inflamed Gastonia and the lapse of a month during which the passion and prejudice aroused by this case in both camps had had a chance to simmer down. In a packed courtroom, the atmosphere of which was considerably less tense than that of the Gaston court, the sixteen participants in the recent strike at the Loray mills who are accused of conspiracy to murder O. F. Aderholt, Gastonia police chief, went on trial, the thirteen men charged with first-degree murder and the three women with murder in the second degree.

The same severely judicial temper which Judge M. V. Barnhill displayed at Gastonia during the two preliminary days of the trial a month ago was manifested again at the reopening of the case here, and has resulted in developments distinctly favorable to the defense. Although denying motions by defense counsel Arthur Garfield Hays to dismiss the indictment and bill of particulars on grounds of indefiniteness and insufficiency, the Judge ordered the prosecution to bring in a more detailed bill, and gave encouragement to the defense by ruling that evidence of conspiracy will be confined to events of the night of June 7, when the police chief was killed, thus, it is believed, cutting out much of the testimony of the prosecution relative to the tumultuous weeks of the strike which culminated in the homicide. Such testimony would inevitably have influenced the jury.

Whatever may be the significance of this now noted trial as an epochal battle between workers and mill-owners in the South, it is clearly the intention of Judge Barnhill, who from the first has kept the case thoroughly in hand, to limit it to its purely legal aspects as a trial for conspiracy resulting in murder, and to eliminate as far as possible the heated controversial issues. Whether he will be able to do this remains to be seen, as the case is so deeply involved in questions larger than the killing itself. The Court ruled as follows: "I shall restrict the evidence to what happened on the grounds and will admit no evidence of any conspiracy except to resist the officers on the night of June 7." This ruling was made over vigorous objection of the prosecution, whose second bill of particulars had set forth at some length a charge of conspiracy to enter the Loray mill and remove employees.

Probably several days will be taken up in selecting the jury from a venire of 200. This number may prove to be too few from which to choose the twelve who will decide the case. For every defendant the State has four peremptory challenges and the defense has twelve, which means that the selection of the jurors is likely not to be completed before the first of next week, at earliest.

Friends of the defense have called attention to the fact that, strictly speaking, the strikers will not be tried by a jury "of their peers," since according to the North Carolina law jurors must be property owners, which the defendants are not. Aside from this, on the whole the chances of assembling an impartial jury are better in Mecklenburg County than in Gaston, not only because of the greater distance from the scene of the killing, but also because of the more varied elements that make up the population of Charlotte, the second-largest town in the State. It is true, however, that the Charlotte papers in general have done what they could to prejudice their readers against the strikers and to make impartiality as difficult as possible.

In addition to Judge Barnhill's limitation of the issues, another aspect which is considered favorable to the defense is the provision of the North Carolina law whereby defense counsel are allowed preliminary examination of the State's witnesses. This examination took place on the second day of the trial with lawyers for the prosecution present.

Entrance of Arthur Garfield Hays, general counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union, came as an eleventh-hour surprise, and strongly reinforces the defense. Previously, the comparative weakness of the defense against the array of prominent lawyers retained by the prosecution had been a subject of comment in the State, and the presence of the distinguished Mr. Hays, veteran of many battles for civil liberty, may well put new heart into his colleagues and give his opponents pause. The relation of the American Civil Liberties Union to the case has been misunderstood, and it may be well to quote here in full the statement given out by the executive committee of that body on August 26:

> In view of certain misleading statements in the press concerning the relation of the American Civil Liberties Union to the Gastonia defense, the union desires to repeat its statement that the International Labor Defense is solely responsible for the conduct of the case, that Mr. Arthur Garfield Hays enters the case at the request of the International Labor Defense and not as the general counsel of the Civil Liberties Union, that the functions of the Civil Liberties Union in this instance are, as they have been from the beginning, (1) to transmit to the legal defense funds sent to the union itself; (2) to exert its influence to guard and protect before the court of public opinion the vital issues of civil liberties that may be involved in what is ostensibly a murder trial but which grew out of an industrial struggle that has been accompanied by evidences of passion and prejudice. Both these functions we desire and expect to continue.

A sketch of the setting of this case shows on the bench in Mecklenburg's spick and span new courthouse a lean, laconic young judge who speaks so softly that reporters have to bend forward to catch his words. Facing him in a long semi-circle which stretches across the courtroom are the sixteen defendants, whose appearance is anything but sinister, and who seem singularly untroubled. Two of the women, Vera Bush and Amy Schecter, who have been speaking continuously in behalf of the defense since their release on bail, show signs of strain, but not so nineteen-year-old Sophie Melvin.

Behind and to one side of the defendants is the flock of newspaper correspondents and special writers. No other North Carolina case has ever attracted such a gathering of representatives of the press. Their presence means front-page publicity which North Carolina may enjoy less than some which its new industrial development has brought forth in recent years. One hazards the guess that the array of correspondents has had a somewhat sobering effect upon the prosecution. Too many typewriters are reporting this trial for the heresy-hunt begun by the prosecution at the habeas corpus hearing to be pursued with quite the righteous fervor with which it began.

To the left of the judge are the lawyers for the prosecution: Clyde R. Hoey, brother-in-law of Governor Gardner, the most conspicuous—suave, theatrical, eloquent, with flowing gray locks, cutaway coat, and boutonnière; E. T. Cansler, one of the ablest members of the Charlotte bar, with a notable record in criminal cases; breezy John G. Carpenter, solicitor, and titular leader of the prosecution; A. L. Bulwinckle, attorney for the Manville-Jenckes Company, which operates the Loray mills, and during the strike head man of the mill's Committee of One Hundred, against whom the strikers nurse sore grievances; R. G. Cherry, State commander of the American Legion; George B. Mason, Gastonia city solicitor; A. E. Woltz, A. C. Mangum, and other lesser lights from Gastonia, whose interests are identified with the manufacturers but who are careful to maintain that in this case Gaston County and the city of Gastonia are their only clients. All are staunch defenders of the faith—faith in the unquestionable rightness of the industrial status quo.

Opposite sits the defense: Arthur Garfield Hays, of New York, and John Randolph Neal, of Tennessee, "foreigners," who, no doubt, are regarded with added suspicion by citizens of Mecklenburg, Tar Heel stronghold of fundamentalism, because of their previous connection with the Tennessee evolution trial. With the exception of Leon Josephson, of Trenton, New Jersey, and R. L. Sigmon, the only Gaston lawyer associated with the defense, all the other defense counsel are from Charlotte: Tom P. Jimison, who has been active in behalf of the strikers from the start, R. L. Flowers, J. D. McCall, Thaddeus Adams, and W. H. Abernethy.

Among the spectators who crowded the courtroom on the first day of the trial were a number of mill-workers who had come, half-anxious, half-curious, to see what the law would do to the defendants who had roused them to demand better conditions of labor and life. Some were men in overalls (dressed for the occasion, said one of the Charlotte papers contemptuously), some were women with thin, strained faces and babies in arms—ignorant of the deeper significance of the case, but knowing well that working hours are long and wages meager, and that the accused men and women had tried to help them.

While the fate of the defendants is being decided, mills clatter from dawn to dark and on through the night in this section, the textile center of the State. North Carolina, waking to the importance of the trial, watches, wonders, speculates on the future here of a great world current which has disturbed its goose that lays the golden egg.

In the Driftway

HOW unprogressive we are! How old-fashioned! Of course one usually hears it put just the other way: How progressive we are; how modern! But that is because a single item of progress stands out and is remarked in the midst of a stationary mass all about. The overwhelming conservatism of man, his fear of change, his indifference and even downright antagonism toward efforts to better his lot—these things are the rule of life, and the occasional halting steps forward are the exceptions, even in the United States, which we like to believe is the most progressive country in the world. The very fact that we talk so much about progress, real or fancied, is proof of its unusualness. Nor is the Drifter thinking, when he considers how unprogressive we are, of our notorious slowness in making advances in our political, industrial, and social life—of our indifference toward extricating ourselves from conditions which enlightened people generally admit to be intolerable, and yet quietly go on tolerating. Nobody of intelligence argues that we are progressive except in a scientific and material way, but right in that field, too, the Drifter would like to say that we are nothing of the sort. In the last quarter of a century we have developed the automobile, the airplane, the phonograph, the radio, and the motion picture; we have wrought wonders in our factories in the way of labor-saving machinery and have introduced new marvels in medicine. Yet in housing we have reached a practical impasse in the construction of homes for the masses at rents which they can pay, in city transportation we are bungling into ever greater congestion, in food we have more variety but poorer quality and worse cooking than ever before in the history of America, and our clothing—for men, at any rate—is so palpably absurd that even the usually long-suffering and change-fearing male has been crying out lately for relief.

* * * * *

BUT it is in some of the little things that the Drifter is most often struck with our dependence upon habit, our tendency to cling to objects in the material world long after they have ceased to have any use, and often after they have become positive nuisances. Take, for instance, the watering cart, or sprinkling wagon, that still rolls through the streets of most of our cities in summer—at least it still survives in New York. Survives and is paid for by the public. The watering cart goes back to the days of dirt or stone-paved highways and vehicles drawn by horses. It was useful then in laying dust, and if driven over a street or road often enough was a boon in keeping dirt from flying. But with the general appearance of asphalt or concrete pavements on our roads there is comparatively little dust to fly. What is more, the advent of the automobile has covered all our streets with grease and oil so that after a watering cart has sprinkled them they become running rivers and stagnant ponds of oleaginous muck. Motor cars, dashing through this with their broad tires, whirl it twenty feet to either side of them and bespatter the pedestrian so that the only hope for his clothes lies with the dry-cleaner. The sprinkling wagon today is a mere habit—a survival that is not only a needless waste but a positive pest.

FROM Milt. Goldman comes a letter saying that the remarks about the pleasures of haying [August 7] evoke no sympathetic response from him. Quite the contrary.

> But how very different was the business of filling our silo. (You apparently had no silo on your farm.) Our corn being cut, hardly a day passed that my brother or I did not inquire of my father when we were going to "make silage." And when he finally rode off one morning with our farm hands, Fyeodor and Jake, to borrow the necessary machinery from a neighbor, we were happy with the impatience and restlessness of lovers.
>
> To a youngster there are many happy places on a farm, but the interior of a silo is of course not to be equaled. We were within hours before the machinery was ready to blow the fodder up and through the cone-like top. Very impatient were we indeed, and one of us scurried out every few minutes into the hot sunshine to find out the cause of the delay. But when the green flakes finally began to rain down upon us our joy was great. We gaily set to scattering the fodder, wildly stamping it down to the accompaniment of the chugging and droning machinery without, and the Polish harvest songs taught us by Fyeodor, within. We were very merry under that fragrant hail, our ears stinging and our tongues wagging with shouts that echoed resonantly in that tall cylinder. And when we climbed up and down the steep ladder as the silo filled majestically, we felt as important as we thought Fyeodor.
>
> Eheu! Those happy hours are gone, and we must solace ourselves with the vicarious joys of memory. I shall forgive you for stimulating some pleasant reminiscences; but please say no more in praise of making hay.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Defense of Metellus

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is all very well to quote Catullus with apparent admiration, but of what avail is that when in the same issue Mr. Harding (p. 167) makes Quintus Metellus Numidicus a Greek, calls him Metullicus Macedonicus, and characterizes as indignation what was probably a jest and is reported as a piece of impolitic plain speaking? Why should a man compress so many errors into one sentence? Does he not fear the gods? Or the grim Saturnian threat "Dabunt malum Metelli"? If they could tie Naevius to a post, what would they do to a man who so abuses their name and an innocent witticism?

Berkeley, California, August 19 MAX RADIN

Marching on Broadway

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There ought to be a law making it a crime for anyone who is not a channel swimmer, or a stowaway, or a Rumanian queen to invade the sacred lane of Broadway with a parade. This afternoon about 10,000 Jews from the East Side marched to the office of the British Consul in Whitehall Street. But what a terrible parade it was! No marshal, no swinging baton, no blaring brass bands, no color; nothing, except the sight of bearded old men and weeping old women marching without rhythm or step, dragging some banners on which were such words as "rights," "justice," "humanity." A hundred Jews or more had been massacred in Palestine, and the wretched figure of Israel, bent and broken, creased and lined with the suffering of ages, marched again, even as he marched in Egypt, in Kishinev when the Cossack rode riot, and in Rumania when death stalked through the villages.

But did I say that there was no rhythm to the step of these tragic marchers? Even now, long after the last of them has vanished, the steady, silent beat of their footsteps fills the air like some measured chant out of a distant past, and to those who have ears it seems to say: "Let us march. We have always marched. Until this brotherhood of man of which they sing, while their swords drip with blood, shall come to mean something, until then let us march . . . let us march."

Freeport, Long Island, August 26 GABRIEL HEATTER

Patriotism and Religion

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following is extracted from a pamphlet distributed to the public schools. The pamphlet is entitled "The Flag of the United States of America." The first page contains this subscription: "Editing Committee: Gridley Adams, E. S. Martin, Boy Scouts, John L. Riley (since deceased), American Legion." The quotation I submit reads: "The Flag . . . a symbol sacred second only to The Cross." ! ! ! The exclamation marks are mine.

New York, July 18 EPHRAIM CROSS

Syntax

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue for May 29 you dilate upon Dodsworth's Dilemma, due to his inability to understand the language of the English stage. On the same page (638), under the heading Peace and Poison, you express sentiments that awaken an answering echo in the heart. Here again, however, the language itself is tinctured with poison; and I am giving you no peace till you admit and correct it. In the last sentence in the last paragraph but one you have written: "Who knows but what as a result of the Cleveland disaster Paris will be snuffed out in the next war with the gas which proved so efficient at Cleveland?" Here are two errors in English: the "what" and the "which" should both be "that." I have ample encouragement to expect something better of The Nation.

Timarn, New Zealand, July 7 CLYDE CARR

[The "what" certainly ought to be "that," but we think the "which" is justified by usage, at least in these United States.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Edward Carpenter

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In my naive moments I have wondered why so little attention is paid Edward Carpenter, whose death is mentioned in your issue of July 31. Are his writings not literature? Or is literature too puny a vehicle for that infinitely extended self?

Walt Whitman, recognized as a kindred spirit, seems the only one to be reasonably associated with him. Yet who illuminates life as he does? Who has so simply defined the infinite, so clearly expressed the limitations of the human mind (witness his essay on science) and conveyed the possibilities of the universal sense?

His prose is staggering in its powerful simplicity, and "Towards Democracy" is the key to a heaven. The answer to my wondering may well be: He was too universal, too unassuming, too selfless. He may—alas—have favored social equity. He expressed too much overwhelming beauty of soul. An ordinary mortal can stand but little; for the appetites are ever at the door, like tax collectors in England.

Portland, Oregon, August 3 H. W. JARRETT

A Correction

Mr. Benjamin A. Javits, coauthor with Charles W. Wood of the book entitled "Make Everybody Rich: Industry's New Goal," which was reviewed in The Nation of August 14, calls attention to the fact that the reviewer "apparently desired to heap it entirely on the head of" Mr. Wood. "The material in the book," Mr. Javits writes, "is mine, an Institute for Industrial Coordination is my child, and I spent many hours on the manuscript before publication." Mr. Wood, he adds, "was good enough to assist a busy lawyer and the busy lawyer was delighted to have the assistance of an able and dynamic writer."

The reviewer, Mr. James Rorty, to whom Mr. Javits's protest was submitted, writes that "unconsciously and quite unintentionally" he did treat the book as though it were Wood's exclusively," having been led to do so by the fact that "practically all the ideas in it appear, at least by implication, in Wood's 'The Myth of the Individual.'" The ascription of the book in the main to Mr. Wood was, however, Mr. Rorty assures us, entirely unintentional. The Nation joins with Mr. Rorty in expressing its regret to Mr. Javits that his part in the undertaking should not have been fully indicated.

EDITOR THE NATION

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—750 K.
September 9—Paul Blanshard
September 16—Arthur Warner

Contributors to This Issue

S. K. RATCLIFFE is an English journalist, now on the staff of the New Statesman.

CHARLES MORROW WILSON is assistant editor of All's Well, published in Fayetteville, Arkansas.

NELL BATTLE LEWIS is on the staff of the Raleigh News and Observer.

HAL SAUNDERS WHITE is in the English department of New York University.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN is head of the editorial department of Simon and Schuster.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN is a member of the boards of directors and of editors of the Realist.

JOHAN SMERTENKO is a New York critic.

V. F. CALVERTON is editor of the Modern Quarterly and author of "The Bankruptcy of Marriage."

RAYMOND LESLIE BUELL is the author of "The Native Problem in Africa."

RICHARD MCKEON is in the department of philosophy of Columbia University.

STUART CHASE is the author of "Men and Machines."

HALLDÓR KILJAN LAXNESS is Iceland's foremost contemporary novelist and poet.

Books

For the Nursery

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Now darkening horses stumble to their stalls
Over the worn sill of dusk.
One after one the ruddy cattle come
Embering to grey . . .
And the white whisper of milk.
Storm-crested roosters sheathe their metal legs;
Sack up the amber jewels of their eyes
In cloudiness.
And now the sweet mouse,
With quiet tooth and neat,
Is harvesting the subtle grains of sleep.

Pseudo-Historical Fiction

The Rebels. By Alfred Neumann. Translated by Huntley Paterson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

ONE of the reasons for Alfred Neumann's failure to gain an American audience commensurate with his merits is that he is touted as an historical novelist when he is not one at all. By turns he is mystery-story writer and metaphysician, a sorcerer whose effects vary from the awe-inspiring to the parlor-tricky. To read his works as historical novels is simply confusing. He is never really interested in creating a background or making vivid some historical complex. The treatment in "The Rebels" of the Carbonari uprising in central Italy from 1820 to 1830 is purposely oblique and fragmentary. Actually, the reader is not supposed to know what it is all about, to have any systematic understanding of the social and economic forces which presumably lie behind the movements of the personages. A clear understanding would be murderous to the shadowy Gothic effect for which Neumann is striving. The intrigue is enveloped in a dark cloud of innuendo; tortured souls express their agonies in gnomic sentences; no one is frank or explicit; Checca, Madda, Caminer, and even Guerra himself are sinister, humorless, melodramatic. The tale is labyrinthine, a maze of dark, narrow streets in which the characters dog each other stealthily, meet but to utter a few low-voiced mysterious words, and pass on, wrapped in the black cloak of their own moral suffering.

It is a deliberate and intelligent falsification of history, just as a romantic novel by Walter Scott is a childish and uncritical one. Neumann is not interested in the Carbonari conspiracy for its own sake, but because by enmeshing his already complicated characters in a network of intrigue he can produce an effect of still greater complication. He enriches the enigma of their personalities by subjecting them to the cross-currents of a mystical patriotism. To put it a bit cheaply but not necessarily inaccurately, the political intrigue is artistically necessary because it prevents the characters from speaking openly to each other. History is like a black veil behind which their faces are nebulous and frightening, their voices muted and elusive.

Once the reader has experienced this strange terror effect, he has received most of what Neumann has to give. As a story "The Rebels" is much less interesting than "The Devil"; in fact its bare fable is banal. It reminds one of those classic "situations" dear to Corneille and Racine. The Princess Maria Corleone finds herself at once the mistress of the Grand Duke of Tuscany and of Guerra, magnetic leader of the Carbonari. By a further complication she finds herself actually involved with the Carbonari in their projected assault on the Grand Duke's life. Her vacillations and Guerra's, as they are torn between passion and duty, love and patriotism, furnish the major lines of the story's exterior movement. At bottom, however, the situation is a stock one; the plot is unimportant; the outcome is awaited by the reader with no overpowering eagerness. What one comes to look for is not the mere points which determine the tragic curves of the career of Guerra, but the half-glimpsed confrontations and dialogues, those elliptic utterances which proceed out of terrific emotional tensities, out of imagined incest and fratricide, out of loves and hates which dare not speak their names or fully unveil their chimera-faces.

In view of what has just been said it may seem a little silly to speak of "The Rebels" as a study of anything; and yet I think it is such a study, a study of the conspiratorial temperament. With the possible exception of Guerra (and then only at the end of his career) none of the characters is politically minded. Gioia, Checca, Madda, Maria Corleone might all conceivably be on the side of reaction rather than of revolution. They have no clear comprehension of the struggle in which they are pawns, nor do they in their hearts desire any such understanding. To them, intrigue and conspiracy are forms of personal salvation, not instruments of political freedom. Conspiracy is a refuge for their unhappy and unbalanced souls. In its ambiguities, its denunciations, its atmosphere of assassination, is a reflection of their own interior turmoil. In its perils and escapes they find a sort of release for their own life-despair. Real revolutions, of course, are the work of businesslike individuals, patient and practical propagandists like Lenin; but just below such leaders there is always a group of tortured romantics whose fanaticism, by reason of its very remoteness from any political aim, is sometimes all the more effective.

I may add that it needs but a touch here and there to turn "The Rebels" into a gorgeous satire on the revolutionary temperament. Neumann stops just short of extravagance; another step and his characters, with their eternal dramatizing and twilight utterances, would have been completely ridiculous. He does not take that step, affording one more proof of the oft-repeated statement that it is difficult to be at the same time a German and a humorist.

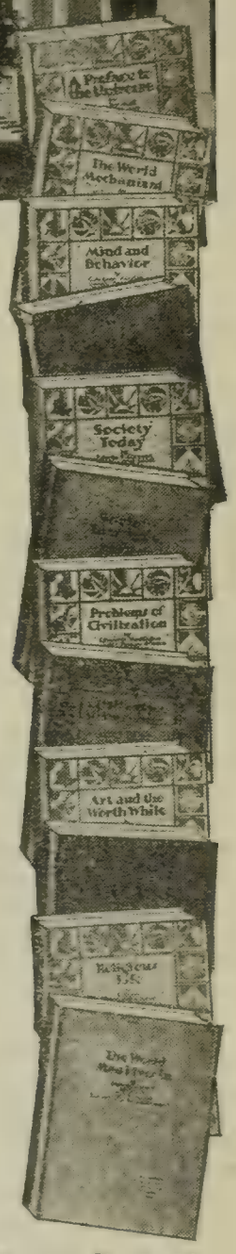
CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Consider the Ants

The Structure of Politics at the Accession of George III. By L. B. Namier. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $10.50.

EARLY this year a new reputation was made when Mr. L. B. Namier, sometime tutor of Balliol College, Oxford, published his "Structure of Politics at the Accession of George III," being the first two volumes of a larger work which is to include a study of the imperial problem during the American Revolution. Since the days of William Stubbs the task of the historians has largely been that of rewriting Whig history as scholars instead of as propagandists, and Mr. Namier's book involves an important revision of our estimate of eighteenth-century politics, of the extent of political corruption by court or governmental funds ("a small rivulet . . . and not nearly as dirty as supposed"), of the importance of "rotten boroughs," and of the part played by parties. Narrative history tends to show us a picturesque struggle between

58 Famous Authorities



Offer You

A University Background

Through Home Reading

That broad, cultural background that is so big an asset in social and business life and yet that has been so difficult to acquire in this busy age CAN NOW BE YOURS. To those men and women who have been denied a formal college education; or who have been compelled to specialize in some restricted line; or whose college work was completed some time ago and is now out of date, a wonderful opportunity is now offered to acquire a well-balanced, up-to-date understanding of modern cultural knowledge.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY

Essays in Contemporary Thought

Now Available to You in This Fascinating Reading Course of 12 Handy Volumes

Fifty-eight famous authorities from as many fields of thought have co-operated to give you a thorough appreciation of man, his world, and his intellectual achievements, in a series of stimulating essays which follow the structure and present the material of the Northwestern University Course in Contemporary Thought. All the essentials that you could gain from attending the actual University lecture course may be yours, by home reading at your own convenience, through this new series—offering in easy reading style that broad knowledge of the Arts, the Sciences, History, Philosophy, Religion, and Society that forms the cultural background of the University-trained man.

"MAN AND HIS WORLD"

The series is edited by Professor Baker Brownell, of Northwestern University, and the contributors comprise the outstanding figures in all fields of modern thought. The books present simply and clearly the latest accepted conceptions of man, his past and future; his artistic and scientific achievements; his individuality and social organization; his present knowledge of his world, its natural forces and the Universe of which it is a part. Twelve volumes form the set, as follows:

1. A Preface to the Universe
2. The World Mechanism
3. Mind and Behavior
4. Making Mankind
5. Society Today
6. Society Tomorrow
7. Problems of Civilization
8. Civilization and Enjoyment
9. Art and the Worth While
10. Five Arts
11. Religious Life
12. The World Man Lives In

In logically developed form the series progresses from the sciences to society and on to art, religion, and philosophy revealing the whole modern world and coordinating its complex knowledge into one related and harmonious picture. It is impossible to give an adequate idea of "Man and His World" in a brief announcement, so we are making it easily possible for you to

A Few of the 58 Contributors

Edwin E. Slosson
Morris Fishbein
Zona Gale
Richard T. Ely
Clarence Darrow
Joseph Jastrow
Llewellyn Jones
Robert Morss Lovett
Stuart Chase
Shailer Mathews
Walter Dill Scott
Waldo Frank
Bertrand Russell
Ellsworth Huntington
Austin H. Clark
Fay-Cooper Cole
W. E. Hotchkiss
Bishop Francis J. McConnell

12 vols. Size 5 x 7 in. Art boards with cloth back. Illustrated with modern decorations. Handsomely boxed.

Examine the Books FREE

Without cost or obligation to you we will place the complete set in your hands for ten days' examination. Look the books over carefully; read enough of them to appreciate the clarity and interest of their style; notice the pre-eminent contributors: and judge for yourself their definite value to you. If you are not entirely satisfied you may return the set and owe nothing. If you keep it, make a first payment of $3.25 and four monthly payments thereafter of $4.00 each—a total of $19.25 for the complete set of twelve handsome volumes. When you see the books you will realize how low the price is for so valuable a work. Send the examination form today.

See the Books at Your Bookstore, or -------ORDER ON THIS COUPON-------

D. VAN NOSTRAND CO., Inc.
250 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Please send me for examination the 12 volumes of MAN AND HIS WORLD. Within ten days of receipt I may return the set and owe nothing. If I keep it I will make a first payment of $3.25 and four monthly payments thereafter of $4.00 each—a total of $19.25. Nation 9-11-29

Name .....

Street and Number .....

City and State .....

D. VAN NOSTRAND CO., INC., NEW YORK

Whig and Tories, Old Whigs and New Whigs, court and nobles, about the principles of liberty and loyalty. Examination of the details, however, shows us "an ant-heap with the human ants" scurrying in a world of parliamentary politics not based on party lines, looking for some "consideration," pecuniary or honorable, from the powers that be, and seeking, thanks to membership of "the best club in the world," to have "figure and weight in the country" and to take proper rank and precedence in London society. And the remarkable thing is that, despite analyses of the minutest detail of borough politics, Mr. Namier contrives to make his two volumes eminently readable.

Perhaps one reason for this last quality is a very un-English vein of gentle cynicism which runs through the whole work. Mr. Namier finds the eighteenth century "a naively corrupt and very amusing age." Regarded this way, philosophically sub specie aeternitatis, one age becomes much as another, one electoral system (humanity being what it is) not much better than another, private recompenses and modern vote-catching party funds not morally very distinguishable. "The aim in Parliamentary elections is not the mental and moral uplifting of the electorate, but the acquisition of seats." That yet there is a certain bright superficiality in this view, which finds twentieth-century and eighteenth-century politics, the politics of Philadelphia and those anywhere else individually distinctive and yet, so far as generalizations go, all much of a muchness, Mr. Namier's own pages are sufficient to show. Without citing the hackneyed case of Old Sarum, which was held by a debtor to avoid his creditors, or the barefaced demands for peerages or contracts in return for Parliamentary support, or the case of electors of the wrong party induced to drink till they died of the effects (with the best intentions—incapacitation alone was contemplated), we find Mr. Namier listing among reasons for entering Parliament "Immunity—Robbers—They likewise say that Bacon was oblig'd to get member, coast what it would, other ways he could not pass his accompts as contractor." Also Mr. Namier lists "Bastards," and quotes the letter of Lord Chesterfield to his illegitimate son stating "you must first make a figure in Parliament if you would make a figure in your country," while elsewhere specifically assigning the reason that membership would be "like the cloak of charity." The most natural thing for a "pretty young man" of gentle birth and small means was to look for provision directly to the state (as they put it in France "quelque chose de par le roi"). Almost all the admirals in the American Revolutionary War were members of Parliament and such matters as the choice of a successor in the regiment when Lord Howe was killed at Ticonderoga was a matter for political intercessions with His Grace of Newcastle. Not only the country, but the army, was full of men ready to sign themselves the Duke's "sincere friend and humble politician." Mr. Namier himself writes: "In 1700 it was 'faithful service to your country'; in 1760 'service of one's friends' "—and the change between the morals of Parliament, and still more of the civil service, during the eighteenth and during the twentieth century is still more emphatic; it is something which the leveling hand of the philosophy of "tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner" does a political disservice (be it sentimental or sardonic) by obliterating.

One conclusion, of the utmost importance to contemporary America, Mr. Namier does draw. Only where the distinctions between parties are genuine, and matters not of persons but of profound principle, can log-rolling, "accommodations," and corruption be avoided. Political corruption is a disease of peace, prosperity, and lack of challenge on fundamental issues. "To destroy it, a true political interest is required of sufficient moment to produce mass movements, to divert the energies and attention of men to a real political purpose and seriously to divide a nation shaken by passions or distress." To upset the complacent pursuit of enlightened self-interest by the English upper classes, when it could be stated in Parliament that the Americans had no grievance since they were represented through the Members for Kent (all land in America legally being held in the manor of East Greenwich), it required the doctrine of Jefferson of periodic revolution. There is no end to corrupt self-interest save by indignant discontent: "Liberty requires courage."

Another conclusion, not drawn by Mr. Namier, may also be reached. Mr. Namier is quite satisfied that the unreformed House represented the "political nation." "That the House of Commons was open to all who could reasonably aspire to it had a wonderfully unifying and stimulating influence on the nation." . . . "The House has at all times been one of the great uplifting influences in English social life." The number of those who could yet reasonably aspire was limited. At Yarmouth from 1722 to 1784 one member was always a Townshend and the other a Walpole; from 1715 to 1874 a Grosvenor always sat for Chester; Herberts and Clives have sat for Ludlow with few intermissions from 1688 to 1923, and Mr. George Windsor-Clive now sits. That is the quintessence of English social life. Whether one approves of it depends upon whether one approves of the permanent limitation to a superior few of the politically active nation. At least Mr. Namier has shown that the power of this few had little relation to public spirit or to efficiency. If one disapproves, then, while conceding that the England of 1775 may be more like that of 1925 than we had thought, we shall make the deduction that the time is overripe for substituting, for what Mr. Namier, in a Mephistophelian phrase, calls "socially uplifting influences," a "mass movement" for social justice and political rationalization—such as, perhaps, we may see under a MacDonald government.

GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

Spying Out Zion

Those Ancient Lands. Being a Journey to Palestine. By Louis Golding. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.50.

Reports of the Experts Submitted to the Joint Palestine Survey Commission. Boston: Published by the Commission.

IT is extraordinarily illuminating to contrast these two books, to balance the artist's impressions against the experts' opinions, to fill in his generalizations with their detailed statistics, to light up their depressing tables with the flame of his optimism. If his vistas range farther—back to Abraham and Joseph, the Kings and the Patriarchs, and forward to the unborn Hebrew dramas in the amphitheater of the university—their alkali determinations go deeper; they apprise Joe and Abe, Sam and David of the agricultural opportunities in the plains of Acre, Athlit, Beisan, and Jordan.

Where Mr. Golding is eloquent and vague and sentimental, the experts are terse, particular, and skeptical. While he glories in the beauty of the orchards, they assert that the Egyptian market can absorb 456,824 kilos of apricots—fresh, and 1,564,764 of apricots—dried. He is thrilled by the singing of the Chalutzim, the pioneers; they point out that the agricultural settlements have physical limitations, that of the million and a half acres in Palestine more than one-third are non-tillable. In the end—or even before the end—one turns with relief from the lush prose of this minor prophet to the economical report of the messengers sent again to spy out the Land of Israel.

Mr. Golding makes of Palestine a pleasant place though he seeks to make it inspiring. He cannot arouse in the reader a sense of its contemporary validity because for him it is too insistently the archaic treasure-house of our Hebrew ancestors or the eventual Utopia of our Jewish grandchildren. Despite his disclaimer, to him "there is something a little shocking . . . that he must link up by automobile the shrines of his pilgrimage"; thus while his chauffeur was filling the Buick with petrol Mr. Golding was making observations on the picturesque Arabs at the Damascus gate instead of noting that the gasoline cost seventy-five cents a gallon—more than three times what the American driver of that car would pay. Had he noticed the price, he might have sought the reason for it and thus discovered an entirely different Palestine.

Strangely enough the experts have also turned to other subjects rather than pursue the explanation of the high cost of living in Palestine—the index number for 1927 is 255 whereas in Egypt it is 154 and in the United Kingdom 167 on a pre-war basis of 100. Both Sir John Campbell and Dr. Leo Wolman, who recommends a special report on the subject, condemn the high tax rate, and the commission states its summary:

> Two evils of the past still burden Jewish settlement. One is the danger to loss of life and property from raids by nomadic Bedouin tribes from the vast region east of the Jordan. . . . The other evil is heavy taxation and the manner of levying it as a tithe. This penalizes intensive, thorough cultivation and interferes with growing perishable products . . .

But to the reader who does not dig thoroughly in the statistics it will not be apparent from these guarded statements that the entire Zionist venture, despite all the remarkable idealism, energy, and material that has gone into the work, is doomed to failure unless the lion of British imperialism is drawn off from its prey or unless Great Britain conceives its mandate as a moral trust rather than an economic monopoly.

JOHAN SMERTENKO

Social Criticism

Lyric Pioneers of Modern Germany. By Solomon Liptzin. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

ONE of the most interesting developments in criticism devoted to revealing the effects of social change upon literary trends is to be found in this volume by Solomon Liptzin. In an earlier book, "The Weavers in German Literature," Mr. Liptzin covered very adequately the economic background of the literature of protest that sprang up in Germany in the nineteenth century. In still an earlier volume, "Shelley in Germany," he showed in striking detail how critical attitudes toward Shelley were determined by the vicissitudes of political and economic circumstance. The praise, for instance, which was poured out with such unending generosity upon all of Shelley's revolutionary poems in the forties suddenly ceases after the failure of the revolution of 1848, and the era of attack begins, with men like Schmidt and Hebbel—Hebbel had been a Shelleyan before the revolution—leading the assault. In line with this same logic, Mr. Liptzin has shown in "Lyric Pioneers of Modern Germany" the interconnection between the whole movement of German life of the last century and its literature.

Beginning his study with the observation that literature is a seismograph of life, the author proceeds to trace the evolution of literary forms as expressions of life realities. In all deference to Camillo von Klenze, of whom Mr. Liptzin in a sense is a disciple, and whose study "From Goethe to Hauptmann" covered roughly the same period, Mr. Liptzin has succeeded in coming closer to the root-facts in the German literature of that day than his predecessor. Mr. Liptzin's analysis is straightforward, clear, and conclusive. His method is never vague nor uncertain. In general it is dissective rather than descriptive.

JUST OUT

AFTER MOTHER INDIA

Harry H. Field

The first book to tell what effect "Mother India" has actually had in India. In the light of the mass of new material Mr. Field critically appraises that book and builds a bridge between Miss Mayo and her critics. $3.50

CHICAGO

The History of Its Reputation

Henry Justin Smith and Lloyd Lewis

"The body, soul and voice of Chicago through a hundred years."—N. Y. Sun. "A vivacious narrative."—Robert Morss Lovett, New Republic. "The remarkable story of a city, photographed au naturel."—Harry Hansen, N. Y. World. $3.75

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

NEW BOOK CLUB

12 BOOKS for $5

EVERY month a new book delivered to your house on the day of publication. To show you how fine they are we'll send you one book on approval together with complete details of our plan. If you like it send us $5 and you receive a new Paper Book every month for a whole year. If you do not like the book return it to us and you will be under no obligation. This offer is open for a limited time only so clip the coupon now.

PAPER BOOKS, Charles Boni, Publisher,
66 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Please send me, free, a sample of the Paper Books, and details of your plan. Within 5 days after receiving the book I will send you $5.00 for a charter subscription for the Paper Books, or return the book.

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....

($5.50 in Canada, $6.00 abroad)
Send check with coupon if you prefer. 100 N

Social forces and class struggle are realities that are never evaded nor denied. On the other hand, they are used as the bases for approach and interpretation.

Beginning with the autobiography of Ulrich Braeker in 1789, Liptzin carries his study through the rise of the social lyric, the poetry of the middle class, the lyric of social pity, and finally to the lyric of social revolt and the lyric of social cynicism. The rise of interest on the part of writers in the proletariat is given the due significance that it deserves. The discussion of the social lyric, which reached its apex in the verse of Freiligrath and Heine, is sound in its interpretation. The arrival of Willkomm's proletarian novels as early as 1843 is considered in the enlightened manner of the new social criticism. Hebbel's "Maria Magdalena," in which the dramatist selected his characters from the lower classes, and Klein's "Kavalier und Arbeiter," in which the problems of the industrial proletariat were given serious and sympathetic portrayal, are noted as important too in chalking the change from the old, the bourgeois, to the new, the proletarian, literature.

There are other critics in England and America who have exploited the same critical approach, but Liptzin's work is more important than theirs in detail if not in range of conclusion. Lacking the brilliant dynamics of Trotzky's "Literature and Revolution," "Lyric Pioneers of Modern Germany," nevertheless, possesses in scholarship what it often lacks in spirit.

V. F. Calverton

Government by Professors

My War Memoirs. By Eduard Benes. Houghton Mifflin Company. $7.50.

THE day of the expert is upon us and his coming has not been an unmixed blessing. As the Geneva naval conference showed, he may magnify technical difficulties until there is no possible solution: what is needed in this complicated world is a philosophical view of the whole. In one sense the creators of Czecho-Slovakia were experts: they were men learned in history, philosophy, politics, and the law. But because of the breadth of their knowledge and the depth of their insight they knew how to rise above immediate difficulties and to single out the forest from the trees.

At the age of twenty-one Edward Benes went away from home in Prague and for three years he studied in the universities of France and of Germany. He then returned to Prague and between 1908 and 1914 continued his work in economics, sociology, and philosophy. When the World War broke out, Professor Masaryk and Professor Benes seized the opportunity to restore the ancient greatness of Bohemia—an opportunity for which they had conscientiously prepared. "I always consciously practiced politics in a scientific spirit," says M. Benes. These Czecho-Slovak leaders began by stealth to build up an organization at home and support for this organization in the Allied countries abroad. It was a perilous task, full of formidable obstacles, in part based on Allied misunderstanding. Allied support was fully won only when the Czecho-Slovaks contributed an army to their cause. In Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia common soldiers had joined Austro-Hungarian regiments; but these now deserted to the ranks of the Russians and after the 1917 revolution they came together in improvised volunteer organizations which under the leadership of General Syrovy began their spectacular march across Siberia en route to the Western front. They were diverted from their ultimate goal by encounters with the Bolsheviki in Siberia, as a result of which they occupied 8,000 kilometers of railway.

Finally came the armistice. On November 4 Professor Benes drove through Paris en route to a meeting of the Supreme War Council at Versailles. Seated beside Vesnic and Venizelos, he "could scarcely believe in the reality of what had happened. Three years previously I had escaped across the frontiers of Bohemia, crawling through the thickets to avoid being seen by the Austrian and Bavarian gendarmes, and staking the whole future on what destiny might bring. Now I was sitting in conference with the representatives of France, Great Britain, United States, Italy, Japan, Serbia, Greece, Belgium, and Portugal to decide with them as to the fate of the empires of Wilhelm and Karl and to sign the terms of their capitulation."

Thus the state of Czecho-Slovakia came into the world, a product of political intelligence, of determined effort, and of Allied arms. M. Benes, in common with Professor Masaryk, was one of the authors of the edifice; and he has told his story with proper impersonality and with great dignity of style.

Raymond Leslie Buell

An Uncertain Guide

Mediaeval Culture. By Karl Vossler. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two volumes. $8.00.

AT the suggestion of others, Dr. Vossler specifies in his preface, the two-volume translation of the work which had appeared in German as the "Divine Comedy" is entitled "Mediaeval Culture: An Introduction to Dante and His Times." Dr. Vossler's acquiescence to the suggestion was unfortunate and ill-advised; a narrower rather than a broader title would have been appropriate. The book is planned, however, with a large sweep to the end of opening up "to a wider circle of intelligent readers the comprehension of the Divine Comedy": Volume I begins with a comparison of Goethe's "Faust" and Dante's "Divine Comedy," proceeds to a study of the religious background (in the course of which Egyptian, Babylonian, Assyrian, Jewish, Persian, Greek, and Christian beliefs in a future life are differentiated in an average expanse of about a page and a half for each belief), then takes up the philosophical background and the ethical and political background; Volume II is devoted partly to a study of Italian and ancient literature, partly to a rhetorical tracing of the course of the Divine Comedy.

The chain of German vulgarizations during the past two decades (Dr. Vossler's work belongs at the earlier end of the chain) illustrates, in contrast to more recent American examples, one other way of making culture easily accessible. Dr. Vossler's book is one of the works of digested erudition, acquired from reading large numbers of doctoral and inaugural dissertations, intended to keep the general reader abreast with the changing learned conception of things in general; its appearance in English is doubtless indication of the hope that such second-hand erudition might help to bring a larger group to proper appreciate stupefaction before works of art.

Dr. Vossler's method is to sweep together diverse elements from sundry sources (usually, except in the case of Dante himself, on the authority of some one else) to explain this or that. The problem is seldom stated as it might have been in the original writings, and the solutions lose the significance their authors stated for them to take on instead an almost mystic resonance in Vossler's rhetoric. Consequently the conclusions of the book usually might be right or wrong indifferently; the pontifical decisions in which the shortcomings and ignorance of Plato, Aristotle, Anselm, Aquinas are pointed out are in all cases distressing. Indefinite decisiveness is so definite a characteristic of the book that no one example will illustrate it variously enough. But at random: Scotus Erigena is a bold champion of reason and a mystic whom the church treated as a heretic, but "the amiable and tactful Anselm of Canterbury . . . clips the wings of reason after she had been strengthened again through realism and puts her in the service of the church's belief." Passing over the confusing circumstance that it was for his realism that Anselm's contemporaries criticized him and that even his master protested that he pushed his rationalism too far, it is inexcusable that doctrines as finely worked as those of Erigena and Anselm should be tossed aside in such crass generalities.

Frequently, however, the author is definitely right. Elaborating on Dante's political doctrine he remarks, "Of Occam and Marsilius of Padua he surely knew nothing." Possibly the meaning is that Dante died in 1321, while Occam began his political writings about 1330, Marsilius about 1324.

But an even more lamentable consequence of the author's appreciative and generalizing vein is the distortion it works in the plan of his book. Properly enough about half of the first volume is devoted directly or indirectly to philosophy. Yet when one arrives in the second volume at the sphere of the Sun where Aquinas and Bonaventura present a company of philosophers to Dante, one is hurried by in three brief pages of distressing generalities. Literally the reader has been given nothing in the two volumes by which to appreciate the significance of the persons Dante mentions. Even the circumstance that Bonaventura should present Joachim of Flora is not mentioned nor is the introduction of Siger of Brabant by Thomas mentioned here (although one might remember that there was a mention of Siger in the first volume, and the bare information that he is in paradise). Yet there are fascinating and easily comprehensible stories in the contrasts of persons and doctrines involved in the passage through the sun; relevant to them brief excursions into contemporary philosophical debates might have been introduced which would have been more pertinent than the wordy disquisitions of Volume I. There is no reason why a work, to be popular, must be erroneous, or why the presentation of philosophical problems need be interpreted by the statement of the right answers which none of the debaters (save as they anticipated Kant or some other modern) perceived. Popular works have been simple, unpretentious, precise; indeed it might be suggested that in even these two volumes Mr. Spingarn's nicely conceived bibliography in the appendix is intelligent popularization. There is some excuse, however, in that it is not only popular studies that seek out the sources and colors of generations of thinkers. Doubtless the present work is learned enough to be a joy and an aid to the historians and essayists who study to distinguish the tempers and distempers of ages.

RICHARD MCKEON

Knights-Errant

The Labor Movement in the United States, 1860-1895. By Norman J. Ware. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

SINCLAIR LEWIS once asked me who knew anything about the American labor movement beside myself. Bowing low, I had to admit that, relatively speaking, I knew nothing about the labor movement, but paying dirt would be found in the heads of Ben Stolberg, Leo Wolman, A. J. Muste, Bob Dunn, and Norman Ware. That the tips were sound is evidenced in part at least by the present volume. Mr. Ware won the Hart Schaffner and Marx prize in 1924 with his "Industrial Worker, 1840-1860." Now he carries the saga up to 1895, in a manner scholarly, careful, and readable. It is essentially the story of the Knights of Labor, its dizzy rush to power and its rocket-like collapse. For a time the organization was immensely successful. It put the American labor movement on

The TRUE STORY of the ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

Joseph McCabe, Eminent Rationalist, shows why the Roman Catholic Church dreads history as much as Fundamentalism dreads Science.

Joseph McCabe, though now a famous Rationalist, was for twelve years a monk in a monastery. Since leaving the church, he has spent years in investigation and research. He knows the inside facts about the Roman Catholic Church. It is necessary only to tell the truth—history is devastating in its revelations. You can draw your own conclusions.

For a year Joseph McCabe will contribute one 30,000-word article each month to The Debunker, a unique monthly magazine. The titles of the 12 articles, the first of which appears in the October 1929 issue, are: (1) How the Roman Catholic Church Really Began; (2) How the Roman Catholic Church Became Wealthy and Corrupt; (3) How the Pope's Power Was Made and Enforced; (4) How Rome Made and Ruled the Dark Ages; (5) How People Were Made to Submit to Papal Power; (6) The True Relation of Rome to the Revival of Art, Letters and Learning; (7) The Height of the Papal Regime of Vice and Crime; (8) How Rome Fought Attempts to Reform Morals; (9) The Truth About the "Reform" of Rome; (10) The Last Alliance of Church and State; (11) Roman Catholic Intrigues of the 19th Century; (12) The Roman Catholic Church as It Is Today.

$1 We will enter your subscription to THE DEBUNKER for 1 year, including the 12 30,000-word McCabe article listed above, with many other sham-smashing articles, for only $1 ($1.50 Canadian and foreign).

SEND A DOLLAR BILL WITH THIS BLANK

Haldeman-Julius Publications,
Dept. A-1, Girard, Kansas.

I enclose $1 ($1.50 Canadian & Foreign) for one year of THE DEBUNKER starting with the issue of October, 1929, containing McCabe's first article on the Catholic Church.

Name .....

Address .....

City..... State.....

INTERNATIONAL

THE SOVIET UNION AND PEACE

With an Introduction by Henri Barbusse

An authoritative collection of official documents, treaties, decrees and appeals comprising the peace and disarmament proposals of the Soviet Government from 1917-1929.
8 vo. 294 pp. $2.25

ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION

Ten years of progress reported by outstanding Russian leaders, including several hundred photographs of revolutionary events. (Quarto—Volume I, $2.75.) Quarto—Vol. II, $4.00.

OUTLINE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY

by I. Lapidus and K. Ostovityanov

A course in Marxist Economics, covering the material comprised in the 3 vols. of Capital, with a systematic contrast of the various phases of production and distribution in the Soviet Union.
1 vo. $3.25

THE LIFE AND TEACHINGS OF KARL MARX

by Max Beer

A popular biographical study of the founder of scientific Socialism. 12 mo. $1.25

CEMENT, by Feodor Gladkov. 8vo. $2.50.
AZURE CITIES, Stories of New Russia. 12 mo. $2.50.
THE REVOLUTION OF 1917, by V. I. Lenin. 2 parts, 8 vo. each, $4.00.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS CO.
INCORPORATED
381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

the map; it reached groups never reached before; it covered the nation with propaganda about land, money, immigration, government ownership; it mixed into politics upsetting the digestions of untold statesmen; and like a phoenix from its ashes sprang the American Federation of Labor. It is a grand story, dramatic, bizarre, and disheartening—and thus thoroughly American. Mr. Ware goes far to explain why Sam Gompers, fleeing in terror from all the gaudy mistakes of the Knights, stamped the modern labor movement with a different hall-mark altogether. Nor, as the years have marched, is it apparent that the change was for the better. The Knights were out to remake the world, and foolish as such projects often are, there was in their attempt courage and daring and the authentic gleam of life. Foolish? Look at Ramsay MacDonald and his knight-errantry today.

STUART CHASE

Books in Brief

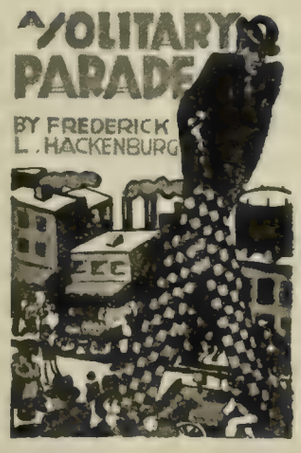
Prohibition or Control? Canada's Experience with the Liquor Problem, 1921-1927. By Reginald E. Hose. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

Mr. Hose's book may be cordially commended to all Americans who are interested in comparing the methods of Canada and the United States in dealing with the liquor traffic. Where the United States has ordained national prohibition, with a resulting orgy of corruption, official lawlessness, and crime, Canada has combined in a workable scheme provincial or local option and national regulation.

> The American system seeks to attain its object by compulsory control—a veritable constitutional strait-jacket. The Canadian system rests its attempt upon self-control, depending upon the traditional common sense of the people for success over intemperance. Hence the American States, with far wider powers, have surrendered to federal authority the very rights which the Canadian provinces are exercising to the full in their self-determined liquor laws, which cause no friction with the federal authority.

Mr. Hose discusses in much detail the powers and duties of the various commissions to which the control of the manufacture and sale of liquors is intrusted, the history of local option, the conduct of retail business, the enforcement of the liquor laws, and the various questions of taxation and revenue that are involved. The system of government control in Newfoundland is included in the survey. It is Mr. Hose's conclusion that "there does not appear to have been any dislocation of trade or unfavorable economic conditions" as the result of the system, and that "there is nothing to indicate that efficiency has been impaired or output retarded in the manufacturing world."

Problems of Peace. Third Series. Oxford University Press. $3.50.



This handsomely printed book contains "the lectures delivered at the fifth meeting of the Geneva Institute of International Relations," and is the third of a series of volumes published under this title. As the institute is organized and maintained in cooperation with the British League of Nations Union and the League of Nations Non-Partisan Association of the United States, the lectures given under its auspices from year to year naturally concern themselves with the work of the League, and present this work in the most favorable light. The lectures in this volume are no exception to the rule. The distinction, however, of the lecturers, the first-hand information which they handle, and the broad, inclusive, humane spirit in which they speak, give this collection of addresses an indisputable value. The Future of the League, The Working of the League Council, Disarmament, The First Results of the World Economic Conference, Tendencies in International Labor Legislation, The Mandates System, The League and the Protection of Minorities, The British Commonwealth and the League, Asia and the League, The Function of Law in International Relations, The Influence of Public Opinion on Foreign Policy come under discussion by authorities, mostly English, of the highest scholarly standing. To American readers the paper by Professor Manley O. Hudson, of the Harvard Law School, on America's Relation to World Peace, will be of especial interest. Professor Hudson finds the Briand-Kellogg Treaty for the renunciation of war to be of "great political significance and of great psychological importance," but believes it to be inferior as an achievement to Article II of the League Covenant. Yet he rejoices that this treaty places in our hands "a new implement for us to use in our struggle with the forces that make against peace."

Our Changing Civilization. By John Herman Randall, Jr. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $3.

Much of the material in this book is a popularized version of the author's more scholarly "Making of the Modern Mind," and it needs therefore scarcely be said that it is a philosophical, sociological essay on the evolution of Western society since the Renaissance, and very delightful reading. The Renaissance started a long epoch of accelerating change, yet we have still not learned how to change quickly and easily. Habits and ideals formed under earlier conditions make difficult the adjustments which society constantly has to make. We are slow to realize that industrialism demands new philosophies, new techniques of living, new standards, and are reluctant to strike out boldly for ourselves. Cynical protest, the escape of the aesthete to the Latin quarter or Fiesole, the glorification of business, these are all transitional passages, the discord has not yet been resolved into the new key for which we are searching. When this has once been found the author is confident that we will be in a position to assimilate and make good use of our heritage of philosophies, arts, and faiths, to value them as never before. Having escaped the "tyranny of emancipation . . . we shall turn to our ancestral goods to build our homes."

The Washington Conference and After. By Yamato Ichihashi. Stanford University Press. $4.

Mr. Ichihashi, who was Viscount Kato's secretary and interpreter at the Washington Conference, gives a balanced survey of the conference as it appears in the perspective of eight years. There are occasional Japanese sidelights, but for the most part the significant fact is that his judgment is very close to that of American and British observers.

The frankest discussion of the political life of New York and Albany ever published. An absorbing account of the life of a poor immigrant boy who worked his way up to become one of New York's best known lawyers, who served seven years in the Assembly where he was known as "The Champion of Lost Causes on Capitol Hill."

There is hardly a politician who escapes the author's scathing comment; there are hundreds of amusing incidents, told in an intensely human, direct and absorbing fashion.

The book of the day at a time when New York is once more in the throes of a bitter political battle fought by the very people so shrewdly commented upon by Frederick L. Hackenburg in "A Solitary Parade."

Price $3.00

THE THISTLE PRESS
151 Fifth Avenue New York

THEATERS

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

TRAVEL

Excursions to

SOVIET RUSSIA

via S.S. LEVIATHAN

— LARGEST STEAMSHIP AFLOAT —

New York—London
Leningrad—Moscow
$335 UP

Free Soviet Visas

Return ticket good for one year.

Sailings: Sept. 25, Oct. 12, Nov. 2, Nov. 20.

Ask your local Travel Bureau or AMERICAN-RUSSIAN TRAVEL AGENCY, Inc.

[illegible] Fifth Avenue New York City
Telephones: CHELsea 4477 and 5124

A Literary Vagabondage
Thru
Soviet Russia
with MICHAEL GOLD
via
LONDON COPENHAGEN HELSINFORS
and 10 days in LENINGRAD and MOSCOW
To study the new theatres in the Soviet Union—interviews and talks with Eisenstein, Mayakowsky, Lunacharsky and other noted writers, producers and directors.
SAILING, MIDNIGHT, SEPT. 27, on the S. S. ROTTERDAM $488
175 Fifth Ave. Flatiron Bldg. NEW YORK
WORLD TOURISTS INC.
Telephone ALGONQUIN 6656
CHICAGO MOSCOW TOKIO

See Page V—Houses and Apartments to Rent—For Sale.

CINEMA

STARTING SATURDAY SEPT. 14

THE MOST REVOLUTIONARY ADVANCE IN THE MOTION PICTURE TO DATE!

LIFE IN RUSSIA—
—Caught with the Naked Lens!

A COLOSSAL CROSS-SECTION OF THE PULSING EXISTENCE IN THE LAND OF THE SOVIETS.

FIRST SHOWING IN AMERICA
Direct From Moscow.
A Sovkino Production
An Amkino Release

The Berlin press hails this unique film: "Marvellous photography . . . full of character . . . extremely interesting . . . thrilling . . . exciting . . . excels everything so far presented in field of artistic film-creations . . . wonderful detail work . . . stands on the highest level . . . the most progressive film of the time. . . ."

—and on the same program—
A Remarkable Soviet Comedy
Exhilarant—Exciting—Exuberant

introducing a unique comedy team
ANNA STEN and KOWAL-SAMBORSKI

FILM GUILD CINEMA
52 West 8th St. Spring 5095-5090-1716 bet. 5th & 6th Aves.
Popular Prices — Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Weekday Price — 12 to 2 — 35c

International Relations Section

Social Conditions in Iceland

By HALLDÓR KILJAN LAXNESS

NEXT summer the Icelandic Parliament will celebrate its one thousandth anniversary. I am told that our Parliament is the oldest legislative assembly in the world—at least, it is the oldest in Europe. The Icelandic nation is extending invitations to the celebration to all Western countries. The United States has decided to send five delegates, and many individual States of the federal Union will be represented. The United States Government is appropriating $50,000 for a statue of Leifur Eiríksson, of which it is going to make the Icelanders a present on this occasion. Leifur Eiríksson, or Leif the Lucky, the first white man to discover America, in the year 1000, was an Icelander.

We have preserved in our country the old Norse language, which has developed into various dialects in the other Scandinavian countries. Every Icelandic child can read and understand books that were written in his language 800 years ago. The Icelanders can be characterized as a literary people. The vast bulk of literature popularly called Old-Scandinavian, comprising the Sagas and the Eddas and the history of the Scandinavian kings, which is at the same time the ancient history of Scandinavia, is written exclusively in Icelandic. All the bigger universities in Europe have a chair in the Old Norse language, which is the language which is spoken and written in Iceland today.

Contrary to the aspirations of the younger commercial nations, the ambition of every genuine young Icelander is to become a literary man. In Iceland we look upon business men with the same skepticism with which literary men are regarded in some other countries. There has never in the history of Iceland been any man of prominence in any field who did not have a literary education. Our most important statesmen have all been literary men—poets, authors, historians, and educators.

A 100 per cent American would be inclined to think that a country run by "dreamers"—is not that what they call them?—would be in a hopeless predicament both politically and economically. The reverse is the case. I read in a San Francisco paper the other day a statement made by the Danish economist, Dr. Knud Berlin, which showed, by comparative statistics, that Iceland had the highest per capita foreign trade of any nation in the world. The national budget of last year showed that the value of our exports exceeded the value of imports by about 17,000,000 crowns. That is a good showing for a nation of 100,000 souls.

Our chief export is fish—herring and codfish. At one time Icelandic herring merchants had the bad manners to compete with one another in the foreign markets, and for some years the bickering for better and better offers continued so long that a great part of the year's crop of herring remained unsold and had to be thrown into the ocean again. Then the government of Iceland took the herring commerce into its own hands. The foreign markets have now only one powerful seller to face, where there was previously a flock of haggling business men underbidding one another. This government monopoly of the herring commerce has been a tremendous success despite the vigorous attacks from the business people. And it is characteristic of Iceland that the director of the herring monopoly is a young erudite who specialized in literature at several European universities, author of several books, editor of a periodical on literature and social science, and coeditor of a labor paper in North Iceland.

There are three things I should particularly like to point out to people who belong to big countries which are continually bragging about prosperity. We have in Iceland no unemployment, no absolute poverty, and practically no criminality. In my lifetime there has been only one murder in Iceland—committed by an insane woman who killed her brother. Petty thefts are committed mostly by children who learn about those things in moving-picture houses. We have no regular jail worth mentioning. There was one in Reykjavik, but it was empty most of the time. But there has recently been erected a so-called "working home" on a big farm about 100 kilometers from Reykjavik, where drunkards, loafers, idlers, foreign tramps, and idiots may be put to useful work.

It has been the custom in late years to collect statistics about unemployment. According to reports from last spring, there were in Reykjavik only eight unemployed people. Five of those were accounted for because of sickness, one because of old age, and two of them had worked until April 30, 1929. As for poverty, that is taken care of by an excellently organized municipal aid. Thus, a man who, because of adverse circumstances, is unable to support his family, is provided for temporarily by the municipality without losing his prestige or civil rights. It is understood that he will pay back what has been given him as soon as he is able to. If he cannot, it is all right. We have had old-age pensions since the latter half of the nineteenth century.

We are very proud of our public education. Illiteracy is unknown. Every municipality has a public school, and there are a greater number of middle schools (high schools) in Iceland than among any other group of 100,000 people in the world. In addition we have two gymnasiums or higher colleges, a university and two commercial colleges, one on a capitalistic basis and the other on a cooperative basis.

There are innumerable newspapers and periodicals in Iceland. The periodicals especially are excellent; all modern current ideas find their spokesmen in them. Icelandic authors and artists are supported by the government, and the best of them are, as far as I am able to judge, on a level with good European and American artists.

Organized religion fares badly in Iceland. Ministers of religion have no prestige and the churches are as a rule empty on Sundays. Fundamentalist teachings find only a very poor support in the country because of a general lack of interest in such things among the population. The country has been Protestant since the sixteenth century, but recently the Catholics have built a gorgeous cathedral at Reykjavik, though there are only about 150 Catholics in the town.

SCHOOLS

OAK LANE
Country Day School

having been maintained as a successful progressive COUNTRY DAY SCHOOL since 1916, last year added

A Residence House for Boys 10 to 17 Years

in response to frequent requests from parents. All the advantages of a modern school and expert teachers plus resident opportunities in a small group.

For catalog address

WILLIAM B. CURRY (formerly Master at Bedales School, England), OAK LANE, PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.

MANHASSET BAY SCHOOL

A progressive school within commuting distance of the city for day and boarding pupils. Boys and girls 4 to 12 years.

Write Mrs. J. H. Renson, Manhasset Bay School Port Washington, N. Y.

NURSERY SCHOOLS

Announcing

A Nursery School at Oak Lane Country Day School

Oak Lane, Philadelphia. Through the generosity of Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Stokowski. Beginning September, 1929.

WILLIAM B. CURRY, Headmaster

OUR NURSERY SCHOOL

338 East 19th St., near Stuyvesant Park
A cooperative, progressive undertaking for children from 18 to 30 months of age.
Full day care. Sunny garden for outdoor play.
Progressive nursery school methods.
Group limited to 10 children. Applications should be made at once. Write or phone Slava Dunn, 338 East 19th St., N. Y. City.
Gramercy 4990.

HOFFMANN SCHOOL

for Individual Development

8997 Gouverneur Avenue, between Sedgwick Avenue and Van Cortlandt Park.

Day and Boarding School

CHILDREN 4-13 YEARS SCHOOL BUS

MOHEGAN MODERN SCHOOL

Peekskill, N. Y.

Announces its fall and winter program. A modern school in the country from kindergarten through the first year of high school. Living House for non resident children 4-14 years of age. A few vacancies available. For catalogue and information write:

Dr. B. W. BARKAS, Director

Great MOMENTS in "LITTLE NOVELS"

Like "opals flawlessly cut," Arthur Schnitzler's Little Novels offer the perfection of the Viennese master to his eager and growing American audience. Countless great moments are packed away in the ten little novels that comprise this book—magnificent moments, glamourous moments, ineffably tender moments . . . moments made unforgettable by the genius of Arthur Schnitzler.

"He crept further into the room. On the other chair, among some underclothes . . . God! there it was . . . a purse . . . he held it in his hand . . . At that instant he heard a faint creak. With a quick movement, he lay down full-length at the foot of the bed . . . Another creak . . . then all was silent, profoundly silent . . . He had done it! He had the twenty francs and now he could say to his brother 'You see I'm not a thief!' . . . and today they could start on their wanderings to Bormio, through the Valtelline . . . to Tirano . . . to Edole . . . to Lake Iseo."

—from "Blind Geronimo and His Brother" [page 150]

"Why did he send for me? Had she confessed? Why is he staring at me like that? Why am I sitting here at Molde on a verandah with a Pierrot? Can it be all a dream after all? Perhaps I am still asleep in Klare's arms . . . "

—from "The Fate of the Baron" [page 31]

"Then she became a model and walked on at a small theatre. The things she told us about the Director! . . . Then she fell in with a medical student . . . and she often came to fetch him from the dissecting-room . . . or more often stayed with him there . . . "

—from "The Greek Dancing-Girl" [page 71]

"Has Irene forgotten that she wanted to call Wilhelmine a murderess to her face? . . . And is Wilhelmine still aware that I am her lover, though I have called upon her in the middle of the night with a strange woman?"

—from "Dead Gabriel" [page 212]

This book of Arthur Schnitzler has just been published . . . and all over America, as in Europe, thousands of readers are now discovering for themselves the great moments in Little Novels.

In 1925 THE INNER SANCTUM had the honor and good fortune to publish Arthur Schnitzler's FRÄULEIN ELSE. That was almost five years ago. During those years, Arthur Schnitzler, long accepted on the Continent as one of Europe's greatest writers, has made his way with increasing success in America. In rapid succession and with growing acclaim five other books were published, BEATRICE, NONE BUT THE BRAVE, RHAPSODY, DAYBREAK and THERESA. It is with a sense that Schnitzler's fame is on the point of a brilliant consolidation that LITTLE NOVELS is presented. $2.50

from THE INNER SANCTUM of
SIMON and SCHUSTER
Publishers · 37 West 57th Street · New York

"LITTLE NOVELS" a new book
by ARTHUR SCHNITZLER

The social reawakening that has taken place in Iceland during the last fifteen years can largely be summed up in the history of the activities of one man. Mr. Jónas frá Hriflu, our present Minister of Education, and author of half a dozen books on educational matters, has had a very remarkable career both as social organizer and statesman, though he is only forty years of age. He went abroad while still very young, after having finished college in Iceland, and studied pedagogy and sociology in Scandinavia, Germany, France, and England. When he returned to Iceland he organized the so-called Young Peoples' Associations all over Iceland, with a center in Reykjavik, where he became the editor of their organ.

This movement helped greatly in leading the thoughts of the young into social channels. By and by Jónas frá Hriflu directed the energies of his adherents into more palpable enterprises and set out to fight for the organization of cooperative societies among the farmers. The young generation in the country stood by him, and in a few years, with a masterly, clever campaign, he succeeded in forming a chain of cooperative companies all over the country, with a branch in every district and a center at Reykjavik. These companies are owned and run by the farmers. They export their products without any middlemen and import directly foreign goods at far better prices than could be obtained by the individual business man. With the exception of Reykjavik the capital, the greater part of the nation's commerce is now in the hands of the cooperative societies, which are united under one head, the Alliance of Icelandic Cooperative Societies, on the principle of reciprocal responsibility: one for all and all for one. This means that if one individual cooperative society is in the way of going bankrupt, the confederation will even the balance. This cooperative chain is by far the most powerful commercial organization in the country, with offices in Edinburgh, London, Hamburg, Copenhagen, Oslo, and many other places. It controls to a large extent the affairs of the country both economically and politically. As the chain stores are owned by the people, they make it a point not to deal with anybody else. Most individually owned stores and business enterprises in the province have gone bankrupt, since they are not able to compete with the cooperative societies.

Mr. Jónas frá Hriflu was also the founder and still is the protector of the biggest labor unions both in Akureyri, the largest town in the North, and Reykjavik. Our most powerful labor union is formed of the trawler-fishers, but the trawlers are unfortunately still owned by wealthy private outfitters. The outfitters are the representatives and the stronghold of capitalism in Iceland. But now the workers are beginning to organize their own fishing companies on a cooperative basis, and one has actually been formed this year, starting with two trawlers. The foundation of that company is the most hopeful step we have yet taken toward the nationalization of our natural resources.

[The second and concluding article on Life and Property in the Caribbean, by Jonathan Wickwire, has been unavoidably deferred and will appear in the International Relations Section of the issue of September 25.]

RESORTS

Hospitality That Is Unique

It brings back friends year after year

Western View Farm

Open Until December

New Milford, Connecticut

83 miles from Columbus Circle

elevation 1000 feet—10th season

$8 a day, $49 a week

Telephone: New Milford 440.

Riding Swimming Tennis

Interesting people

UNITY HOUSE

IN THE BERKSHIRE MOUNTAINS

ALL CAMP SPORT ACTIVITIES

New Social Hall overlooking private mile and a half lake —new tennis and hand-ball courts—

AND ALSO

A spacious lounge—fireplaces—covered walks —cozy library—bowling, billiards, etc.

OPEN ALL YEAR. STEAM HEAT.

"Rain or Shine—Fun All the Time."

Early reservation essential—Call (till 7 p. m.)

UNITY HOUSE, Forest Park, Penn. Bushkill 4R2-5R3

NEW YORK OFFICE, 3 W. 16th St. Chelsea 2148

Operated on a non-profit basis—the comfort of our guests is our only incentive to effort. Owned by The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

SEA GATE RENDEZ-Vous

Where food is the best.

Cozy, comfortable and convenient. The balmy sea air combined with sun's health-giving rays offers you a restful and pleasant change. Arrangements can be made per week or day, or as long as your vacation lasts. 8913 Laurel Ave., Sea Gate, N. Y. Harbor, Phone Mayflower 8655

SECLUDED Country Resort—Conducive to enjoyable relaxation; wholesome table; tennis; 1½ hours from Grand Central; $25 weekly. HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 353.

Apartments

Let The Nation help solve your apartment problem. We are doing it all the time for others.

says one advertiser—

"We've rented a delightful apartment through the ad we ran in your publication."

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance to

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City

Telephone, Fitzroy 9074

Dance! Laugh! Play!

In this glorious Mountain-Lake country. Camp Sports in a Setting of Hotel Comforts

Write for descriptive booklet "J. T."

NEW MODERN BUILDINGS

KENMORE

at the Lake

NORTH WHITE LAKE, N. Y.

Station: Liberty. Phone: White Lake 62

N. Y. Office: 182 Fifth Ave.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1929 No. 3350

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 287
EDITORIALS:
Much Ado About Disarmament 290
The Nation's Laws 291
Morals and Movies 291
The Circus Forever 292
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 293
THE TRIUMPH OF THE POWER COMPANIES. By H. S. Raushenbush 294
THE POWER TRUST IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS. By George W. Norris 296
THE CENTRALIZATION OF POWER CONTROL 297
WISCONSIN'S POWER FIGHT. By Alvin C. Reis 298
FEDERAL CONTROL OF THE POWER TRUST. By Drew Pearson 300
GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S POWER PROGRAM. By Samuel I. Rosenman 302
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 304
CORRESPONDENCE 304
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 305
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Summer. By Ada Hastings Hedges 306
The Great American Tragedy. By William MacDonald 306
The Crisis in Power Control. By Henry Raymond Mussey 307
Baudelaire. By Joseph T. Shipley 308
Indian Lore. By Eda Lou Walton 309
Contrasts. By John Haynes Holmes 309
Fiction Briefs 310
Drama: Mauve Decade—With Music. By Joseph Wood Krutch 311

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

Dramatic Editor
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Literary Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON HEYWOOD BROUN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS LEWIS S. GANNETT CARL VAN DOREN
MARK VAN DOREN LUDWIG LEWISOHN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50; and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 34, Clifton Gardens, W. 9, London, England.

THIS ISSUE of The Nation is a challenge and a reply. It is a challenge to the power interests of the country that have exploited for their own benefit our richest resources, and it is a reply to those critics who frequently charge that progressives are impractical idealists. The power program presented by the experts in this issue is as practical as an electric-light bulb. Senator Norris and H. S. Raushenbush draw an indictment against the power interests whose justice no man can deny. These interests have not only made inordinate profits in recent years by the formation of great holding companies, but they have bought newspapers, college professors, and politicians in order to stifle public criticism of their policies. They have branded the leading advocates of public ownership as dangerous citizens, and have defeated almost every attempt at effective regulation. What can the consumers do about it? We believe that they will ultimately recognize the wisdom of public ownership as a national policy, but for the present a preliminary program of State and federal legislation is necessary to correct the worst abuses in the industry and to permit progressive communities to advance on their own initiative. As the federal part of this program we advocate the Couzens bill, as outlined by Drew Pearson, provided that it does not involve making the consumer pay rates on the basis of the excessively high prices which the holding groups have paid to acquire operating companies; in the State and local fields we submit the Wisconsin plan, as described by Alvin C. Reis, and the New York plan, as described by Samuel I. Rosenman. Now, when the power lobby is discredited and on the defensive, is the logical time for all American progressives to fight for such a program.

WE SHARE MR. HOOVER'S feeling of outrage over the propaganda against naval reduction by William B. Shearer, which the latter charges was financed by American shipbuilding firms. Until recently Mr. Shearer was known as a big-navy advocate, supposedly expressing his own opinions on an all-important question of national policy. He had been putting his ideas before the public in interviews, articles, and a book. He went to President Coolidge's naval arms conference at Geneva, where he was responsible for a large amount of propaganda hostile to reduced armaments; later he appeared in Washington in behalf of the fifteen-cruiser bill. However mischievous his opinions, Mr. Shearer had a right to express them if he was speaking in his own behalf or for somebody else whose name he made public. But it appears that he was doing neither. He has filed a suit against the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, and the American Brown Boveri Electric Corporation, alleging a promise to pay him some $300,000, of which only $50,000 has been forthcoming. If this statement is accurate it completely discredits Mr. Shearer and brands three important shipbuilding firms as engaged in the same kind of dishonest and contemptible effort to mislead public opinion as has already been exposed in connection with the power interests. Incidentally, we have fresh proof of how exceedingly profitable this business of deceiving the public is, and what a high price the armament makers can afford to pay to keep the pot boiling.

MR. HOOVER'S ADROIT ATTACK upon the Shearer propaganda means that the Senate will have to investigate the subject. Even before the President spoke, Senator Borah had asked the Committee on Naval Affairs to make an inquiry, saying that if it failed to do so he would try to get the Foreign Affairs Committee, of which he is the chairman, to dig into the scandal. Nothing short of a searching hearing can now satisfy the public. The explanations of the shipbuilding companies are neither adequate nor convincing. The excuse that they hired Mr. Shearer, but not to work against naval reduction, is not good enough. Business firms do not pay a man $50,000—not to say promise, as Mr. Shearer alleges, six times that amount—without expecting substantial financial benefits in return. The Shearer scandal, following the facts brought out in regard to crooked power propaganda, ought to waken the public to similar dangers all along the line and should help to clarify thought on this subject. Propaganda, as we have said, is legitimate; it is no less so when paid for and delegated than when done directly and for nothing. But propaganda is only legitimate when the public is fully informed in regard to those for whom it is made. Incidentally, we think some of our peace advocates might read the signs of the times, and make clearer the sources of their support.

SECRETARY STIMSON having given the approval of the Administration to the Root formula for our entrance into the World Court, the issue will come before Congress again presently, but it remains to be seen whether our legislators will be satisfied. Mr. Root's formula is a bit of clever legerdemain, questionable on theoretical grounds though it might work in practice. It says, in effect, that if some other nation insists upon an advisory opinion from the court against the wishes of the United States, the latter may resign. As the United States would have that privilege at any time anyhow, the sole gain seems to be that under the Root formula this nation would leave by prearrangement instead of subjecting itself to the charge of picking up its blocks and going home in a huff. More satisfactory than the acceptance of the Root formula by Mr. Stimson and the conference of the World Court members at Geneva was the announcement there that France, Great Britain, and Greece would sign the "optional clause" of the tribunal's constitution—already accepted by Germany. This provision should more correctly be styled the "obligatory clause," because it pledges the signers to accept arbitration of all legal questions within the court's jurisdiction. Acceptance of the clause by all the large Powers would be a real milestone in the progress of arbitration. It should be chronicled with approval, too, that at the session of the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva representatives of France, Finland, and Greece promised to work for the ratification by their parliaments of the general act of the covenant for the compulsory arbitration of all disputes. On top of this half a dozen countries, led by Great Britain, went on record as favoring a revision of the covenant so as to put further restrictions upon making war. We hope to see this proposal advanced from the stage of rhetoric to that of action.

WHEN "YOUNG TEDDY" ROOSEVELT arrives in Porto Rico as its Governor he will find himself in a political bear's den. Five years ago, confronted by the growing power of the Socialists, Antonio R. Barceló, leader of the Unionists, and José Tous Soto, head of the Republicans, struck hands in an alliance. The Unionists had stood for the independence of the island—without exactly meaning it—while the Republicans favored statehood within the United States. The Alianza swept Porto Rico five years ago, but last year barely held the legislature against the assaults of the Socialists—actually a labor party—led by the veteran Senator Santiago Iglesias. When President Hoover took office last spring a delegation, of which Barceló and Iglesias were members, set sail for Washington to present a bi-partisan demand for the retention of Governor Towner in office. Tous Soto stayed at home. While the delegation was en route Mr. Hoover apparently decided on the appointment of "Young Teddy," and asked Felix Cordova Davila, resident commissioner for Porto Rico in Washington, to sound local sentiment. He cabled to Tous Soto, and the island's politicos, sensing the appointment as already made, hastened to climb aboard the bandwagon by saying that they liked "Young Teddy" fine. Don Antonio went back to Porto Rico raging that he had been "double crossed," called his Unionist followers together, and they read themselves out of the Alianza. It is said that the Unionist Party —that of the landowning and wealthy classes—now plans a coalition with the Socialists. Iglesias, that highly astute practical politician who leads the latter group, has not said yet what he plans. In any event, "Young Teddy" is likely to find himself in a political menagerie the back-biting of which will make the manners of the pandas he captured in Asia seem as mild as those of mice.

THE "RICH MAN'S DELIGHT" is the appropriate label for the new $500,000,000 issue of short-term Treasury certificates which has just been offered with the special feature of exemption from all income taxation—from surtaxes as well as from normal income taxes. This total exemption was made possible under a resolution sponsored by Secretary Mellon and passed by Congress before the recess. As we pointed out in an editorial, Mr. Mellon's Bad Bill, in The Nation of June 19, the economic and social consequences of this new policy are most undesirable. It is in direct conflict with a sound Treasury policy, long established and well tried. Even in the enormous stress of financing the World War the Government was most reluctant to exempt federal obligations from any but normal taxes, and as a matter of fact only a small portion of some $25,000,000,000 worth of federal securities issued in that period was so favored. For it was recognized then, and is as true today, that tax-free securities automatically nullify the progressive features of our income tax; they enable the rich to evade—in a nice, legal way—the higher taxes in the upper brackets. No wonder, therefore, that the present issue was heavily oversubscribed in the amazingly short time of three days—and this despite the prevailing tightening of the money market. There is little doubt that our wealthy citizens are keenly appreciative of this generous treatment from Mr. Mellon and would like to see him continue to grant full tax exemption in all future issues of securities—his expressed purpose. But such action, if continued, would put an end to progress toward a just and scientific income-tax policy.

A GOOD OLD-FASHIONED coal-and-iron police chief is likely to shout, as justification of his violence: "This is not a strike; this is a riot." Thereby, to his own complete satisfaction, he rules out all consideration of the motives that lead angry, hungry men and women to the picket-line. It is strange to hear Britain's Labor Prime Minister using similar language in referring, at Geneva, to the Arab outbreak in Palestine.

> There is no racial conflict in what happened in Palestine the other day [said Ramsay MacDonald]. . . . This is no conflict between Moslem and Jew; this is simply an uprising of lawlessness and disorder. . . . No nation, no civilized nation, no nation with any political responsibility, no nation cooperating with other nations to do their best for all the peoples of the world will ever yield to outbursts of criminality and murder.

Whereupon Mr. MacDonald appealed to Moslem and Jew alike to unite in condemnation of the past and in support of the British Government. His language sounded dangerously like Tory anger. It will not do simply to blame the Arabs for the outbreak and to assume that support of the British Government is all that is needed in the circumstances. It isn't. Mr. MacDonald himself, when leader of His Majesty's Opposition, if our memory serves aright, protested against the use of bombing planes dropping destruction from the skies upon man, woman, and child alike in Arab villages near Bagdad. Some cynic is likely to dig his words out of the files of Hansard.

JUDGE CHARLES J. CARR of a Boston municipal court has acted according to the law and common-sense in dismissing the charges against Alfred Baker Lewis and Jackson Wales, who were arrested on the Common when talking of Sacco and Vanzetti, by order of the superintendent of police, Michael J. Crowley. Judge Carr upheld the right of free speech as an American institution in discharging the prisoners, but he did not comment upon what was perhaps the worst aspect of the arrests. Both Lewis and Wales spoke under permits obtained in advance. There is good legal opinion that a permit to speak has no permissive character about it. That is, city officials have no authority to abridge the right of free speech, and an application for a permit to speak cannot legally be refused; it is, in fact, merely a notice to the police of intention to speak, so that they may make arrangements to preserve order. Anyhow both Lewis and Wales had permits. Superintendent Crowley had a right to arrest them for what they said if it violated the law, but he had no authority to take away the permits and then arrest them for not having any when they continued to speak. The fact is that he knew he could not successfully prosecute them for mentioning those—in Massachusetts—unmentionable words "Sacco" and "Vanzetti," and so he broke up the meetings by a contemptible and lawless ruse. We hope Messrs. Lewis and Wales will turn around and prosecute him for false arrest.

WITH THE SETTLEMENT, practically on the strikers' terms and including recognition of the union, of the New Orleans carmen's strike, one of the strangest labor episodes in the South reaches a conclusion. For the strikers won their fight, not by their own super-organization and solidarity, not by any sudden softening on the part of the employers, but because the public, the people of New Orleans who were directly inconvenienced by the failure of the street cars to carry them, refused to ride in cars manned by scabs, and got to work anyhow, by whatever vehicle that was handy. The public supported the strikers! This would be handsome enough in a Northern city with a long tradition of labor disputes; in the South, where organized labor is just gaining a foothold, where notions about unions and the dignity of labor are regarded as a little new-fangled, it must have been surprising to the workers themselves. From a correspondent in New Orleans we have the following letter:

> The trolleys have been running during the sixty-five days of the strike with virtually no passengers. Nearly all the civic organizations unanimously adopted resolutions pledging that their members would not ride in the trolleys during the strike and assessing a $10 fine for those who did. People owning cars have driven to work those who did not. Business houses lent trucks for the purpose of breaking the lockout, advertised to the idle workers that their payments on furniture, automobiles, etc., would not be due until the men again were earning money, and urged them to hold out against the Public Service Company. Yet only one newspaper, the Item, itself an open shop, supported the strikers.

In the face of such solidarity—of the innocent bystanders who are ordinarily supposed to be the chief sufferers from a public-utilities strike—what could the company do but yield? This is a very simple lesson, one that labor, employers, and the "public" might well learn by heart.

THE TRIAL at Charlotte, North Carolina, of sixteen of the leaders of the Gastonia strike ended on September 9 in a shocking manifestation of mob violence. Due to the fact that one of the jurors became insane, a new trial was ordered to begin on September 30. Angered, apparently, at the prospect of delay and possibly eventual acquittal, a mob in Gastonia raided the offices of the International Labor Defense, destroying much property, and kidnapped three of the union's leaders. The men returned later, saying that they had been beaten and then released. Until this turn of events the sixteen Communists and strike leaders who are charged with the murder of Chief of Police Aderholt had every reason to feel cheerful concerning the progress of their case. Judge M. V. Barnhill had been just in his rulings, the jury seemed to be as good as could be expected considering the inflamed opinion of the region, and the evidence produced by the prosecution in the preliminary stages of the trial failed to establish conspiracy among the defendants or to fasten the shooting of the police chief upon any particular persons. It seems probable that if any of the defendants are convicted it will be almost entirely upon circumstantial evidence. When the prosecution sought to appeal to the emotion of the jury by producing a dummy of the dead police chief clothed in his uniform and covered with a shroud, Judge Barnhill immediately ordered the dummy to be removed.

THE CARRIER PIGEON, that romantic symbol of speed, accuracy, and devotion, is to be abandoned by the navy as a purveyor of messages in favor of economy, the radio, and the airplane. Thus does the machine age destroy one more of the cherished institutions of a more innocent day. Time was when the dispatch to the general on the field of battle, the order that was to save the prisoner destined to execution, the word that would call the soldiers to release the beautiful girl in the clutches of the wicked bandits, was bound on the leg of a swift-flying bird which would speed unerringly to its destination. Now that same word—or its less romantic but perhaps more realistic equivalent—speeds by radio through the ether, unimpeded by wing or wire. It reaches not only one destination but many; it carries its message and receives its answer long before the faithful pigeon could have made half its flight. But the tradition of message-carrying birds will linger a while in the annals of the navy, just as the fame of the dashing teams which used to draw the fire engines, but now have been replaced by motors, is not yet quite lost. Pigeons will still be used, we read, in Guam and at Lakehurst. They are useful in isolated sections or when planes have been forced to land unexpectedly. In other words, when machines fail, animals must serve. Horses pull out the mired motor; no radio would have brought back an olive branch to Noah in the Ark. For that he had to use a dove.

Much Ado About Disarmament

WE were much interested, as were many others, in the report last spring that Ramsay MacDonald proposed to visit the United States to discuss the naval armament situation with Mr. Hoover. Mr. MacDonald has an interesting personality and a winning manner, and his position as Prime Minister of Great Britain is obviously one of importance. If he could sit down with Mr. Hoover and talk the matter over, it seemed natural to suppose that some of the larger difficulties in the way of an Anglo-American agreement about armament reduction might be ironed out, and the way smoothed for a presentation of the subject to Congress and Parliament. The suggestion, indeed, was more than interesting; it was intriguing, and the newspapers of both countries played it up valiantly.

No sooner had the proposal been launched, however, than it began to be buffeted by head winds and bad weather. The first public intimation that Mr. MacDonald might take a few weeks off and cross the Atlantic was made, if we remember rightly, on June 10 at London, and was favorably received. Six days later Ambassador Dawes, who had just arrived in England, saw Mr. MacDonald in Scotland, and the next day Mr. MacDonald told the correspondents that the visit depended upon the diplomatic situation, "but I should think I probably would go." By June 26 things looked a bit doubtful, the diplomatic condition, it appeared, being an agreement between Great Britain and the United States about a naval conference. By July 1 the sky was further overcast: Mr. MacDonald would come if he were invited, but he had not decided when—probably not until October. Press dispatches of July 18 agreed that the visit would probably be postponed, but on the 24th Mr. MacDonald again was coming in October.

Meantime Ambassador Dawes had been busy discussing the armament question at London and had described the Hoover "yardstick," happily in general terms only, to the Pilgrim Society; a bill empowering the President to make secret purchases of war materials in certain cases had been prepared by the Secretary of War; a railway shipment of fourteen-inch guns had arrived safely in California; and Mr. Hoover had halted plans for the construction of three cruisers and demanded that army costs be cut down. Within a week after these latter incidents Mr. Hoover was backing water on the army cut, the British Admiralty was joining in the London parleys, pay increases for the American army to as much as 105 per cent in some cases were being demanded, and Washington announced that parity had been accepted as the basis of an Anglo-American agreement and that the navy was going ahead with the plans of the three cruisers whose construction had been held up.

All this, while rather confusing to the man in the street, seemed to make Mr. MacDonald's visit only the more urgent. The question of the visit dropped out of the news until August 21, when it was again reported from Washington that Mr. MacDonald would not come unless a basis for a naval conference had been found. Something went wrong, or else something happened between twilight and dawn, for the next day the same Washington announced that Mr. MacDonald and his daughter were coming about the middle of October. London, cautious about denials, understood that the coming would not be in October's first week. On August 25 Mr. MacDonald was coming late in September; on the 28th his arrival had been placed between October 1 and 10; on August 30 the Baltimore Sun announced that he would arrive on October 4 and sail on his return on the 12th. Twenty-four hours later Mr. MacDonald was quoted as saying that his coming "must depend upon the agreement"; on September 2 London was doubting that there would be any visit at all, while on September 3, the day on which Mr. MacDonald made the optimistic speech at Geneva which Secretary of State Stimson promptly dashed with tepid water, White House officials were reported as saying that "nothing was known" there about the visit "beyond what had appeared in the newspapers."

The country is still waiting for Mr. MacDonald, and we still hope that he may find it possible to come. The reason for all the backing and filling, however, is clear enough. Mr. MacDonald has long been enthusiastic about armament reduction, and as soon as the May election made him Premier he set out to do something about it at once, forthwith, without delay. Then public opinion, and the Admiralty, and the naval experts, and Australia, and the Singapore base, and the naval plans of Italy and France, and the Palestine disorders, and reparations all got in his way and the great reformation slowed down. Mr. Hoover, who has not yet learned that politics is not quite like railway building or dam construction, also wanted naval armaments reduced now and limited hereafter, and set up Mr. Dawes to explain all about the virtues of the yardstick; but the Dawes speech, when critically examined, turned out to offer only the old hokum about cooperation between statesmen and experts—two aggregations that have not yet been able to agree upon anything either among themselves or with one another. On August 14 we were told, on what was claimed to be authority, that the yardstick had been abandoned and a ship-for-ship arrangement substituted. Now, as far as the drippings of news from secret conversations indicate anything, the two countries are back where they were at the beginning, and where they have been ever since Mr. Coolidge's three-Power conference broke down in August, 1927, namely, at the issue of parity. As nobody has any but a vague notion of what parity means, and even Mr. Hoover's engineering-mindedness is unable to show how it might be attained, the outlook for an agreement that will let Mr. MacDonald take ship seems remote.

It is time that the farce were ended. Three years of more or less continuous discussion of armament reduction have produced thus far nothing of importance except talk—and a steady increase of armaments almost everywhere, with the United States well toward the van. What the country wants is action, not politics, debate, and expert hairsplitting. If Mr. MacDonald still thinks that by meeting Mr. Hoover he can get something practical done, we hope his visit will be made. If he is not sure of being able to do that, it were better that he should not come.

The Nation's Laws

THE announcement from Washington on August 26 (we quote a summary from the New York Times) that "federal prohibition administrators throughout the United States have been instructed by the Treasury Department to make an effort to obtain a larger measure of cooperation from municipal, county, and State officials in the enforcement of prohibition," and that "the regional administrators have been directed to see to it, so far as practicable, that the local authorities shall take over the prosecution of such offenses against the law as the sale of liquor in roadhouses and in speakeasies, and other acts that are held to fall properly within the police power of the States and their various subdivisions," raises a question of national, State, and local interest far beyond the particular issue of prohibition. The announcement followed close upon the heels of a manifesto issued by Maurice Campbell, prohibition administrator for the New York district, calling attention to the "inactivity" of Police Commissioner Whalen and District Attorney Banton of New York City, reminding them that the New York Court of Appeals had held that speakeasies were subject to the penal laws of the State regarding public nuisances, and informing them of his intention to turn over to the State district attorneys for prosecution all speakeasy cases framed by federal prohibition agents.

In the exchange of amenities which followed Mr. Campbell's plea for a helping hand, Mr. Campbell was virtually invited to mind his own business and let the New York police administration alone, and was specifically told that if he "would talk less and work more he would be a better prohibition administrator." We are ill disposed to defend the administration of the New York Police Department in general, and the 32,000 speakeasies that are said to flourish within its jurisdiction seem to us too many, but to the promptness with which Mr. Campbell's representations were kicked out the door we respectfully raise our hat.

The Treasury authorities at Washington, if not their New York agent, ought to know and probably do know that the campaign upon which they have entered is without legal foundation and an open intrusion upon the constitutional rights of the States. It is an elementary principle of American constitutional law that no State is under obligation to enforce a federal statute. It may not rightfully impede the operation of the statute, but its whole duty has been done when it has recognized the existence of the statute in its courts, and when its courts have recognized the constitutionality of the statute if the question of constitutionality has been affirmatively answered by the federal Supreme Court. Beyond this no State is required to go. Comity, to be sure, sanctions such cooperation as allowing the use of State prisons or jails for the confinement of federal prisoners, or police aid to federal marshals in serving a federal process, but these things are courtesies, not obligations. The Northern States which in the days of the Fugitive Slave act refused the use of their jails for the detention of fugitives who had been apprehended by Southern slave hunters, acted fully within their constitutional rights.

The adoption of a prohibition amendment and the enactment of federal laws to enforce it have not changed in the least this constitutional prerogative of the States. It is true that the amendment gives to the States concurrent jurisdiction with Congress in enforcing its provisions, but a grant of concurrent jurisdiction does not enlarge in the least the authority of Congress at the expense of the States. What is true of the States, moreover, is equally true of municipalities, for they are created by the State and subject in all respects to its control. It is the duty of the federal government to enforce its own laws. For the performance of that duty it has at its disposal marshals and their deputies, a swarm of special agents, and in the last resort the army and navy. If it cannot secure obedience through these means it has no other recourse save to throw up the sponge and let the law become a dead letter if it cannot be repealed. When Mr. Campbell or other federal prohibition agents undertake to arraign the officials of a State or municipality for laxity in not doing what it is the business of the federal government to do, they are meddling in business that is not theirs and at the same time confessing their own impotence.

Morals and Movies

THE suggestion that bad little children may be made good by sending them to the movies was made by Dr. Phyllis Blanchard of the Philadelphia Child Guidance Clinic before the ninth International Congress of Psychology at Yale. She is quoted as saying:

> Numerous studies made by scientists have failed to establish any appreciable contribution to delinquency from motion pictures, but we do find the motion picture to be helpful in many ways. It affords healthy escape from drabness, to adult and child alike. It is perhaps the most useful of all the present mediums of expression in the inculcation of generally accepted standards of morality and behavior. It is a definite Americanization aid to the children of the immigrants.
>
> I have sat in motion-picture theaters and marveled at the unanimity with which the children present reacted on the side of law and order. When the villain is caught and punished, as is always the case under the policy of those who make American motion pictures, the applause of the children is swiftest and most enthusiastic.

Yes, we too have heard that applause when the slim young lieutenant of the Canadian Northwest Mounted invaded the lonely cabin in Saskatchewan and yanked the fair Kathleen from the arms of the gent who hadn't shaved for a week. And we agree with Dr. Blanchard that such things are not likely to make children delinquent; but we have been concerned with the effect produced upon the minds of the adults in the audience. How can a movie which satisfies a child of twelve be made morally safe for a man of thirty-five? Thus far the censors have spent all their time protecting children against adult movies; they might better protect adults against childlike movies.

When the motion-picture producers are compelled to choose between the moral capacities of the twelve-year-old and thirty-five-year-old, it appears that they almost invariably choose the child. Moral problems on the screen are presented in those simple blacks and whites which a seventh-grade pupil can grasp while simultaneously eating peanuts and experimenting with the nickel candy vendor on the seat in front. For the child the artificial simplicity is probably a good thing; he is not yet prepared to make fine moral discriminations and, as an introduction to ethics, it does him no harm to learn the difference between a man who steals and a man who does not steal, between a murderer and a man who does not murder, between a teamster who beats his horse over the head with an iron pipe and one who spends his last dollar for Dobbin's oats.

Having mastered these oversimplified contrasts the child should pass on to more subtle discriminations, that is to say, he should pass on to life as it is with its complex of varied impulses that are neither right nor wrong in themselves. But the movies do not pass on. They dwell forever in the stage which is designed to make children conventional.

Not enough has been written about the moral havoc that may be wrought by carrying over into maturity the simple blacks and whites of childhood thought. That havoc is apparent in any war, strike, or political campaign. The oversimplified moral category of childhood becomes the blind prejudice of maturity. Ku Kluxers, fundamentalists, and super-patriots are products of arrested moral reflection.

It is in the field of nationalism, and even more that of sex, that the movies perpetuate most definitely the moral categories of childhood. We refer not only to the exaggeration of the importance of the romantic impulse in its most unreflecting form, but to the constant representation of the sexual drama as a mosaic of blacks and whites in which legal ceremonies consecrate any crazy, transient passion, in which divorce is always wrong unless preceded by vicious conduct, and in which sexual relations outside of marriage even on a desert island are never permissible unless, perchance, the young things find a fragment of a Bible on which to swear eternal monogamy.

Take a typical Hollywood treatment of a genuinely important sexual problem. A girl loves a married man and her affection is reciprocated. To satisfy the Hollywood code it is not possible to treat this problem in a straightforward manner, because the very existence of the love is a sin unless it can be justified by showing total depravity on the part of the man's wife. So, while sanity in sex standards would dispose of the whole situation by quiet divorce, the scenario writer makes the wife into a vixen, gambler, spendthrift, harlot, sadist—or what have you; the waiting virgin becomes —well, a Hollywood heroine. She barely touches His hand in their pure and beautiful courtship, and in the final reel it turns out that He never had any sexual relations with his wife anyway.

So while modern social science is teaching men to get back to human values behind institutional forms, the movies are perpetuating the old and false identification of goodness with institutional allegiance. If it be said in defense of the motion-picture producers that any art in order to achieve success in a democracy must pander to the traditional in morality, we can point for refutation to the spoken drama and to the novel. Certainly the American novel has achieved a maturity in sexual attitudes far beyond the prejudices of the standardized majority. The movie producers, under the advice of Elder Hays, have surrendered moral sophistication (on the screen, not personally) in behalf of box-office receipts. In the circumstances it may be necessary to consign motion pictures to the place which Dr. Blanchard allots to them, lifting our young to the norm of moral conformity.

The Circus Forever

IT was with regret that we read of the passing of Ringling's Circus from Madison Square Garden in New York City. Mr. Ringling, so the story went, was unwilling to give up one night a week of his four weeks' engagement to the Garden managers for boxing matches; the Garden managers declared that last year they lost $60,000 on Mr. Ringling; Mr. R. retorted that in major considerations like the circus money is no object; whereupon the Garden officials quite properly presented him with a higher-priced lease than he had had before, which he at first refused and then further repudiated by the handsome gesture of buying up all the circuses which had accepted the Garden's terms.

Thus there is still only one Ringling, the child of the only original Barnum. There are features at Ringling's that cannot be duplicated anywhere else: for instance, the beautiful and talented Miss Leitz, if that was her name, who flips herself back and forth on her wrist 147 times by actual count. Any lady who has an arm like that deserves a monopoly on the act, and probably she is bound by a cast-iron contract to the Ringlings for the balance of her life, or as long as her wrist holds out. Then there was Zip, the great What-Is-It, who was reported to have been an exemplary husband and father, despite the torpedo shape of his cranium.

It is the word "tent," however, on which hangs our reason for being disturbed by the new program. Circuses, although some children of the present age are not aware of the fact, used to be held in tents. In one tent, to be exact. Inside the tent were the peanut and lemonade stands, the bearded lady, the ape man, the five-legged calf, the Half-Man-Half-Lady, the African Lion, the Real Jumbo Elephant, the spectators, the ring, and the performance. A small boy could, if he were lucky, wriggle under the edge of the tent at some distance from the entrance and see the circus gratis. The tent smelled—it smelled of more things than could be listed in a column this size. It was a great, strong, thick smell that met you at the door and laid a friendly arm over your shoulder as you walked about. It even went home with you, in a somewhat diminished state, and was the cause of embarrassing and unnecessary questions about how you had spent an afternoon that should have been devoted to education.

But for the big-city child the tent has gone. And Madison Square Garden was the next best thing to it. It was large, it was lofty, its roof was out of sight and might just as well have been made of canvas as of anything else. And under this mysterious roof came acrobats and clowns, tamed wild animals and those whom it was impossible to tame, a beautiful Miss Leitz and the only unique twenty-four Arabian horses which actually dance the waltz. We do not know whether or not there will be a circus next year at the Garden. On that point Mr. Ringling is dumb. But we warn him that if there is not we will stay at home. A circus somewhere else will be different from the circus of our youth and middle age. And as it differs its merits grow correspondingly fewer. Only the circus we know is the circus for us.

It Seems to Heywood Broun

RELIGIOUS liberty in America is much more honored in oratory than in practice. With the school year starting it develops that once again the fight must be made against the introduction of religious instruction. Mgr. Lavelle devoted a recent sermon at St. Patrick's Cathedral to this subject. It would seem to an outsider as if the parochial school system should satisfy the Catholics, but probably the church grows anxious over the fact that a very sizable proportion of its parishioners send their children to the public schools.

"Our children come out of our public schools," said the prelate, "enlightened and equipped to be good citizens who can serve their fellows and their country. They are, also, we hope, faithful servants of their God. The one regrettable feature of our American school system is that it is not prepared to offer religious instruction."

At another point the Catholic clergyman said: "Primarily, of course, religious instruction should be given in the home, but instruction in the home should be supplemented from other sources. . . . Our public schools were not always without religious instruction. If we are to restore it we must do so in a manner that will not offend or transgress the rights of any one. I ask you all to pray that a satisfactory system may be worked out and to lend your support to such movements as the Interfaith Council in our City. On this council, Catholics, Jews, and Protestants are working side by side to find a worth-while form of religious instruction for the schools."

Naturally, I have no desire to suggest that the drive to get religion into the schools comes primarily from the Catholic church. The evangelical Protestant sects are much more eager. There is some merit in the argument of Mgr. Lavelle. But not enough. He falls into the common American error of restricting religious liberty to the right of the individual to worship according to his own conscience. Surely there is no liberty unless we also grant each person the right to abstain from any form of worship if his ideals are so inclined. It is not enough that religious instruction should be acceptable to Catholics, Jews, and Protestants. Agnostic taxpayers have a right and duty to refuse such a compromise.

From my own standpoint I am not prepared to acquit atheists of all fanaticism. Their unwavering opposition to the Bible seems to me a little muddle-headed. I cannot go much of the way with Puritanical freethinkers who would suppress the book as immoral. I think that under certain conditions the Bible is not harmful to young people. Indeed I'm all for having the Bible as a part of the school curriculum. It is silly business to have boys and girls in English classes boring themselves with "Ivanhoe" when they might be reading the thrilling tale of Bathsheba and David.

Some of my atheistical friends insist that the Bible is dynamite in the hands of the impressionable. They contend that it encourages anti-social conduct. This is true only when the book is presented as sacred and inspired in a unique manner. There is every reason why the schools should study the Bible as English literature. Also, I think no man is even grounded in education if he is wholly unfamiliar with the great religions of the world and their origins. If Mgr. Lavelle will indorse a system of religious instruction which shall give the public school children some conception of the relationship between Christian dogma and pagan myth I will gladly join hands with him. And of course the young scholars ought to learn about Jesus and his ethical system which has so profoundly affected the thought of the whole world. But it would be a sleazy course, indeed, if it did not undertake to cover the teachings of other messiahs as well. I do not mean that there should be an attempt to undermine the faith of children who come from religious homes. Religion can be handled just as objectively as biology. Let the story of Christ be told without comment. And also the story of Buddha.

Some of the most enthusiastic Bible readers I know came from agnostic homes where the book was forbidden. One man in particular never read a line of the masterpiece until he was well past thirty and then he was entranced. He would drop in on people late at night in order to discuss what he had read and his theories of the resurrection. He was like a child who has just dipped into the Arabian Nights. But this was a man of discernment and reading courage. He was not afraid to skip. Fundamentalists have done the Bible a great injury by insisting that every single word in it is directly inspired by God. This has always seemed to me a blasphemous theory, for it would argue that the Creator has His off days. Certainly the Bible is a book mixed in merits. Some portions of it are worth the attention of none except students in theology or ancient lore, and again after aridity the reader steps into the finest prose known to our language.

I quarrel with those who are too prone to read symbolic significance into the Bible. Here, too, I think I detect a weakness in the fundamentalist position. A good hardshell Baptist will die rather than admit that the story of Adam and Eve is an allegory. He will stand by a literal serpent and actual fig leaves. But get him into the Song of Solomon and he'll hedge and explain that beautiful and palpably erotic phrases refer to an enthusiasm for church-going.

In the process of editing the Bible for readability and literary merit "Revelation" should be the first to go. No one but preachers and Freudian analysists can make anything out of this jumble. And aside from incoherence I find small beauty in the book. The prose sinks under its own weight and comes to nothing. Begats, of course, are nobody's business unless he be one of the higher critics. Such passages are not for children. But nothing of an erotic nature need go. In spite of my atheist friends I contend that the Bible is among the cleanest of books, for it deals with sex frankly and simply and never employs a smirk.

As for the violence and cruelty which is celebrated in certain portions of the Old Testament, I see no harm in this if the book is put forward as a story. Shakespeare can be equally savage, and even Stevenson has gone in deeply for horrors. The modern child is insulated. A youngster brought up on the various things done to Jeff by Mutt is not likely to be harmed by hearing of the mean trick which Jacob played on Esau.

HEYWOOD BROUN

The Triumph of the Power Companies

By H. S. RAUSHENBUSH

THIS has been a great year for the men of the power industry. It opened, as the legislatures convened, with a little fear and the modern equivalent of prayer. All through the year 1928 their control of press, schools, civic groups, and men in political life had been uncovered, bit by bit. Their expenditures of public moneys to effect that control, their fight to keep the regulatory system exactly what it is now, their influence in the legislatures was all an open story. Not even the insurance companies, not even the New Haven had gone at the business of buying and molding the country closer to their hearts' desire as the power men had done, and the latter had committed the additional sin of putting it all down in black and white. For that sin they were expected, when the legislatures met, to be their come-uppance.

The legislatures of 1929 have met and adjourned. With a few minor exceptions the power men have beaten every bill intended to make regulation more effective or intended to relieve the municipal ownership of power plants from the handicaps put upon it in earlier days. It has been a year of triumph. Already in June they saw that there was to be no punishment for their presumption in influencing schools and press to teach a doctrine intended to intrench them and profit them financially. They began making statements, telling us that they had done nothing for which they needed to apologize, that they would continue as before.

This does not mean that they have not learned a lesson. I think they have learned a lesson: Not to write so many letters about their sly affairs (for letters can be found and read in public), but to use the telephone instead.

This ability of the utilities to make us like what they do to us is in itself a triumph of social craftsmanship, and should receive, as it does, the proper reward. What if the power companies and fertilizer companies have been able to hold up the development of Muscle Shoals by the Government for ten years? The delay has given them freedom from low prices during those years. It has effected a domestic tariff for them during that period. It has helped their businesses. What if the power men have donned false-face and entered the schools? They are free public schools, aren't they? What if they did buy a lot of newspapers, try to buy a lot more, and persuaded editors to put out an immense amount of propaganda and falsehood without showing where it came from? They paid for it in advertising, which helped make bigger papers and richer power companies at the same time. What if they did hold up Boulder Dam for four years? The delay gave them a President who has staked his professional reputation on the proposition that engineers won't work as well for the government as for private companies, and who has to prove himself right. The Pacific Coast has been saved from a great public-ownership development of the kind which exists in Ontario and gives for two cents what the coast pays six cents for. That sort of Anglo-Saxon un-American thing is to be kept safely outside of our borders. For this relief much thanks are due. What if the people who try to make our regulatory system do its job well are beaten at every turn in the legislatures? It teaches them the much-needed lesson that they can't count on the government to do much for them. It makes them more reluctant to resort to government ownership. It thus saves for private initiative a whole series of opportunities which would otherwise be lost to it. . . .

Before going into the triumph of the power companies in the legislatures of this year, it is necessary to recall their triumphs of other years which have given us the system of regulation we have today. They were once its enemies. Familiarity, however, has bred—friendliness. They like it. They defend it. No one can touch it with impunity.

The essence of the story is this: Light and power are governmental services, so necessary and monopolistic in their character that they must be controlled, in some form, by the government. This is a Supreme Court dictum. They are services which we have a right to ask be furnished as cheaply and abundantly as possible. We might perform them ourselves. We can turn them over to private enterprise to perform, and then try to regulate the performance. Except in those cases where cities insisted on having these services before the companies were willing to give them, or where the companies got too stubborn about their rights to charge more than the traffic would bear, we have let the privately owned companies furnish the service. We tried at first to control them by cities. The granting of franchises turned into a pollution area. The companies also expanded. It was hard for a single city to regulate a company that extended throughout a State. The States then began to regulate, setting up commissions. The question of the day is: How well does that regulation work, and how can it be made to work better? With this goes the further question which all friends of the system have to meet: What chance is there of making it work better when every attempt to do so is defeated by the utilities?

The essence of regulation is the ability to fix rates, and when you lose that ability you regulate no longer. That is exactly what, to a large extent, the commissions have lost. They can no longer say: "You have put a certain amount of money into the business, you must be content with a fair return on that money." What they say now is: "You can earn a return on a large amount of money you never invested, you can cash in on the growth of the cities you serve, on the increased values of land, and we cannot stop you. We can try, however, to limit the flights of your imagination." These are two somewhat different things.

What the commissions have lost here is control of the rate base. The Indianapolis Water Company case, the O'Fallon case this year have toppled over the attempt to get service at cost. In its place is being put a system of guesswork which triples and quadruples the equity of the common stockholders and loads the rates to the gunwales. The Interstate Commerce Commission showed that if this new system were also applied to the railroads, they would in 1923 have added 12 billion dollars to the 19 billion invested. In the Indianapolis case the money put into the utility was $10,434,000. The new rate base was fixed at $19,000,000, an increase of 82 per cent. The book costs of the New York Telephone Company were $542,693,000 in 1925, the company asked for $240,000,000 more. A large part of this involved the appropriation of consumers' money. The power company in Cambridge did not want to lower its rates. The commission found a fair value of $2,500,000. The company wanted $1,175,000, or 47 per cent, more. In the proceedings in which San Francisco took over the private-power systems the city claimed that the actual cost of the properties plus severance damages was $31,223,000. The companies claimed $90,000,000, almost three times as much. The commission fixed $38,500,000 as a fair price, and has been informed by the companies that the case will be taken into court. Here obviously is a system of regulation where the essential control has been lost, where service at cost is no longer possible, and where favorable commissions are very important to the utilities.

In some States, notably California, Wisconsin, and Massachusetts, the public-service commissions try to keep as close to actual cost of service as they can, but they, too, feel obligated to make something of a bow toward the new uncertainty. On this very important matter of securing a stable rate base two bills were introduced this year, both of which failed to pass. In Massachusetts the board favored a State contract with the utilities, evening up any past deficits in dividends and guaranteeing that their stock should not be allowed to go below par, in return for the uncontested right of regulating the companies on the basis of their adjusted capital. In Indiana Senator Moorhead proposed that the commission should not allow securities to be issued above a fair value of the property, and that rates should be fixed on the basis of actual cost. No other States tackled this problem in a serious way. Several minor attempts, in Missouri and elsewhere, were defeated also.

Another control the commissions have to a large extent lost is that over operating expenses. The advent of holding companies means that the operating utilities let the holding companies do many services of engineering and financing for them. Over these the commissions have small power. The case for interstate control lies less in the fact that some power is shipped across State lines in a way to dodge regulation than in the fact that the holding company charges can not now be controlled, although the two companies have common ownership. Only in one State, Indiana, was a bill for holding-company control introduced, and that was defeated by adjournment of the House. The New York bill, once supported by the commission in that State, was not introduced.

Twenty-nine States do not even have nominal control over the purchase price paid for all operating utilities under their jurisdiction, and there is a danger that the excess prices now being paid by holding companies will, within a few years, become part of the base on which we will have to pay rates. But even States like New York which have a nominal control permit excess prices. In four years the New York commission let an excess over costs of $202,000,000 be paid and then began opening the way for it to become part of the rate base. A little more delay and the holding companies will not be afraid of control.

Bills for investigation of the regulatory system of the water-power situation were defeated in Kansas, Missouri, North Carolina, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, and Georgia. In New York several similar bills were offered and one, which gives the majority political leaders six places on a commission of nine, was passed. Colonel William Donovan has been appointed counsel for the investigating body. Massachusetts voted to investigate the financial holdings of its utilities.

There are eight States without commissions to control the power industry. In Texas, Florida, Kentucky, and Delaware bills for such commissions were introduced and defeated. In Kentucky the utility men appeared in favor of the proposal. In West Virginia the water-powers were put under a commission on about the easiest licensing terms allowed in any State in the country, and an amendment that power could not be sold outside the State cheaper than inside was defeated. Similar proposals concerning the export of hydro-electric power were shelved in other States. Maine voted to export its power, subject to a referendum and an excise tax on all export, of which a quarter million dollars annually is to be devoted to rural service. No guaranty as to lower rates accompanies the proposal.

The only improvement in the system which passed this year was a relatively small one, in Ohio. A legal and engineering staff is to be set up inside the commission to hear and submit cases to that body. This is a small recognition that the commissions have gone judicial. Otherwise the record of nibbling toward improvement of the regulatory system is a consistent one of defeat. In Indiana and Pennsylvania bills allowing the commissions a few more months to consider rates before they go into effect were lost. In Illinois a proposal to allow the commission to collect reparations for overcharges was lost. Bills in Texas, Missouri, and New York to reduce the rate of return were lost.

In addition to these attempted changes in regulation several efforts were made to supplement the breaking system by a program of government or municipal ownership. In New York Governor Roosevelt got nowhere with his proposal for a board of trustees to develop the St. Lawrence water-powers. In Minnesota the proposed $50,000,000 bond issue for State water-power development was lost. In Wisconsin the Senate defeated the constitutional amendment to allow the State to recapture and develop its water-powers. In Texas a bill to revoke all permits for dams on public streams which had not been started to date was lost. In Nebraska a bill to establish a bureau of water conservation and utilization was lost. Bills for power districts in Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Washington were either voted on adversely or shelved. In Nebraska, however, the power district bill of 1927 was amended to meet constitutional objections and repassed.

The municipalities of the country have long been suffering from limitations put upon them which prevent them from raising money for power and light plants in the same way as the companies do, on the strength of the expected earnings of their proposed plants. They have, for the most part, to stay within debt limits which in thirteen States are below 5 per cent of their assessed valuation and in thirteen others below 10 per cent of it. These limits they use up quickly enough for schools, sewers, and other public necessities. They are also held down by law in most States from expanding beyond the city limits as private companies may do. These two limitations, far more than the tall talk of the utilities about "governmental inefficiency," explain the lack of growth of municipally owned plants in this country. A great number of bills to give them more freedom to grow on an equal plane were introduced, notably by some of the Western leagues of municipalities. With one exception in Nebraska, one in Wisconsin, and another in North Dakota those of major importance were all defeated.

There is no reason to believe that this record of power company victories will be changed next year under a similar scattering and random attack. Any changes to be made in the interests of the consumers will come only through heavy mobilization. There is little nourishment to be had in nibbling the insiders in the power industry out of the favorable positions they have captured inside the lines of regulation. They profit far too heavily where they are to yield lightly. They have concentrated enough wealth to control the country and apparently that is exactly what they propose to continue to do.

The Power Trust in the Public Schools

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

THE difference between barbarism and civilization is education. Tyrants cannot permanently rule an educated people. Ignorance is the mother of superstition and superstition is the domain of despots. Intelligence is the foundation of democratic government.

In America we have the public school system. It is essential to the perpetuity of our institutions. If our public schools are perverted and defiled, our governmental institutions are weakened and will eventually be destroyed. A new crop of rulers must take control every generation and a government which would prosper and a people who would retain and increase their happiness must prepare the oncoming generations for new governmental responsibilities which are continually falling upon their shoulders.

We are living in the dawn of an electric age. Nature has not only supplied us with electricity, this necessity of human happiness, but she has likewise furnished the means by which it can be made. Every drop of flowing water, coming from the snows, the springs, and the rain, as it travels its downward course, possesses the power of converting, out of nothing as it were, this wonderful element of modern civilization. This is a property which belongs to all of us, a source of human happiness. It has become a necessity of modern life. Therefore it should never become the subject of private profiteering. Its utilization in the homes of America and in the factories of commerce, for practical purposes, depends to a very great extent upon the elimination of private profit from its generation and distribution. Like water, it should be supplied to our people at actual cost.

For several years a contest has been going on between those who believe this work should be done as a governmental function and those who believe that the right to use our public streams for this purpose should be turned over to private corporations for private profit. It was supposed for some time that this was a fair and open contest between the believers in two separate and distinct doctrines of government. If this were true, then the contest would be just. Intelligent, educated people would decide the question the same as they would decide any other governmental question, after full debate and fair consideration.

In the course of the debate in the Senate on the Muscle Shoals question, it was frequently alleged that there was a Power Trust in this country; that it was nation-wide in its control. Indeed, it was charged that this trust reached out into foreign countries and was, in fact, international in its operation. These charges were scoffed at. They were ridiculed. The men making them were denounced as enemies to human progress.

As a result of this discussion, the Federal Trade Commission was directed to make an investigation. And what has been the result? It has been ascertained that there exists in this country a combination, the most powerful that has ever been put together by human ingenuity. These power magnates have divided the country into districts and put a ruler of their own in each district. These managers are assisted by assistant managers, by division superintendents, and by almost an unlimited number of specialists, lawyers, and hired men and women in all walks of life. It has been shown that millions of dollars have been spent to keep this machinery in operation. It has been shown that $400,000 was raised by this trust to control the action of the federal Congress. In the main, this particular attempt was to defeat the Muscle Shoals bill, the Boulder Dam bill, and the Senate resolution directing an investigation of the subject. Untold sums have been spent to control the press, usually by methods which were indirect, but unfair and disgraceful, nevertheless. Armies of emissaries secretly representing this trust have gone into every community. They have undertaken to control legislatures, public-service commissions, members of the national Congress, public educators, school boards, municipal authorities, commercial clubs, secret societies, women's clubs, boy-scout organizations. They have not forgotten the preacher in the pulpit. They have sent lecturers, ostensibly traveling upon the business of State universities, to lecture to farmers' clubs and social organizations. They have sent women into the field to speak at women's teas and various similar organizations. They have organized committees of inspection to examine the textbooks used in the public schools. They have issued thousands of pamphlets to be used in the classroom. They have entered the universities of the country and subsidized professors and leaders in educational lines.

The trust has done all this secretly. No one would have any right to object and no one would object if these private corporations would advocate openly their viewpoint and their method of supplying electricity to the people. No one would find fault if this discussion and these influences were operating in public. But these emissaries were not known by the people who heard them or the people to be influenced by them to be in the pay of this monopoly. The propaganda which was fed to the press was, in the main, published as editorial or news matter and the readers had no knowledge that this material was supplied from some central headquarters of the trust. In order to conceal their activities from public view it was necessary that they sail under false colors. We ought to ask at this point where they secured the money with which to carry on this warfare. Where did they get the funds which they used so lavishly to fool the people? It must be remembered that the Power Trust has only one source of revenue, and that is the money contributed by the people who buy their product. They were using our money to deceive us and our children.

The evidence before the Federal Trade Commission discloses the sending of a catechism into the public schools of some of our States. In this catechism are questions and answers which it was intended the children should memorize. The answer to one of these questions reads as follows:

> In every case in which a community has attempted to operate a public service utility which is subject to great change and development, it has been found that the costs of the service are higher than when the service is furnished by a private corporation.

This statement is not only misleading, but it is absolutely false. It undertakes to put into the minds of our children a falsehood, and it does this under the guise of education.

Another answer to one of the questions in this catechism stated in effect that statistics have proved that the cost of living in cities operating their own utilities is much higher than where the service is intrusted to private enterprise.

It is shown in this same catechism that the power magnates were trying to prevent criticism of their own activities. They were trying to instil in the minds of the children the idea that such criticism was unpatriotic and should never be indulged in by good citizens. For example:

> QUESTION: What is the effect of adverse criticism upon utility service?
>
> ANSWER: When people in any community criticize adversely public utilities in their city they are advertising their own city to outsiders as a poor place in which to live and are thereby retarding its growth.

Down in Alabama a college professor was hired by the power companies to carry on their work. He traveled over the State, talking to church gatherings, farmers' organizations, Rotary clubs, Kiwanis clubs, etc., and somewhere in every speech he made he had carefully tucked away misleading statements praising the private-power interests and condemning municipally owned electric-light plants. He was introduced as a director of extension of the university, a man interested in the industrial development of the State, but it now develops from the investigation that he was paid regularly by the Power Trust over $600 a month.

One of the representatives of the trust, in writing to a trust representative in a different State, after describing how he had succeeded in outlining the public-utility courses in two universities, wound up by saying:

> We laid the groundwork circumspectly and with great care, so that the actual suggestion that such courses be started came from the faculties of the institutions themselves. The rest was routine.

The evidence shows that in some States the trust was successful in bringing about a complete revision of the textbooks of the public schools of the State. The methods pursued depended upon the conditions that had to be overcome. In one State where the power companies were undertaking to have the textbooks of the schools edited so as to give their viewpoint to the student, one of the letters on the subject contained the following language:

> Of course, all of the business must needs be transacted with exceeding tact and diplomacy. Local conditions and prejudices will have to be taken into account when the educators are approached. Also it may be well to note what appropriation the school superintendent may have at his disposal for the purchase of textbooks. It may well be that avenues of proper assistance in a small way will present themselves. It may be well worth a utility's while to help in that regard. Such aid, unfortunately, is subject to misinterpretations and would therefore have to be rendered in a manner well safeguarded from suspicion.

I am not undertaking to give a complete résumé of the evidence. To do that would fill volumes. I am only trying to give a few illustrations of what is going on in free America. All of it has been done in the name of private ownership of public utilities. Has not the time come when those who love our public schools, who want to guard them with honesty and to preserve them in purity, should raise their voices in condemnation of this unrighteous and unpatriotic attempt to utilize the public school system to control public sentiment for private gain?

The Centralization of Power Control

THIS table, prepared by H. S. Raushenbush for the Committee on Coal and Power, shows that seventeen holding companies control 85 per cent of the nation's power. The first two combinations, which together control 34 per cent of national production, work in such close cooperation that they could be classed as one.

Rank	Name	Thousands of kwh[1]	Per cent of total
1	United and affiliates	15,084,925	18.80
2	Electric Bond and Share	12,245,572	15.26
3	Insull	8,347,894	10.40
4	North American	5,720,291	7.13
5	Consolidated Gas	3,835,037	4.78
6	Standard Gas and Electric	3,624,310	4.51
7	Southern California Edison	2,421,357	3.00
8	Pacific Gas and Electric	2,322,015	2.89
9	Stone and Webster	2,273,470	2.82
10	Detroit Edison	2,142,549	2.66
11	Associated Gas and Electric	1,917,055	2.40
12	Duke Power	1,745,776	2.17
13	American Waterworks and Electric	1,727,565	2.15
14	Cities Service	1,426,122	1.77
15	Con. Gas (Balt.)—Penn Water	1,418,650	1.76
16	International Paper-Power[2]	1,325,660	1.65
17	United Light and Power	1,203,068	1.50
		68,781,316	85.76
	Next 15 groups	5,399,535	6.75

[1] On basis of mergers to June 15, 1929, and latest published figures of production by companies 1927—80,200,000,000 kwh.

[2] Has on its board directors from other New England companies representing a further production of 1,635,480,000 kwh.

Wisconsin's Power Fight

By ALVIN C. REIS

LAST spring a conservative Wisconsin daily remarked: "If anyone doubts that the battle lines are now forming in Wisconsin for perhaps the most gigantic struggle in a decade, he has only to inform himself of the hearings held during the past week in the Assembly Committee on Judiciary." Those hearings concerned the new public-power program which challenges the private ownership of Wisconsin's electric power. The program, which has attracted national attention, embraced three proposals:

1. A constitutional amendment enabling the State of Wisconsin to recapture its water-power and engage in the generation and distribution of electric power.

2. A power district bill authorizing cities and intervening rural territories to establish district units for the production and distribution of electricity.

3. Enabling legislation designed to aid municipalities in the public operation of electric utilities.

The constitutional amendment on recapture reads in part as follows:

> For the purpose of promoting the wider use of electricity in the home and on the farm and for the purpose of promoting the industrial development of the State by providing abundant electric power, the State may acquire by gift, purchase, and condemnation, and may own, convey, construct, develop, extend, improve, add to, conduct, manage, control, and operate water-powers and electric utilities; and may generate, distribute, buy, and sell heat, light, water, or power directly or indirectly. To carry out the purposes of this section the State shall have all the powers incident and necessary thereto, including the power to borrow money.

In the 1927 Legislature this proposal was introduced; it passed the Assembly 70 to 13, and was killed in the Senate 20 to 10. In the 1929 session this constitutional amendment was again introduced. It passed the Assembly 71 to 19. On July 31 it was killed in the Senate by the vote of 17 to 16—a single vote! The amendment will be introduced in the 1931 session and I believe that it will pass.

What is the basis of this proposed constitutional provision? The political philosophy behind it is that water-power is a natural resource to be held in trust by the State for the benefit of all the people rather than to be alienated to private interests.

There is, moreover, a substantial business argument for State ownership and operation of its water-power. Guy Tripp, chairman of the Board of Directors of the Westinghouse Company, is authority for the statement that 80 per cent of the cost of producing electricity from water-power consists of fixed charges, which are principally dividends on stock and interest on bonds. That fact is not true of any other productive business. In the ordinary manufacturing business the elements which go to make up the cost are mainly labor and material. In the mining business it is practically all labor and transportation. Go into any ordinary manufacturing plant and you will find swarms of workingmen and piles of material. Go into a power plant and you will find nothing sitting there but an investment. In the enormous plants along the Menominee River in Wisconsin, for example, you will find generally only one man around and in most cases he is not really necessary except as a watchman. The lower plants are run from the plant above on the river. They are classed as automatic or semi-automatic. There is no labor cost. There is no material cost. Practically the whole cost lies in the fixed charges on the investment.

What is the point of this illustration? It is this: The State of Wisconsin can borrow money at from 4 per cent to 5 per cent. The private utility in Wisconsin is entitled to earn a return on its investment of 7 per cent, perhaps 8 per cent (and indeed under decisions of the United States Supreme Court may be entitled to earn this on its reproduction value). Now this difference between 4 per cent or 5 per cent and 7 per cent or 8 per cent—we will say an average of 3 per cent difference—if amortized over a period of less than twenty years, will retire the entire investment! Two per cent amortized over twenty-five years or so will retire the original investment completely. When the original investment is retired the fixed capital charges which apparently are the principal item in the cost of water-power are also done away with.

What was the objection advanced to the control and operation by the State of Wisconsin of its water-power? "State Socialism." We have eighty-six municipal electric plants in Wisconsin. There are 2,581 in the United States, in addition to 7,000 municipally owned water-works. The difference in theory between 2,500 cities supplying electric power and a State recapturing the natural resources of its water-power, is difficult to comprehend. What difference is there between a water-works and a water-power plant? The city of Madison owns its water-works but is not socialistic. Why is it good republicanism to turn on the faucet, but socialism to push the electric-light button?

Ontario, where the public hydro-electric project exists in all its glory, is conservative politically. Socialism is decried. The government project was started by Canadian manufacturers under the regime of a conservative premier, Sir James Whitney. Sir Adam Beck, who was in charge of the government undertaking from its inception until his death, was knighted by the King of England for his magnificent work for the people of Ontario. The local public-service commissions in the 252 municipalities now joined in the Ontario project are almost invariably composed of the outstanding manufacturers and business men of the community.

The Wisconsin power district bill (consisting incidentally of forty-one printed pages) authorizes the creation of a new kind of governmental units to be known as "municipal power districts." These power districts may be organized by two or more municipalities but are distinct units from the municipalities themselves, with their own governing bodies, their own properties, and their own assets and liabilities.

Municipal power districts will be organized upon referendum vote of the people in the municipalities included within the district. No municipality may be included unless a majority of its electors vote in favor of joining the power district. The referendum may be brought about in one of two ways: Either by resolution passed by the governing bodies of at least one-half of the municipalities proposed to be included within the district, or by resolution of not less than 10 per cent of all the electors within the territory proposed to be included. If a district is organized additional territory may be joined thereto by referendum vote in the municipalities proposed to be added. Under no circumstances, however, is a municipality ever to be divided.

The governing body of the power district is a board of five directors nominated by subdistrict primaries and elected for four years. The actual management of the utility properties owned by the power district is vested in a general manager selected by the directors.

In the management of its property the power district will have substantially all the powers of a private utility. It can mortgage its property or any portion thereof and may lease, sell, buy power or anything connected with the generation or distribution of power. In addition the power district, being a governmental subdivision of the State, has the power to issue bonds, which are a general obligation upon all the property within the power district, and also the power to levy taxes.

It should be emphasized in this connection that the power district bill does not allow a district to start a plant or system to compete with a utility already covering that district. The district must acquire the existing plant or system and pay for it at full value. In other words, this is not a municipal competition bill. It is not "confiscation." It may also be pointed out that the property of the power district will be taxed exactly as is the property of a private utility.

What is the purpose of the power district bill? It is twofold. Under the State constitution no governmental unit within the State may become indebted to a greater amount than 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property within its borders. That restriction practically blocks any municipality today from acquiring or extending an electric utility. If a modern municipality were to take over all utility properties within it, the 5 per cent limit would thereby be absorbed so that it could have no other indebtedness whatever. So great has been the demand, moreover, for schools, parks, and numerous other municipal undertakings that many municipalities are finding it difficult to finance even such improvements within the debt limit, without thinking of acquiring utilities.

The power district, constituting a new governmental subdivision, will under the constitution have its own 5 per cent debt limit based upon the assessed valuation of all property within the power district. The indebtedness for the power district will be entirely distinct from the indebtedness of the municipalities within the territorial limits of such power district. This expedient will allow the acquisition of electric property.

The more fundamental purpose of the power district bill is to enable the public to conduct electric operations on a large scale and to enjoy the advantages of big-business operation now available to the private utilities in the field. Six corporations—reflecting, in fact, only three holding corporations—control 75 per cent of the electric business of Wisconsin. In contrast the eighty-six municipal corporations in the business are each forced to work as individual, isolated units.

If a large private company can concentrate under one management the electric business in a score of communities, why should not these communities themselves, if they have or desire their own electric undertakings, be allowed to make the same concentration? If Two Rivers can obtain current from Manitowoc, why should they not be allowed to unite? And who is the best judge of such a union, the legislature or the municipalities themselves?

The city of Kaukauna which has one of the most efficient electric plants in the world, municipal or private, can produce 100,000,000 more kilowatt hours, but it has no market for this supply within the city limits. If a power district were opened up to it, it could dispose of this product. In the town of Vandercook 100 per cent of the farmers want Kaukauna's cheap service and not that supplied by the private utility. If and when the power district bill passes, the city of Kaukauna and the town of Vandercook and perhaps even an appreciable portion of the Fox River Valley can get together in one single public power district. And that is why the privately owned utilities considered the bill dangerous. It should be emphasized that the legislation is purely permissive, not mandatory. No municipality or rural territory can become part of a power district except by the will of the people expressed in that district.

What were the objections of the utilities to the power district plan? The first one was that the power district will have the power to issue bonds. But what of it? Milwaukee financed its water-works by bonding and now owns its plant worth millions of dollars, practically debt free. Most financing will be done by mortgage bonds anyway and not by general obligation. Moreover, the people must approve a bond issue before it can be floated. Finally, bonds are not a new obligation. Municipal bonds represent only a paper transfer of debt. A private utility today has a perpetual mortgage on the community. All that the municipality does is to take over the mortgage. The people are paying the interest on the bonds in rates today. They will do the same thing in a power district and no more. The only difference will be that the rate of interest may be lower and that the district will ultimately retire its indebtedness.

A second objection to the power program is that the district will have the power to tax. Of course it will. The tax power stands behind the bonds of any governmental unit whether it be United States government, State government, city, county, school district, drainage district, or power district.

As a matter of practice the tax power is not used in the conduct of a municipal electric utility. There is not a publicly owned electric utility in Wisconsin today, to my knowledge, that is taxing its people to pay bond interest or for any other purpose. The municipal utility supports itself. Sometimes the utility is supporting the municipality.

The enabling legislation of the public-power program in Wisconsin consisted of the Loomis bill and the Carow resolution. The Loomis bill authorized cities to compete with private utilities without a certificate of convenience and necessity. The bill passed the Assembly but was killed in the Senate. The Carow resolution provided that in computing the 5 per cent debt limitation, there should not be included the indebtedness incurred in financing any income-producing utility. This gave relief to that extent from the constitutional restriction which as it now exists is a legal deterrent to electrical operations by many cities. The Carow resolution is the only part of the power program that passed. Thus goes into history the Wisconsin power fight of 1929.

Thus, it is predicted, there begins the greatest battle of the next decade in Wisconsin. It is a battle to give the public operation of electric utilities—which has been an avowed policy for a quarter of a century in this State and nation—a chance! Basically, Wisconsin's public-power program is simply this: Let the people by adopting the constitutional amendment on recapture or by forming a power district decide for themselves whether they want public or private operation of electric utilities. That is not radicalism. It is democracy.

Federal Control of the Power Trust

By DREW PEARSON

TWO years ago last March the Sixty-ninth Congress was attempting to end its last days without leaving too much work unfinished when Senator Walsh of Montana introduced a resolution. It was a measure deliberately calculated to make history and the history which it started is still being recorded. The resolution provided for a Senate investigation of the financial structure and the propaganda agencies of the Power Trust.

Walsh had hoped that in the stampede of legislation which always attends the closing days of any Congress, his resolution would slip by unnoticed. But it did not. The ever-watchful agents of the power companies got wind of it, and when unanimous consent was requested someone who had been tipped off objected. The resolution was sent to committee. There Walsh waged a lone battle. Against him was arrayed a battalion of the most high-powered lawyers the utilities could mobilize. Every kind of publicity which an astute corps of power-company propagandists could devise was brought into play.

Walsh fought on. Many members of his own party on the Interstate Commerce Committee deserted him. For days he stood at bay against the army of power-trust attorneys. Finally by a majority of one vote, a coalition of progressives of both parties reported his resolution to the Senate.

There he faced a fight even more bitter. The Power Trust redoubled its energy and its propaganda. Seeing that they could not entirely defeat the investigation, the utilities attempted to sidetrack it, and on the motion of Senator George of Georgia, whose largest campaign contribution had come from a power company, the investigation was snatched from the dreaded hands of Senatorial inquisitors and shunted to the supposedly innocuous Federal Trade Commission.

That was one year and one-half ago. But times change. Just before the summer recess of the present special session of Congress, Senator Couzens, now chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, also waited for an opportunity to pass a resolution. His measure likewise called for an investigation of the Power Trust. But whereas the Walsh resolution provided only for an investigation of the finances and propaganda of gas and electric companies, the Couzens resolution provided for an investigation of every possible phase of the power industry—from financing and propaganda to ownership and control, and including service and rates. It provided not merely for the investigation of gas and electric companies but of radio companies—meaning the Radio Corporation of America; telegraph companies—meaning Postal and Western Union; and telephone companies—meaning the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. In fact there is no phase of the power industry or any branch of it which the Couzens resolution cannot investigate.

Senator Couzens made no secret of his resolution. The power interests must have been familiar with its tremendous potentialities. But they brought no battalion of lawyers. They unloosed no deluge of propaganda. Apparently the floodlight of publicity which the Federal Trade Commission had turned upon them had unnerved them and they feared to register publicly their opposition to further investigations. The resolution passed—unopposed. Yes, times do change.

But the Couzens investigation paves the way for greater changes. The resolution provides for hearings on the Couzens bill, which in turn is the most drastic plan for the control of the power and communications trusts yet before Congress. It lumps together all of the power activities of the nation, so far uncontrolled, and places them under the supervision of a commission similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is to be called the Commission on Communications and Power.

It takes, for instance, the regulation of telegraph and telephone lines away from the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has been much too busy regulating railroads ever to pay any attention to these other two interstate carriers. It takes control of radio communication away from the Federal Radio Commission, which is to expire on December 31 anyway. And finally it takes over the Federal Power Commission in toto, and adds to its present functions the regulation of interstate power rates.

But to understand how sweeping is the regulation proposed by the Couzens bill, some conception of the present lack of regulation is necessary. The most important regulation which the bill proposes is that of the transmission of power between States. This came as an afterthought, and is one reason why so much importance is attached to the preliminary hearings during which the bill is to be rewritten. It so happens that after Senator Couzens had drafted his plan for regulating telegraph, telephone, and radio companies, a closer study of power disclosed that there exists today no means of regulating the rates which a company generating power in one State may sell it for in another State. There the problem becomes complicated. It becomes so complicated, in fact, that the federal courts have handed down numberless decisions regarding the special contracts existing between cities in one State and power companies in another, most of which decisions vary and have been interpreted with even greater variance, so that some cities are in hot water with their utility companies most of the time. This interstate regulation is the greatest need in the power field today.

The only interstate check on water-power at present is that exercised under the Federal Water Power Act of 1920, which the Power Trust has done its best to manipulate, circumnavigate, and undermine. Passed during the last days of the Wilson Administration, this law was a compromise among those who advocated government ownership and operation of federal power sites and those who championed private exploitation.

A Federal Power Commission was established composed of three Cabinet members—the Secretaries of War, of the Interior, and of Agriculture. And because these gentlemen are always more engrossed in national defense, oil leases, and farm relief than in such nebulous questions as power control, the commission became the most inefficient and easily manipulated bureau in Washington.

Probably such Secretaries of the Interior as Albert B. Fall and Roy O. West, former attorney for Insull, took more than the average interest in the Federal Power Commission, but on the whole its management was left entirely to its executive secretary.

This key position was occupied for nine years by O. C. Merrill, a power-development enthusiast who wanted to see water-power used regardless of eventual public interest, and who has recently resigned to take a berth created for him by the Power Trust. It is now occupied by Frank E. Bonner, appointed only after Ray Lyman Wilbur, honest but naive when it comes to things outside his own particular educational field, had wired his old friend Paul Downing, president of the Pacific Gas and Electric, to see if Bonner was acceptable. Secretary Wilbur explains that he, personally, knew nothing about the qualifications Bonner should have, so he consulted someone who he thought would know—an illustration of the blessings the Power Trust has enjoyed under the present system of "absentee" commissionerships.

The duty of the Federal Power Commission is to grant fifty-year leases to private companies to develop the water-power sites of the federal government. Because of the "absentee" commissionership system the man who makes the chief decision in granting leases is the man who surveys the site—the commission's engineer. In three cases these engineers have resigned in order to take more lucrative jobs with power companies which had received leases from the commission, and in a fourth case one of them left to take a position with a power lobbying organization.

Since at the end of fifty years these leases expire and the power plant may revert to the federal government at a cost equal to the total investment minus the depreciation reserve, one of the most important duties of the Federal Power Commission is to inspect the accounts of the power companies. Here the Power Trust has resorted to the most persistent subterfuge in order to undermine the law. It has argued, first, that it may be its own judge of how large its depreciation reserve should be, and that its own directors may vote to add to the reserve only when profits are conveniently large, instead of carrying it as a fixed charge, as the Interstate Commerce Commission requires the railroads to do.

Again, the Power Trust has argued that it may charge to its capital investment the stock transfers, engineering and management charges rendered to subsidiary companies by the parent concern—all of which increase the price which the public must pay to recapture the plant at the end of fifty years, and also the rates at which electricity is sold during those fifty years.

The Couzens bill is drafted to change all this. Instead of commissioners who have large governmental departments under them and who can work at power regulation only in their spare moments, Senator Couzens proposes that his new Commission on Communications and Power shall be composed of five commissioners, who, like the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, are experts in their field and devote all their time to this one problem. One of them is to be a specialist on water-power, another on radio, another on telegraphs, and another on telephones.

More important in the bill are the Couzens proposals for regulation of the transmission of interstate power. The Commission on Communications and Power is to undertake this regulation only when petitioned by State authorities, or by a "substantial number" of consumers. However, the commission reserves for itself the right to judge what comprises a "substantial number."

Instead of allowing the commission to be swamped with the job of interestate rate-fixing over the vast area of the United States, the Couzens bill provides for "joint boards" for different localities consisting of one representative from every State where power is produced and consumed. Here again the Commission on Communications and Power is to be the judge regarding what States shall be represented. The joint board is to hear all complaints, render decisions regarding rates, and when it cannot arrive at a decision, pass the question on to the commission at Washington. The commission always retains the right to take any case out of the hands of the joint board and to revise any decision.

One part which will be hotly debated empowers the commission to value the companies controlling interstate transmission. The holding groups have paid prices which are out of all relation to value. In New York State the excess payments amounted to $202,000,000, and at that rate they are probably over a billion for the country. The utility-company support of this commission may be explained by a hope of manipulating it so as to saddle these excess prices on the consumers.

That, in brief, is the bill which has already received the support of some of the strangest bedfellows that ever championed a piece of radical legislation. It has the support, first of all, of the three cabinet members who now head the Federal Power Commission. All of them—Secretary of War Good, Secretary of the Interior Wilbur, and Secretary of Agriculture Hyde—agree that water-power regulation is far too important to receive only a fraction of their time. It has the support of that giant of the wires, the International Telephone and Telegraph Company. It has the support of that octopus of the air, the Radio Corporation of America.

Finally, if Mr. Hoover's friends are to be believed, it also has the support of the man who on the steps of the Capitol on last March 4 proclaimed that "because we substantially confer a monopoly limiting competition, we must regulate services and rates."

Governor Roosevelt's Power Program

By SAMUEL I. ROSENMAN

IN New York the people's fight for the control of power resources is a State fight because the law does not permit the city governments to go into the power business except by special act. For several years a bitter struggle has been in progress at Albany for the development of a State power program that would protect the consumers. A sharp difference of opinion as to the method of development has delayed the program.

With the exception of Governor Hughes the Republicans have favored leasing our natural water-power resources to private companies. Governor Smith and more recently Governor Roosevelt have favored State development and operation.

The plan proposed by Governor Roosevelt goes much further than State development. It provides that in the distribution of State-generated energy State contracts with the power companies replace the present unsatisfactory form of regulation. As far as the State water-powers go it involves the creation of a Board of Trustees to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, to be constituted as a public corporate entity. These power trustees would have no stockholders, but would be given the power to issue securities to be sold to private investors. These securities would be exempt from federal and state taxation and would be secured by the power structures to be built and by the revenues derived from the sale of water-power. The proceeds from the sale of the securities would, of course, be used to build the necessary structures at the source of supply and equip them for the development of the power. Interest and principal would be paid out of the proceeds to be derived from the sale of the electrical energy produced. The securities would themselves be the obligation only of the public corporation, the power trustees, and not of the State itself. In this way, neither the money of the State would be expended nor its credit pledged.

New York has already seen the successful working out of these principles in its New York Port Authority, which has built, and is still building, great bridges serving the port of New York, and is now planning other tremendous port projects, raising the necessary funds by the sale of tax-exempt, low-interest bonds, secured by and paid out of the revenues of the improvements constructed by it. In this way, bridges costing a hundred million dollars have been and are being financed and completed without pledging the credit of the State for a single penny, or requiring a single dollar of taxpayers' money (except as temporary advances).

Only the other week a bridge across Lake Champlain, connecting the State of New York with the State of Vermont, was opened to traffic. This bridge was built and financed under a similar arrangement. A bi-State commission appointed respectively by the governors of New York and Vermont built this bridge out of the proceeds of bonds issued by it as its corporate obligation and secured by the bridge and the revenues therefrom. In the same way, the necessary power structures could be erected by the proposed water-power trustees without ultimate cost or liability to the State. There would be no stockholders to demand dividends; and interest rates would be kept at a minimum by the nature of the security and its tax-exempt feature.

The foregoing constitutes in brief outline that part of the New York water-power program which deals with providing the physical plant for transforming falling water into electrical current. It involves a definite declaration of the public policy of the State that the natural water-power sites in, upon, or adjacent to the rivers to be developed shall remain inalienable to the people; that all structures necessary to the development of hydro-electric power, including dams and power plants, necessary for the generation of such hydro-electric power, shall be built, financed, owned, and physically operated by a public authority in accordance with a plan to be approved by the Legislature of the State of New York.

So much for the question of developing the power. The other problem, which is of even greater importance to the consumers of the State, deals with the transmission and distribution of this current from the plant where it is developed to the industries and homes of the people of the State. Governor Roosevelt has announced, in the bill introduced at Albany last March, the definitive principles which should govern such distribution. They are (1) that the development, generation, transmission, and distribution of power shall be made in such manner and on such terms as to assure fair and impartial treatment to all consumers at the lowest rates compatible with a fair and reasonable return on the actual cost; (2) that the rates to be charged consumers for power shall be based on the cost of the service, considering only the actual capital outlays spent in plant investment and working capital, with a proper allowance for obsolescence and depreciation, and the necessary operating expenses (all to be determined in accordance with rules to be established by the commission), plus a return on the capital investment not exceeding the interest paid on borrowed money and dividend rates paid on preferred stock, not in excess of the rates currently payable on preferred stock at the time of its issuance, and not to exceed 8 per cent on all other capital actually paid in, in cash or in property; and (3) that such rates shall not be subject to the rate-regulating power of the Public Service Commission.

The change made by Governor Roosevelt in the plan proposed by Governor Smith consists of this definite declaration of policy in removing from the Public Service Commission all power to regulate the rates charged consumers for power secured from the State. Instead of utilizing the regulatory powers of the Public Service Commission the present plan proposes to substitute the method of contract with distributors of electric power. It is definitely provided that in fixing these contractual rates only four things are to be considered: the capital investment, allowing for depreciation; the actual operating expenses determined in accordance with fixed rules; the actual cost of bonded and preferred financing; and a return not to exceed 8 per cent on other capital investment.

The Governor, in his water-power message to the legislature last March, called attention to the present widespread belief in the ineffectiveness of the existing rate-regulating powers of the Public Service Commission. Indeed, during the last legislative session he proposed the creation of a commission to study the whole question of the powers of the Public Service Commission with a view toward revising the entire method of regulation of public utilities and other corporations coming within its jurisdiction. As a result of his recommendation there was created and is now functioning an investigating commission charged among other things with the duty of recommending necessary amendments in the Public Service Commission law for better regulation.

When public service commissioners were first created in this State and in other States, one of the basic purposes was to protect consumers by providing fair rates based on a fair return to private capital. The principle was adopted that profits from private capital engaged in a public-utility enterprise should be limited to a fair return only, and that when greater profits than such a return were earned they would be passed back to the consumer in the form of lower rates.

Since that time, this original protection for the consumer has been to a large extent nullified. Recent court rulings involving replacement value, "going value," so-called good-will, return on capital, and allowances for reserves, have made legally possible investment returns never dreamed of by the framers of the original public regulatory theory. For that reason, the Governor has sought to avoid the rate-regulating powers of the Public Service Commission as applied to the water-power to be developed by the State. The plan, therefore, contemplates that the board developing the power should ultimately enter into contracts with transmitting and distributing companies under which a fair price to the consumer will be guaranteed. It is a method frankly based on a theory of contract rather than a theory of regulation. Of course, the bill provides that the board should submit any such contract to the legislature for acceptance, rejection, or modification before executing it.

This plan, it is believed by the Governor, provides a definite protection to the consumer, in that it makes the right to have power from the power station depend absolutely on a fixed maximum return on actual investment, with books kept in accordance with rules fixed and agreed upon in advance. The details of the actual construction and transmission would, of course, have to be worked out by the power trustees themselves and would require approval by the legislature. The engineering phases of the problem, the necessary negotiations with the representatives of Canada and its Provinces, the question of the necessity of a federal treaty and of federal legislation, the conferring with power interests for the purpose of arranging the contract, and the details of financing would all have to be looked after by the trustees, but only in accordance with the foregoing principles of public policy as declared in the bill.

This proposed method of distributing electrical energy by contract increases the importance and danger of the recent power merger created by the formation of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation to take over the capital stock of the Buffalo, Niagara and Eastern Power Corporation, the Northeastern Power Corporation, and the Mohawk-Hudson Power Corporation. This merger may create such a monopoly of electrical distribution in New York State, outside of the metropolitan area of New York City, that aside from the question as to an actual violation of the State anti-monopoly laws it may put the State to a marked disadvantage in obtaining a proper contract for such distribution. Instead of negotiating with a number of competing companies for fair contracts, the State will apparently be compelled to treat with a single monopoly. However, if a fair contract cannot be obtained from existing distributors, Governor Roosevelt has by fair warning indicated the alternative step in the administration policy. In his message of March 12 he said:

> I want to see something done. I want it done in accordance with sound public policy. I want hydro-electric power developed on the St. Lawrence, but I want the consumers to get the benefit of it when it is developed. They must not be left for their sole protection to existing methods of rate-making by public-service commissions. Are the business men of this State willing to transmit and distribute this latent water-power on a fair return on their investment? If they are satisfied, here is their opportunity. If not, then the State may have to go into the transmission business itself. It cannot on the one hand let this power go to waste, nor on the other be required to yield to anyone who would aim to exploit the State's resources for inordinate profit.
>
> We shall soon know whether or not such a contract can be made. If the trustees can make it and it commends itself to the people of the State, then the legislature and I will approve of it and we can go ahead. But, if no such contract can be made, we shall know the reasons why and protect ourselves accordingly. I want to be in accord with sound business principles. I believe there are enough good business men in this State who see this problem as clearly as I do and will be glad to join with the State in this endeavor. I want to give to business this big opportunity to participate in a public service.

In other words, if a proper and reasonable contract cannot be made which will protect the consumer, the State itself may be forced into providing systems for transmitting this electricity.

The Republican legislature has rejected completely the Governor's plan. It has refused to subscribe to the principles of public policy formulated in his message. Its continued opposition over a period of six years to such a proposal indicates that it will not accept a progressive power program until the force of public opinion compels it. Observers at the Capitol at Albany are doubtful whether this opposition represents the real opinion of the rank and file of the Republican Party. The leadership of the Republican Party, however, appears to be unalterably opposed to this policy of development. How long the Republican political leaders can withstand the force of public opinion in this matter is purely a matter of conjecture.

The issue is clear. It is the interest of the consumers on the one hand, represented by the State, and on the other the interest of those who would use the resources of the State for inordinate profit. Reasonable and fair profit is assured. Does Big Business insist upon exploiting the property of the State for inordinate profit? If so, then, as Governor Roosevelt points out, the State of New York as a matter of self-defense may have to go into the business of transmitting and distributing electricity, as the Province of Ontario has done so successfully.

In the Driftway

IT is odd how many persons, in reading a book, omit the preface. The Drifter would never think of such a thing. He believes that the preface—when there is one—is, if not the most important part of the book, at least essential to beginning it. For a reader to ignore the preface is foolish on his own account and unfair from the standpoint of the author. For it is in the preface, as a rule, that an author explains the scope and purpose of his volume and the circumstances connected with its writing. He gives just the material, in other words, which a real reader always wants as an approach to a book, and which an author is justified in asking anybody to acquaint himself with before attempting to pass judgment on the writing. Sometimes the Drifter reads the preface to a book and skips the rest, but he never skips the preface and reads the rest. The Drifter is also a careful reader of dedications. They are not as important for understanding or judging a book as prefaces, but they often convey a note of human interest which it is a pity to miss. Sometimes, too, dedications contain some light on the reason for a book which the careful reader will like to have, as in Bernard Shaw's "The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism and Capitalism," which is inscribed "To my sister-in-law, Mary Stewart Cholmondely, the intelligent woman to whose question this book is the best answer I can make."

* * * * *

ON the whole, it is the dedications of books on the sea which the Drifter most enjoys, for sailors are a romantic folk whose inscriptions are often elaborate and convey a good deal in regard to the writers' personalities. Nothing could be briefer or tell less than Joseph Conrad's dedication of "Youth," which is simply "To C." On the other hand, "The Rescue" bears the following dedication: "To Frederic Courtland Penfield, last ambassador of the United States of America to the late Austrian Empire, this old-time tale is gratefully inscribed in memory of the rescue of certain distressed travelers effected by him in the world's great storm of the year 1914." Sir Bertram Hayes, formerly commodore of the White Star Line and commander of the steamship Majestic, makes a wide gesture in his volume of reminiscences, "Hull Down," which is "Dedicated to all my friends afloat and ashore." That is too broad for anybody to get much kick out of it. On the contrary, William McFee's first book, "An Ocean Tramp," opens with a statement that is highly personal: "To A——— R ———" Below this are the lines from Heine: "She was lovable, and he loved her. But he was not lovable, and she did not love him."

* * * * *

PROBABLY wives are the ruling favorites for dedications, though mothers press them hard and might turn out to run ahead if anyone wanted to compile the statistics. (So many useless statistics have been compiled already that somebody ought to be fool enough to tackle this job.) Fathers run well behind and husbands are practically left at the post. Morgan Robertson, in his "Spun-Yarn," has a tribute which is nicely conceived and gracefully phrased, as follows:

Dedicated
To the memory of
My Father
Captain Andrew Robertson
A good man, and a strong one the ablest seaman
I have known.

* * * * *

WHEN sailors dedicate books to their wives they generally manage to refer to them as "shipmates," "pilots," or something similar, and the inscriptions usually contain a good deal of treacle, for sailors are notoriously sentimental about women. (If it weren't so catty the Drifter would add that sailors are sentimental about women because they see so little of them.) Sam Noble dedicates his volume of reminiscences "To Jeanie, my wee pilot," while Frederick Perry, in his "Fair Winds and Foul," cuts loose with this: "To the most tyrannical but just and lovable little captain that ever trod the quarter-deck of the good ship Matrimony, my wife, this book is affectionately dedicated by the author." But the Drifter's favorite dedication is to be found in a volume published last year on Donald McKay, builder of clipper ships, by his grandson, Richard C. McKay:

To the Memory of Albenia Boole McKay
and
Mary Cressy Litchfield McKay
Who both gave Donald McKay every evidence of love and affection, and made possible much of their husband's success, this volume is dedicated.

The Drifter

Correspondence

The Facts About Gastonia

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As one of the counsel of the Gastonia strikers I want to register my objection to misstatements of fact made in your magazine. In your issue of July 31 you state: "Out of the darkness came shots fired from shot guns. They seemed to come from the small building used as union headquarters. The police were struck, one died, and two were injured." These are the facts the prosecution will try to establish, but these are not the facts in this case.

The facts which I gathered after interviewing more than 100 witnesses, good, honest, Christian folks who would rather see sixteen persons die in the electric chair than tell an untruth, are as follows: The strikers formed a picket line and marched toward the mill. They were met by the local Gastonia police, who were drunk. They were blackjacked, kicked, and cursed. The strikers offered no resistance, but went back to their tent colony. The police on the picket line threatened that they would come down that night and clean out the bunch of "white trash." About a half hour later the police arrived at the tent colony. With drawn pistols they ran up to the guard, blackjacked him, and took his gun away from him. One of the officers then shot at the strikers. Immediately another officer fired at the headquarters. Then the workers shot. The police fired the first shots which were pistol shots. The workers shot in self-defense only after the police fired.

The "Committee of 100," the vigilante committee organized by the Manville-Jenckes Company, were ready to follow the police at a given signal. They were armed with guns at the Loray mill and given liquor to bolster up their courage. They were delayed only by a long drilling freight train.

Trenton, N. J., August 13 LEON JOSEPHSON

[We did not assert in our editorial of July 31 that the strikers fired first or that the police fired no shots at the strikers. We studiously avoided making such statements because up to that time no affidavits had been produced to show whether the police fired at the strikers and whether any strikers were struck by police bullets. Recently the defense counsel of the Gastonia prisoners has supplied us with a series of affidavits indicating that the police opened fire upon the strikers after deliberately making plans for an attack. As to the truth of these affidavits we cannot vouch, but we are glad to present this view of the tragedy to our readers.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

Doctor Robinson

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your editorial on Sanity and Sex in the issue of September 4 should evoke the gratitude of all friends of civilization and decency. It is a straightforward gesture in a dangerous field.

In one respect only would the writer suggest an addition. In mentioning some representative names on the International Committee of the World League for Sexual Reform you omitted, probably quite unconsciously, the name of the American who has done more than any other of his countrymen to promote a humane and civilized attitude toward sex—namely, Dr. William J. Robinson, editor of the Critic and Guide and author of many wise and useful books on diverse aspects of sexology. We are prone to overlook the work of pioneers. At a time when the researches into sexology carried on by the writer of these lines were limited to observing pictures of Anna Held in tights, and at a time when Calverton, Schmalhausen, et al. existed only as cosmic potentiality, Dr. Robinson was raising his hand almost unaided against the prudes and purists and advocating a medical and sociological attitude toward sexual problems. In a day when neither Margaret Sanger nor Norman Haire had ever heard of a contraceptive device, Dr. Robinson was establishing his position as the first effective American advocate of birth control. By converting the late Dr. Abraham Jacobi to the birth-control position, he did more than any other American to give birth-control respectability in the medical profession.

Northampton, Mass., August 3 HARRY ELMER BARNES

The Candy Rat

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of Fashions in Food in The Nation of August 7, why, oh why was the candy rat forgotten, overlooked, neglected, unmentioned? This slight grieves me. Do you not recall the candy rat—marshmallow, chocolate, (cream, not "milk") coated? His price was one penny.

Each Christmas the candy rat was to be found in the toe of the bulging stocking. Christmas, and life itself, are not quite the same, now that the dingy glass cases no longer shelter the candy rat. We've hunted for him in vain these many years.

RACHEL MAYER KNOTT

Morro Bay, California, August 8

Contributors to This Issue

H. S. RAUSHENBUSH is the author, with H. W. Laidler, of "Power Control," and also of a forthcoming book, "We Fight for Power." He has been secretary of the Committee on Coal and Power.

GEORGE W. NORRIS is Senator from Nebraska.

ALVIN C. REIS is chairman of the Committee on Judiciary of the Wisconsin State Legislature, and has led the fight for the power program which he outlines.

DREW PEARSON is a Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun.

SAMUEL ROSENMAN is counsel for Governor Roosevelt.

ADA HASTINGS HEDGES frequently contributes poetry to the magazines.

WILLIAM MACDONALD is a regular contributor of historical and political reviews to The Nation.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY is managing editor of The Nation.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY is at work on a book of literary criticism.

EDA LOU WALTON is the author of "Dawn Boy: Blackfoot and Navajo Songs."

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES is pastor of the Community Church of New York.

The Nation Radio Hour—Every Monday at 8 P. M.
526M.—WMCA—750 K.
September 16—Arthur Warner
September 23—Paul Blanshard

The Golden Wind

is the first of the 12 books for $5.00 to get it

Clip the Coupon

THE first Paper Book, widely praised by critics, is now in the hands of all subscribers. And every month hereafter they will each receive a new book on the very day it is published. In order to show you how fine these books are we offer to send you "The Golden Wind" on approval, together with complete details of our plan. If you like it send us $5 and you will receive a new Paper Book every month for a whole year. If you do not like the book, return it to us and you will be under no obligation. This offer is open for a limited time only, so clip the coupon now.

PAPER BOOKS, Charles Boni, Publisher 101 N
66 Fifth Avenue, New York

Please send me, free, "The Golden Wind," and details of your plan. Within 5 days after receiving the book I will send you $5.00 for a paid-in-full year's subscription for 12 Paper Books, or return the book.

Name.....
Street.....
City..... State.....
($5.50 in Canada, $6.00 abroad). Send check with coupon if you prefer.

Books and Drama

Summer

By ADA HASTINGS HEDGES

If there should come a wet wind from the sea
To freshen at the heart these hills that parch
Beneath the sun, and if more tenderly
The light should fall from the relenting arch
Of sky, or shadow cooled by rain should fold
In silver mist these broken slopes, subdue
And comfort them, their naked breasts might hold
The peace of forests, dim and veiled and blue.

The desert has its sorrows: dust for dreams
Of mist and trees to soften each contour
Too sharply drawn—of showers and of streams
Implacably withheld by some old foe;
And somewhere in these hills must still endure
A hunger such as only deserts know.

The Great American Tragedy

The Tragic Era. The Revolution after Lincoln. By Claude G. Bowers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

THE story of the twelve years which followed the death of Lincoln has many times been told. Professor John W. Burgess, for example, has scrutinized with withering acumen the extraordinary vicissitudes which the Constitution underwent at the hands of radical Republican politicians, and the late Professor William A. Dunning made some enlightening observations on the political as well as the constitutional phases of the period. Rhodes labored valiantly through it, struggling to give a semblance of order to its sadly tangled elements. We have had a few illuminating biographies and books of reminiscence and a few studies of particular episodes. Not until Mr. Bowers, however, has any writer caught the note of vast and ghastly tragedy that sounds persistently through the long years of reconstruction—a tragedy so great and dreadful as to make the very name of popular government a by-word and leave the record of the Republican Party indelibly stained. "I have sought," Mr. Bowers tells us, "to recreate the black and bloody drama of these years, to show the leaders of the fighting factions at close range, to picture the moving masses, both whites and blacks, in North and South, surging crazily under the influence of the poisonous propaganda on which they were fed." What Mr. Bowers set out to do he has done, and done it brilliantly and with power.

The elements of tragedy in these dozen years could not have been better chosen if the great corrupter of mankind himself had selected them. A defeated, disrupted, and humiliated South, its white population, in the main, branded with disloyalty and its Negroes an ignorant and barely civilized mass; a victorious North flushed with the success of a kind of holy war and reveling in an insubstantial prosperity; an arrogant and corrupt majority party bent upon riding rough-shod over all opposition; an adventitious President whom nobody wanted and another who merited contempt; a horde of politicians and hangers-on in Congress and out, with only here or there a leader of substantial parts: such were the major factors in the spectacular political game. It was admitted that the rebellious South must in some way and at some time be restored to political fellowship in the Union, but the idea of union had been seized upon, even before the fighting ended, as a golden opportunity to make a radical Republicanism supreme. The wrath of heaven visited upon secession was to be turned to partisan advantage; the voice of the people was to be heard only through a Republican machine; while as for the Constitution—let that scrap of paper go hang! Thus was the overthrow of slavery to be celebrated, the Union preserved, and the great experiment of self-government advanced toward completion.

The main ground of controversy was clear from the first. The death of Lincoln left to Andrew Johnson the development and execution of a reconstruction program whose success depended upon the loyal cooperation of the Southern whites, but in which Negro suffrage found no place. Perhaps the program was too generous, but to the Republican radicals it was an anathema. Without the Negro, Republican domination of the South was impossible, and Republican domination was the aim of reconstruction. Hence the twelve dark years of frightfulness, political, military, social, of flagrant violation of the Constitution, of ignorance, greed, corruption, and moral degeneracy in government the like of which no other country has ever known.

Mr. Bowers will not be hailed by scholars as a constitutional historian, and a good deal of the politics that has usually been made prominent in histories of the period is relegated in his book to second place. To be sure, he tells us all that most readers will need to know about Johnson as President, the history of the great reconstruction legislation, the course of military government in the South, the orgies of carpetbagism, the rise and fall of Negro suffrage, the impeachment trial, the colossal ineptitude and corruption of the Grant regime, the Liberal Republican movement of 1873 and the financial crisis of that year, and the Hayes-Tilden contested election. But his main concern is rather with the personal characteristics and conduct of party leaders in both sections, the heated and vitiated atmosphere which Republican politics created and in which the political life of the country went on, the social setting at Washington and in the South, and the harsh conflict of theories, prejudices, ambitions, and resentments which continued until the Republican hold had been broken and a solid South had recovered, in some measure at least, its political independence.

It is here that Mr. Bowers, laden with the fruits of a formidable research, makes his distinctive contribution. He takes us behind the scenes at Washington, from the Capitol and the White House to the boarding-house and the bar-room. We go with him on tours of the South, into the homes of the people and to the State capitals where black and tan governments held sway, and again into the Republican plotting-places of the North and with Johnson on his calamitous speaking tours. We meet Ashley, "this delectable creature" of Republican domination; Thaddeus Stevens, "picturesque old thunderer" and evil genius of the party which he terrorized; Stanton, "molded by nature for conspiracy, if not treachery," and a long list of others who professed to serve truth and justice. The drawing-rooms of the capital open their doors, and we meet the brilliant Kate Chase Sprague, Mrs. Belknap, Mrs. Hamilton Fish, and other hostesses of a society which moved in elegance and dripped corruption. The pen-pictures are innumerable, and catholic in their range: Blaine, Conkling, Greeley, Jim Fisk and Jay Gould, Schurz, Sumner, Ben Butler, Garfield; some of them figures clean and straight like Charles Francis Adams, some, like Greeley, the playboys of ineffectiveness, some daubed with evil beyond all hope of rehabilitation.

Mr. Bowers does not write as if he were wholly impartial, and some of his readers will doubtless feel that his zeal has led him to lay on dark colors with a heavy hand. His defense of Andrew Johnson, for example, seems to be at least all that the evidence warrants, and by so much as Johnson's virtues are magnified the vices of his enemies are blackened. It is the prevailing limitation of downright writing, and Mr. Bowers is downright indeed. The sterling merit of his book is its altogether remarkable recreation of the spirit of the time. If he has dealt severely with great reputations, he has also rescued many lesser ones from neglect. The spokesmen of the South are given a hearing and women lobbyists are unmasked. There is no history of the sordid epoch better worth reading, none better calculated to destroy respect for Republican morals, and none more certain to give its readers shocks and thrills.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

The Crisis in Power Control

Electrical Utilities: The Crisis in Public Control. By William E. Mosher and others. Harper and Brothers. $4.

DR. MOSHER and his associates have written an arresting book, of great value to the student of power control. Syracuse University may well be proud that such a book comes out of its School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. The authors assume that the power industry exists to furnish power to the public efficiently and cheaply: "The electric-power industry performs an essential social function. The state might perform this function. When it leaves it to the industry to do so, the industry acts in a way as an agency of the state." As public-service enterprises, power companies, in accordance with well-established legal principles of great antiquity, are subject to regulation by the state, and (to anticipate the argument) if the companies manage to make regulation ineffective, then public ownership and operation will in due course almost inevitably follow.

Every State in the Union except Delaware has a regulatory commission of some kind, but in seven of them the commission is wholly lacking in jurisdiction over the power industry. The thirty-nine regulating States altogether spend less than $2,000,000 a year on the control of power companies, while the New York Edison Company alone has already spent more than $4,000,000 fighting a single case brought by New York City in 1925 for lower rates. As the companies can charge back upon the public in rates the enormous expense they are willing to lavish in fighting effective regulation, even the best of commissions has a rocky road to travel—and by no means all of the commissions are unduly good. Furthermore, in recent years they have unfortunately shown an increasing tendency to regard themselves as judicial bodies rather than militant defenders of public rights.

But even at best the commissions are sharply limited by the courts, and at worst are rendered well-nigh powerless in the matter chiefly important, namely, rates. This book contains a careful and eminently fair review of the leading cases, and the writers conclude that on the whole the courts are becoming more liberal in their attitude toward administrative bodies, but that the Supreme Court has left the lower courts and the commissions in a state of great uncertainty because of the unclearness of its own principles of rate making. Under the decisions a utility company is entitled to charge rates yielding a reasonable return on the property employed—and here we plunge into the valuation morass. Many people think that the court has gone over bag and baggage to the disastrous basis of reproduction cost. The dicta of the court, notably the language of Mr. Justice Butler in the Indianapolis Water intelligently planned for families who are tired of present-day New York

A new kind of town

BUILDING a whole town new! What an opportunity! Not just a matter of improving a city already built, but a chance to start from scratch and plan a new kind of town so that —noisy, dangerous traffic is separated from where people live

—children can go from home to school without crossing a single street

—playgrounds and parks connect with every house

Radburn houses now ready

All this is no hazy project for the future. This town is actually being built. It is Radburn, between Hackensack and Ridgewood, New Jersey, within easy commuting distance of Manhattan. Houses and apartments are actually ready. Many families are already living there.

Radburn houses are totally different from the monotonous rows that characterize so many suburban developments. They are designed in wide variety, are attractive and well built. For the most part they are arranged so that living rooms face on pleasant gardens.

Radburn houses are priced well within the range of moderate incomes. Because of large scale building operations by a Limited Dividend Company, they represent unusual values. And the convenient Radburn Payment Plan makes it easy to buy out of income.

You can live there

Are you tired of subways? Tired of worrying about your children when they go into the streets to play? Radburn offers you a way out. The coupon below is for your convenience. Mail it for complete information about Radburn and how easy it is for you to live there.

RADBURN

Reg. Trade Mark

Built by CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

A Limited Dividend Company—
Organized to build better homes and communities

Main Office
18 EAST 48TH STREET
NEW YORK Wickersham 6210

Radburn Office
FAIR LAWN AVE. & PLAZA RD.
FAIR LAWN N. J. Armory 2500

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION,
FAIR LAWN AVE. & PLAZA RD., FAIR LAWN, N. J.

Please send me information about Radburn, the Town for the Motor Age and how inexpensive it is to live there.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

Company case, lend much color to this idea, but the actual decisions of the tribunal, as the careful analysis of the present volume shows, have by no means closed the door on the prudent-investment theory, or indicated that the court regards reproduction cost as more than one among many elements in valuation. But the dictum of the court has been carrying quite as much weight with the lower courts and the commissions as its action. "The Massachusetts courts alone have consistently maintained capital honestly and prudently invested and devoted to a public service as their rate base." If this principle, which was challenged in 1927 in the Worcester Electric Light case, ever comes to the Supreme Court and the court makes a clear-cut decision that the utilities are entitled to a return on the basis of present reproduction cost and not of prudent investment, then, in the words of our authors, "the outlook for order in rate regulation will be far from bright"; the rate base will be so raised as to prevent any considerable rate reduction for a long time to come, and the hand of advocates of public ownership will be much strengthened.

The direction of utilities by holding companies exempt from public control (essentially the present situation) is good for the holding companies and bad for the public, to put bluntly the findings of Dr. Mosher and his coworkers, and it is essential that holding companies should be brought under public regulation. Intercorporate financial transactions must be made clear and public. Moreover, with eighteen States exporting from 10 to 92 per cent of the power they generate, and with seventeen importing from a tenth to a half of the power they use, there is no authority, in the absence of congressional action, for the regulation of the wholesaling of power across state lines. Thus, with the development of interstate power transmission, the companies get more and more out of hand. And through it all, the purring motor of the power industry's enormous propaganda machine has lulled the public into complacent sleep. If anyone doubts it, let him read the sober and restrained chapter of this book on the subject.

The investigators conclude, accordingly, that we have reached a crisis in public control. Public complacency, if it continues, will let the utility management continue to exploit the industry, as it has done in the past, for profit—plenty of it. State commissions must be given power and funds to fight for the rights of the public; they must have power to audit accounts; they must be given jurisdiction over holding companies. There must be effective federal control of companies operating across state lines. There must be prompt decision about utilizing great resources like Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, and the St. Lawrence in order to lower rates to consumers. Above all, the rate basis must be fixed. Till that is done, control is impossible—and already the Philistines are upon us!

In the second part of their work, the authors examine various more or less effective methods of control now in use, aside from our regulatory commissions. They study the law proposed in Massachusetts whereby all future grants would be refused to any utility that did not agree by contract to accept the State's system of regulation, and they explain fully the possibilities of regulation through the so-called contract system as it might be developed by state and federal authorities. They point out the possibilities of rate control through federal development of the great power resources combined with contracts with private or municipal corporations for distribution on terms strictly determined. Their chapter on the Ontario Hydro-Electric will be a joy to honest men bewildered now and again by some fresh smoke-screen of propaganda and falsehood concerning that enterprise put forth by the National Electric Light Association and its cohorts. With complete fairness, but with merciless clearness, they point out the basis of inaccuracies in these biased reports, and the Hydro emerges for what it is—a successful example of public operation on business principles, with high standards of service, and with a proud record of gains to consumers of all classes.

The English plan of integration of public and private enterprises under a single authority, designed ultimately to create a unified national system, is little known in this country, and the description of it in this book should stimulate the study it deserves.

After pointing out the really surprising degree to which the power industry meets the economists' tests for a publicly operated industry, and showing the almost insuperable obstacles in the way of present expansion of government ownership in this country, Dr. Mosher and his associates go on: "It may be confidently predicted that the present policy of high rates, of resisting control at every point, of secretiveness with regard to financial operations, and of the dubious manipulation of public opinion will be but the initial step in the direction of a public-power monopoly. The alternative and the only safe policy for a public-utility enterprise is acceptance of such changes in the regulatory system as will eliminate the unfortunate practices which have grown up in recent years." Their final conclusion may well be taken to heart by the utility leaders, apparently drunk with pride of power: "The primary and most urgent need in the electrical utility is public-spiritedness among the responsible leaders." Amen!

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Baudelaire

The Cult of Beauty in Charles Baudelaire. By S. A. Rhodes. Columbia University: Institute of French Studies. Two volumes. $3.

DR. RHODES performs a useful service in reminding us of what even Paul Valéry had forgotten, that Baudelaire's "debt" to Poe was, as the dates show, an affiliation through brotherhood, not discipleship, and that Poe's debt to Baudelaire is largely the recognition of the world. Indeed, there is little about Baudelaire that these two volumes do not display: the poet's keen response to life through each of the five senses, his views on prohibition, his anguished search for spirit through flesh, for God through Satan. Tennyson once protested that more persons than Horace had heard the sea moan; T. S. Eliot, foreseeing pedantic discussion of his own work, tells us the phrase "sylvan scene" in "The Waste Land" occurs earlier in Milton; and Dr. Rhodes, undeterred, assures us that Marcel Proust copied Baudelaire because, in a similar situation, one word is repeated—only in Proust the theme has "reached a lower degree of depravity" because Baudelaire drew down the shades which Mlle Vinteuil and her Gomorrhean (sic) friend leave open!

It is good to see Dr. Rhodes stress Baudelaire's insistence on the idea Jonson pointed: "To judge of poets is the faculty only of poets, and not of all poets, but the best"; but his efforts to "establish a bond between" his "own perceptions and those of the poet" are too labored. No man who writes "like we," "everybody in Balzac . . . have genius"; who discusses the flawlessness of the poet, his sense that every idea has its one perfect expression, and adds "It is up to the artist to discover it"; no one who translates Baudelaire—Baudelaire, whose style was "as polished as his finger-nails"!—into such English as "I am writing now a Salon, without seeing it," can be expected to attain the spirit of the man. This work is offered, not as a translation, but as an original American study of the French poet; and there is indeed no question that those whom the poet himself has inspired will here be, if nothing else, informed.

JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY

Indian Lore

A Book of Indian Tales. By Charles Erskine Scott Wood. The Vanguard Press. $2.

IN this volume the well-known Western poet and author of "Heavenly Discourse" retells Indian tales which he heard during his army career as a young man on the frontier. He makes no attempt to ascribe the tales to any tribe or to give analogies or to be exact in the spelling of Indian names. Most of the stories are those of the Northwest coast tribes. The book, of course, contributes nothing to anthropological collections; it does not attempt to do so. Its purpose is purely romantic: the recreation of the vast mountainous and desert lands where the native peoples clothe in teleological and imaginative lore their tribal habits and beliefs. The tales give one colorfully the atmosphere of early Western days and demonstrate the Indians' methods of thinking through life. Their authenticity need not be questioned since the book is unscientific in its purpose.

One of the best of the tales is not Indian at all. It is the venerable poet's own deep desire clothed in a psychological pattern akin to that of several of the Indian stories. This, the last of the collection, is the story of the long search after the land where death is not. Here, because the poet is freer, the language and method of narrative reach their highest intensity. The book is worth while for this story alone.

The volume may appeal to older children, but it has been written rather for minds that love primitive thought and vision. Many collections of Indian tales exist; the peculiar value of this volume lies in the fact that Mr. Wood heard the stories and has retold them after his own fashion.

EDA LOU WALTON

Contrasts

Nobel: Dynamite and Peace. By Ragnar Sohlman and Henrik Schuck. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $5.

THE double-compartment mind is more or less of a commonplace in religion. Michael Faraday, whose researches and discoveries mark an epoch in the history of physical science and yet who believed without doubt or question the most extravagant superstitions of orthodox Christian faith, had such a mind. But this double-compartment type of mentality is more common outside the field of religion than we sometimes imagine. Alfred Nobel, for example! Here is the immortal discoverer and manufacturer of dynamite, ballistite, and other vast explosives which have made war at last the most ghastly horror of the world, and at the same time a passionate lover of peace who glorified the cause by lifelong service and reward. These biographers of the great Swedish scientist recognize that "it seems inconsistent that a man who devoted so much energy to warlike inventions should at the same time have been a pronounced pacifist," and confess that he was "sensitive to the incongruousness of his work with his pacifist sentiments." They insist, however, that along with his scientific genius there was "the eternal idealist" in Nobel. But this is a mixture more mysterious than that of dynamite itself, and it takes a more profound and penetrating study than is contained in this pedestrian and purely external story of the man, to explain the combination. The book has neither literary merit nor historical importance. Its chief value is to be found in its account of the world-famous will, and in its record in the appendices of Nobel's patents and of the Nobel Prize winners.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

THEN I SAW THE CONGO

Grace Flandrau

author of "Being Respectable"

Two American women cross "darkest Africa" from West to East, and find that bright equatorial sunshine clears up a great many illusions fostered for their greater glory by gentlemen adventurers and yarn-spinning sailors. Here is a modern African Adventure, brilliantly real and exciting. Illustrated with photographs from the movie taken on the trip. $3.50

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

You can change your mind . . . .

. . . you can improve and control this machine of yours that thinks if you know how it works. If you know the laws of this mechanism called mind you can direct it intelligently instead of blindly. . . .

THE THINKING MACHINE

By C. JUDSON HERRICK

At All Bookstores. $3.00

The University of Chicago Press

5801 Ellis Avenue Chicago

Fiction Briefs

Ex-Wife. Anonymous. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

This thin volume purports to be the true story of a woman who was discarded by her husband, and who sought forgetfulness in promiscuity. Her rather lurid career terminated in a sincere passion for a married man. When he left her, she died emotionally, and her final remarriage was merely a passive half-humorous acknowledgment of loneliness. It is evident that the dramatic sequence is exaggerated and that even the more prosaic details of her flight from memory are theatricalized. Nevertheless, the narrative seems to be authentic; it has a certain intangible quality of truth. Whether it is true or not, however, the book is an interesting portrait of a particular type of post-war woman. Her flippant cynicisms, her nonchalant observations on sex, divorce, maternity, and freedom reveal the soul of those young, irresponsible women who have accepted too literally the maxims of Omar, and to whom life has become simply a thing to forget in cocktails and jazz. These incidental epigrams, by the way, are far more interesting than the adventures of the ex-wife who willingly submits to a man whether she loves him, hates him, or is indifferent to him.

Chronicles of a Gigolo. By Julian Swift. Horace Liveright. $2.

This book will probably annoy, and may enrage, those who like to have pleasant distinctions made in their favor. Such readers will be disconcerted in noting how little difference there is between so-called perversion and so-called normalness. They may be surprised to discover how really fine and genuine a person Julian Swift is. Perhaps they will see that this professional dancer has accomplished a good deal, and that the epitaph suggested by one of his clients, "He amused someone," means much. Julian is unsure, clever sometimes, sometimes smart, but the latter we forgive because it is so obviously a defense against a world which openly sneers and covertly slips a five-pound note into one's hand for services rendered. The very defects of the man contribute to an extraordinary self-characterization.

Plus and Minus. By Franz Harper. Translated from the German by Derick Wulff. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

The hero of this ultra-modern German novel knows "no other morality than to kiss and no other philosophy than to be happy." Dominated by runs of good and bad luck which bring alternate success and failure to his undertakings, he creates and exploits a robot in an attempt to win a beautiful compatriot. Mr. Harper's book belongs to the genre of "The Madonna of the Sleeping Cars," and provides diverting light reading. The complications which arise in Fedor Harolsen's pursuit of his lovely lady, together with the swiftness of the action, afford compensation for a style that is somewhat chaotic and for the strained sophistication and rather wearing animation of the characters.

The Eater of Darkness. By Robert M. Coates. The Macaulay Company. $2.50.

Both Robert Coates and his first novel are extremely interesting phenomena. For our knowledge of the author we are indebted to Malcolm Cowley, who contributes a critical portrait to the book-jacket. We learn that Mr. Coates is famous everywhere except at literary teas, that he is discussed in Montparnasse, Harlem, Normandy, Broadway, and the Riviera, that he collects matches and mechanical puzzles, and that although he is unknown to the general public, taxicab drivers and the cognoscenti know him very well indeed. The novel itself is an incredible compound of vaudeville and poetry. When the author is not burlesquing the "scientific" detective story, with its voluminous footnotes, he is rhapsodizing on the Palisades at sunset. Stray bits of literary gossip, brief ecstatic tone-poems on downtown New York, melodramatic murders, million-dollar robberies, and whatever else the author happened to think of are strewn indiscriminately over the pages. The result, surprisingly enough, is one of the most amusing novels of the season. According to Ford Madox Ford, it is a Dadaist novel. This should prove that if Dadaism is not taken too seriously, its very unintelligibility may become quite intelligible.

Outsiders. By Josephine Bentham. Rae D. Henkle Company. $2.50.

This is the first time, to our knowledge, that an author has personified in the character of a woman the spiritual confusion that belongs so definitely to this generation. More important than the story of Leslie and Paul's incompatible marriage is the study of Leslie's uncertain relation with life. Were Miss Bentham able to construct a plot as well as she describes Leslie, "Outsiders" would be an important social novel. As it is, Paul and the other characters are not made sufficiently integral to the theme to afford the necessary contrast; they are too casually introduced and poorly handled. The episodes, also, lack all structural connection and the prologue and scenes in the first chapter are inexcusably awkward and unsatisfactory. In fact were it not for the dialogue the style of the book would be negligible. Fortunately, the conversation is vigorous, personal, and idiomatic.

Farmer, Have You a Daughter Fair? By Mike Wallach. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

The subtitle is: "A Traveling Salesman Meets the Mamselles from Armentières," and the blurb informs us that the "book describes one phase of the World War sadly neglected by historians." This jocular, nudge-in-the-ribs ballyhoo is hardly confirmed by the contents, which are sufficiently banal. From them we learn that when Mr. Wallach had ten francs in his pocket he made a bee-line for the nearest lady of joy; but this can hardly be considered a revelation. Mr. Wallach winds up his trifling smoking-room narrative with a priceless Al Jolsonism: "One more week and discharge! Then a family reunion at home with hearts overbrimming with tearful joy. I sank into my own bed that night, and closed my eyes, vainly seeking sleep. Many times my mother tip-toed into the room. I heard her sigh softly." The book has a certain slight value as a record of the war-reactions of one who was entirely without any emotional relation to the struggle.

Drama

Mauve Decade—With Music

I HAVE never attempted to conceal my genuine—if temperate—liking for what is commonly regarded as the vulgarest type of American musical entertainment. When speed, nakedness, and noise are glorified with the abandon which characterizes the most frenzied of our revues, I revel sedately and am not bored unless the producer aspires to better things. Jazz and black jokes may be exceedingly elementary forms of art, but they are at least genuine and hence infinitely preferable to the attenuated pseudo-gentility of most operetta, with its fourth-rate romanticism and those tinkling little tunes which are nothing except feeble examples of respectable music. "Refined" has always seemed to me the most damning adjective which can be applied to a musical show, and though I often remain in my seat as long as the dancing is furious enough, nothing except a hurried exit can save me from a lasting fit of depression when the hero and heroine begin to take the moon seriously.

All this is by way of preparing an emphasis for the statement that, despite my adherence to the opinions just enunciated, I nevertheless found very pleasantly beguiling the new entertainment which Oscar Hammerstein 2d is sponsoring and to which, for no very persuasive reason, he has given the name "Sweet Adeline" (Hammerstein Theater). It is, to be sure, a musical comedy rather than a revue. It has, that is to say, a plot which is being remembered at least half of the time and it makes no use whatever of the appeal of bare skin. Yet it manages, nevertheless, to be both lively and entertaining, and I am inclined to attribute this (to me at least) surprising fact to two circumstances: (1) The librettist exhibits some signs of that intelligence and wit which seem generally denied those who compose librettos; and (2) several of the performers are possessed of talents first rate in their kind instead of being, as the stars of semi-serious musical comedy usually are, merely people whose voices are not good enough for opera.

The scene is laid in the gay nineties, and though the humorous possibilities inherent in the quaint ways of our immediate ancestors have been recently overworked, they are here developed with a gentleness which contrasts very favorably with the fatuous overemphasis which has marked a good many of the recent mocking revivals. In the tone of the whole one detects a quality which is almost literary, and one realizes that it is the result of a kind of sophistication quite different from that which is one of the virtues of the rowdy revue. This latter is the sophistication of those whose feeling for the language, manners, and moods of the contemporary noisy set is as extraordinary as their obtuseness where everything else is concerned. It is the sophistication of those who are as familiar with the intricacies of jazz rhythm as they are incapable of appreciating any other kind, and who are as accomplished in their use of slang as they are incompetent to handle any other idiom. But the author of the book of "Sweet Adeline" has, despite the familiarity of the plot material which he uses, a certain sensitiveness which can only be the result of what, for all the inappropriate portentousness of the word, we must call a kind of culture. Hence he can wander from the paths usually trodden by writers of revues without falling into that dull imbecility which is usually the only quality detectable in the work of the contemporary American librettist who aspires to operetta.

As for the talented performers, the most conspicuous are Helen Morgan and Irene Franklin. The former, and more recently renowned, gets all that it is possible to get out of mawkishly doleful ballads of the kind popular in the night clubs where broken hearts have been for some time exceedingly popular. The second, long famous on the vaudeville stage, exhibits a broader range, and her scene programmed as "Lulu Does Her Stuff" is quite the best thing of the whole evening. "Sweet Adeline" is obviously destined to last most of the season and it deserves to do so.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

□ THEATERS □

GILBERT MILLER
(by arrangement with Maurice Browne)
presents
Journey's End
By R. C. Sheriff
HENRY MILLER'S THEATRE, 124 West 43rd Street
Eves. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

□ CINEMA □

Starting This Saturday Sept. 14

THE MOST REVOLUTIONARY ADVANCE IN THE MOTION PICTURE TO DATE!

LIFE IN RUSSIA—
—Caught with the Naked Lens!

A COLOSSAL CROSS-SECTION OF THE PULSING EXISTENCE IN THE LAND OF THE SOVIETS.

FIRST SHOWING IN AMERICA

Direct From Moscow.

A Sovkino Production
An Amkino Release

The Berlin press hails this unique film: "Marvellous photography . . . full of character . . . extremely interesting . . . thrilling . . . exciting . . . excels everything so far presented in field of artistic film-creations . . . wonderful detail work . . . stands on the highest level . . . the most progressive film of the time. . . ."

—and on the same program—

A Remarkable Soviet Comedy

Exhilarant—Exciting—Exuberant

introducing a unique comedy team
ANNA STEN and KOWAL-SAMBORSKI

• FILM GUILD CINEMA •
52 West 8th St. Spring 5095-5090-1716 bet. 5th & 6th Aves.
Popular Prices — Continuous Daily Noon to Midnight
Special Weekday Price — 12 to 2 — 35c

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

HOUSES—APARTMENTS

APARTMENTS TO RENT

GREENWICH VILLAGE (82 Horatio St.) a little community consisting of charming 1, 2, 3 room apartments. Complete kitchenettes, baths, showers, woodburning fireplaces, facing beautiful garden. $47.50 up. Watkins 10210 after 11.

CHARMING two rooms, bath, kitchenette; steam heat, fireplace. Chelsea district. $75. including gas and electricity. Rent October 1st. Watkins 5954 or write Box 2138, % The Nation.

GREENWICH VILLAGE—Modern daylight studios, overlooking garden; two open brick fireplaces; graftex walls; 3-4 large rooms and kitchenette. $80 up. 30 Gansevoort St. (Cor. Hudson St., near Abingdon Square.)

ROOMS FOR RENT

GENTILE private family (3 adults) have comfortable, nicely furnished, newly decorated living-bedroom, suitable lady or gentleman; elevator, shower; near Riverside Drive, restaurants; few steps subway, buses; reasonable. Edgecomb 5679.

HOUSE FOR SALE

EAST ORANGE, N. J. Closing estate. Unusually cheerful, well-built house, recently redecorated, 4 master bedrooms, 2 tiled baths, parquet floors, steam heat, secluded garden, forest trees. Phone Orange 3694-R.

ROOM WANTED

YOUNG MAN, architect, desires pleasant room with piano. Call evenings, after 8. Algonquin 3819.

BOARD WANTED

OR room only, for business mother, also complete care and board for 5 year daughter. 1 room for both. Prefer home with woman having daughter same age. Liberal pay. Box 2142, % The Nation.

SHARE APARTMENT

YOUNG LADY of refinement and education has attractive apartment that she wishes to share with cultured business girl; references requested; phone evenings Davenport 1775 or write Box 2146, % The Nation.

DISCUSSION

THE GROUP
A Clearing House of Opinion meets at Auditorium—150 West 85th St.
DR. A. A. BRILL will speak on
"INTERPRETATION OF DREAMS, PHANTASIES AND SYMPTOMS"
Tuesday, September 17th at 8:30 P. M.
Admission 50c. Organized 1918
S. A. Seligson, Director, 285 Madison Ave.

POSITIONS WANTED

TEACHER, ten years' experience as head of dormitory, camp executive, dramatic coach, English, desires position in school or as governess. Prefers vicinity New York or Boston. Address Box 2143, % The Nation.

YOUNG woman, college graduate, with literary ability, journalistic training, five years editorial and secretarial experience, wants full or part-time position. Box 2144, % The Nation.

YOUNG woman, expert bookkeeper desires full or part-time work. Salary secondary to intellectual environment. Box 2145, % The Nation.

RESORTS

The Camp for Moderns

GREEN MANSIONS
Warrensburg, N. Y.

The Most Complete Adult Camp In the Adirondacks
Rich in autumnal beauty
Open until October First

Tel. Chestertown 370
LENA BARISH Directors SAM GARLEN
Write for booklet

UNITY HOUSE
IN THE BLUERIDGE MOUNTAINS

An ideal place in the Fall. As beautiful and inspiring as in May. Private mile and a half lake—new tennis and hand-ball courts—

A spacious lounge—fireplaces—covered walks—cozy library—bowling, billiards, etc.
OPEN ALL YEAR. STEAM HEAT.

Reservations essential

UNITY HOUSE
Forest Park, Penn.
Bushkill 4R2-5R3

NEW YORK OFFICE
3 W. 16th St.
Chelsea 2148

Operated on a non-profit basis—the comfort of our guests is our only incentive to effort. Owned by The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

Spend your September vacation in the heart of the Adirondacks at
TROUT LAKE CAMP
Rates $25.00 per week
All Sports—Excellent food
Booklet on request
P. O. Lake George N. Y.
Tel. Bolton 96

SECLUDED Country Resort—Conducive to enjoyable relaxation; wholesome table; tennis; 1½ hours from Grand Central; $25 weekly. HIL-BERT HOUSE, Lake Mahopac, N. Y. Hill Friedberg, Prop. Tel. Mahopac 853.

Hospitality That Is Unique

It brings back friends year after year

Western View Farm
New Milford, Connecticut
83 miles from Columbus Circle
elevation 1000 feet—10th season
$8 a day, $49 a week
Telephone: New Milford 440.

Open Until December

Riding Swimming Tennis
Interesting people

Open Until December

Apartments

Let The Nation help solve your apartment problem. We are doing it all the time for others.

says one advertiser—

"We've rented a delightful apartment through the ad we ran in your publication."

Rates, minimum half inch (30 words) $3.08. Additional lines of 6 words, 62 cents each.

Send advertising, with remittance to

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York City

Dance! Laugh! Play!
In this glorious Mountain-Lake country.
Camp Sports in a Setting of Hotel Comforts
SPECIAL LOW RATES NOW!
Write for descriptive booklet "J. T."

NEW MODERN BUILDINGS
KENMORE
at the Lake
NORTH WHITE LAKE, N. Y.
Station: Liberty. Phone: White Lake 61
N. Y. Office: 182 Fifth Ave.

MAGAZINE

TOLERANCE

LOVERS of TOLERANCE—Mail name and address for free copy of Tolerance Magazine, 60 Bank Street, New York.

GRAPHOLOGY

GRAPHOLOGIST.—Have you ever taken a personal inventory? Your handwriting, well interpreted, summarizes your assets and liabilities. Write letter. Miss Florence M. Lyon, Box 286, Quincy, Mass.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXIX NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1929 No. 3351

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 313
EDITORIALS:
The Shipbuilders and Shearer 316
Keep Your Shirt On 317
U. S. E. 317
Divorce à la Yucatan 318
IT SEEMS TO HEYWOOD BROUN 319
MAINE WINS ITS POWER FIGHT. By C. C. Nicolet 320
ANARCHY VS. COMMUNISM IN GASTONIA. By Nell Battle Lewis 321
DISHONORING THE D. A. R. By Helen Tufts Bailie 323
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 325
CORRESPONDENCE 326
BOOKS AND DRAMA:
Father and Son. By Carleton Drewry 327
A Free Woman. By James Rorty 327
The Triumph of Time. By Joseph Wood Krutch 327
An Imperfect Philosophy. By Mortimer J. Adler 328
Realism and Mannerism. By Clifton P. Fadiman 329
Finding Borrow. By Norah Meade 329
Lincoln Legends. By Luther E. Robinson 329
Railroad Pioneer. By Oswald Garrison Villard 330
Books in Brief 330
Drama: Ship-Shape. By Joseph Wood Krutch 332
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Life and Property in the Caribbean—II. Protection of Property. By Jonathan Wickwire 335
CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE 338

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor
HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, Managing Editor

Associate Editors
ARTHUR WARNER
DOROTHY VAN DOREN PAUL BLANSHARD

